PORTRAIT OF PROSPER M. WETMORE.

Among the poets of America, the name of Prosper M. Wetmore must long maintain an honourable rank. Although he has published but little, yet that little is enough to distinguish him as a practised and powerful writer and a man of genius. His compositions are characterized at once by energy and a chastened taste. We know of few lyrics in the language that can compete with his "Lexington," in Tyrtæan ardour and beauty of versification. It is, perhaps, the best known of the author's productions; but we think many of his shorter pieces are quite as much entitled to admiration; among them, the spirited stanzas to Murat will not soon be forgotten. Mr. Wetmore has collected his fugitive poems, including "Lexington," into a volume, which was given to the public six or seven years ago, and is, doubtless, in the libraries of a majority of the lovers of poetry in our land. Like two of his eminent coevals, Halleck and Sprague, Mr. Wetmore is engaged in active commercial pursuits, from which he too rarely withdraws himself to "build the lofty rhyme." He seems utterly to have forsaken the muses of late, and is, if we mistake not, not only a man of business but of politics. It may be for some future commentator or biographer to exclaim:

"How sweet an Ovid was in Murray lost!"

The likeness we present our readers to-day is a faithful one, and was engraved by Parker from an admirable painting by Henry Inman.

THE ILLUSTRIOUS OBSCURE.

BY WILLIAM COX.

"The world knows nothing of its greatest men."—Philip Van Artevelde.

CHAPTER I.

Containing sundry original interrogations and reflections, appropriate to the history.

Who can estimate the pains and pangs attendant upon the possession of the fatal gift of genius? Who can form the slightest conception of the wild ideas, the bewildering reveries, the scathing thoughts, the gloomy reflections, the eagle flights, that tear and rend to pieces the fine tissue work of the cellular membranes? Who can comprehend the inflammatory action incessantly going on in the over-excited brain? Who, indeed—for who, it may boldly and fearlessly be asked, can comprehend the incomprehensible? Is not genius—or the reputation of it—coveted by all men? Yet, what has it done for them? Has it not plunged those afflicted with it into the depths of misery—brought them to the verge of madness—given them hints, not to be mistaken, of ultimate starvation? Has it not lifted them above the clouds, only to let them fall the heavier to earth again? Has it not elevated them to barren high places—mental pilvins—merely to be pelted, scoffed at, and reviled by the crowd below? It has. It has found men poor, and it has kept them poor. It has found them rich, and brought them to the insolvent court. It has dragged the bowl, sharpened the dagger, whetted the knife, strapped the razor, primed the pistol, for its unhappy possessors! It has hung them up by the neck in verdant forest glades, and caused them to bathe in deep waters without taking off their clothes. It has done many things; and most indubitably, among others, it shut up the shop of Josiah Jefferson Craggs, apothecary, 638 Bowery.

Terrible gift! dreadful distinction!

CHAPTER II.

Of the birth and parentage of Josiah Jefferson Craggs, and of his progenitors.

The great Craggs, when little, came into the world pretty much in the same manner as other people, and for the first twelve months of his existence took his infantile sustenance without evincing any marked peculiarity to distinguish him from the ordinary run of children. Shortly after this, however, his mother and female relatives began to express an opinion that he was by no means a "common child," (very few are), and being an only one, his precocious sayings and doings were duly noted and narrated for the profit and entertainment of all who visited the house of Craggs. But it is much to be regretted that the details of the earlier period of his life are lamentably obscure and apocryphal. A hazy incertitude hangs over the days of his childhood and adolescence; indeed, the only thing of moment that is positively known, is the interesting fact recorded in the literary scrap-book of an azure maiden aunt of his, that at the age of six he showed a decided preference for the history of Jack the Giant Killer, (or, as many learned men and sound authorities write it—Queller), over that of Tom Thumb.

This mark of discrimination was looked upon by the family as something

The father of our hero, Hancock Madison Craggs, flourished in the city of New-York as an eminent tallow-chandler towards the close of the eighteenth and early portion of the nineteenth centuries. It may be as well to mention—as everything connected with genius acquires a perhaps adventitious consequence—that the original manner of spelling this obscurely-illustrious name was "Scraggs;" but one of Josiah's ancestors being gifted with a refined taste and euphonious notions, thought proper to drop the s, thus at once cutting the association which connected the family name with the extreme or "scraggy" end of a neck of mutton, and at the same time skillfully connecting it with the picturesque beauties of nature—"ye crags and peaks," etc.

Hancock Madison Craggs was an inoffensive man. He neither distinguished, nor sought to distinguish himself, in arts, arms, politics, philosophy, or literature, but no man made better candles; and as the fame of his "dips," long and short, spread abroad, and the excellence of his "moulds" became known, his money, and consequently his respectability, increased. But his accumulative propensities relaxed not; and he continued to devote all his energies to the profitable task of enlightening his neighbours.

Sitting in his shop, however, one summer's afternoon, being then in the fortieth year of his age, it suddenly occurred to him, that he might just as well take a wife and perpetuate the name of Craggs, as leave his cash to distant relatives. It also occurred to him that there was not many orders in to execute, and therefore there could not be a better time than the present. Being a man of strictly business habits, he accordingly advertised for a helpmate the next morning, and in the evening paper of the same day he was blessed with a favourable response. He was a little daunted, it was true, by the promptitude of the reply, but he scorned to shrink from his word. An interview took place, preliminaries were arranged, and three weeks afterwards he bowed his neck to the yoke, and went through the trying ceremony of matrimony with a decent fortitude and a manly resignation that evinced no ordinary firmness of character.

In the due and legitimate time allowed by law and nature, Josiah Jefferson Craggs, the illustrious obscure of the present memoir, squalled melodiously in his nurse's arms.

CHAPTER III.

Of the early days of young Craggs, and how he astounded his relatives.

The biographies of most eminent men—Sheridan, Scott, Crabbe, Byron, etc., go to prove that they were but dull boys, inept scholars, and that wit, poetry, or eloquence, could neither be whipped into or out of them. Young Craggs, in these respects, bore a striking and hopeful resemblance to those great men, for a more inveterately stupid youth never puzzled a tutor. True, he learned to read, and, moreover, wrote a hand which, like that of other gentlemen of genius, it was almost impossible to decipher; but all attempts to inculcate him with any portion of arithmetical knowledge were found to be altogether fruitless; and as for grammar, not only did he loathe, abhor, and despise it in his secret soul, but he habitually evinced his thorough contempt for it in his ordinary conversation. In fact, common people thought him a fool; but the backs of his copybooks began to show flashes—coruscations—of the spirit within him. They were covered with such rural rhymes as "plough," and "cow"—of a sentimental character, as "despair," "nightmare," and of an affecting or incipient satirical tendency, as "heart," "smart," "depart," "waters blue," "a long edieu," "a think of you;" from which those who could see beyond the mere surface of things, or were under obligations in business to the elder Craggs, surmised that there was more in the young Josiah than met the eye. The "faculty divine," however, might have remained long undeveloped—might have smouldered away unseen, unknown; he might have been a "mute inglorious Milton," he might have been a tallow-chandler, but for an event untoward in itself, but productive of the happiest and most important consequences, and which, like the application of a match to a rocket, sent his genius at once soaring and blazing away into the seventh heaven.

His blue-stocking aunt had a tortoise-shell cat. The tortoise-shell cat was imprudent in its habits—staid out late o' nights, and a cold, an inflammation, and an untimely end were the series of consequences brought on by its bad hours and irregular modes of living. Great was the lamentation which ensued. The aunt was inconsolable; and for two days and two nights afterwards, young Craggs, then in his sixteenth year, was observed to be a changed creature. He was lost in thought, abrupt in his answers, absent in his manner, and started in his sleep. This was attributed to his extreme sensibility; but lo! on the third morning, a folded sheet of foolscap gilt-edged paper was observed upon his literary relative's dressing-table. She opened it, and a "Monody on the Death of a Favourite Tortoiseshell Cat," met her astonished view. She read it, and went into a fit of unequivocal raptures—hurried down to the breakfast-table, where, after an immensity of questioning, much mystery, a good deal of blushing, and somewhat of flutter and trepidation, the author, at last, stood revealed in the person of her nephew!

Upon this Mrs Craggs, who had pertinaciously refused to read the lines until she had finished her coffee and toast, eagerly seized them, fell into a fit of raptures also, shed tears of joy, and uttered sundry thankful ejaculations for having been "blest with such a son!"

After the breakfast-things had been cleared away, and the proud mother and delighted aunt left by themselves, a consultation was held touching the wonderful discovery of the morning, when both ladies simultaneously found out that it was a long time since they had had a tea-party; upon which the number of chairs, silver tea-spoons, and Chinese cups and saucers were counted, and a proportionate quantity of invitations issued.

CHAPTER IV.

Of the great Craggs's tea-drinking, and the consequences thereof.

On one of the dog-days in the year 18—, all the talent, beauty, and fashion connected intimately or remotely with the family of the tallow-chandler, assembled at six o'clock in the evening in his best parlour, and speedily a cloud of white vapour, the combined evaporations of two-and-twenty smoking cups o'er-canopied the heads of two-and-twenty lovers of adulterated hot water. As the operation "progressed," the atmosphere became hot and humid to the last degree. The countenances of the ladies assumed the hue of "flame-coloured tuffets," and their curls—all the crispness taken out—unanimously uncurred, and hung down, in most mermaid and disconsolate fashion, around their perspiring countenances. They had all pretty much the appearance of having recently emerged from a vapour bath, and their attempts to look cheerful and fascinating were, it is to be regretted, anything but successful. The hostess, though as hot as most of them, persisted, as is usual, in showing the greatest hospitality by pressing the company to eat and drink considerably more than they thought requisite. A general desire, however, seemed to prevail to get the scalding fluid out of the room as soon as possible, when, unfortunately, a little, fat gentleman—a distant relation, noted vulgar though reported rich, inadvertently yielded, much to her horror and surprise, to the hypocritical entreaties of the hostess to take a "fourth cup," which he sipped very leisurely amid the silent maledictions of the more refined two and three cupites. After he had finished, the little gentleman arose, threw open the window, sat down beside it, flung himself back in his chair, stretched out his legs, set his arms a-kimbo, and commenced puffing and blowing with the regularity and precision of a steadily-worked bellows.

After the tea-kettle had been cleared away, and the individuals composing the company had informed each other that it was "very hot!"—"very!"—"very close," "exceedingly so," etc., Miss Smithers, (the azure aunt), announced that she believed she had "a little treat in store for them," whereupon they one and all declared that they "really could not take anything more;" and the little, fat gentleman stopped puffing and blowing in order to express his belief that he had taken a good deal too much already; upon which Mrs. Craggs gave a supercilious and malignant glance towards the vulgarian—when his eyes were turned another way and then looked smilingly and apologetically around towards the rest of the assembly. Miss S., however, simperingly explained that it was a "mental" treat to which she alluded, and forthwith the aforesaid sheet of foolscap gilt-edged writing paper, was produced and laid on the table with an air of very considerable mystery.

The several portions of the company looked puzzled, and straightway the eyes of Master Craggs became intently fixed upon the ceiling.

Miss Smithers then proceeded to read, with much emphasis, but very little discretion—in consequence of being carried away by her feelings—the "Monody on the Death of a Tortoise-shell Cat," during which operation Josiah's face assumed a decidedly apologetic appearance.

This is not the place to give that monody entire, and a sense of justice will not permit us to mar its pathetic beauty and touching simplicity by fragmentary quotations. Suffice it to say, that after Miss Smithers had finished, a murmur of satisfaction and applause filled the room, and it being obvious that it was a family affair, the inquiries after the tender and talented author became numerous and pressing in the extreme; whereupon Mrs. Craggs and Miss Smithers looked fondly, complacently, and knowingly towards a certain individual who still continued to peruse the ceiling. The company took the hint, and unanimously looked amazed and gratified beyond measure. The approbation of course became vociferous, and exclamations of—"Is it possible!"—"Dear me!"—"Well, I declare!"—"Who would have thought it!" flew round the room in all directions.

Grateful as the dew on Hermon was all this to the soul of Josiah. And his protestations that the "thing was nothing!"—"a mere trifle!" etc., only added to the prostration in his favour. "A mere trifle, indeed!" indignantly exclaimed the guests, and one solemn old gentleman sagely remarked, that "modesty and ability always went hand in hand."

Enough! the triumph was complete, and when the company broke up, every individual present (except the vulgarian) begged for a copy of the "Monody," as the greatest earthly favour that could possibly be bestowed upon them.

The cat had been previously stuffed by one of the most accomplished artists in that line; the monody was printed, framed, and hung up above it, and the future destiny of Josiah Jefferson Craggs was fixed!

(To be concluded in our next.)

ORIGINAL TALES FROM THE GERMAN.

THE GRAZIOSO.

BY MRS. ELLET.

IN THREE PARTS—PART THE FIRST.

It was on a clear balmy morning in the spring of 1703, that a number of carriages, drawn by mules, were moving slowly along the highway leading to the capital of a certain German prince. The roads were at that period in a condition not far from dangerous, which accounted for the massive structure even of the most elegant vehicles. Those, however, of which we now speak belonged rather to the class of freight-wagons, and were well laden with the persons and chattels of an Italian dramatic and dancing company, journeying on the express invitation of the prince.

Spite of the tedious road, the tenants of the wagons showed merry faces; even Signor Ranuzio Spacciamino, the impressario, (the office is, in general a sorrowful one,) looked gaily around him, full of the pleasant certainty that his empty money-boxes were soon to overflow through the liberality of the prodigal prince. He spoke not, but there was meaning in his looks, as if in the depth of his manager-soul he rejoiced and exulted. The other members of the troop on the contrary were loud in mirth; some chatted, some sang canzonets, some emulated the birds, and roused the echoes with idle whistling.

A short distance in advance of the first wagon rode, on spirited mules, a young woman of unrivalled beauty, and a young man, whose fine though strongly marked features showed a strange mixture of cunning and audacity, of good nature and satirical malice; to an experienced observer readily announcing him as no other than the grazioso of the company.

The fair one was evidently the prima donna, as proclaimed by her demeanour, the haughty yet at the same time languishing glance of her large dark eyes, the arch smile of her rosy lips, and above all the magnificent voice, as she joined in the tune the grazioso began to play upon the mandoline.

The others became instantly silent, as Fiametta, (that was the name of the lovely girl,) began to sing, save at the close of every verse, when the chorus struck in with accompaniment of castnet and tambourine. The song ran as follows:

"Love, curious, once travelled Unknown the world around,
To seek, to prove, if any where
Could constancy be found
But ah! the search was vain,
And vain the eternal porch;
Where one was found to keep the vow
'Twas broken by the other!

CHORUS.

Believe, O yes believe him,
If Love doth promise pleasure,
Believe the sweet delight he brings,
But Truth's a hidden treasure.

Then sighed Love—full of sorrow;
Is then my power so small!
Must I not count upon a day—
I—mightiest of all!

But smiling said Dame Venus,
"Dear boy—set trouble free;
Love will endure for ever,
As doth Inconstancy."

CHORUS.

If one we love forsakes us,
Must we sans comfort be!
For ever, ever, Love endures,
As doth Inconstancy! etc.

When the song ended, the merry people shouted and clapped their approbation. But Fiametta turned to her companion and said, "Your song, Giovecchino, is like yourself! half pleasant, half perverse; it vexes me whenever I sing it, and yet I have it always on my lips. Can you tell me why it is so?"

"O yes!" answered the grazioso; "you are a thorough woman and never know your own mind!"

"A bad conclusion, good friend; I certainly know it in one respect!"

"In what? I should like to hear."

"I always laugh at you whenever you prate to me of your love!"

"Laugh or weep, Fiametta, I will never believe that I sigh in vain, till you can treat me with indifference!"

"Ah, poor knave! then you may hope to the world's end, for I can be indifferent towards no man. But only wait till the right one comes to woo me and wins my heart—"

"Death and the furies!" cried the grazioso fiercely, and Fiametta burst into a musical laugh.

"Tell me, Giovecchino," said she archly, "how stands it now with your confidence!" and wheeling her mule round, she rode back singing to the carriage in which sat the impressario.

"The witch has again stirred me beyond bounds!" murmured Giovecchino, laughing at his vexation and striking his forehead. "Yes—" he sighed with a comic expression of disquiet, "yes—I am a fool, who seeks all imaginable means of tormenting himself but, by St. Jannario! I love her better than the light of my eyes; ay, and she loves me; yes, she loves me—only. Madonna help her! she will not own it!"

The company here drew nigh the end of their journey; they entered a chestnut avenue, and saw shine in the morning light the towers of the princely city, whose gates were soon to open hospitably for their reception.

At the expense of the sovereign a stately mansion was fitted up for the abode of the company, the distinguished members of which were frequently supplied with choice dishes from the prince's table.

An open space surrounded with pavilions was assigned them, where the stage scenery, etc. were arranged; the impressario, putting all in order to the best advantage, assisted in his labours with alacrity by Giovecchino and the primo amoroso, Antonio Monte Cavallo. After a few days the preparations were so far advanced, that all was ready for the rehearsals. The impressario failed not to announce this important intelligence to the court marshal, who conveyed it, as in duty bound, to the gracious ears of his master.

"You really are, then, of opinion, that this company will suit us!" asked the prince.

"Most undoubtedly, my lord; it is the same company your highness saw and was pleased to commend three years ago in Naples, and they have improved much since that time, particularly in the new grazioso, a wild lad, who seems created for the part he has to play."

"And what is become of the pretty child, the dark-eyed little girl who sang and danced so bewitchingly!" she called Fiametta, if I mistake not."

"Ah! I marvel at my gracious lord's memory," cried the marshal with a deep inclination; his eyes flashed as he proceeded, "by mine honour, your highness, the little Fiametta is grown the loveliest maiden my eyes ever beheld!"

"Indeed?"

"As I have the honour to assure my gracious lord, never saw I such a shape! such perfect symmetry, youthful fullness and freshness! And a head, my prince, such a head! I say too little, when I say it combines Juno's majesty with the beauty of Aphrodite! The glance of her eye is like the storm-lightning of a summer's night! Yet what avails description; may it please you, my lord, to see her yourself!"

"Now by my faith that will I," laughed the sovereign, "and the sooner the better." The marshal received his orders, and the next afternoon the prince went without other attendance than his confidant, to be present at the rehearsal.

The impressario, apprised beforehand by the marshal what an honour he might expect, received the royal visitor in his best attire, and with the deepest humility. An immense Spanish peruke adorned his venerable head; his crimson coat was so adorned with gold lace, a hand's breadth wide, that the original colour of the material was only visible in small spots; in short, Signor Ranuzio Spacciamino shone and glistened like a gold bug. His blue satin vest was richly embroidered; his black velvet breeches were fastened at the knee with huge bright yellow rosettes of silk; his flesh-coloured stockings had golden clocks, his shoes golden buckles and high heels; a long, pointed sword, and a small three-cornered cap decorated with magnificent plumes completed his elaborate array.

With a persuasive melody of speech, granted of heaven only to those born in the Strada di Toledo at Naples, Signor Ranuzio Spacciamino lauded his glorious fortune, and the condescension which had induced so great, and powerful, and generous, and renowned a prince to suffer the sunlight of his presence to irradiate a poor, obscure impressario. Having concluded his oration, he stood awaiting the royal answer, in an attitude of humility much resembling that of a pocket-knife half clasped; but his highness laughed most uncourtiously in his face. "Leave your silly compliments, Signor Ranuzio," said he; "we want no such stuff; but show me the members of your company." Though somewhat disconcerted, Signor Ranuzio bowed so low that his dependent arms touched the ground, and did as he was commanded.

Highly delighted was the prince, when, as the impressario called over the names and presented the members in turn, the grazioso came forth with a merry leap, improvising an appropriate canzonet. A full pulse thrown to him proved his gracious satisfaction at the performance of the sprightly lad. But an involuntary exclamation escaped the prince, as Signor Spacciamino introduced the fair Fiametta. "By my truth!" whispered he, entranced to the marshal, "the damsel is divine!" Fiametta was not unaware of the effect her appearance produced; it occasioned her some embarrassment and she stood before the sovereign with downcast eyes. At length his highness recollected himself; he was pleased to pay her some compliments, whereby many a court dame would have pined with envy, inviting her, during the rehearsal in the intervals of her singing, to take a seat near him. He in fact led her to the seat, in defiance of all etiquette, for it was the place appropriated to the princess during the evening representation. Yet the marshal took no notice; nor would even the high seneschal, had he been present, have dared to remind his highness of the breach of form; the master of that court observed etiquette only so long as it pleased him.

ENIGMAS.

THE CLOUD.

In light, in shade, its changing form appears,
Now clothed in blushes and now bathed in tears;
It spreads its wings upon the summer air,
And sits in silence on the mountain bare;
Wrapped in the shadows of its gloomy breast,
The springs of life, the fires of vengeance, rest;
It floats in kindness, and it flies in wrath,
And skies grow darker in its awful path;
It paints the petal of the dying flower,
It shakes the temple, and it rocks the tower!
Its shaft strikes down the lovely and the brave,
Yet will it turn and weep upon their grave.

THE DEW-DROP.

It came unheard, and darkness veiled its birth,
The child of heaven, yet only seen on earth;
It lay half hidden in the folded leaves,
The sleeping floweret round her bosom weaves,
And when the moonbeam touched it from afar,
It shone and sparkled like a fallen star;
But ah, it trembled in the breath of day,
And softly faded like a dream away.
Such was its fate, and thro' without a stain
It came to earth, and sought the shoes again;
A rosy cradle, and a golden shroud,
Born in a flower, and dying in a cloud.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

VIEWS IN ONEIDA COUNTY.

I AM inclined to think, Mr. Editor, that the scenery of middle New-York—of Oneida county, for instance—has not been sufficiently appreciated and extolled. I imagine, moreover, I can let you into the secret. It is this: the route of travel lies through the swamp region of the canal; that long snake (whose tongue is cooled in the waters of Lake Erie, and whose "tip of tail" tickles the Hudson at Albany) preferring, as is natural, the low, hemlock, old stump and frog region to the country above. I do not blame said serpent, the pet of the state, for preferring the low grounds to the distressing heights, which, south-west of the Mohawk, swell up and then sink away into valleys; ah! how voluptuously beautiful! But I wish to blame those who have wandered by the banks of the Mohawk where it saunters down from the regions north of Rome—those who have gazed upon the Oriskany and the groves which emperors so its meandering, who have stood upon the elevation called "Butt's hill," viewing beneath, far—far beneath, the spires of the would-be capital, and in the dim distance, perched upon the avenue of poplars, the stately chapel and buildings of Hamilton College. Let me speak of one of these scenes. About six miles from a spot (on the canal) called Mansion-House village, the memory whereof is fragrant by reason of its swarms of toppers, its profusion of beer, and the bright excellence, pungency and variety of its jokes—six miles from this rare village, is a ravine, into which, from the height above, by a steep, smooth road, and past a mill, you descend upon a bridge. A queer, picturesque old thing it is; and it spans the Mohawk.

I am given to understand that the inhabitants of the neighbourhood contemplate a new erection to supplant the old building, which now hovers over the child-like waters and crazily threatens to "crush" them "into mist." Nothing can be more preposterous than this plan. It is true, the present contrivance has, by its shaking, been the curious means of frightening several females into fits; it is true, several horses, amused by the rocking of the old timbers, and by the gaping of several holes disclosing a river twenty-five feet below, have thereupon reared, and by their upright conduct expressed themselves desirous of jumping over into the water; where-by, pulses have been quickened, and cheeks paled, yes, even to the whiteness of the foam which dances down the current. I do not deny the propriety of a man's getting his life insured, or of putting his hymn-book into his pocket, and making his will previous to venturing over said bridge with a plump, bouncing team and a couple of ladies in the back seat of his vehicle. Spare me, if you please, the imputation of contradicting your assertion that, in all probability, the plunge through the shivered planks and parting beams, of Mr. A. and oxen, or of Mr. B. wife and daughters, will, ere the year is closed, furnish the country papers sundry dainty paragraphs headed "awful catastrophe," "shocking accident," etc.

But the question is this: whether such trifling occurrences (past or prospective) are as hinted at above, are sufficient to warrant the complete destruction of the old, and the construction of a new bridge? Even if the old one should sink away with or without a load of flour and two yoke of cattle, ought not some reverence to be entertained for the ancient—old weather-stained and most beautified as it is? Ought it ignominiously to be cut up and rafted down the stream? Methinks such conduct to the down-trodden would be unbefitting this age, and especially that section of country. Would not such treatment look too much like revenge? We should consider its past services; how often moved by the affecting weight of the bonneted in the passing carriage, and in consideration of their worth and alarm, hath it foregone the satisfaction of fainting away at such a time, and postponed again and again the hour of its fall, till weakness forbade longer deferment? Let it therefore remain, (if it should tumble), rich in its desolation—its abutments partly fallen, and yet vine-clad—the green grass upon the crevices of the stone, the old railing still upright, and uniting with other features to give it a saddening interest and a charm.

I anticipate your objection; that the horses of Rome township, Oneida county, generally speaking, are not accustomed to spring fifty feet from bank to bank with a wagon-load of apples, calves, or girls, as the case may be; at any rate, you aver they cannot perform such a Rome-antic feat without somewhat discommoding the load or passengers—including in the latter a digestion altogether too rapid for health and enjoyment. I am inclined to grant you the same; but permit me to inquire if there is not a bridge near by, distant only five miles above; not to mention one five miles below? Consider, moreover, the taste of the wandering artist, of the lover of nature, who, of course, would be shocked by a new erection with bright-looking timbers, and, for aught I know, painted rails and new stone abutments without one stain of moss, or the festoon of a single ivy-branch. Consider, in addition, the respect due to age. Would it not look too much like imitating the habits of those savages in Oregon, who are accustomed to ease their aged parents of life's closing troubles by crowding in their brains by means of a hatchet, applied therewith with an action usually called "a blow," and in such instances, coupled in civilized criticism with the epithets "outrageous," "horrid," "devilish," etc. Let us consider the old bridge as standing. From it, what a lovely scene is beheld! The distance, blooming in an azure, soft as the blue of a ripened plum, through which the purple peeps, floats up upon the sight—a range of gentle hills, with outline printed upon the reposeful clouds in curves and variety which would absolutely enrapture the eye of Cole. The high, rich-red, and again brilliantly gray cliffs to the right, with their wealth of vines and festoons swarming in the air, are a sumptuous addition. To the left, and in "the middle distance," bowing over the Mohawk and veiling in majesty and grace with the live oaks, which, swept of their moss, mirror themselves in the brightness of those sea-islets upon the Georgian coast with its thousand isles—veining with them, tower the elms and sycamores—to Taste's enthusiastic eye, witchery imbedded and draped in green!

To my own mind, hardly less agreeable is the view from above. Thence, we take in the fine old tattering concern which stretches over the river; the precipice, too, comes in on the left; and it must be confessed that its blackness and jaggedness are hideously grand against the sunset's rich, yet delicate splendour. This splendour is prolonged and more profusely flushed with the magic of colour by reason of the sheets of light flung up into the wizard haze from the bosom of Oneida lake. Here our distance (looking south-west) is recognised in the hills which are full fifteen miles from our station. From those hills (shaking the kaleidoscope of memory) we now behold the departure of the sun. Daylight vanishing in the lake as in a blaze of fire, like the visitant of Manoa, assumes amid the flame an angel's ravishing beauty, changing in its flight, before the eye, into the supreme loveliness of heaven. The view here is widely changed; it is a vast scene sinking away toward the lake and the one cone of a hill beyond in the horizon's verge. The lazy wreaths of smoke rising from the middle distance and the star-mocking tips of spires remind us that in the valleys villages are reposing. One might imagine they had been swallowed by an earthquake, so that night was visible but the steeple tops, while the smoke of those fires, which rocked and engulfed the devoted town, was curling upward to become another signal added to the flames tipping the spires, and likewise admonishing the distant of its doom. Permit me to describe a scene far from the present and vastly differing therefrom. But as this article is now a respectable length, perhaps the description had better be left to another paper. Yours truly, &c.

MR. EDITOR.—In reply to your question concerning the subject of discussion at the eastward, regarding the side which the gentleman should take of the lady when riding on horseback, I beg leave to say, that though many riding-masters have taught that the gentleman should take the right of the lady, I have ever dissented from such instructions, and, with all my female companions, prefer riding to the right of the gentleman for the following reasons:—First, when the gentleman is upon our right side, he is unable, if required, to render us assistance, as his left is the bridle arm, and his right is from us. Second, the lady is less liable to accidents, especially in cities, when the gentleman is on the left, as she is then protected from the passing vehicles. In England, where it is customary to turn to the left, it is different in this respect. Thirdly, it is easier for the lady to converse on the left than on the right, owing to her position on the horse. These three are the chief reasons why we prefer and practise riding upon the right. I have heard it said on the other side, that when the gentleman is on the left, there is danger of accidents by collision. Experience teaches the reverse. It is almost impossible to dislodge or injure the lady by collision when on the left, while a slight contact of the horses or riders on the opposite side is very apt to do much mischief. There is a greater feeling of security to the lady when the gentleman is on the left, and she is more secure when he is "at hand." We shall therefore adhere to our right, and presume that the eastern ladies will come to the same determination.

FLORIDA WAR.—Now that the Florida war is again concluded, and, in all probability, for the last time, we trust that some one competent to the task will give us a full and authentic history of the origin, progress, and close of the military operations in that territory. A most interesting volume might be collated from the adventures of our troops during the last six or seven years. But where is the Ariadnes, who could satisfy all parties by his impartiality?

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

ABDUL ORRINDEE.

THAT fickle minister of Allah, whom the Franks call fortune, and picture as a blindfold goddess, seemed resolved in heaping her favours on Abdul Orrindee, to show that her hand is not always unsteady nor her eye blinded. He was one of those instances which she delights sometimes to set before the sons of men, to convince them that inconstancy is no necessary part of her nature—that she can pour forth unmingled sweets, and crown with an unending garland. Or perhaps she had consigned Abdul's earthly lot to the ministrations of those tender hours which are now attending him in the seventh heaven, and who had fallen in love with him before he left this world for his native seat.

Be this as it may—his lot was well seen to. He was a fortunate and a happy youth. Son of the prime vizier of our greatest sultan—a wise though indulgent father—he saw smiling around him all the luxuries which wealth and influence could procure. As he bounded through his spacious palace or fairy gardens on the banks of the Tigris, moving every limb with the agility of an antelope—his neck curving more proudly than the desert serpent's, his eyes sparkling above his cheeks like two stars above the redness of the northern dawn, enchanted the fair girls who had forgotten their native vales in his delicious groves; and he saw through the scented foliage the glance of their beckoning arms.

He had a frame at once healthy and delicate. His pure blood, exquisitely sensitive to every delight, sported like quicksilver through his veins. And Abdul failed not to partake of all the good which Allah had spread around him. The nimble courser, the dancing boat, the cooling sherbet, and the rich red wine; the maiden's bower, and the fresh zephyrs laden with music and perfume floating through it—he enjoyed in all.

But Abdul's soul was large. His eighteenth summer had not flown over him when he was found often alone. No: Hafiz was with him; he conversed with the sweet bards of the days that are gone. His boat often lay still, midway on the broad, calm, sunset-flushed bosom of the Tigris, and their strains were in his ear. A new power woke within him; and he sighed with joy when he found that it could conjure up richer scenes than any within the blue mountains of Bagdad's horizon. He imagined.

And in his palace he gazed often and long on a marble head, such as the Franks have about their stairways and halls. It was one which his father had seized at the sack of Antioch—a head of the great Greek demigod, Plato. And Abdul gazed upon it till Haidee and gentle Lilius grew jealous of its broad, still forehead. And ere long the books of the Greeks were in Abdul's palace, and in his choicest shades, and in his boat; and a Greek captive taught him to read them. Abdul thought.

His days were now days of labour. Pleasure was no longer his business. His thoughts were with things afar, and with things past, and with things to come. One evening, as he was gazing from his window upon a noble palm—"Three years ago," he exclaimed, "how was I happier than thou art! I luxuriated in my health and vigour, and comeliness, living on outward influences; and so dost thou. But now"—His eye glanced to heaven, first with pride and then with gratitude.

He had sounded all the joys of sense; but thought and knowledge spread before him an ocean, which he might sail for ever and discover neither bottom nor shore.

He saw the merry together in their merriment, and the thinker alone in his thoughtfulness; and he sighed not, but smiled as he reflected that he now found that happiness in himself which he was once obliged to seek in companions. He loved his present pleasure the better that it was his own—that its spring was unknown and untasted by those about him.

He did not envy the gay their smiling and laughing; for he knew from experience that these were the tokens of mere bodily exhilaration. "When I smiled and laughed like the best of you, it was my body, I remember, that rejoiced; but now that my spirit is taking its pleasures, look into that, if you can, and you shall see it smile."

Thus thought Abdul. Would he have thought and felt, and been all this, had he grown up in labour and restriction? Or would he not, when he grew old and rich, have looked mournfully upon his body, as not having afforded him all the enjoyment it could produce? Disgusted with that application of which he knew only the drudgery, and allured by that gaudy and boisterous mirth of which he knew not the shallowness, might he not have resolved to make amends for a youth void of pleasure, by becoming that most loathsome of living things, a sensual and profligate old man?

How little knowest thou, O mortal, of thine own good! It may be well for thee, even to have been a prince.

W. H. S.

A DELICATE REBUKE.—General Wilkinson was, in 1777, an aid to General Gates, and by him sent to Congress, at Yorktown, with the despatches giving an account of the surrender of Sir John Burgoyne, and the British army, to the Americans at Saratoga. On the way he spent a day at Reading, about fifty miles from Yorktown, with a young lady from Philadelphia, whom he afterwards married. When the despatches were read in Congress, propositions were made for paying a proper compliment to the favorite of General Gates, who brought us such pleasing news. Samuel Adams, with a grave and solemn face, moved Congress that the young gentleman be presented with a "pair of spurs."

MARRIAGE PORTIONS.—It was one of the laws of Lycurgus, that no portions should be given with young women in marriage.

A THOUGHT.

When I am gone, oh! lay me not to sleep
In the dark vault where sunbeams dare not dwell—
Too heavily would weigh the silence deep
On one who loved this flowery earth so well!
But where the breezes tremulously swell
Through the green summer foliage; and the sky
In dreamlike beauty bends above my cell,
With all its swift-winged songsters soaring high,
Amid sweet Nature's glow—there would I wish to lie!
Sweet, sweet shall be my sleep; the delicate grass,
Spangled with dewy flowers, shall o'er me spring;
And the light gales, that through the branches pass,
Scattering around their early blossoming,
Wildly and sadly sweet, my dirge shall sing.
The fragrant turf shall tempt no vulgar tread,
But gentle hands their flowery gifts shall bring,
And the pale moonlight holly leaf-drops shed,
And smile serenely bright above the early dead! INEZ

INFLUENCE OF CIRCUMSTANCES.—Great men are those who have felt much, lived much; who, in a few years, have lived many lives. The tallest pine grows only in the regions of storms. Athens, the city of tumult, was the mother of a thousand great men; Sparta, the city of order, boasted but one Lycurgus; and Lycurgus was born before his laws. Thus, we see that great men most frequently appear in the midst of popular agitations: Homer, in the midst of the heroic ages of Greece; Virgil, under the triumvirate; Ossian, on the wreck of his country and her gods; Dante, Ariosto and Tasso, in the midst of the reviving convulsions of Italy; Corneille and Racine, in the age of the Fronde; and Milton, chanting the first rebellion at the foot of the bloody scaffold of Whitehall. And if we examine the individual destiny of these great men, we shall find them harassed by an agitated and miserable life. Camoens cleaves the waves, his poems in his hand. D'Erulla writes his verses on the skins of beasts, in the forests of Mexico. Those of them, whom bodily suffering does not divert from suffering of mind, lead a stormy life, devoured by an irritability of disposition, which renders them a burden to themselves and to those who surround them. Happy they who do not die before their time, consumed by the ardour of their own genius, like Pascal; by grief, like Molière and Racine; or victims to the terrors of their own imagination, like the miserable Tasso!

AMERICAN NAMES.—The names of many of our finest streams and mountains are sad stumbling-blocks in the way of the poet, but, in most instances, the original Indian names are more euphonious than those which have been substituted. Niagara, Ontario, Oregon, are not unworthy appellations, but what shall we say of Frog's Misery, Squam, Onoleg, Tompkins, Mudville, and such elegant cognomens! A writer in the Nantucket Inquirer, in the following sonnet, presents a ludicrous instance of the difficulty under which a local poet would labour, in attempting to enchain his verses with our names of places.

SONNET.

To thee, O, Siasconset! when I've stood
By Niagara's side and heard the roar
Of those fierce waters and down-pouring flood,
My thoughts have flown, and by thy sounding shore,
By memory led, again my feet would stray,
Near where Tom Nevers lifts his sandy head,
Where Sankaty his beacon did display,
And down by Sachacha's soft oozy bed
Most willingly my thoughts were led away
From Quisenberry prairies green, where we graze
The shaggy buffaloes; from regions gay
With flowery tribes; from these in by-gone days
Still back to thee, O home! my thoughts would stray—
To Polpis, Shemo, Squam, Muskekeet, Contuc, Quaise.

NAPOLEON AMONG THE LADIES.—We learn from one of his recent biographers, that politeness to the fair sex was not habitual to the character of Napoleon. He was but little calculated for the utterance of those soft nothings which custom has familiarized to female ears. His compliments were often of the most uncouth description. At one time he would say to a lady, "Mon Dieu! how red your arms are!" to another, "What an abominable head-dress!" or, "Who can have trussed up your hair in that manner!" or, "How soiled your dress is! Do you ever change it? I have seen you in that at least twenty times." In spite of this bluntness, Napoleon possessed every requisite for forming what in the language of the world is termed a man of engaging manners—every requisite but the will.

FRENCH COOKERY.—The French decidedly bear away the palm in the science of the cuisine. In this branch of enterprise not even the Yankees can compete with them. Mr. Bremer, in his late work upon Russia, remarks, that French cookery, like the French language, is fast overrunning the earth, levelling all national distinctions, and doubtless destroying all national prejudices. "The professors of this popular branch of sciences are to be met with everywhere; everywhere, too, are their labours in behalf of humanity munificently rewarded. A chef-de-cuisine, who leaves Paris on the top of the diligence with nothing but his nightcap and saucapans, rolls back from Russia, as from England, in his own carriage, loaded with the tribute of grateful nations."

FOIBLES OF THE GREAT.—Voltaire should not be judged by his comedies, Boileau by his Pindaric odes, or Rousseau by his allegories. Criticism should not maliciously seize upon the feebleness which the most distinguished talent often exhibits; nor should history give undue prominence to the littleness which are almost always found in the most illustrious characters. Louis XIV. would have thought himself dishonoured, if his saleté-de-chambre had surprised him without a wig; Turenne, when alone in the dark, trembled like a child; and we know that Cæsar was alarmed, lest he should be upset in his car of triumph.

WE are happy to be enabled once more to publish an ORIGINAL POEM from the pen of Mr. HALECK. There is no writer in the United States for whose productions the public clamour is so loud and frequent. The following is not unworthy of the most inspired moments of the author of "Alnwick Castle," and the lines upon Burns.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GOETHE.

AGAIN ye come, again ye throng around me,
Dim, shadowy beams of my boyhood's dream!
Still shall I bless, as then, your spell that bound me!
Still bend to mists and vapours, as ye seem!
Nearer ye come—I yield me as ye found me
In youth, your worshipper, and as the stream
Of air that folds you in its magic wreaths
Flows by my lips, youth's joy my bosom breathes.

Lost forms, and loved ones ye are with you bringing,
And dearest images of happier days;
First-Love and Friendship in your path up-springing,
Like old Tradition's hallowed-remembered lays;
And long-sleep'd sorrows waked, whose dirge-like singing
Recalls my life's strange labyrinthine maze,
And names the heart-mourning many a stern doom,
Ere their years summer, summoned to the tomb.

They hear not these my last songs, they whose greeting
Gladdened my first—my spring-time friends have gone,
And gone, fast journeying from that place of meeting,
The echoes of their welcome, one by one.
Though stranger-crowds, my listeners since, are breathing
Time to my music, their applauding tone
More grieves than glads me, while the tried and true,
If yet on earth, are wandering far and few.

A longing long unfelt, a deep-drawn sighing
For the dark SPIRIT LAND o'erpowers me now,
My song's faint voice sinks fainter, like the dying
Tones of the wind-harp swinging from the bough.
And my changed heart throbs warm—no more denying
Tears to my eyes, or sadness to my brow.
The Near afar off seems, the Distant high,
The Now a Dream, the Past reality.

ORIGINAL LETTERS FROM ENGLAND.

LONDON AND LONDONERS.

Strangers—Cockneys—Greenwich Pilot—London, past and present—the Queen.

It is a common remark that strangers know more about London than Londoners; and it is a very true one. A man of reading and intelligence who has lodged a month in the city, becomes, in his brief sojourn of thirty days, much better acquainted with its churches, cathedrals, theatres, parks, gardens, museums, picture-galleries, and other places of resort, than thousands of citizens who have spent their twice thirty years in it; and it is somewhat surprising the stranger when passing his comments on any of the public institutions or places of recreation and amusement, to be answered by a gray-haired man, who was born in London, and has never been out of it—"Ay! I have heard that so and so is well worth seeing, but I have never been there myself." How many thousands live a long life, and die in this famous city without having been either in Westminster Abbey or St. Paul's Church! It does rather startle a man, when dwelling with some unclean upon the verdure and varied beauty of St. James's or the Regent's Parks, and the delightful contrast they afford to the whirl, dust, smoke and bustle of London, to be coolly answered by some respectable middle-aged gentleman—"So I suppose." The middle-aged gentleman himself has contentedly plodded through two-thirds of an existence amid the said whirl, dust, smoke and bustle, without ever dreaming of visiting those cool retreats. Perhaps he may have refreshed himself with the sight of grass, trees and water somewhere; but the parks, probably, lay out of the line of road between his house and his country-house; and that, with a genuine Londoner, is good and sufficient reason for never having gone near them.

But there are stronger cases than this. It is necessary to take a pilot at Greenwich, about five miles below London, though now nearly joined to it by streets, to bring vessels up to the Tower. The pilot who brought up the ship in which I came passenger, was an active, bustling, little man of about fifty years of age, with a tongue that must have been made of good stuff to have lasted him so long, for he never let it rest for a single minute. One of my fellow-passengers, who was in some doubt about a portion of the town to which he had to go, and seeing the little pilot so very talkative and communicative, asked if he knew Suffolk-street?

"No," was the reply.

"It is very near Pall Mall—of course you know Pall Mall."

"No, I don't."

"Not know Pall Mall?" cried my fellow-passenger, who had been in London thirty years before, and had a perfect recollection of this common thoroughfare—"not know Pall Mall!"

"Whv, Lord bless you!" said the little pilot, "I never was in London in my life!"

We thought the man was joking, but he went on as gravely as possible—"Not that I can exactly say that either, 'cause in pulling down I've called 'a' sometimes at some of the houses on the river side to have a drink of porter or a drop o' gin, but I never was in any of the streets!"

Now you must not generalize, and deduce from this that few of the inhabitants of Greenwich ever see London, because the very reverse is beyond question the fact. The pilot's I take to be a strong, though by no means a solitary case. Doubtless amid the thousands and thousands who swarm in London streets, there are many as inquisitive as a Yankee pedler; but, generally speaking, I think the Cockneys an incurious people.

But the stranger in London wishes to see all he can. Probably his time is limited, and he may never be there again, and he loses not an hour. The Londoner verifies the proverb of, "What may be done at any time is never done." He purposes going here and there, but he puts off, and, as most men die sooner than they expect, at last he makes his exit without seeing places within a few streets of him, which others have traversed thousands of miles of land and water to get a glimpse of.

Besides, the stranger has generally the advantage of being better acquainted with the past history of London than the busy denizens who crowd about its marts of commerce, and he makes it his business to hunt out the famous localities. The Tower—"ay, the Tower!"—alone, is to him a stone and mortar romance; and in the hackney-coach and cab-stand on the Tower-hill, he sees the place where Jack Straw beheaded the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Lord High Treasurer. Instead of porters, draymen and coal-heavers, he peoples Eastcheap with the beings of the past—Prince Hal, Poina, Pete, Pistol, Nym, Mrs. Quickly, and the fat Knight—there is yet no lack of Bardolph; and in Smithfield, the centre of all that is dirty, disagreeable and commonplace, where gin-shops abound, and drovers, jobbers, and pig-drivers congregate, he recalls the bold and resolute Wat Tyler, the young and gallant Richard, and the courageous Walworth; or dreams that perhaps on the very spot where he stands, the flames curled around the heroic martyrs Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer. He seeks for dingy Green Arbour Court where the "Deserted Village" was penned, and takes his pint of porter in the room where volumes of dogmatic wisdom issued from Johnson's mouth. The cemeteries, too, swarm with the names of the illustrious dead, soliciting inspection. In fact, there is no end to the instructive amusement to be derived from looking at London in this way. Even in the dull and stupid pile of buildings known by the name of Ely-place, the stranger recognises the site of the garden of the Bishop of Ely, whose strawberies Gloucester so much commended; and there are a hundred instances of a similar kind which are a source of equal interest and gratification to a man of reading and observation.

Not so the Londoner. He lives solely in the present. "Have you seen the papers?" is the morning and evening inquiry. "What's the news?" "Who'll be sent for—Peel or Durham?" "Oh, Peel!" "Won't do," etc. etc. Within this day or two, of course, the all-engrossing subject of conversation has been the conduct of her majesty.—"What do you think of the little woman sending Peel to the night-about?" "Noble girl!" "Saucy young minx!" "Ha, ha! the poor Tories!" "She'll rue it before long," etc. etc. just as party happens to view her conduct through its coloured optics. To me, who can care little about names, it certainly appears that her majesty has acted with not only what may be called "queerly" spirit, but with what is better, a truly "womanly" spirit. It seems that she flatly told Sir Robert, who wished to have the females about her person removed, and their places filled by others, that "with his political arrangements she of course had nothing to do but to give her assent to them, but that she would sooner give up her crown and retire into private life, than be separated from her nearest friends and the companions of her childhood!" There is a charming violation of court etiquette for you! And thus it seems, that for the present, at least, the kindly impulses and true and affectionate feelings of a woman, have baffled the deep-laid and long-concerted schemes of the proudest and most powerful political party in England.

When I heard of the result of the interview between the inexperienced girl and the practised and wily man of the world, I could not help recalling Coleridge's fine lines—

"To be innocent is nature's wisdom;
For, surer than suspicion's thousand eyes,
Is that fine sense, which, to the pure in heart,
By mere opportunity of its own goodness,
Retains the approach of evil!"

Not that Sir Robert Peel is by any means to be regarded as an incarnation of evil; though certainly Toryism, requesting the sacrifice of the best feelings of our nature for factious purposes, savours rather of the policy of the nother world.

But partisanship spoils the best, and many a worthy gentleman in private life, is pushed and spurred on by party to do and say that of which, as a private gentleman, he would feel rather ashamed.

Of course the Tory press is in a fearfully rabid state. The editors of the Times, it is said, cannot bear the sight of water. Many in the House of Lords are in the same condition. It is extremely lucky that "the Derby," the greatest horse-race in the world, is run for this week. The betting upon it is immense, and may act as a "counter-irritant" with one half of the Tory peacocks.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

AMERICAN WRITERS FOR ENGLISH JOURNALS.

BY TITMOORE'S FAY

THE leading British journals, as it is well known, have correspondents in every part of the world, not to treat their readers to flowery fancies, or graphic descriptions of temples or towers, but to relate living intelligence, principally political. Among them figure several residing in America, from which country for the last year news has been looked for with peculiar avidity. The United States have almost unobservedly grown up to an equal importance with other nations. It was but yesterday she was spoken of in the same tone as that used towards the British possessions adjoining her. Now she exercises a great influence over European countries, and from being, in regard to England, as a child to a parent, has become a companion and a friend. The sneers of the mother country have almost ceased. Even those accustomed to distrust, no longer deride; but even in strictures, unjust as well as unkind, have adopted a language of respect. Our recent difficulties with France has reminded Europe that Hercules is no longer in the cradle, but is ready to go upon whatever enterprise duty assigns him; and we have seen in the Times newspaper, England herself accused of being unable or unwilling to follow our example of lofty honour.

I believe the United States is gaining every year in the consideration of Europe. That whatever may be the embarrassments under which she labours, it is here understood that they are incidental to her age and position, and in no way detract from her claims to respect, and that they do not merit the flippant reproaches bestowed by people who do not understand the questions they decide so superficially. I believe that it is thought in Europe, (and I believe the opinion to be correct,) that could a man in any of the middle classes, or even in the professional and mercantile classes, choose his birth-place, it would be wise in him to choose our country. The experience of an emigrant from the old continent is not always a correct criterion. The native will always enjoy advantages not acquirable by the stranger. Of the former, the experience, the associations, the affections, and the hopes are rooted in his own land, to which, morally and physically speaking, he has been acclimated from his birth; while the latter, however glad he may have been to escape from his own country, carries with him lurking tendencies and opinions not adapted to his new mode of life. He may or he may not consider his change fortunate. But the path is clearer for the individual in America than in Europe, and he has a better chance of procuring the necessities of life. The great political experiment now going on there is one of the utmost importance to "millions yet unborn;" and one likely to exercise great influence upon the governments of the old world. The experiment is successful until it has failed. No failure has yet taken place, and therefore no such failure can be justly proclaimed. So far from it, whatever local troubles may exist, whatever partial incidents may occur to be regretted or to be ashamed of, whatever laws or customs remain for discussion or for accusation, I say that the great whole is proceeding successfully—that no one has a right to raise an alarm—that there is no real occasion for national denunciations—that no people exist more entirely in the possession of what is necessary for prosperity and self-instruction—more able to bring to their firesides the essentials of life and the materials of contentment, and more able to protect their firesides from internal tumult or foreign aggression. Neither England nor France nor Russia, nor any European government, denies to us the respect which they claim for themselves; and not one of them would presume to offer an insult, or to refuse a just redress for wrongs. We are at peace with all nations. We are in no fear of foreign invasion; and, among the human beings scattered over the surface of the globe, there cannot be selected the same proportionate number in any other climate where so few are in want of all that Cincinnatus or Solon would have asked from heaven.

Under these circumstances it becomes those in the enjoyment of such blessings to show their appreciation of them by at least always acknowledging their existence, and by never, from local causes and momentary impulses, casting disrespect upon a country so favourable to their well-being, and thus, as it were, deriding, ungratefully the mother that not only gave them birth, but that cherishes their manhood. That the wanderers from other lands should really misunderstand the broad and promising political system rising around them, or should misrepresent from a desire to be smart, or from a pecuniary motive, is scarcely worth exciting our surprise or our anger. But the American should never send forth an insult against his country. Even when writing for the public at home, it becomes him to abstain from general condemnations; but when addressing himself to the readers of a foreign land—of England—his venerable parent and progenitor, pride, if not principle, should temper his strictures to a tone of calm narration or respectful regret where it became his duty to speak of the folly, weakness or crimes of individuals or parties. This the writers in question do not always think of, and I am certain it is more the want of reflection than of proper sentiments upon the subject. It is in some degree also a want of a knowledge of the world. They attach an unjust importance to evils in their circle, and fancy them the peculiarities of their neighbours, instead of the features of human nature. Hence the English reader is treated to an indignant burst worthy of Cicero at every chance crime or outbreak, while the same things are going on in London to a much greater extent; and descriptions of them are smuggled into the newspapers in small type, scarcely attracting the least attention.

Do not these writers know that in all European countries every day occur crimes and casualties of a description not to be surpassed? that poor people starve and freeze to death continually, in the streets and cellars of London? I myself was present when in that town, the centre of English law, art, literature, power, taste, and fashion, a poor man murdered his wife and children and then cut his own throat, and the bodies were all exhibited for some time to the populace, who crowded to the show, at one penny a person. Do these writers know what is going on in Ireland? Do they forget Fieschi and his co-mates? Here is a paragraph taken from a late journal:

that a third attempt at assassinating the present French ruler—two having already failed—might prove successful. The sentiment thus expressed was, it appears, rapturously received and applauded by the assembled company—the chairman only (whose name it is unnecessary to mention) having thought it prudent or decorous to interpose by a call to order. A ministerial paper, in advertising to the circumstance two evenings afterwards, assuming an equal degree of propriety, professes its astonishment and disgust at the occurrence, at the same time taking occasion to applaud the pious magnanimity which dictated the reproof, and finding it discreet to forget entirely that it was the inflammatory and incendiary language employed by the honourable chairman himself, in his opening address to the meeting, which engendered the excitement of the poor operative second, and on whose head, in all justice, this tempest of virtuous indignation ought accordingly to have burst, and would have done so, but that he commands forty votes, and sways the destinies of the British ministry."

There are certain topics which some of these writers mention too much in a party spirit to be either just to the people at home, or acceptable to their enlightened readers in England. A London newspaper has sometimes afforded the singular coincidence of a letter from an American (imbued with some local and transitory excitement) filled with unmistakable disgust at his own country, and, perhaps for the sake of a sonorous period, predicting her downfall; while an article from the editor of the same journal, in a different column, justly bore witness (perhaps the acknowledged tribute of an enemy) to the claims of the nation to respect and admiration, and her now fair chance of effecting a moral revolution, bearing upon the happiness of large classes of human beings, and likely to modify the constitutions of the future governments of the world.

The gentleman who sit down fifteen minutes before the closing of the mail bag to pronounce a party opinion upon such weighty subjects as national existence—founded on any thing—no matter what—springing from the passions or interests of any individuals, or set of individuals—should be instructed that there is no stigma to be found charged on the United States—no crime in her criminal annals—no incident on her political arena—no convulsion in her mercantile heavens—but what have happened in a greater degree, over and over again in other countries. They excite in the old world less attention because men are used to them. No political rancour existing in the United States can equal that to be found in several European countries; and no atrocious crimes can be selected from the fluctuating population of our Atlantic towns, or from the back-woods, or from any portion of the land, but what may be fairly kept in countenance by the same class of incidents much more frequently taking place in the old world, in many parts of which there is no press at all to proclaim them. I do not say they should therefore be concealed, but they should not be related prominently as specimens of American society. An historian, after describing our revolution and the characters it produced; the constitution and laws under which we live; the millions of inhabitants dwelling in peace and plenty over our fields; our orators and statesmen who compete with those of England; the number of our people who are educated and enlightened; the enterprise of our merchants, and their integrity as nobly proved; our war-ships floating fearlessly on every sea, wronging no one and taking wrong from none; our broadening system of national education; our distinguished religious instructions from the pulpit, the multitudes who have preserved their holy faith as unmercenary as when their ancestors first landed on the Plymouth rock; the number of persons who live exempt from taxation, conscription, the bayonet, the press-gang, the terrible inquisition, and oppressive police laws; exempt from war, pestilence, and famine; sheltered from inclement seasons; instructed in their duty to God and man; surrounded by the sustaining influence of the domestic affections, and enjoying sufficient leisure to walk abroad sometimes, to take their holiday amusements; who have meat and tea and sugar for their daily use; and who never suffer from want of wood, clothing or medical care; should an historian, after drawing this beautiful and happy picture, add, that, like all pictures of earth, it was not wholly unshadowed; that there were, unhappily, topics on which men's opinions were divided, and their passions inflamed; that vice was not excluded from our sunny hills, and free-rolling rivers; that those thrones and heavens to which human nature ever had been subjected, were here also perceptible; that our government interfering lightly with the daily concerns of life, but conducting unseemly and unfeeling the course of the great machine, and leaving the multitudes living under its protection, as much as possible to the dictates of their own reason; if an historian should say that such a government sometimes beheld in silence local events not yet regarded as ripening time, he should do so in no tone of reproach or derision. If this historian had previously traced the course of other nations, he would have already followed many through greater dangers and less curable calamities from the evil passions of its children, but none that have made more rapid advances in the art of so governing as to ensure the greatest amount of good to the greatest number of people.

There is one other hint which I cannot forbear adding, for the benefit of American writers for the British journals. It would be more agreeable, I am certain, to the readers on this side the water, to suppose themselves receiving opinions not tinged by party feeling. The correspondent should, if possible, be attached to no party. He should aspire to something of the dignity of an historian, and mark the movements of democrat and whig, as dispassionately as he would the wars of the Greek and Persian. But if that cannot be, let us have no unselected sketches of political enemies, no accusations of harsh interpretations of motives and measures. An honourable mind may fall into such an error by thoughtlessness, but a moment's reflection will prevent the recurrence. On no principle of justice can a statesman trust his portrait to an unfriendly hand, even at home, where such things are understood and disregarded, where malice can be despised, or error corrected. But before a foreign public, any attempt to vilify or ridicule men of political opinions, must lower the writer in his own estimation as well as in that of those who observe him. It is an attempt to forestall opinion, which seems dishonourable even where done accidentally. It is like beating an enemy with his hands bound, or stabbing him in the dark.

And of the portrait of public men this is to be observed. During the operation of their measures they cannot be judged. The clamour of denunciation and praise are equally unmeaning. It is when his career is ended, when nothing more is feared from his own ambition, or hoped from his patriotism or wisdom; when his plans have unfolded themselves at large, and people have had an opportunity to examine the motive and purpose, to behold their meaning, and observe their consequences; when the seed planted perhaps amid the storm, has had time to grow up in the sunshine and ripen into a harvest of good, if one is to follow, it is only then that the character of a statesman can be drawn, then, alas, when the patient bearer of abuse and calumny, the waiter for the coming time, is, perhaps, no longer on the arena to hear the acclamations of the fickle multitude. Who knows what truths have grown up in the mind of such a man in advance of the age; truths not yet revealed to the multitude who devote their lives to pleasure, or the cares of gaining a livelihood, and not to the comprehension of a great subject? Who knows what a desire to benefit his kind, to elevate his country, to leave behind him a monument of his sagacity and patriotism; who knows what honest and noble principles have guided him over the heaving waves of popular tumult, and amid the howling storm which may hurl him into the deep?

It is not for the hasty correspondent of a daily paper to impugn with his opinion of an hour; an hour snatched from avocations of a very different nature, and an opinion seized perhaps from the lips of the last passer by, in the columns of a partisan press; it is not for a gentleman under such circumstances to say one man is a "traitor," and another is a "fool," and a third is "toiling only for himself, and is willing to sacrifice his country."

The opinion of an individual may have little influence over the minds of the gentlemen who write these "letters from the United States" to the British journals, but they may be induced by this hint to reflect that they address themselves to a mass of enlightened people; that whatever may be the local crimes and calamities of England, there exists there the brightest standard of moral right; that the subject of America is now one of too grave importance to be treated hastily or flippantly; that the way to make others respect us, is to respect ourselves, and that English people wish fair intelligence, not party animadversions. I may add, that the fault I complain of is not perceptible in all, and that letters of this class are generally read and much copied into the continental journals.

ORIGINAL AMERICAN ANECDOTES.

RECORDS AND REMINISCENCES.

BY HENRY STANHOPE LEE

THE PENALTIES OF POPULARITY.

PERHAPS one of the greatest annoyances to which persons in conspicuous positions are subject, is in the intrusive visitations of travelling lion-hunters. Being at Ashland not many years since, I was surprised at the frequent and uncomely trespasses upon the time of Mr. Clay, committed by these well-meaning individuals. Hardy a half-hour would pass without some interruption of this sort. Nothing could exceed the perfect good-humour and resignation with which the great statesman submitted to these inflictions. Although in the midst of labours which claimed his assiduous attention, he would quit his task to discharge the little courtesies which a visit of respect or a letter of introduction exacted from him, without the slightest sign of petulance or disappointment.

I shall never forget one incident, which, at the time, I thought sufficient to try the temper of a martyr, but which had quite an opposite effect upon Mr. Clay. It was a day or two before his departure for Washington, to be present at the meeting of Congress, and he was very busy in the arrangement of his papers, when a servant entered and said that some one at the gate wished to see him.

"Show him in," said Mr. Clay.

"He is on horseback, and says he can't come in."

"Tell him that I am extremely busy, and that he must come in if he wishes to see me."

The servant went out, but soon returned with: "He says he can't possibly get off his horse."

"Well, if the mountain will not come to Mahomet, I suppose Mahomet must go to the mountain;" and Mr. Clay went out to see what so preeminent a visitor might want.

The "gentleman on horseback" was a sleek-faced, squinting Yankee, in pepper-and-salt pantaloons, a brimstone waistcoat with glass buttons, and a coat of the latest down-east fashion. After an interchange of civilities, Mr. Clay supposing that the fellow wanted to dispose of his horse, remarked: "That is a fine animal you ride, sir."

"Yes, a pretty fair creature," replied the nondescript, slapping his cow-hide boot with his whip, and staring with all his might and main in the senator's face.

At length, wondering at the silence of the fellow and at his protracted stare, Mr. Clay was forced to remark: "My name, sir, is Clay. Have you any business with me?"

"Business! O, no—none in particular—but I have heard tell of you a good deal in our parts, away off east of sunrise, and I thought, as I was passing your way, I'd just call and see how you looked. I know what you are going to say, but can't stay now—though if I cross these lots as I go back, maybe I'll stop and take a glass of cider with you. Good-by!"

So saying, with a very patronizing air, the fellow rode away and left Mr. Clay laughing heartily at the encounter.

BURGOYNE AND THE BOSTON BLOCKADE.

It is well known that General Burgoyne aspired to the double laurels of the dramatist and the soldier. He was the author of several comedies and farces, some of which yet keep possession of the stage, and have frequently been published; but one piece called the "Boston Blockade" has, I believe, never passed through the hands of the printer. During the time of the occupation of the tri-mountainous city, the royalists used to make themselves merry with amateur theatricals. Old Faneuil Hall was converted from a temple of liberty into a temple of Theopius, and Burgoyne being unable to subdue the Yankees by the sword, resorted to the pen and the buskin to overpower them with ridicule. I am indebted to the tenacious memory of an old lady, who remembers being present at the representation of the "Boston Blockade," for the following specimen, which formed the finale to the piece, the stanzas being severally sung by four of the principal characters; a lady, an old gentleman, a negress, and a young royalist, who was the hero of the affair:

The principal lady of the piece.

Ye ladies, who find the time hang on your hands—
Thus kept in a cage by the enemy's bands,
Like me, choose a mate from the numerous crew,
As brave as my soldier, as tender and true
With such a companion, confinement has charms,
Each place is a paradise clasped in his arms,
And only of absence and distance afraid,
You'll bless the small circle of "Boston Blockade."

Old man

Ye tar-barrel law-givers, Yankeeified pigs,
Who are tyrants in custom, in theory whigs,
In return for the favours you've lavished on me,
May I see you all hang upon liberty-tree.
Meantime take example, and cease from attack,
You're weak in your arms, as I am in my back:
In law and in love we alike are betrayed,
And alike are the laughter of "Boston Blockade."

Fan-fan—negress

Your pardon, my massa, one word to intrude,
I'm sure in my heart you will not tunk me rude,
Though in public you scoff, I see many a spark
Would tunk me a sweet pretty girl in the dark
Thus runs the world merrily on with Fancifan,
She eat good salt pork and get kissed by white men;
Me do messy business, she pleased, and I paid,
Eged! me no tired of do Boston Blockade

The hero—a young officer.

Huzza, then, ye comrades of honour and truth,
Experienced age and high-spirited youth,
With drum and with fife make our chorus more shrill,
And echo shall wait it to Washington's hill.
All brave British hearts shall beat time as we sing,
Due force to our arms, and long life to our king!
For the honour of both be our banner displayed,
And a glorious end to the "Boston Blockade!"

On the arrival of Sir James L. Yeo in the British provinces, the editors there boasted that he had come to put Commodore Chauncey to school, with a view to instruct him in the rudiments of seamanship. The subsequent adventures of Sir James gave rise to many witticisms, among which was the following:

EPICRAM.

To instruct how to rule,
He took leave to school,
And sure never a lad could learn faster,
In a fortnight or so,
By the lessons of Yeo,
He thought nothing of—doggling his master!

THE SPIRIT OF SEVENTY-SIX

We are fast losing it—the spirit which inspired the men of the revolution, and wrought out the goodly fabric of American constitutional liberty. With this generation will, I fear, pass away that generous pride in the achievements of our ancestors, which distinguished us in times of peril and disaster. We are growing cosmopolitan, universal, demoralized. Foreign influence is exercising a control, which threatens to do away with all vestiges of our great revolutionary struggle. It is nothing now to have been an American born—to have been familiar from childhood with all the old landmarks, crisscrossed with the blood of our heroes. It is nothing to be the immediate descendant of those devoted benefactors of their race. The man, in whose ears are yet ringing the echoes of Bow-bells, and who knows no more of Bunker Hill, Mount Vernon and Monticello than he does of the mountains in the moon, may come and push from his spool the gray-haired revolutionary veteran, whose blood was shed like water in the contest with our enemies. The presuming scribbler, who imbibed hatred for this country and its liberties with his mother's milk, may come and traduce every-thing American, not only with perfect impunity, but with the countenance of those, whose lineage should teach them to spurn with contempt the vernal creatures, who, while they sue for their bounty, insult the land of their birth. Alack, and well-a-day! That I should "see what I have seen—see what I see!"

THE LIGHT OF THE LIGHTHOUSE.

BY SPES SARGENT.

The closing of a day in June,
Mild, beautiful and bright!
The setting sun, the crescent moon
Mingling their doubtful light!
The west wind brings the odour sweet
Of flowers and new-mown hay,
While murmuring billows at our feet
Breathe of the salt-sea spray.

We stroll along the wide sea-beach,
A ledye faire and I—
And on what Nature's page may teach,
In ocean, earth and sky.
And, as across the waters blue,
With roving glance we gaze,
A light springs suddenly to view—
It is a beacon's blaze!

O, lamently the new-born flame
Disparts the purple air;
In childish wonder we exclaim,
To see a sight so fair.
"How bright," the ladye says, "its ray
Shoots o'er the swelling tide!
Now, listen to the tale, I pray,
With yonder shaft allied.

"Upon that island's narrow ledge,
Of rocks with sea-weed strown,
Fringed by the thimble-scatter'd sedge,
The lighthouse towers alone!
There 'mid the sea's perpetual swell,
The dash of breakers wild,
Two solitary beings dwell—
A father and his child.

"Three years ago, no friendly light
Across the dark roof beamed;
A white flag on the rocky height,
The only signal, streamed.
Poor Francis Lorne had then a wife,
He had but children five,
He led a fisherman's bold life,
And merrily did he thrive.

"It was on Independence Day;
To Mary Lorne he said,
'My sloop is rocking in the bay,
A flag at her mast-head!
Come, gentle wife! your work throw down,
And, children, come with me,
And we will take a trip to town,
This day's great sights to see!

"On board! on board! fair blows the gale!
My boat is swift and strong;
With streamers gay and loosened sail,
How will she sweep along!
The sky is clear and beautiful,
Bright gleams the breezy morn,
We'll skim the blue waves like a gull!
We will!' said Francis Lorne!

"O, joyful heart, exult not so;
Mistrust that prospect fair;
It is the lure of death and woe,
The ambush of despair!
That night the storm in wild array,
Clove through the billows dark,
And, in a cloud of foam and spray,
Rushed on the fated bark.

"The morning's dim, unconscious smile,
That hushed the raging storm,
Disclosed upon that rock-bound isle
The father's pallid form.
And strain'd to his protecting breast,
His little Ellen lay;
There are but two—where be the rest?
Ye ruthless billows! say!

"Poor Francis! when his struggling soul,
The fearful scene recalled,
No soothing could his tears control,
His reason was appalled!
A grief that blanched his sunburnt face
Thenceforth upon him grew—
A grief, the world could not erase,
And time could not subdue.

"And when, at length, on yonder spot
Was reared the lighthouse spire,
To him was given the lonely lot
To tend the beacon fire:
There from the busy world apart,
Its clamour and its strife,
He lives with but one human heart
To share his desert life.

"But O, Aurora's crimson light,
That makes the watch-fire dim,
Is not a more transporting sight
Than Ellen is to him.

He pineth not for fields and brooks,
Wild flowers and singing birds,
For Summer smileth in her looks,
And singeth in her words.

"A fairy thing, not five years old,
So full of joy and grace,
It is a rapture to behold
The beauty of her face!
And O! to hear her happy voice,
Her laughter ringing free,
Would make the gloomiest heart rejoice,
And turn despair to glee.

"The ocean's blue is in her eyes,
Its coral in her lips,
And in her cheek, the mingled dyes,
No sea-shell could eclipse!
And, as she climbs the weedy rocks,
And with the sunshine plays,
The wind that lifts her golden locks
Seems more to love their rays.

"When the smoothed ocean sleeps unstirred,
And, like a silver band,
The molten waters circling gird
The island's rim of sand,
She runs her tiny feet to lave
And breaks the liquid chain,
Then laughs to feel the shivered wave
Coil down to rest again.

"And when the black squall rends the deep,
The tempest-cradled maid,
To see the white gulls o'er her sweep
Mounts to the balustrade,
Above her head and round about,
They stoop without alarm,
And seem to flout her threatening shout
And her up-stretching arm.

"Once Francis sought the neighbouring town,
And she was left alone,
When such a furious storm came down,
As never had been known.
'My child!' the wretched parent cried,
'Oh! friends! withhold me not!
The bravest man, in such a tide,
Would quail on that bleak spot.'

"He strove till faint and out of breath
His fragile boat to gain,
But all knew it was certain death,
To tempt the hurricane.
And wilder grew the tempest's power,
And doubly black the night,
When, lo! at the appointed hour
Blazed forth that beacon light!

"The sea-fog, like a fallen cloud,
Rolled in and dimmed its fire,
Roared the gale louder and more loud,
And swelled the billows higher!
Above the gale that wailed and rang,
Above the booming swell,
With steady and sonorous clang,
Pealed forth the light-house bell!

"Warned by the sound, ships inward bound,
The offing sought again,
And soon the baffled tempest found
His anger was in vain.
The billows fell, the winds rebuked
Crept to their caverns back,
And placidly the day-star looked
Out from the cloudy rack.

"Bright through the window-panes it smiled,
Upon the little bed,
Where wrapt in slumber deep and mild,
Ellen reposed her head.
Her friends, her father seek the place;
Good saints have watched her charms!
Her blue eyes open on his face
And she is in his arms!"

The voice was mute, the tale was told;
Sacred be my reply!
Along the wide sea-beach we stroll'd,
The ladye faire and I.
Bless'd, ever bl. ss'd and unforgot
Be that sweet summer night,
And blessings on that wave-girt spot,
The Light-house and the Light!

NUMBER ONE.—A large edition of the present number has been struck off, to meet the wishes of new subscribers.

THE FINE ARTS.

THE PANORAMA OF THEBES.

Who has not read of Thebes! That venerable city of which poets have sung and historians spoken, for three thousand years. We of the new world, unaccustomed to antiquities beyond a century, look towards older countries, and admire and wonder at the crumbling remains of edifices on which art had done her utmost to decorate, and feeble man to preserve to future ages. In England what is more picturesque and solemnly grand, than an ancient abbey, with the winding ivy entwining itself around its clustered columns, as if endeavouring to prevent their fall, and hanging in festoons from its pointed arches! We go farther back and dwell on the remains of the Roman forum. Here the imagination is excited with stirring scenes. Receding into antiquity we rest on the acropolis of Athens. The classic monuments of Greece are here before us, and all feel a desire to be on that sacred spot where Solon and Plato and Socrates dwelt. But the imagination does not rest here. Let it still farther thread the mazes of antiquity and alight on the banks of the Nile. But what find we here, after the Persian, the Greek, the Roman, the Saracen, and the modern European pillage! After a decay of twenty-five centuries! We find magnificence even in ruin.

The picture alluded to above, represents a portion of the remains of Thebes. To give all that remains would be impossible; as they extend several miles on both sides of the Nile, and the view is intercepted by heaps of fallen edifices, and the accumulated mud and rubbish of twenty centuries. The artist, however, has happily chosen for his subject the most extensive and imposing of the temples, with its gateways, propylæ, and obelisks, that remain on the plain of Thebes.

The name by which this mass of ruins is known is Karnak. The most prominent is the great propylæ, corresponding to a gateway which forms the principal entrance to the temple. This work is four hundred feet long by forty in thickness. Its height, if cleared of the rubbish in which it is partly buried, would be about one hundred and fifty feet.

The magnificent palace or hall is another prominent object in the picture. From the number of columns that constitute this great arch, it has been called by recent travellers "the Hall of Columns." The Giants' Palace would be more appropriate, for we can hardly conceive it possible that human beings, such as we now see, could have erected such a forest of massive columns, with corresponding architraves, cornices, etc. These columns are sixty feet in height and thirty-six in circumference, with elaborate, bell-shaped capitals, supposed to be an imitation of the lotus. The shafts are richly sculptured and charged with hieroglyphs. The interior as well as the exterior of this vast edifice is covered with sculptures, representing the Egyptian deities, their battles, in which the king is always the most conspicuous personage, their religious ceremonies, and an endless number of hieroglyphic inscriptions. The researches of the learned Champollion, Jones, and others, have enabled us to decipher the inscriptions, and to learn the founder of this stupendous pile.

It was built by Osire, who, together with his son Rameses the Second, completed its numerous decorations. They were both celebrated kings, and their conquests constitute a large portion of the historical representations that cover the walls. They flourished about the year 1360, B. C., thus showing an antiquity of more than three thousand two hundred years. A period so remote that the mind can scarcely comprehend it, and realize that at so early a period the arts were so much cultivated.

Several gateways and propylæ are seen in various directions, standing solitary and alone. Others rise from a mass of broken columns or fallen walls. Here the tall and richly sculptured Obelisk raises its graceful form to the height of a hundred feet—there lies another prostrate. Broken columns, colossal statues, Sphynxes, and half-buried walls, are seen in every direction. In the distance are the Syrian mountains, containing the tombs of the kings. They are at present the most interesting objects remaining of the ancient Pharaohs. On their walls and ceilings are painted in colours all the arts, the trades, and the sciences of that country, as they existed at the remote period of the construction of the tombs; and, remarkable as it may appear, they retain all the freshness of colour and outline, as if they were the work of yesterday. Such is the state of the atmosphere, that there is no decay, even the wood that forms the sarcophagi of the mummies is perfectly sound.

Many are puzzled to know how the date of these monuments is ascertained with so much precision, when, in modern times we find it so difficult to fix the date of events which transpired only a century ago. The Egyptian monuments are generally covered with hieroglyphic inscriptions, referring to the kings, through whose munificence these monuments were erected. The particular year of their reign is also stated, in which great events occurred. Like all other nations they had a great cycle embracing many hundred years. One of these cycles or periods terminated, or at least was brought down to a period subsequent to the Christian era; which, of course, enables the historian to fix with certainty the date of its commencement previous to that era. The date of the Grecian Olympiads, or particular year of Rome, is not more certain than are those of Egyptian history, for they are obtained by the same means. If, then, we find it recorded on an Egyptian temple, that it was erected in a particular year of their cycle, we have but to calculate from the beginning of that cycle, (which being known,) and we have the period agreeable to our chronology. The most ancient date found on the Egyptian monuments goes as far back as two thousand two hundred years before Christ.

It is the vast antiquity of this country, and her astonishing monuments, that render Egypt so interesting in our day. Her inscriptions, so long locked up from the knowledge of the world, are now deciphered; and with all the boasting of moderns of their superior knowledge, it appears that the Egyptians were quite as learned three thousand years ago. A knowledge of steam-engines, printing-presses and gunpowder always excepted.

Mr. Catherwood has made a good selection in the panorama of Thebes. It is beautifully painted. The perspective is equal to anything ever put upon canvass, and one can hardly rid himself of the idea that it is not nature he is viewing. Many interesting figures of Arabs, with their camels and horses, are seen near the ruined temples, the effect of which, among such piles of masonry, is very agreeable. They are besides very necessary appendages, for, unless the spectator has some well-known object to compare with the huge masses around him, he can form no idea of their immense size.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Musical Review. A record of musical science, literature, and intelligence—edited by E. L. M. Jr., New York, 307 Broadway, E. J. Vancleave; Boston, Parker and Dixon, Weeks, Jordan and Co.; Philadelphia, Vint and Meignou; Baltimore, George W. Hays, Jr.

This is a work well deserving the patronage of all who feel interested in the progress of music. It has maintained, continually, a bold stand on the side of truth—zealously advocated the cause and interest of the musical profession—given charlatanism its just desert—resisted manfully the encroachments made upon the rights of the profession by pettifoggers and quacks, and undeviatingly pursued a course which long proved that love for the art and the artist is the principal guide. We have often wondered that a class of men, so respectable as musicians, pursuing a vocation so refined, and one requiring so much talent and study, should suffer themselves or their art to be in the least degraded. They do not unite together, and declare music to be a science—their vocation a profession—themselves a fraternity of professors. And if they will not respect themselves, how can they be respected by the community at large? It is incumbent on the professor and diligent at large, to sustain the Review in its laudable efforts to correct the existing evils, and to introduce a better state of things in this delightful department of human learning.

Memoir of a Mechanic. Being a Sketch of the Life of Timothy Claxton, written by himself. Together with miscellaneous papers. New-York: George W. Light. Pp. 179.

The subject of this memoir is an Englishman by birth, but was for several years a resident of Boston, though now, we believe, he has returned to his native country. He is well-known and respected not only as an ingenious and industrious manufacturer of school and philosophical apparatus, but as a zealous and efficient promoter of the cause of popular improvement, especially among the mechanic classes. His example is one full of encouragement to the young mechanic, and shows how much may be effected, even under adverse and straitened circumstances, by energy and perseverance. The memoir is quite interesting, and not unworthy to be placed by the side of Benjamin Franklin's autobiography in the library of the young. An excellent likeness of Claxton, finely engraved on steel from a painting by S. S. Osgood, embellishes the volume.

Military Magazine. Philadelphia: Wm. M. Huddy, 84 Noble-st.

This is the title of a quarto publication, issued monthly in Philadelphia, and enriched with pictorial embellishments, handsomely engraved and coloured. It purports to be a magazine of military illustrations, and a record of the institution, organization, and history of the volunteer corps of the United States. This work is well entitled to the support of military men. One picture in the last number we admire especially. It is a full-length likeness of our excellent friend and companion in arms, Colonel Page, of Philadelphia. There he sits in full uniform in his marquee, as natural as life, smiling good-humouredly in the very face of the reader. We shall have this plate framed by Clover, and hang it in our best parlour.

Birds and Flowers, and Other Country Tales. By Mary Howitt. Boston, Weeks, Jordan and Co. Pp. 2-5.

Beautiful as the first spring violet, and musical as the first spring warbler of the trees and fields, this little volume comes to us at the most appropriate season, bringing, by the best power of imagination, visions of waving foliage and gliding brooks and birds and flowers. Had Mary Howitt lived in mythological times, she would have been the high priestess of Flora, for she is one of nature's best interpreters. We commend this volume to young and old, to the denizen of the crowded city and the free inhabitant of the country. It will, as the author desires, "convey to many a heart a relief for the enjoyment of quiet, country pleasures; a love for every living creature, and that strong sympathy which must grow in every pure heart for the great human family."

The Gentleman of the Old School. A Tale. By G. P. R. James, author of "Richtienau," "Charles Tyrrell," &c. New-York: Haeper and Brothers.

Superior to his last work in plot, incident and development of character, is "The Gentleman of the Old School," from the prolific pen of James. So long as this author writes so well he cannot write too much, nor will the public tire of his productions. These volumes form one of the most engaging fictions of the day. Lady Mallory is an admirable portraiture, and indeed all the female characters are portrayed with the skill and fidelity of an accomplished artist. We think this will be the most popular of the brilliant series of romances by James.

Charles Vincent; or, the Two Clerks. A Tale of Commercial Life. In two volumes. New-York: Haeper and Brothers.

The scene of this novel is laid in New-York and its vicinity, and as far as the author attempts to convey a picture of its localities and society, he is quite successful. But he deals far more in incident than in description, and he fixes the reader's attention and carries it on to the close of his narrative with considerable power and animation. The best-drawn portraits are those of Mrs. Jenks and Clara Wilmot. The hero is a very proper young gentleman, and the villain a very inconsistent one. We learn from the preface, that this is the author's first novel. It gives ample promise of future excellence.

The Jubilee of the Constitution. A discourse delivered at the request of the Historical Society. By John Quincy Adams. New-York: Samuel Colman. Pp. 120.

No less valuable for its historical illustrations, than attractive for the vigour and brilliancy of the style, this address will of course be read by all to whom the history of our constitution is a subject of interest. It is well worthy the study and the admiration of every true American.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

As the care now stop at Union Place, a correspondent asks why that beautiful promenade is not thrown open to the public. Is it because the trees are yet ungrafted?—The series of "Genevieve" are very harmonious and very beautiful. Her communications have not been neglected.—The Florentine story by "H." has been laid aside for present.—We must decline the communications of "Nickelby," "L. Y.," "S.," "W. X.," "Ponleahar," "M. P.," "Thelia," "O.," and "O. P. Q.,"—Many pieces, "too tedious to mention," shall be daily considered and noticed.—We must decline taking order in the controversy matter broached by our Hartford correspondent. His communication is admirably written.—Why does not "Jon" apply directly to Mr. Placido? What need of a mediator?—We must decline the proposals of our London correspondent. "A Packer-up of unconsidered trifles."—The readers of the Mirror will perceive that the contents of the present number are original.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JUNE 29, 1839

VOLUME THE SEVENTEENTH

No volume of the NEW-YORK MIRROR was ever begun under such favourable auspices as the present. For the last few months our subscription-list has increased with a rapidity altogether unexampled in the history of this periodical. Our friends are more numerous, our resources more ample, and our exertions to render the Mirror one of the most interesting and valuable repositories of literature and the fine arts, shall be as unflagging as ever.

Our old correspondents will continue to furnish original papers on a great variety of subjects interesting to the general reader; and new writers have been engaged for special purposes. At home we have a list of nearly two hundred contributors, embracing most of the talent and genius of America, and we have established a permanent correspondence abroad. Mr. Cox will write from London—Mr. Fay from Berlin—and an American gentleman, who holds a high rank in the estimation of his countrymen as a graceful and easy writer, will furnish us with occasional sketches from Paris.

In the course of the volume, fifty pieces of popular music will be published—selected by MESSRS. BERKELEY, HORN, RUSSELL, KNIGHT, &c.

SIX SUPERB ENGRAVINGS, (including the two issued with the present number,) will be given, engraved by DANFORTH, PARKER, &c., from original designs and portraits by WEIR, INMAN, CRAPMAN, &c.

A number of CURIOUS ETCHINGS on wood will also be published in the present volume, engraved by ADAMS, ANDERSON, JOHNSTON, &c., from original designs.

While we shall never forget that the NEW-YORK MIRROR is purely an American work, we shall not, on that account, exclude interesting extracts from English journals of merit—and shall also continue our translations from the French, German and other European languages.

Nothing shall be left undone to render this work, in its literary character, its engravings, its music and its typography, equal, if not superior, to any periodical of the day.

A number of literary novelties, curious historical legends, American reminiscences, and Indian traditions, are already in preparation. Indeed, every subject within the range of literature or the fine arts is embraced in its plan; and it has received the commendation of the press throughout the United States and Great Britain, as a refined and elegant repository of the belles lettres.

In catering for the general taste, we shall never omit to set aside a due proportion of space for the especial amusement and edification of the ladies of America, in the sunshine of whose favour the Mirror has so long flourished as a favourite journal.

We presume that the reader will freely admit, that a work embracing an immense variety of choice matter, most of it expressly written for its columns—containing superior engravings on steel, with copious selections of exquisite music, beautifully printed—together forming an IMMENSE VOLUME of four hundred and sixteen imperial quarto pages—is, at the trifling subscription of five dollars per annum, afforded at a price unsurpassed in cheapness by any periodical ever published in any country.

In issuing this first number of a new volume, we feel confident that while we continue to merit, we shall continue to receive the liberal support, which we take this occasion to acknowledge; and we commence a new volume with renewed spirit, and a steady determination to render the Mirror all that its most ardent friends could wish.

Our Agents and subscribers will confer a favour by at once complying with the terms of publication. Those in arrears, and we are happy to say the number is but small, we trust will be kind enough immediately to liquidate our claims against them. From our good old friends and subscribers, who have stood by us so many years, it is almost superfluous to say they would oblige us by extending their usual courtesy in regard to payments in advance. We expect it in all cases.

Our subscription-list.—In turning over the pages of our subscription-list, it is truly gratifying to find the names of many of our fair and gentle countrywomen, who commenced reading the Mirror a "long time ago," when they were in their teens, who have since become wives, mothers, or, alas! widows—but who, through all changes, have continued to read and sustain this periodical. It is a curious fact, that not in a single instance, are they in arrears. Besides these (God bless them!) we observe the names of a large number of subscribers of the opposite sex who have stood by us during a little lifetime, whose heads are silvered over by the hand of time since they first began to "take the Mirror in"—No. I. Vol. I. friends, who have never deserted us—and who, we are bold to say, never will. The remainder of the list is composed of newer but none the less ardent friends, who seem to be pleased with our exertions to please them, and who never allow us to "dun them twice." In sober earnestness it is a "goodly company" of many thousands from among the rites of the land. It is to these, and such as these, that we confidently look for a continuation of their indulgence, encouragement and support.

The Society of the Sons of St. George and Thomas Sully.—The misunderstanding between Mr. Sully, the artist, and the St. George Society, has, it appears, been settled by arbitration; a full exposition of which has been published in the Philadelphia papers. By this arbitration it is adjudged, that Sully shall deliver to the society, after the payment by them of five hundred dollars, his full-length picture of Victoria—that the said society shall be the positive owners of the picture, but not of the design or copyright of the same—that the artist shall have the privilege of disposing of his copy of the painting as he may see fit, and that the society shall have the same privilege in regard to the original picture. This decision appears to us, under the circumstances, the most judicious that could have been made. Unless the artist had been restricted by a positive contract, we do not think he would either in equity or in law to surrender his right of exhibiting his copies. The sum paid him by the society was, in the first place, too paltry to admit of the consideration that they originally intended to deprive him of the benefit of an exhibition. In the next place, their motive being ostensibly loyal and patriotic, precluded the idea of any mercenary views or intentions. Again, by common usage, if an artist executes a likeness or a fancy piece to order, which he thinks will benefit him by exhibition, he is at liberty to retain a copy in his studio. These reasons are alone, we think, sufficient to sustain the adjudication of the arbitrators. We have read the reasons of Mr. Wharton for dissenting from this adjudication, but as they proceed from a different view of the contract between the society and Mr. Sully, they do not affect our opinions upon the subject. Unless positively restricted by contract, we think the artist had an undoubted right to exhibit as many copies as he might choose to execute.

Ashtand.—This is the name given by Mr. Clay to his beautiful estate in Kentucky. We find the following account of it in a letter from Dr. Humphrey published in the Philadelphia North American.—"Happening to meet, and to be introduced to Mr. Clay in the morning, he very politely invited us to call at his seat, a mile and a half out of town, which we did at four o'clock. He received us with all the ease and urbanity for which he is so much distinguished, entered freely into conversation upon a variety of topics as they happened to come up. It is delightful to find a great man so perfectly affable and unaffected; and indeed this is one mark of true greatness. Ashtand is an enchanting spot. The mansion is simple, spacious, and venerable; standing just on the border of a park of eighty acres, which for the majesty and beauty of its thousand forest-trees, is the finest I ever saw. Mr. Clay has two other woodland pastures, and, in all, something like eight hundred acres in his farm. He has lately turned his attention very much to raising sheep, and it is said no man in Kentucky, even, can show you finer oxen and cows than he can. He spent an hour in walking with us over his grounds, and detained us, almost imperceptibly to ourselves, till nearly sundown."

Scaccia's introduction to the art of singing.—Messrs. Hewitt and Jacques have lately published one of the most valuable musical compilations of the day, it being "an introduction to the art of singing upon a new and improved method, illustrated by clear and scientific rules, the result of long experience, and an acquaintance with the best Italian and other modern authors; by John A. Scaccia." This work is recommended by the highest musical talent of the country, and we are confident it will be found a most efficient auxiliary to the musical student. Mr. Scaccia has manifested a thorough acquaintance with his subject, and the volume before us is creditably alike to his talents and his scientific attainments.

Dr. Channing's style.—There is a capacious article in the last Edinburgh Review, said to be written by Lord Brougham, in which Dr. Channing is somewhat rudely handled. We do not think that the reviewer—shrewd and ingenious as he undoubtedly is—makes out a very strong case. If the passages quoted in the Review as defective in style or fallacious in thought, are all that can be selected from the writings of Channing to carp at, more truly may it be said of him, than of any other great contemporary writer, that he has penned no line, "which dying he could wish to blot."

Jennison's latest premium refrigerator.—It may be remembered by some of our readers that last summer gave a detailed account of the construction of these useful articles. Since then several improvements have been added, among which is the water filter, by which the water from the ice is purified and drawn by a faucet in front, cool and fit for drinking. The objection of its imparting a bad flavour to articles kept in it, of a dissimilar nature, is entirely obviated. These articles may be found at No. 300 Broadway. They are worthy the attention of housekeepers.

Exchange papers.—We have just finished one of the most unpleasant of our annual duties—that of revising our exchange list. Imperious necessity compels us to discontinue the exchange with many new acquaintances—but in our arrangements for the present year, we have not forgotten, and never shall forget, our old friends. Will such as receive this number, be kind enough either to copy the prospectus or to give the substance of it in their respective journals, and much oblige us!

COME, GANG AWA' WI' ME.

A BEAUTIFUL BALLAD—WRITTEN AND COMPOSED BY EDWIN RANSFORD.

Published by Hawitt and Jaques, 239 Broadway.

MODERATO.

Oh! come, my the moon A-cross yon rip-pling sea, Come, let thy be gay and And has-ten, wi' me. 'Tis mo-ny a night sin' first we met Belove, shines bright heart light, love.

neath the green-wood tree, Then let thy heart be light-er yet, Come, gang a-wa' wi' me. 'Tis mo-ny a night sin' first we met Be-neath the green-wood tree, Then let thy heart be light-er yet, Come, gang a - wa' wi' me.

tree, Then let thy heart be light-er yet, Come, gang a - wa' wi' me.

SECOND VERSE.

Oh! tarry not, my only love,
I've pledged myself to thee;
And by yon stars that shine above,
For ever thine I'll be!
'Tis mony a night sin' first we met
Beneath the green-wood tree,
Then say, ere yonder stars have set,
Thou'll gang awa' wi' me.

THIRD VERSE.

Thy features are so fair, my love,
Thy mind is ever free—
Oh! let thy willing heart still prove
The love thou bear'st to me.
'Tis mony a night sin' first we met
Beneath the green-wood tree,
Then say, ere yonder stars have set,
"I'll gang awa' wi' ye."

THE LAST SONG OF THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY.

The following original verses, from the pen of Thomas Haynes Bayly, were sent us some months previous to his untimely death in April last. They will be read with a melancholy interest at this time.

GO AND FORGET

Go and forget that we have met,
Go to the friends dearest to thee;
Loved as thou art, freely depart,
Others more fair will receive thee;
Smile and deceive, they will believe,
E'en as I used to believe thee.
Though my tears flow bidding thee go,
More should I weep wert thou to stay;
Better at once all hope renounce,
Than see thee change day after day.
Go—I will never accuse thee,
Seek her whose smile will amuse thee;
She in her turn too soon may learn
What I endure thus to lose thee.

THE FATE OF GENIUS.—I have heard men of the present day, distinguished in politics, in literature, in science, complain of envy, of hatred, of calumny. They are wrong. It is law. It is glory. The high-renowned afford examples. Hatred follows them everywhere. Nothing escapes it. The theatre openly yielded to it. Shakespeare and Moliere; the prison could not take away from it. Christopher Columbus; the cloister did not preserve St. Bernard; the throne did not save Napoleon. There is only one asylum for genius in this world; it is in the tomb!

POETRY AND MUSIC.—As the musician in those complicated performances, those mazes of harmony, which an unpractised ear cannot thread, perceives beauties where another would hear nothing but noise and confusion, so the poet, in the chaotic wildness of nature sees order and sublimity; so the poet, from the "common scenes which round him lie," from the manifold relations and sufferings of humanity, from his own inward passions and aspirations, evolves, unfolds and combines beauties, and harmonies, and delights, which the uninitiated might toil in vain to discover.

WRITING FOR NEWSPAPERS.—I think it is John Neal, who somewhere remarks—"Who that cares a fig for to-morrow, will take pains to write for a thing that won't keep! Engraving on a fog-pillar—writing your name on the sands of the sea-shore—on a plastered wall (as in the chamber where Shakespeare was born)—these are about of a piece with cutting flourishes in a newspaper for posterity—better do it on the rind of a ripe water-melon."

PARADISE LOST.—If ever a literary composition bore the ineffaceable impress of meditation and inspiration, it is the Paradise Lost. A moral thought, touching at once the two natures of man; a terrible lesson, conveyed in sublime verse; one of the most momentous truths of religion and philosophy, developed in one of the most beautiful fictions of poetry; the entire scale of creation run over, from its highest to its lowest degree; an action which commences with Jesus, and terminates with Satan; Eve, gradually drawn by curiosity, compassion and imprudence, to her perdition; the first woman in contact with the first devil: rich is the scene presented by Milton; a vast and simple drama, in which all the machinery is spirit; a magic painting, in which the shadows of darkness steal gradually over all the brighter tints: a poem which at once charms and terrifies.

A SILENT BROTHERHOOD.—The monks of the monastery of La Trappe never speak. We have never heard of a nunnery where a similar rule was observed, and presume that such an institution has never been, and can never be maintained.

ORIGINAL TALES FROM THE GERMAN.

THE GRAZIOSO.

BY MRS. ELLET.

IN THREE PARTS—PART THE SECOND.

The rehearsal began. Repeated nods of approbation attested the pleasure of the prince, especially at the lively and sly, yet choice humour of the grazioso. But when Fiametta's turn came, his delight was at the highest. Breathless he listened to her singing, and followed with glancing eyes her movements in the dance; loudly applauding at the close. A precious ring sparkled the next moment, as a token of princely favour, on Fiametta's finger; and a sum was ordered the impresario for distribution among the other actors. So ended the first visit. Signor Ramuzio Spaccamino swam in delight, the rest rejoiced loudly, and none more loudly than the grazioso. Fiametta looked silently at him and then again at the sparkling ring; Giovetchino seemed not to observe it; he sang, and sang, and laughed, till the tears ran down his cheeks; at length he ran off. To Fiametta his laughter sounded like weeping; with a smile, but sighing deeply at the same moment, she pressed her hand upon her eyes, and presently went away.

When the marshal waited on his master next morning, he found him reclining on the sofa in a reverie and unconscious of his entrance. The marshal looked at him some time silently; at last he ventured to make known his presence by a scarce audible hem. "The prince started up, and nodding graciously—"Can you imagine, marshal," he said, "what I was thinking about just now?"

"If I might venture, my lord."

"Well."

And the courtier, well knowing how far he might presume, answered slyly, "Perhaps the fair Fiametta?"

The prince burst into a laugh, exclaiming, "Well guessed! you told me not too much of the maiden!"

"If your highness pleases, I can yet more—"

"No, no. We will ourselves study the fair. Prepare her for a visit!"

"I, my lord?"

"You," repeated the prince, while he stood up affectionately leaning on the marshal's shoulder and smiling upon him. "We know you to be an experienced, adroit man of business, hitherto worthy of our confidence."

"My lord is pleased to flatter his most humble servant. The harder it is, my lord, to be compelled to say to your highness, that the fair Fiametta is like no other maiden; that her strange caprice may stand in the way of my gracious lord's will; in a word, that we can here accomplish nothing by ordinary means."

The prince had stepped a few paces back, and while his favourite spoke, was surveying him angrily from head to foot. "Marshal!" he replied in a cold tone of displeasure, "you know well it is not my will to regard any obstacle in the way of my wishes. I may rule this land! I would counsel none to gainsay it—none! Understand that!"

"By your grace! my lord," answered the courtier meekly, "it never entered my thoughts. I pledge you my head, Fiametta shall be yours; but I must repeat to your highness, the girl is not to be won by ordinary means. May it please my lord to lend a gracious hearing to his servant for a moment? I will lay the matter before you, only waiting your approbation of my plan to begin my labours."

"Speak on, then!" cried the prince, and threw himself again on the sofa.

"That it pleased your highness," began the courtier, "to honour the beautiful Fiametta with your notice, your true servant perceived, who strives ever to guess the wishes of his sovereign, oft venturing upon acts ere his gracious lord has given him command so to do; inasmuch as matters oft demand a zeal and knowledge to which the sovereign of a dukedom cannot stoop. In such a case your servant never scruples to sacrifice himself where the honour of his adored master requires it."

"Well said!" interrupted the prince, yawning; "but to the business."

"Scarce guessed I what was passing in your highness's thoughts," continued the marshal, "when my resolution was taken. I went, after the rehearsal, to the house of the manager, to Signora Mariana, the old 'cara maria,' whom my lord perhaps remembers at Naples."

"Yes, yes, to the business."

"I dropped a hint or two, that a certain exalted personage, to all appearances was pleased to be interested in the Signora Fiametta. She listened, she trembled for joy; in short, we are of one mind; the old one is devoted to me, body and soul."

"I give you the old one!" cried the prince, laughing, "but how stands it with Fiametta?"

"All in time, my lord; for what the old one told me, surpasses language! Think, your highness, Fiametta loves! is ashamed of her love, and its object; yet, for the sake of this attachment, have not less than a dozen princes, counts, and barons sighed at her feet in vain!"

"Now by the light!" exclaimed the prince, "but this is strange enough; and who is the happy man loved by the prudish lady?"

"No other, my lord, than the droll Giovetchino, the grazioso of the company!"

"Impossible!"

"Pure truth, your highness; and he, moreover, loves her to distraction, and is jealous as a Turk! They torment each other, yet cannot part. To make the matter still more complicated, the old impresario is passionately fond of the boy—has his stiff notions, too, and must know nothing of our project, else he might prove a serious stumbling-block; and your highness is too good-natured to resort to severe measures in the matter of the old man."

"That is a question, marshal! In good truth, I am gentle, very gentle! I do not abuse my power. But I know not what should hinder me, if a man provoke my anger, from putting him out of the way! Why have I armies and forts? Santa Maria! But the old fool may go, if you find other means of satisfying me."

"That will I, your highness! It is important, in the first place, that we make the grazioso ridiculous in Fiametta's eyes; for that is the stumbling-block between them. He must seem ridiculous—ridiculous even to contempt; but understand, must not himself feel it! Still less must he suspect how high a hand is in the game. The boy is a mad fellow, and might spoil our project; and were that once to happen, our contrivance would only serve to invest him with the glory of a hero. A dexterous assistant in the affair, who can bear all the blame, if need be, I have found in the primo amoroso, Signor Antonio Montecavello, himself a rejected suitor of the maiden, who desires nothing more than revenge upon his rival. When she is taught contempt for the grazioso, and in proportion a higher value for herself, my lord, there needs but a light attack to insure you victory; for what female heart can withstand the condescension of your highness!"

The prince replied, smiling, "I see, indeed, but little in all you have told me to discourage me from despatching the affair at once and briefly; yet, as difficulties enhance enjoyment, you have my leave to intrigue to your heart's content! Only take care it last not too long. When you need my help, say so; meanwhile your recompense shall be worthy of a prince's giving!" He held his hand to the marshal, who pressed it reverentially to his lips and retired.

Armed with full powers, the courtier began his play; the prince was present at every rehearsal, continually proposing alterations and improvements to the impresario, yet before the intorixated Spaccamino could collect himself sufficiently for reply, turning it off with, "Well, well, my dear Signor, settle it all with our marshal, as you both think best." Then he would turn to consult Fiametta, and whatever she advised was instantly ordered to be done. Signor Ramuzio was too stupid to see the meaning of all this; the damsel, on the contrary, could not but perceive what power her lightest word had over the will of the handsome prince, upon whose glance so many thousands hung—who in his own dominions reigned like an eastern despot.

That all this flattered the girl, is not strange; the most prudent prima donna could not have repressed a little triumph at these proofs of the power of her beauty. Condemn not, then, the fair Fiametta, a lively daughter of the south, if she owned some womanly vanity, and was pleased at the prince's gallantry, conscious as she was of the envy of all her female associates. Yet her joy was not unembittered! The more she exulted in the royal admiration, the more deeply she felt how ridiculous a figure the grazioso cut, and how inseparable he seemed in real life from his comic parts. She could not help seeing the prince and his court convulsed with laughter at his jokes, and hearing the prince declare he had never seen such a precious lad for fun—so thoroughly made for a grazioso! At one rehearsal, in which the grazioso performed, the prince flung him a purse, asking him, laughing, "if he would not like to enter his service as cost fool!" Fiametta observed, indeed, that Giovetchino with difficulty repressed his indignation; nevertheless, the strange face he made at the prince, the old primice with which he declined the honour of being court-fool, moved her, spite of herself, to laughter.

The prince marked the youth's paleness and triumphed. So long as the rehearsal lasted, the frolic humour of the grazioso was in requisition; his most unmeaning words were laughed at, applauded, and rewarded with gold.

At the end, the prince himself conducted the prima donna to her litter. In passing, she cast a glance at Giovetchino; he was leaning exhausted and trembling against a pillar. "Poor lad!" said the prince, "you have overtasked yourself for our amusement! Go into the kitchen, the butler will give you what will mend your strength; bid them feed you well, my good fellow!"—They passed on; Giovetchino gave a leap and sank on a bench, half breathless.—"Good luck to you, Giovetchino!" cried Antonio, the amoroso, coming towards him with a malicious smile; "his highness means well with you, and also, I will wager, with the Signora Fiametta! Ha, do you not think she will soon leave our company! By my troth, I cannot bear to think of it! We were never so well off as now, and good luck cannot last for ever! 'Tis said the prince means to establish a grand Italian opera here: Fiametta will be a charming prima donna—and per Bacco! his highness seems to have cast eyes on her! But the offer he made you, ha! ha! he! it was too mad, eh, Giovetchino?"

The youth had risen, and with a cold smile answered his enemy, "My dear Signor Antonio Montecavello, you may keep your good wishes and observations to yourself, nor fancy me now, as I was yonder on the boards, a grazioso. I know you hate me; you think me to blame that Signora Fiametta despised your suit; but I assure you the fault was not mine. If the lady spurned you with cold contempt, the reason was simply and solely that she knew Signor Antonio Montecavello for a worthless, pitiful fellow, as well as she knew him on the stage a despicable amoroso. That I love Fiametta, you may know; that she will not return my affection, that I never hope to win her, you may also know. But if you dare again, wretch—and his displeasure amounted to fury—"if you dare again breathe a syllable about it, by all the infernals! here, or at the foot of Vesuvius, it is the same to me!" His voice was choked with rage; he was deadly pale, but glared on the amoroso with the look of a tiger, grasping convulsively the handle of his knife. With a shriek, the affrighted Montecavello sprang back; the grazioso mastered himself, and bursting into a contemptuous laugh, left the circus.

The beautiful Fiametta stood before the mirror in her chamber, contemplating with satisfaction a pair of splendid earrings, the latest gift of the prince, which old Mariana Capuzzi had brought her.

"Do you think, Mariana," asked she, smiling, "that even the prima donna at San Carlo has jewels like mine?"

"No, child," replied the other; "nor I question has the prima donna at Rome, or Milan, or Venice, any to compare with yours! Yet for you, little one, the costliest are not too costly! Sparkle and shine as they may, they cannot rival your eyes! Corpo della luna! Had I had your eyes when I was young, and your pretty face and shape, it should have gone hard but I would have had at least a marquis to my husband."

"I want no marquis!" said the damsel, gaily.

"Right, little one!" said Mariana, "it is better you remain free; I mean, that you should not marry. A marquis after all, were he ever so rich, is but a mean prize; but a duke, darling, a duke, such as reigns here! To govern him, were worthy of Fiametta!"

"You are not in your senses, old one!" cried the girl, turning away and blushing deeply.

"I am rational enough to see through you!" returned Mariana. "Eh, you think I know not what you wish and dream of! Well, all depends upon you, cara mia, all!"

"Silence!" cried Fiametta, glowing with indignation, "you do not see through me! I may yield to vanity for a moment, but I am better than you think me. No, no! never could I sink so low!"

"So low!" repeated Mariana, "to be the beloved, the adored, of the handsome prince of his time! To float in all the delights of youth, beauty, riches and unbounded power can command! The envious of all! is that to be sunk low!"

"One thing you forget, Mariana!"

"Ha, what is that?"

"The contempt of the world."

"The little fool! what care you for the paltry multitude, that never dare open their mouths except to cry vivat! unless their sovereign bids them!"

"Oh!" cried the maiden with feeling, "out of the eyes of this unhappy people speaks an accusation more terrible than the wildest outcry of Massaniello's children!"

The old woman replied with a cold and scornful laugh—"I would have never believed the wisdom of the grazioso so catching!"

"Name not that hated name!" cried Fiametta, bursting into tears. "Oh, miserable weakness! that I for the sake of that name rebel, reject, insult a man who loves me, beyond all! whom I—poor Giovetchino! and you, thankless, have you quite forgotten that it was Giovetchino who saved your life and mine?"

"No, darling!" answered the old woman, ironically; "and if you will marry him for that, I have naught to say."

"Who talks of marrying him?" angrily asked the girl.

"Eh! I think, yourself! That the lad loves you, we all know; you but just now said it! that he pines and grieves after you, his pale cheeks bear witness. It was but this morning Signor Ramuzio observed, 'the youth is grown so melancholy, he can serve no longer as grazioso, if this goes on!'"

"Poisonous serpent!" murmured Fiametta, glancing contemptuously at the old woman. Signora Capuzzi was about to renew her suggestions, when the door opened and Giovechino entered.

"Leave the room!" he said sternly. "With a malicious look Mariana obeyed, muttering as she went—"The boy carries himself, our lady pardon me, as if he were a reigning prince!"

Fiametta had seated herself at a table, whosom lay scattered some of her jewels, which she was gathering together to put into a casket. Giovechino stood opposite her with folded arms, observing her gloomily. "What have you to say to me?" began at last the maiden, without looking up.

Sighing deeply, he asked—"Not a look does Fiametta longer deign the poor Grazioso!" The maiden raised her eyes timidly; saw the bitter smile, and the trace of deep we on his pale and sunken cheeks; overpowered with emotion she could only murmur, "Giovechino!"

The youth flung himself at her feet, snatched both her hands, pressed them to his heart, to his lips, passionately exclaiming, Oh, Fiametta! my only, my ever beloved! such was the tone with which you once spoke to me! I loved was the look you once gave me; that I dreamed myself in heaven, and could have asked the highest angel, which is happier, thou or I! I was happier! In judgment, your heart was turned from me, and now I am wretched, unspeakably wretched!" His tears burst forth; in trembling agony he laid his burning brow on Fiametta's, laid and wept aloud.

"Giovechino!" cried the maiden, deeply moved, "I beseech you, talk not thus! Only compose yourself, I conjure you! I will—ah! only tell me what I shall do!" Her tears mingled with his; she pressed his head to her throbbing bosom, kissed his forehead, and softly repeated, "Tell me, my life! what shall I do!"

"Follow your heart!" cried Giovechino, passionately—"your heart, that speaks for me! Wo to you and me, if you listen not to its voice, if you stifle it with vanity and false shame! Those are the snares of Satan, who would destroy us for the sake of our love. Our love was purity and truth before heaven! it is and will remain so, if you break not the bond! What does it harm our earnest and holy love, that I on the stage move the people to laughter, while our enemy is named by you 'Caro Spese'! Both are lies, but what we feel for each other, that is truth! Wo to you and me, if it yield to the might of the bad spirit!"

"Hear me! hear me! dear Giovechino!" implored Fiametta; "I love you truly; my heart understands you, and can never be unfaithful. It is because I love you, that I must not, will not deceive you! Call me a fool—a silly, weak girl; but I cannot—I cannot own you before them all, so long as you are the grazioso I cannot bear that my lover should be received and greeted with shouts of laughter only, while admiration and ecstasy war on me! I know well, that much is only seeming, perhaps all, so long as we are on the stage; yet much follows and clings to us in real life. Oh! how like burning steel went to my heart the prince's question, if you would be his court fool! and you, the grazioso, bearing that indignity, seemed to me in that moment even contemptible!"

"Maladetto!" cried the grazioso, springing to his feet, saying, "thou—contemptible!"

"I cannot deceive you in this solemn moment!" said Fiametta, weeping violently.

"She has come to that!" murmured the youth bitterly, while his face grew paler than before. It has been possible to despise the beloved! a moment passed in gloomy silence; then he addressed Fiametta with dignity, though with deep feeling. "When in the passes of the Appennines, Giovechino encountered five bandits alone, and saved the lives of our whole company; he was then the excellent grazioso, and you lay on his bosom, and called him by fond names—"your saviour! your preserver!" What bad spirit has distilled poison into the free soul, that our art and its exercise now seem contemptible! Wo to the people, who can laugh, yet take shame for their mirth, and despise it! a cold capricious, slavish people must they be! So it is not under the fair heaven of our own land! The prince's question moved you to indignation! I, too, scarce repressed mine—not for the silly proposal, that touched my honour; it was for the evil purpose of the prince, to insult me in your presence. Yes! your blushes tell me you know his purpose; that it is part of his project to lower me in your eyes, for he knows of our love! Now tell me, Fiametta, who most deserves contempt, the poor grazioso, who loves you, and cares for no danger, no ridicule, so he may win your affection, or the mighty prince, who will stoop to the lowest means to gratify his wicked wishes, yet is too much a coward to meet the poor grazioso as an open enemy? Ay! were your highest favour the prize, and I could choose between the condition of the mighty prince and mine, I would remain, by heaven I would! the poor grazioso, and bear the curse of ridicule a thousand and a thousand fold!"—Fiametta! I believe your heart! I trust you—for I warned you. Could you yet deceive me—then, Fiametta—then—"

"No more! my Giovechino!" cried the young girl, trembling with emotion; "never, never, shall Fiametta be false to you—to herself! Beloved, again I swear to be yours for ever! all yours! Ah! leave me only time to collect myself; to banish from my heart all unworthy feelings. Could we to-day leave this city—this land! yes—away from this place! away with all that reminds me of this place!" She snatched up the ear-rings and flung them contemptuously from her. Giovechino caught her in a rapture of fondness to his bosom; she resisted not the embrace—she returned it. At that instant the door softly opened, and Mariana's hateful, grinning visage was seen, while with a hoarse laugh she cried, "Said I not so, eh? Viva la signora graziosa!"

ON THE DEATH OF MY DOG BOZ.

BY JAMES NACK.

SINCE nothing dies but something mourns,
Poor Boz! I well may mourn for thee,
Nor heed the stoic pride that scorns
Affection's tear of sympathy.

And while upon the turf I tread
With which thy mangled relics blend,
I feel as if it might be said,
Here sleeps my best and truest friend!

For when on all thy love and truth,
Dulcely and zeal I dwell,
I cannot help but ask in sooth,
What human heart has loved so well!

And can it be! but yesterday
A thing of life in every limb,
Now scudding o'er the fields in play,
Now dashing in the waves to swim;

Or crouching at thy master's feet
With look of grave intelligence,
His every word and glance to meet
With fond, though silent eloquence;

Or rising in thy honest pride,
With grinning teeth, and eyes of flame,
To battle at thy master's side
If near a doubtful stranger came!

And can it be that thou art dead!
It warns me I must life resign—
Oh, may as fervent tears be shed
Upon my grave, as fall on thine!

Since all are doomed to yield their breath,
The thought is with some comfort crowned,
'Twas thine to meet the sudden death
That mighty Caesar sought and found.

For me—let fate come when it will,
I breathe the forest prayer on high,
That fate will find thy master still
As well prepared as thou to die!

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

ROBERT LINCOLN'S SONG.

I WAS not a little alarmed the other day, Mr. Editor, on reading a notice in your paper, regarding my old "hay-day" friend, Robert Lincoln, Esq., commonly called in this democratic "good as you" country, "Bob Link." This notice led me to believe, or rather fear, that among the innovations and changes of the times, he had also changed his song.

Judge my gratification, however, when yesterday I made a special visit to the fields of Jersey, to ascertain what change, if any he had undergone, either in song or costume. I know his haunts. I was sure, if to be found anywhere, I should meet him where I sought him—and I was not disappointed. I saw him on the bough of an apple-tree that stood on the skirt of a meadow, amusing himself in turning his pipes, as it were, to catch the right pitch; at times striking "B and E flat," and again a semi-tone, approaching "C sharp," wailing as usual the summer costume of his father and grandfather, and I don't know but that of his great grandfather too; black satin vest and pantaloons, and white roundabout jacket. Just then, his old favourite, Mary Lincoln, in a dark-grey rust morning-dress, started from a tuft of high grass on a shopping excursion, when "Robert," alive to the duties of gallantry, instantly offered his services, "vingfully" and "sangufully," and the air at once was filled with his delicious melody, in linked sweetest, "long drawn out;" the same "time-cherish'd" note, and line, and word, precisely, as I heard in childhood. For the information of some of your readers, who may not have a copy of Robert Lincoln's song, I now transcribe it; and if they want to hear it sung, let them go to the hay-fields of New-Jersey.

THE SONG.

"Mary Lincoln—Mary Lincoln—
Sweetest—sweetest—
Won't you wait for Bobby Lincoln?
Look, look—Mary Lincoln!
Don't you see—don't you see
Bobby Lincoln—satin pantaloons
And summer jacket!
Tackle to—tackle to—Mary Lincoln—
Not so fast—not so fast!
I'll follow then, round about clover top,
And dock-wed, and apple-tree;
Bobby Lincoln never lets Harry Hause, muckle weaver;
Nor shall she marry Michael Mangel-wortzel."

We are not connoisseurs in bird language, and cannot say, therefore, whether this be a genuine translation of the bob-link's ecstatic song; but if it be repeated rapidly, and with an ear to the bob-link's music, it produces something like the sound.—N. Y. American.

GHOSTS.

Define a vulgar ghost for reference to all that is called ghost-like. It is visibility without tangibility; which is also the definition of a shadow. Therefore, a vulgar ghost and a shadow would be the same; because two different things cannot properly have the same definition. A visible substance without susceptibility of impact I maintain to be an absurdity. Unless there be an external substance the bodily eye cannot see it; therefore, in all such cases, that which is supposed to be seen, is, in fact, not seen, but is an image of the brain. External objects naturally produce sensation; but here, in truth, sensation produces, as it were, the external object.

* Cannot being asked what death he thought most desirable, replied, "A sudden death;" and his death was as sudden as he could desire; so, also, was that of Boz, who, however, has not been known to express any such preference.

Of course, if the vulgar ghost be really a shadow, there must be some substance of which it is the shadow. These visible and tangible shadows without substances to cause them are absurd.

Whenever a real ghost appears—by which I mean some man or woman dressed up to frighten another, if the supernatural character of the operation has been for a moment believed, the effects on the spectator have always been most terrible—convulsion, idiocy, madness, or even death on the spot. Consider the awful descriptions in the Old Testament of the effects of a spiritual presence on the prophets and seers of the Hebrews; the terror, the exceeding great dread, the utter loss of all animal power. But in our common ghost stories you always find, after the deed, after a most appalling apparition, as you are to believe, is quite well the next day. Perhaps he may have a headache, but that is the outside of the effect produced.

Allston, a man of genius, and the best painter yet produced by America, when he was in England, told me an anecdote which confirms what I have been saying. It was, I think, in the university of Cambridge, near Boston, that a certain youth, took it into his wise head to endeavour to convert a Tom Paineish companion of his by appearing as a ghost before him. He accordingly dressed himself up in the usual way, having previously extracted the ball from the pistol which always lay near the head of his friend's bed. Upon first awakening, and seeing the apparition, the youth who was to be frightened, a very coolly looked his companion, the ghost, in the face, and said, "I know you; this is a good joke, but you see I am not frightened. Now you may vanish." The ghost stood still. "Come," said A., "that is enough. I shall get angry, away!" Still the ghost moved not. "By—!" ejaculated A., "if you do not, in three minutes, go away, I'll shoot you." He waited the time, deliberately levelled his pistol, fired, and with a scream at the immovability of the figure, became convulsed, and afterwards died. The very instant he believed it to be a ghost, his human nature fell before it.—Coleridge.

THE PORTRAITS OF L. E. L.

It is singular that so few portraits of this accomplished woman should have been painted. For nearly twenty years she occupied a large portion of public attention: and, during the whole of her career, was almost adored by the young and warm-hearted. Although certainly not beautiful, perhaps she can scarcely be described as handsome—her countenance possessed that which an artist prizes above beauty, at least above the beauty that is without it—expression; her features were not regular, but they were pleasing and attractive at all times; and, when animated, had a character approximating to loveliness. Her form, too, though petite, was graceful. She had a large acquaintance among artists, to whose society she was always especially partial. It is not strange, then, that so few have employed the pencil in perpetuating the remembrance of one so dear to fame, and whose works must for ever form a conspicuous part of the literary history of the age! She first met Mr. Pickersgill, we should suppose about the year 1822 or 3. This portrait has not been engraved. We always considered it a good likeness, though not an agreeable one; and it was never in favour with her or with her friends. Mr. Wright made a drawing of her for the New Monthly Magazine, and a very poor affair it was, giving one the idea of a port charactermaid rather than the authoress of the "Improvisatrice." She sat to Mr. Clise three or four times. One of his drawings was published with her poem of "The Golden Violets;" another was engraved, not long since, by Edward Fendin; and, if not entirely satisfactory, is, at all events, the only print that affords a just idea of the original. While upon the subject, we may remark, that, of Mrs. Hemans, there is, we believe, only one portrait—that by Mr. West; a fine bust, however, was executed by an Irish sculptor whose name we are ashamed to have forgotten; and that the only recollection of Miss Jewsbury, the friend of both Mrs. Hemans and Miss Landon, and worthy to be associated with them, is to be derived from an unfinished and unsatisfactory drawing by her fellow-townsmen, poor Lawrence. This is not, it should be, artist's will themselves lament, in common with the world, when persons of genius—women of genius more especially,

"Lead their grace to the grave,
And leave the world no copy."

We add to our own remarks some which a fair associate has favoured us. The writer was one of L. E. L.'s (we cannot bear to call her Mrs. Martin) most intimate and most attached friends—one who, perhaps, knew her better than most. It is not easy too much to affirm, that she deeply felt and highly appreciated this lady's firm friendship and unchanging affection; and she was one of the last to live in her remembrance.

Of the portraits, that by Mr. Clise is certainly the most like her who is gone from us for ever; her who, a few months ago, was the light and life of all societies in which she appeared. But Sir Thomas Lawrence was, perhaps, the only painter of modern times who could have caught one particular expression, which, fleeting though it was, rendered her face, at times, one of positive beauty. At such moments I used to look on her with astonishment, and wonder how she could have been called "plain." It was strange to watch the many shades of varied feeling which passed across her countenance even in an hour. I can see her now—her dark silken hair braided back over a small, but what physiognomists would call a well developed head; her forehead lofty, and full and open, although the hair grew low upon it; the eye-brows perfect in arch and form; the eyes round, soft, or flashing, as they might be—gray, well-formed and beautifully set—the lashes long and black, the under ones turning down with a delicate curve, and forming a soft relief upon the tint of her cheek, which, when she enjoyed good health, was bright and blushing; her complexion was delicately fair; her skin soft and transparent; her nose small (retroverse) the nostrils well defined, slightly curved, but capable of a scornful expression, which she did not appear to have the power of expressing; even though she gave her thoughts no words, when any mean or despicable action was alluded to; it would be difficult to describe her mouth; it was neither fat nor pointing, neither large nor small; the under jaw projected a little beyond the upper; her smile was deliciously animated; her teeth white, small and even, and her voice and laugh soft, low, and musical; her ears were of peculiar beauty, and all who used to gaze at the beauty of the human head, know that the ear is either pleasing to look upon, or much the contrary; her's were very small, and of a delicate line, and her hands and feet even smaller than her sylph-like figure would have led one to expect. She would have been of perfect symmetry were it not that her shoulders were rather high. Her movements, when not excited by animated conversation, were graceful and ladylike; but when excited, they became sudden and almost abrupt. When she was in the fresh blush of her fame, Pickengulf me her the subject of one of his most perfect pictures—"as a picture, but I never thought of it like it was too womanly, too self-concentrated for L. E. L. And one of her greatest charms as a woman was the difference she made to the opinions of others, and the sweet modesty with which she urged her own. She would defend a position with admirable wit and tact, but always with good temper and a playful sweetness that was quite her own, never suffering her opinion to feel any bitterness or self-reproach if she gained a victory. It was almost impossible to believe the slight, boning girl—bound like a fawn to meet those she loved, those of high minds and unspotted reputation, who knew her all her fruitful life, and who mourn over her early grave, as though they had lost a sister or a child; it was almost impossible to fancy her the poet of so many genres of poetry, or the author of such bitterness as steals over in her novels; but, after ten minutes conversation, a person of ordinary conversation would be convinced that, like the lily flaring on the bosom of our own beautiful flowers, though the blossom was on the surface, the roots were firmly fixed in the depths below. When she was known, the only wonder was that one of such solid and varied information cultivated so many graces, and was so anxious—perhaps too anxious—to please those who sought society for fashion's sake, without being able to appreciate her as she deserved. Though of ten light of heart, she was never light of mind: upon the latter the weight of knowledge, the heaviness that grows with the knowledge of human nature, rested and remained. She was not hopeful either, if she did express a hope she generally checked herself immediately: and her bright smile was usually the herald of a sigh; she had enough of fame, but fame never filled a woman's heart—and wherever she could find domestic affections, she wound her very soul about them.

"Though born in Hans-place, and always residing (with the exception of a few early years) in its neighbourhood, and fond of festing at the romance of a country life, she was too genuine a poet not to revel in the beauties of nature: and on the day, in the fields, or the woods, was enjoyed with almost childish delight. She had no idea of selfish or solitary enjoyment. The only thing I ever knew her selfish in was sorrow: that she coveted in the depths of her own bosom; but it was beautiful to see her intelligent face irradiate with happiness when she had anything to communicate that she knew must give pleasure to those she loved. Most lavish was she of praise where she thought it deserved; and her exquisite taste, like the instinct of the bee, led her of herself only to those flowers where honey was to be found. When forced to be critical, she got rid of the task as briefly and hastily as possible: the wonder being, not that she had been severe, but how she could have been so merciful. It has been said by some writers on the peculiar nature of Irish music, that an air played quickly would be joyous enough to excite mirth, and repeated in a plaintive manner would move the heart to sadness; so that, in fact, the art must possess not only the elements but the power of both. So it often seemed with her: in society she responded to either the tone of sorrow or joy, though she never intruded her own sadness, or talked melancholy, if she could avoid it. She felt intensely for others; and her friends can recall innumerable little attentions, well and kindly timed, that, like a drop of essence, small in itself, diffuses a sweet perfume around it. Most deeply did she live in poetry: it was the soul of her existence. It was in her wistful gaze in the night—pushing, pure, unstudied harmony, born with her, cherished by her, her love, her food, her hope; and, like the nightingale, her last sweet song was sweetest, even when the thorn was festering in her bosom. Prose writing was always a task to her, but she revelled in verse; caught with avidity any idea that was offered to her, and always grateful for the bribe upon which her genius turned to gold. "Subjects for Pictures" were commenced at Mr. S. C. Hall's request, for the New Monthly Magazine, when he was editor to that work; some of her (subjects) are treated in so masterly a manner, that they hardly need the painter's art, but present themselves to the reader's eye without his assistance. Though quite unskilled in the language of the schools, she had a fine feeling for

"The art that can immortalize."

"I remember her once speaking of artists in her usual animated and poetical manner, and concluding by saying, 'that they deserved all honour, they idolized humanity.' And a string of pearls might have gathered, had I noted down the thoughts that fell in savings from her lips. The Princess, in the Fairy tale, was not more prodigal of jewels than was she—bright from the store of her rich mind; but it seems to me a sort of moral sacrifice to rob the temple of the living body of its best riches; to lay them in my desk to wait for what I cannot bear to make precatious notes—for a future I must shrink from contemplating. The task is an unholty one. By day and night, in sickness and in health, in joy and sorrow, in society and under the moonlight shadow of the leafy trees, we have been together. But she is gone! gone for ever! We shall never even look upon her grave—we, who knew and loved her to the last! the magic of her name is with us still, but like her own sweet poetry, that always echoed towards the end of a deep sigh of sadness. "Her mind was too deep-toned to yield much music to the light touch of mirth. I cannot, at this moment, call to mind a cheerful poem from her pen. It was only with the frivolous that she assumed frivolity. She was veryaverse to be considered author-like, and would, in society, avoid all topics that might lead to such a conclusion. Those who knew her when away from the world—and she was convinced that her feelings would not be misrepresented—must remember how light and evanescent were her smiles, how heavy were her sighs. She took unto herself the troubles of those she loved, and those who do so cannot enjoy much of the world's content."

AN ADVENTURE IN MEXICO.

While residing in the mountain city of Calceño, I had occasion to start suddenly on a journey to Zacatecas; seizing my holsters, I departed alone on horseback. In a few hours I arrived at the rancho del Bosal, when I informed myself more particularly respecting the road. I was told that I had to pass through a palm forest several miles in extent, and that I should find a rancho fifteen miles distant, the only one in thirty miles. Riding through the forest, the thought of robbers naturally occurred, and of taking a look at my pistols. On examination I found I had left one to be repaired,

"Wanting, as L. E. L. was supposed to want, the attributes of regular society, I have often been amused at the astonishment expressed by some who did not know her, when she was again disappointed. One evening I invited the Ettrick Shepherd to meet her and a few others distinguished in the world of letters. Hogg started when presented to the club of poets, and, with a look of surprise and a nervous face, and exclaimed, "Oh, dear! I had written and thought many a bitter thing about ye, but I'll do so no more: I did not think ye'd been so bonny."

and that the other had no flint. I felt in the bottom of the holsters, but in vain; so for my safety it was necessary to trust solely to the respectable appearance of a pair of bear-skin holsters. Plodding in the heat of the sun, I discovered, at a little distance from the road, a bamboo hut. No one appeared, but appearances indicated that it was inhabited. I carried my saddle into the hut, and gave my horse the length of a cabresto to graze. With my saddle and armas de agua, I made the traveller's bed, upon which I reclined, placing my holsters by my side. A ferocious looking person soon rode up, asked a few questions, and returned. The inquiries did not fail to excite suspicion; but being overcome with fatigue and the heat of the day, I remained quiet. The man soon returned, bringing a more ferocious looking companion. Seeing my perilous situation, I instantly resolved to demand myself in the same manner as if my pistols had been of the best. The companion, after asking various questions, and praising the holsters, requested me to do him the favour to show him the pistols, to see if they were of a certain class, which he named. "I handle my arms only for defence," was my reply. He protested friendship, and repeated his request. I repeated, that I could not gratify his curiosity in that respect. He became irritated, at length angry, uttering violent and abusive language, the replies were short and harsh. Both were in front of the door, with each a long knife in his hand, in the act of whittling. An hour passed in conversation, and intervals of silence. They walked away.

I thought I would wait until dark, and then, when their lass could not serve them, rush towards them with the presented pistols, and make my escape into the wood. Reclining upon my bed, although not directing my eye immediately towards him, I discovered one of them alant, looking through an interstice in the side of the hut, to observe my movements. I introduced my hand under the flap of the holsters, as if in the act of examining lock and priming, and withdrew it with an air of content. He soon appeared again in front of the door, and banded me to exchange horses, requesting me to mount his and try him. I replied that I wished to repose—that in the morning I would probably trade, and give him a fair difference.

They mounted; it being about sunset, and taking my horse, observed they were going to water; they rode about a quarter of a mile, and turning a point of palm-wood, were out of sight. Alone, I took my pistol, withdrew the charge, and walked about the house in search of a stone for a flint. It was all limestone and would not strike fire. It was now time to resolve, and I did resolve that "prudence is the better part of valour." Taking my money and a few light articles, I proceeded to the road-side, noticed the way it ran, and saw the moon in the same direction. I withdrew a little from the road, thinking my friends might pursue me, and travelled with hastened steps, with the moon for my object, and knowing that the half-way rancho could not be far distant. After walking about three miles, occasionally stepping to my left to see if the road was secure, I heard the barking of the dogs of the rancho. I approached the house and halted, and the owner came out to me, to whom I quickly told my tale—to which he attentively listened, and remarked, "You have escaped with your life, for they are robbers." I was hospitably received by the rancho, and regaled with new milk, torillitas calientes.—Texas Morning Star.

LESSON TO NEWSPAPER BORROWERS.

Time: Saturday morning, eight o'clock. Scene: the breakfast table. A rap is heard at the door, and the newspaper is for a few moments opened before the fire.—"Come, John, it won't do to dry it long, for I see neighbour Snooks is sending his son after it." Another rap at the door. "Father wants to know if you will just lend him the newspaper five minutes; if you sent done with it he will send it right back. He only wants to see if the paper Star has been heard from, what our Tom went in." "Tell your father the brig is not reported." Honno he trips, and as speedily returns: "Mother wants to know who was buried yesterday, can't you lend it to her just two minutes?" "Tell your mother that all the deaths this week are Mr. —, and a child of Mr. —." In a few moments another tap—Sister Susan wants to know if anybody's married this week, and uncle Josh wants to know if there is any account to-day, and father wants to know what the news is from Virginia, and aunt Snooks wants to know if there is any more pretty stories about that Jarvis woman; if you can't spare the paper, why can't you just write down what there is, just cause I don't want to keep running back and forward so—"Here my lad, take this paper to your father, and round to all your uncles and aunts, and have it back, whatever is left of it, next Saturday morning at eight o'clock, precisely, when you come to borrow the next." Ten applications on Saturday by borrowers, all sent to neighbour Snooks, with a particular caution to return it there when done with. Monday morning, a rap at the door, and the boy with the paper is ushered in.—"Mother says it is too much plague to keep the paper all the week, people keep coming arter it so!"—Portsmouth Journal.

ADVANTAGE OF LYING.

When Napoleon took possession of Holland he visited Dordt, and, as was usual with him, made numerous and minute inquiries regarding the imports and general commerce of the place. Among others, he addressed abruptly Mr. Gerrard Mauritz, afterwards British consul at Dordt, asking him, "Well, what number of windmills have we here?" "Five hundred, sire," was as inconsiderately and as abruptly answered. "And what number of cubic feet of timber arrive here annually?" upon which Mr. Mauritz, as incorrectly, but as promptly, named a round number. This smartness, which Napoleon took for intelligence, so much pleased him, that next day the emperor's secretary waited upon Mr. Mauritz with the order of the Legion of Honour, and a most complimentary letter. Mr. Mauritz had previously been informed by a friend who knew Napoleon's temper, that he must not seem to hesitate, or even consider, when addressed, or asked a question by the emperor, but, right or wrong, speak frankly, boldly, and with confidence. Mr. Mauritz took and profited by the hint. In fact, Napoleon had asked the burgomaster a question about the number of criminals annually convicted at Dordt, and while the burgomaster was calculating and thinking, in order to answer correctly, Napoleon turned round upon his heel, and, with rather a supercilious curl of the lip, suddenly asked, and was answered the questions abovementioned.

EARLY RISING.—A father chiding his son for not leaving his bed at an earlier hour, told him, as an inducement, that a certain man being up betimes found a purse of gold. "It may be so," replied the son, "but he that lost it soon up before him."

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

A LEGENDARY BALLAD—FROM THE GERMAN OF HERBER.

Among green pleasant meadows,
All in a grove so wild,
Was set a marble image
Of the virgin and her child.

There, oft on summer evenings,
A lovely boy would rove,
To play beside the image
That sanctified the grove.

Oft sat his mother by him,
Among the shadows dim,
And told how the Lord Jesus
Was once a child like him.

"And now from highest heaven
He doth look down each day,
And sees what'er thou doest,
And hears what thou dost say."

Thus spake the tender mother;
And on an evening bright,
When the red round sun descended,
Mid clouds of crimson light;

Again the boy was playing,
And earnestly said he,
"O beautiful Lord Jesus,
Come down and play with me.

"I'll find thee flowers the fairest,
And weave for thee a crown;
I will get thee ripe red strawberries,
If thou wilt but come down.

"O holy, holy mother!
Put him down from off thy knee,
For in those silent meadows
There are none to play with me."

Thus spake the boy so lovely,
The while his mother heard,
And on his prayer she pondered,
But spake to him no word.

That self-same night she dreamed
A lovely dream of joy,
She thought she saw young Jesus
There, playing with the boy.

"And for the fruits and flowers
Which thou hast brought to me,
Rich blessings shall be given
A thousand fold to thee.

"For in the fields of heaven
Thou shalt roam with me at will,
And of bright fruits celestial,
Thou shalt have, dear child, thy fill."

Thus tenderly and kindly
The fair child Jesus spoke,
And, full of careful musings,
The anxious mother woke.

And thus it was accomplished,
In a short month and a day,
That lovely boy, so gentle,
Upon his death-bed lay.

And thus he spoke in dying:
"O mother dear, I see
The beautiful child Jesus
A coming down to me.

"And, in his hand he beareth
Bright flowers as white as snow,
And red and juicy strawberries—
Dear mother, let me go!"

He died, and that fond mother
Her tears could not restrain,
But she knew he was with Jesus,
And she did not weep again.

TOPICS FOR THOUGHT.

Zeno, of all virtues, made his choice of silence; for by it, said he, I learn other men's imperfections, and conceal my own. People who complain of the dullness of their newspaper may be said to be the silent, who keep their pens clear of any attempt at public enlightenment, and thus are at liberty to see others' imperfections and correct their own. There is probably no sect that is so well supplied with broken legs for a tumble as the editor's chair.

William Penn's maxims are little sought after in the present day. He says of method, that it goes far to prevent trouble in business; for it makes the task easy—hinders confusion—saves abundance of time, and instructs those that have business depending what to do and what to hope.

Believe nothing against another but upon good authority, nor report what may hurt another, unless it be a great hurt to others to conceal it.

Happiness consists in a virtuous and honest life, in being content with a competency of outward things, and in using them temperately. Tillotson says that it is a great mark of the corruption of our natures, and what ought to humble us extremely, and excite the exercise of our reason to a nobler and juster sense, that we cannot see the use and pleasure of our comforts but by the want of them.

Wouldst thou know the lawfulness of the action which thou desirest to undertake? Let thy devotion recommend it to divine blessing; if it be lawful, thou shalt perceive thy heart encouraged by thy prayer; if unlawful, thou shalt find thy prayer discouraged by thy heart. That action is not warrantable, which either blushes to be a blessing, or having succeeded dares not present a thanksgiving.

If thou desirest not to be too poor, desire not to be too rich; he is rich, not that possesses much, but he that covets no more; and he is poor, not that enjoys little, but he that wants too much: the contented mind wants nothing which it hath not; the covetous mind wants not only what it hath not, but likewise what it hath.

We hope there is nothing personal in the following lines. Coming from the quarter they do, we do not feel at liberty to decline them.

THE COLONEL.

A colonel!—such a creature!
I met him at the ball!
Perfect in form and feature,
And so divinely tall!
He praised my dimpled cheeks and curls,
While whirling through the dance,
And matched me with the dark-eyed girls
Of Italy and France!

He said, in accents thrilling,
"Love's boundless as the sea!
And I, dear maid, am willing
To give up all for thee!"

I heard him blushed—"would ask mamma"—
And then my eyes grew dim:
He looked—I said, "mamma—dada—
I'd give up all for him!"

That my papa was rich and old
Full well the colonel knew:
"Love's wings," he said, "when fringed with gold,
Are beautiful to view!"

I thought his haughty quite the ton
Until I saw him stare,
When merely told that brother John,
Papa would make his heir!

Next day and the day after
I dressed for him in vain—
Was moved to tears and laughter—
He never came again!

But I have heard for widow Dash,
He bought the bridal ring,
And that he'll wed her for her cash,
The ugly, hateful thing!

ARAB MANNERS.

MOHAMMED-BEN-MOUSSA, a resident in the village of Kara-Mustapha, in Algiers, lately gave his young wife, Halima, a blow with his yataghan. He was arrested by the French troops, and delivered over to the native authorities. Their mode of proceeding was as follows.—Early in the morning the Cadi El-Arbe and the Cadi of Krachena rode up to the village, accompanied by Captain Dallouville, superintendent of Arabian affairs, and followed by a host of Arabs on horseback. The criminal was led behind by native soldiers. The cadi's first visit was to the wounded wife. Having examined her wound, he said gravely, "It is nothing, the woman is safe." The criminal then entered the tent, and sat down on the ground opposite the fair Halima, whose pretty head, yet wrapped in bandages, rested on her hand. Mohammed, without uttering a word, fixed his eye long and steadily on his young wife; the expression of his face it is impossible to describe; anger and remorse for his conduct seemed to be equally balanced. The silent play of his features had a wild, savage grandeur in it, while Halima abandoned her attitude of melancholy and suffering, and opened wide her brilliant black eyes, which fairly shot sparks of anger and contempt at her unworthy husband. She forgot even that the tent was full of strangers, and that the stern laws of Arab propriety required her to be closely veiled. The cadi interrupted the profound silence in which this expressive and striking pantomime was acted, and said, in a calm and dignified tone, "Mohammed-Ben-Moussa, thou hast committed a crime, in leaving on the head of thy wife the burning trace of thy dagger." With this, he stretched out his hand towards Halima's head. The cadi's words aroused Halima from her silence, she turned her head aside, with an air of the supremest contempt, and cried, crying her husband asunder: "Man! depart hence—thou shalt never look on me again!" Her whole frame trembled with anger for a moment, and she then resumed the pensive attitude in which she was found when we entered. Captain Dallouville then invited us to meet in front of the tribe, to be present at the giving of judgment. A bourras was stretched on the ground, on which the cadi placed themselves. The minutes of the preliminary examination were then read in Arabic and French; after which the cadi asked the prisoner if he acknowledged the truth of what was there stated. He answered, "O representative of the prophet! I am falsely accused; the words of the slanderer have entered piercingly into my heart, like the sharp point of a dagger, I am innocent, as Allah is my witness" do with me as you shall see fit." Here he sat down on the ground, and stretched out his hands towards his judges, looking up meanwhile to heaven. The witnesses were next heard; but the testimony of Halima's mother was rejected on the suggestion of the culprit, on account of her relationship to the accused. The cadi then rested his head on his hands awhile, in reflection, and pronounced the following sentence:—"We repaired to the tribe of Kara-Mustapha, to try the case of Mohammed-Ben-Moussa, and his wife, Halima-Brut-Omar, whom he has wounded. We examined the wound, and find that it was caused by a yataghan. The law El Moukallaf saith, 'In every case where there is the mark or scar of a blow, divorce shall be declared.' Wherefore, we have asked of Halima, if she was willing that it should so be, and on her answering that she was willing, we pronounced the divorce in a manner distinct and irrevocable. Moreover, we condemn Mohammed to receive, according to the saying of the law, eighty blows with a stick, to pay a fine of fifty francs, as the price of the wound, and to restore the dower, which is in amount fifty-six francs, twenty-six centimes. Further, he shall undergo an imprisonment of seven days, that he may learn how to behave himself hereafter. Halima is free to go wherever she may wish. Done in the presence of witnesses of sound mind, and capable to testify in law, being dated on the third day of the month Moharrem, in the year 1255." The sentence was immediately written out and read in Arabic and French. The next moment the bastinado was applied on the soles of the criminal's feet. He bore it with the usual stoicism of an Arab, and was then led back to Algiers, to undergo his imprisonment.

EXTRAORDINARY PROPHECY.

At a late meeting of the French Academy of Sciences, the following communication was read:—"I have ascertained from the continued and laborious investigation in which I have been engaged for some time past, though not as yet with perfect certainty, that next year, (1840,) the course of the stars will be very extraordinary. Be good enough, gentlemen, to put an end to my doubts as to the existence of the facts I allude to, by a speedy answer. These facts are, that according to my observations, a phenomenon is to happen which has never yet been presented; a thing perfectly unheard of, I mean, an eclipse of the earth. The said eclipse will take place as follows: On the sixth of January, at three-quarters past nine o'clock in the morning, a mass of clouds will be seen, which will spread over all Europe, and descend gradually toward the earth's surface. As soon as these clouds arrive at a distance of three feet from the surface, the whole human race will be, as it were, stupified for a quarter of an hour, and lose both sight and hearing. After the fifteen minutes have elapsed, they will find themselves suspended in the air, between the mass of clouds and the sky, at a height of eighteen feet, or thereabouts, during which time the earth will be turned completely upside down, and then return to its former position, and all things go on once more in their regular course. These phenomena will cease at about half-past two in the afternoon. This, if it should really take place, will certainly be a most extraordinary state of things, and I beg of you to let me know your opinion on the subject at your earliest convenience." Fortunately for those of us who have no taste for hanging between heaven and earth, the Academy does not seem to agree in opinion with the philosopher. In fact, with that envy which sometimes exists among men of science, they would not condescend even to notice this discovery.

THE OMNIOLOQUENT CARDINAL.

On the feast of the Epiphany divine service is performed at Rome, in the church of the Propaganda, in the native tongues of the different pupils, who represent all parts of Europe, Asia and Africa. The Cardinal Mezzofanti is perhaps the only man living who is able to converse with each of them in his own language. It is said that his holiness once wished to test the extent of his acquirements. Having had all the pupils of the Propaganda collected in the garden, he made arrangements to have them accost the cardinal successively, and address him, each one in his own mother-tongue. The cardinal, though a little surprised at this polyglottic procession, stood his ground well, and replied to each one in the same language in which he was addressed. But a still more extraordinary feat, if possible, is that all foreigners who converse with the cardinal affirm, that if they had not known the contrary, they should have taken him for a fellow-countryman, so correct and natural are his language and accent.

THE RULING PASSION.

At a ball given lately by M. I—, one of the richest bankers in the capital, the Marquis de T—, trod by accident on the toe of his wealthy host, who was standing, lost in thought, by the chimney. "My dear sir," cried the marquis, "I ask a thousand—" "Apply to my cashier, if you please," was the answer that greeted his astonished ears. M. I— soon recollected himself, and had a hearty laugh with the marquis over his absence of mind; but I— said that he was soon obliged to leave the room, as when the anecdote spread among the company, all the needy young men about town who were present, hastened to tread on his toes, in the hope of getting an equally satisfactory answer, till the poor banker's foot was black and blue.

REVERSE OF FORTUNE.

There is now living as servant in a plain private family near Marseilles, a princess of royal blood, whom misfortune has driven from her distant African kingdom to the shores of the Mediterranean. She was born at Bambara, the city of a thousand cedars, and her father reigned over a country as extensive as all France. Some six months since, the city was taken and burnt, her father escaped with great difficulty, but all his children were seized and sold as slaves. The captain of a French vessel bought this young girl, who has received the name of Oukra, after the well-known romance.

A DERANGED FOWL.

It would seem that luxury is no longer an exclusive privilege of our poor human nature. For three months past all the symptoms of genuine mental alienation may be seen in a thrush, which has perched in the window of a house in St. Pol, and passes the whole day in eying its image reflected in the glass. It is impossible to remove him from the window; he clings fast to the sash, and is incessantly pecking at the glass. If the window is opened, he keeps his footing outside, but never enters the room; if an attempt is made to catch him, he flies off, but returns as soon as the danger is over. He has become so well-known that all the passers-by cast their eyes up to the window, to see if the monomaniac is still at his post; and they always find him there.

ROYAL PERFORMERS.

Once, at Marie Antoinette's private theatre, the little comic opera of Rose and Coles was performed by the royal family and court. The queen had a part in it, and just as she finished one of the songs a sharp hiss was heard. The spectators looked at each other in surprise, but Marie Antoinette, who felt at once that in all the crowd of grandees and courtiers, there was but one person who would venture to take such a liberty, came forward to the front of the stage, and, addressing herself to the king, after saluting the audience, "Sir," says she, "since you are not satisfied with my acting, if you will take the trouble to step out, your money will be returned at the entrance." A thunder of applause greeted this sally, in which the king joined most heartily.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF THE INDIANS.

BY GEORGE CATLIN.

RAIN-MAKING AMONG THE MANDANS ON THE UPPER MISSOURI.

Readers, did you ever hear of "Rain-makers!" If not, sit still, and read on, but laugh not—keep cool and sober, or else you may laugh in the beginning, and cry at the end, of my story. Well, I introduce to you a new character, not a doctor, or a high-priest, but a medicine-man, and one of the highest and most respectable order, a "Rain-maker!" Such dignitaries live in the Mandan nation; ay, and "Rain-stoppers," too; and even those, also, among their conjurati, who, like Joshua of old, have even essayed to stop the sun in his course; but, from the inefficiency of their medicine or mystery, have long since descended into insignificance.

Well, the story begins thus: the Mandans raise a great deal of corn, and sometimes a most disastrous drought will be visited on the land, destructive to their promised harvest. Such was the case when I arrived at the Mandan village, in the steamboat Yellow Stone. Rain had not fallen for many a day, and the dear little girls, and the ugly old squaws, altogether, (all of whom had corn,) were groaning and crying to their lords, and imploring them to intercede for rain, that their little respective patches, which were now turning pale and yellow, might not be withered, and they be deprived of the pleasure of their customary annual festivity, and the joyful occasion of the "roasting ears," and the "green-corn dance."

The chiefs and doctors sympathized with the plaints of the women, and recommended patience. Great deliberation they said was necessary in these cases, and though they resolved on making the attempt to produce rain for the benefit of the corn, yet they very wisely resolved, that to begin too soon might ensure their entire defeat in the endeavour; and that the longer they put it off, the more certain they would feel of ultimate success. So, after a few days of further delay, when the importunities of the women had become clamorous and even mournful, and almost insupportable, the medicine-men assembled in the council or medicine-house, with all their mystery-apparatus about them, with an abundance of wild sage and other aromatic herbs, and a fire prepared to burn them, that their savoury odour might be sent forth to the Great Spirit. The lodge was closed to all in the village except some ten or fifteen young men, who were willing to hazard the dreadful alternative of making it rain, or suffer the everlasting disgrace of having made a fruitless essay.

They only were allowed as witnesses to the hoocus pocus and conjuration which was devised by the doctors, inside of the medicine lodge, and they were called up by lot, each one in his turn, to spend a day upon the top of the lodge, to test the potency of his medicine; or, in other words, to see how far his voice might be heard and obeyed among the clouds of the heavens, while the doctors were burning incense in the wigwam below, and with their songs and prayers to the Great Spirit for success, were sending forth grateful fumes and odours to him who lives in the sun and commands the thunders of heaven. Wab-kee, (the shield,) was the first who ascended the wigwam, at sunrise; and he sat all day, and looked foolish, as he was counting over and over his string of mystery-heads; the whole village were assembled around him, and praying for his success. Not a cloud appeared—the day was calm and hot, and at the setting of the sun he descended from the lodge and went home; "his medicine was not good," nor can he ever be a medicine-man.

Om-pah, (the elk,) was the next; he ascended the lodge at sunrise the next morning. His body was entirely naked, being covered with yellow clay; on his left arm he carried a beautiful shield, and a long lance in his right; and on his head the skin of a raven, the bird that soars amid the clouds and above the lightning's glare. He flourished his shield, and brandished his lance, and raised his voice, but in vain; for at sunset the ground was dry, and the sky was clear; the squaws were crying, and their corn was withering at its roots.

Wan-rah-pa, (the beaver,) was the next; he also spent his breath in vain upon the empty air, and came down at night; and Wab-ah-hah-hee, (the White Buffalo's hair,) took the stand the next morning. He is a small but beautifully proportioned young man; he was dressed in a tunic and leggings of the skin of the mountain-sheep, splendidly garnished with quills of the porcupine, and fringed with locks of hair taken by his own hand from the heads of his enemies. On his arm he carried his shield made of the buffalo's hide; its boss was the head of the war-eagle and its front was ornamented with red chains of lightning. In his left hand he clenched his sinewy bow and one single arrow. The villagers were all gathered about him, when he threw up a feather to decide on the course of the wind, and he commenced thus—"My friends! people of the pheasants! you see me here a sacrifice. I shall this day relieve you from great distress, and bring joy among you, or I shall descend from this lodge when the sun goes down, and live among the dogs and old women all my days. My friends, you saw which way the feather blew, and I hold my shield this day in the direction where the wind comes. The lightning on my shield will draw a great cloud, and this arrow, which is selected from my quiver, and which is feathered with the quill of the white swan, will make a hole in it. My friends! this hole in the lodge, at my feet, shows me the medicine-men, who are seated in the lodge below me, and crying to the Great Spirit; and through it comes, and passes into my nose, delightful odours, which you see rising in the smoke to the Great Spirit above, who rides in the clouds and commands the winds! Three days they have sat here, my friends, and nothing has been done to relieve your distress. On the first day was Wa-kee, (the Shield). He could do nothing; he counted his beads and came down; his medicine was not good; his name was bad, and it kept off the rain. The next was On-pah, (the Elk), on his head the rain was seen, who flies above the storm, and he failed. Wa-rah-pah, (the Beaver) was the next; my friends, the beaver lives under the water, and he never wants it to rain. My friends! I see you are in great distress, and nothing has yet been done. This shield belonged to my father, the White Buffalo, and the lightning you see on it is red; it was taken from a black cloud, and that cloud will come over us to-day. I am the White Buffalo's hair, and I am the son of my father!"

In this manner flourished and manoeuvred Wak-a-dah-ha-hee, (the White Buffalo's hair), alternately addressing the audience and the heavens, and holding converse with the winds and the je-bi that are floating about in them; stamping his foot over the heads of the magi who were involved in mysteries beneath him, and invoking the spirits of darkness and light to send rain to gladden the hearts of the Mandans.

It happened on this memorable day, about noon, that the steamboat Yellow Stone, on her first trip up the Missouri river, approached and landed at the Mandan village, as I have described in a former epistle. I was lucky enough to be a passenger in this boat, and helped to fire a salute of twenty guns of twelve pound calibre, when we first came in sight of the village, some three or four miles below. These guns introduced a new sound into this strange country, which the Mandans at first supposed to be thunder; and the young man upon the lodge, who turned it to good account, was gathering fame in rounds of applause, which were repeated and echoed through the whole village. All eyes were centered upon him—chiefs envied him—mother's hearts were beating high while they were decorating and leading up to their flagpoles to testify to the deed. The medicine-men had laid the lodge and came to bestow upon him the envied title of "medicine-man," or "doctor," which he did so deservely won; wreaths were prepared to decorate his brows, and eagles' plumes and calumets were in readiness for him; his friends were all rallied—his enemies were on their faces a silent gloom and hatred; and his old sweethearts, who had formerly cast him off, gazed upon him as they glowed with the burning fire of repentance.

During all this excitement, Waka-dah-ha-hee kept his position, assuming the most commanding and threatening attitudes; brandishing his shield in the direction of the thunder, although there was not a cloud to be seen, until he, (poor fellow!) (reader, don't attempt to imagine!) being elevated above the rest of the village, espied, to his inexpressible amazement, the steamboat ploughing her way up the windings of the river below; puffing her steam from her pipes, and sending forth the thunder from a twelve-pounder on her deck! The White Buffalo's hair stood motionless and turned pale; he looked awfully, and turned to the chief, and to the multitude, and addressed them with a trembling lip—"My friends, we will get no rain! there are, you see, no clouds; but! my medicine is great—I have brought a thunder-boat! look and see it! the thunder you hear is out of her mouth, and the lightning which you see is on the waters!"

At this intelligence, the whole village flew to the tops of their wigwams, or to the bank of the river, from whence the steamer was in full view, and ploughing along, to their utter dismay and confusion.

In this promiscuous throng of chiefs, doctors, women, children and dogs, was mingled Wak-a-dah-ha-hee, (the White Buffalo's hair), having descended from his high office and mysteries, to mingle with the frightened throng.

Disarmed at the approach of so strange and unaccountable an object, the Mandans stood their ground but a few moments, when, by an order of the chiefs, all hands were ensconced within the palisades of their village, and all the warriors armed for desperate defence. A few moments brought the boat in front of the village, and all was still and quiet as death; not a Mandan was to be seen upon the banks. The steamer was landed, and three or four of the chiefs soon after walked boldly down the bank and into the boat, with a spear in one hand and the calumet or pipe of peace in the other. The moment that they stepped on board they met (to their great surprise and joy) their old friend Major Sanford, their agent, which put an instant end to all their fears and trembling. The villagers were soon apprised of the fact, and the whole race of the beautiful and friendly Mandans was paraded on the bank of the river, in front of the steamboat.

The "Rain-Maker," whose apprehensions of a public calamity brought upon the nation by his extraordinary medicine, had, for the better security of his person from apprehended vengeance, secreted himself in some secure place, and was the last to come forward, and the last to be convinced that this visitation was a friendly one from the white people; and that his medicine had not in the least been instrumental in bringing it about. This information, though received by him with great caution and suspicion, at length gave him great relief, and quieted his mind as to his danger. Yet still in his breast there was a rankling thought, though he escaped the dreaded vengeance which he had a few moments before apprehended as at hand; yet he had the mortification and disgrace of having failed in his mysterious operations. He set up, however, (during the day, in his conversations about the strange arrival) his medicine, as the cause of their approach, asserting every where and to everybody, that he knew of their coming, and that he had by his magic brought the occurrence about. This plea, however, did not get him much audience; and, in fact, everything else was pretty much swallowed up in the guttural talk, and bustle, and gossip, about the mysteries of the "thunder-bolt;" and so passed the day, until, just at the approach of evening, when the "White Buffalo" the hair, (more watchful of such matters, on this occasion, than most others) observed that a black cloud had been jutting up in the horizon, and was almost directly over the village! In the instant his shield was on his arm and his bow in his hand, and he again upon the lodge! Stiffened and braced to the fast asleep, he stood, with his face and shield presented to the cloud and his bow drawn. He drew the eyes of the whole village upon him as he vaunted forth his superhuman powers, and, at the same time, commanding the cloud to come nearer, that he could draw down its contents upon the heads and the corn-fields of the Mandans! In this wise he stood, waving his shield over his head, stamping his foot and frowning as he drew his bow and threatened the heavens, commanding it to rain—his bow was bent, and the arrow, drawn to its head, was sent to the cloud, and he exclaimed, "My friends, it is done! Wa-ka-dah-ba-lee's arrow has entered that black cloud, and the Mandans will be wet with the water of the skies!" His predictions were true; in a few moments the cloud was over the village, and the rain fell in torrents. He stood for some time wielding his weapons and presenting his shield to the sky, while he boasted of his power and the efficacy of his medicine to those who had been about him, but were now driven to the shelter of their wigwags. He at length finished his vanes and his threats, and descended from his high place (in which he had been perfectly drenched) prepared to receive the honours and the homage that were due to one so potent in his mysteries; and to receive the style and title of "Medicine Man." This is one of an hundred different modes in which a man in Indian countries acquires the appellation.

This man had made it rain, and, of course, was to receive more than usual honours, as he had done much more than ordinary men could do. All eyes were upon him, and all were ready to admit that he was skilled in the magic art; and must be so nearly allied to the Great or Evil Spirit, that he must needs be a man of great and powerful influence in the nation, and well entitled to the style of Doctor or Medicine Man.

Readers, there are two facts relative to these strange transactions which are infallibly true, and should needs be made known. The first is, that when the Mandans undertake to make it rain, they never fail to succeed; for their ceremonies never stop until rain begins to fall. The second is equally true, and is this—that he who has once "made it rain," never attempts it again; his medicine is undoubted, and on future occasions of the kind he stands aloof, who has once done it in presence of the whole village, giving an opportunity to other young men who are ambitious to signalize themselves in the same way.

During the memorable night of which I have just spoken, the steamboat remained by the side of the Mandan village, and the rain that had commenced falling, continued to pour down its torrents until midnight; black thunder roared, and vivid lightnings flashed up the heavens appeared to be lit up with one unceasing and appalling glare. In this frightful moment of consternation, a flash of lightning burned itself in one of the earth-covered lodges of the Mandans, and killed a beautiful girl! Here was food and fuel fresh for their superstitions, and a night of vast tumult and excitement ensued. The dreams of the new-made Medicine Man were troubled, and he had dreadful apprehensions for the coming day, for he knew that he was subject to the irrevocable decree of the chiefs and doctors, who canvass every strange and unaccountable event with close and superstitious scrutiny, and let their vengeance fall without mercy upon its immediate cause.

He looked upon his well-earned fame as likely to be withheld from him, and also, that his life might be, perhaps, demanded as the forfeit for this girl's death, which would certainly be charged upon him. He looked upon himself as culpable, and supposed the accident to have been occasioned by his criminal desertion of his post when the steamboat was approaching the village. Morning came, and he soon learned from some of his friends the opinions of the wise men, and also the nature of the tribunal that was preparing for him: he sent to the prairie for his three horses which were brought in, and he mounted the Medicine Lodge, around which, in a few moments, the villagers were all assembled.

"My friends," said he, "I see you all around me, and I am before you! My medicine, you see, is great! it is too great! I am young, and I was too fast. I knew not when to stop! The wigwam of Mah-sish is laid low, and many are the eyes that weep for Koko." (the antelope.) Waka-dah-ha-bee gives three horses to gladden the hearts of those who weep for Ko-ka. His medicine was great! His arrow pierced the black cloud, and the lightning came and the thunder-boat, also! Who says the medicine of Wak-a-dah-ha-hee is not strong?"

At the end of this sentence an unanimous shout of approbation ran through the crowd, and the "Hair of the White Buffalo" descended among them, where he was greeted by shakes of the hand, and among whom he now lives and thrives, under the familiar and honourable appellation of "the Big, Double Medicine."

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF REAL LIFE.

THE ILLUSTRIOUS OBSCURE.

BY WILLIAM COX.

CHAPTER V.

How young Craggs developed unequivocal symptoms of being "foredoomed his father's hopes to cross"

But there was one individual to whom the preceding scene was as bitter and unpalatable as physic or advice; as revolting as water to a wine-bibber, criticism to an artist, or the practice of toleration to a free-thinker. This was no other than Mr. Hancock Madison Craggs.

From his youth upwards that worthy individual had entertained a wholesome and business-like antipathy to poetry. For many other kinds of books he had a sort of vague and undefined feeling of respect, more especially for those of a grave and solid character containing long words and hard names; may, he had even gone so far, being now in his fifty-seventh year, as to commence the study of "Rollin's Ancient History," from which he learned, much to his surprise and edification, that there had been another Babylon considerably antecedent to the one on Long Island; and that the Rome to which he annually exported a few dozens of candles, was only a second edition of a city so steeped in barbarism, that, for several centuries, they used nothing but torches and lamps! Of course, whilst he was himself occupied with those grave studies, he could not avoid feeling pained and disquieted by the trivial nature of his offspring's pursuits. Indeed, he was more than pained and disgusted—he was grieved and distressed, for he regarded poetry and gas as the two most pernicious and unprofitable inventions that had ever pestered the earth; and now, to find that the heir of his hopes—the child of his old age, had turned out a genius, and commenced the suicidal practice of tagging rhymes together, was to the good old gentleman a grief beyond expression. He accordingly talked to Josiah, reasoned with him, pointed out to him that he was treading the path which led to starvation, and concluded by admonishing him, as a dutiful son, to pay no sort of attention to what his foolish mother, or his still more foolish aunt might say, but to eschew poetry altogether, and to devote his time and talents entirely to tallow-chandlery. He then tied an apron around the youth's waist, and led him into the factory, in order to initiate him into the mystery of "long" and "short rights"

The result was such as might have been reasonably expected. Things went on well enough as long as the old man presided and directed, but as soon as his back was turned, the wits of the "gifted one" went a woolgathering, and he gave the "shorts" four more dips than they required, and the "longs," four less, so that when his revered parent came to look upon the very corpulent and very attenuated specimen of his son's exertions, he felt at once that it was a hopeless case—that he had not, and never would have, abilities equal to the tallow-chandler business, and he therefore apprenticed him forthwith to an apothecary.

CHAPTER VI.

Containing much in little.

Seven years flew swiftly away, during which time Mrs. Cragge died, and Hancock Madison was also gathered to his fathers. Before he went, however, he sunk his property, and made a small but settled annual provision for his son, foreseeing, as he said, that he was altogether too great a genius ever to make a provision for himself.

These seven years were, perhaps, the happiest of Cragg's existence. During this time his "Moonlight Inspirations," his magnificent "Ode on Thunder," and his exquisitely pathetic thesis "To a Broken Tea-pot," were published in the "Magazine of Taste, or Omniscient Repository," and gained him a limited but enviable reputation. True, there were some trivial drawbacks on his felicity. In the course of business he had the misfortune to poison three children and two old women, by selling arsenic instead of calomel, and croton oil instead of castor, or some such trivial mistake; but as the parents of the children had large families, and the two old women left several legacies, the circumstances were never minutely inquired into; though there were some cold-blooded muscrautes—narrow-minded wretches, who could not make allowances for the aberrations of genius—who did not scruple to say that Craggs ought to be taken hold of

However, the seven years got over; but certainly it is a fact, that, at parting, his old master took the poet into his back-shop, and in the kindest possible manner advised him to invest his talents in some other line of business if he wished to escape being tried for manslaughter, or perhaps the more capital offence!

CHAPTER VII

Of how C. aggs commenced business, and how he failed to prosper therein.

The apothecary's shop, No. 637 Bowery, when first opened, presented a truly splendid and imposing appearance. Many jars, globes, and bottles, of various shapes and sizes, filled with clear liquids of divers colours, sparkled in the sun by day, and by the help of gas threw long streams of red, blue, green and yellow radiance across the street at night. There was also the usual quantity of preserved lizards, serpents, and so on; and at one window, in gilt letters on a black ground, were the words "Fresh Leeches," at the other, "Physicians Prescriptions carefully prepared." Behind the counter, in a black coat and white apron (he loathed the apron), stood the author of "Moonlight Inspirations."

But things speedily assumed an altered appearance. A blight came over that ill-fated shop. The customers—never numerous—gradually decreased; the leeches died, and were not renewed; and the windows, and jars, and globes, and bottles, became soiled with smoke and encrusted with dust. The face of Craggs, too, always cadaverous, and with a pensive expression, grew lank and yellow in the extreme, and the pensiveness slowly deepened into habitual gloom. In the words of Ossian—"dark thoughts rolled across his soul," and when he drew out the till at evening-time to take out the proceeds of the day's sale, no cheerful gleam of silver met his view, but a few insignificant copper coins made a hollow rumbling noise as he indignantly thrust back the capacious wooden repository into its place. A desolation came over him, and his spirit was darkened.

The cause of all this was obvious. Craggs was now a regular genus. He walked about the streets,

"With folded arms and melancholy hat," dressed à-la-Bon about the throat, affected misanthropic, wore mustaches and a smile of bitter scorn upon his upper lip, became lost in the contemplation of himself, and talked familiarly of "the common herd of men." The habit of composition, too, interfered with the habits of business. Engaged, perchance, in spreading a "warm" or "strengthening plaster," a bright idea—a flash—a ray divine, would dart into his brain; he would pause, absorbed in thought, to analyze it, and in the meantime the hot iron in his hand would hiss and phiz, unregarded, and finally burn its way to the counter, whereby much wash-leather was damaged, and no profit accrued from the spreading of plasters, warm or strengthening.

To complete the matter, he about this time fell in love, and very often took a glass too much.

In love, in liquor, and a fool! His landlord walked not unfrequently past the shop of his talented tenant, and horrid thoughts touching the safety of his rent fitted across his mind.

CHAPTER VIII.

Of Craggs in love, and the "lady of his love."

Now the goddess of Craggs's idolatry—a Miss Katherine Morton—was altogether a most unlikely personage to countenance his addresses. She was a well-educated, accomplished, pretty, merry girl, who could sigh over a withered flower, and look soft and sentimental enough, to be sure, like the rest of her sex, when it suited her turn, but who wore a shrewd, sensible, and somewhat satirical little jade. Of course Craggs, with his head in the clouds, his wits a wool-gathering, and his extraordinary ways, which were not like unto the ways of other men, was an immense treat to her, and she appeared to derive very considerable gratification from "fooling" the inspired and unsmothered youth "to the top of his bent." She allowed him to indite sonnets in praise of her beauty, and descriptive of his own misery, talked of his "style" and that of the other great poets of the day in the same breath, invited him to tea occasionally, when she had a few female friends whom she wished to amuse coming alone, blushed when he stumbled into the room, and sighed very audibly when he stalked out of it.

Perhaps this was not very proper or correct, but lively young ladies do such things for all that.

Emboldened by a continuance of those special marks of grace and favour, Craggs sat down one evening, and in a moment of high-wrought enthusiasm, regardless of the state of his finances, indited a poetical proposal of marriage, in which was anticipated all sorts of "bliss" should her answer be "yes," and all sorts of "wo" should her answer be "no!"

This epistle he had some thoughts of despatching by a carrier-pigeon—messenger-dove—or something of that kind, but feeling rather dubious about its safe delivery, he put it into the post-office

CHAPTER IX.

Of Craggs's mode of composition, and how he unreasonably fell into habits of intolerance.

Craggs, like Goldsmith, and many other great men, did not compose with extreme rapidity. "Fatal facility" was by no means a fault of his. Indeed, his imagination was naturally costive. Some of his efforts were painful to the last degree, and nothing but the ennobling hope of making himself known and admired, and leaving behind him "name and memory," could have supported him in his arduous undertakings. Many and many a time would he sit for hours gazing upon a sheet of blank paper, and for hours blank it remained. A dense weight appeared to press upon his brain, and so true is it that extreme mope, occasionally a feeling bearing a striking resemblance to profound stupidity would take entire possession of him. Then would he start from his chair, pace the room with disordered steps and troubled mien, sit down again, strike his forehead with his clenched hand, but all in vain! not anything would come out; or, at last, when

"With more than usual pain,"

A thought came slowly across his brain, before he could turn it into available rhyme,

"Presto! and quick 'twas gone again!"

This caused him great uneasiness, and, by way of remedy, he be-thought himself of stimulants. He had illustrious precedents. Independent of a vague sort of understanding that the Odes of Anacreon had been composed under the influence of the "rosy god,"

Burns, he had read, threw off some of his happiest efforts when inspired by usquebaugh; Kilmeny, and other portions of the Queen's Wake, he had heard, owed their existence in great part to "mountain dew;" and as for Byron, it was a pretty notorious fact that Don Juan was composed under a course of gin and water. Many poets, too, it was likewise on record, had much delighted in beer. He, likewise, without the slightest hesitation, swallowed large quantities of distilled and fermented liquors, anticipating the happiest consequences therefrom. When his subject was light and gay, he drank brisk bottled ale; when solemn and impressive, draught porter; when of a vehement or impassioned character, rum, whiskey, brandy, or hollands, indiscriminately; and in some of his more elaborate compositions, wherein he gives the reins to his fancy, indulges in all varieties of rhythm, and ranges at will "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," he drank all these liquors in pretty rapid succession, so that it occasionally happened to stimulate his brain to such a degree that he could scarcely put off his clothes; and when he awoke in the morning with throbbing temples and aching head, right bitterly did he complain to his aunt and fellow-lodgers of the wear and tear attendant upon intellectual exertion.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

It is not from the acquisition of ideas, but from the application of them, that conversation derives the greatest charm. Thus an exceedingly well-informed talker may be indescribably tedious; while one who is comparatively ignorant, as regards mere facts, having brought to bear, upon every subject contemplated, a lively imagination combined with a sound judgment, and with strong and clear notions only with dates and historical events, but with strong and clear notions, impressions of familiar things, may rivet the attention of his hearers, and startle them, for a time, into a distinctness of impression which imparts a degree of delightful complacency to his hearers, and to the entertainer himself.

It is generally believed that men of genius write a very obscure, hurried, and eccentric character, such as Byron, Chalmers, Jeffrey and Bonaparte. Washington wrote a fair, manly, straightforward line, every letter legible and distinct; Jefferson's handwriting was bold and masculine; Bonaparte wrote a most unreasonable scrawl; Burke's was uneven and hurried; Hamilton wrote a running-hand spurring of ink; Ganning's penmanship has a chaste and classical appearance. Brougham writes a hasty hand, but with a good pen, and full of ink; Peel writes with a stiff pen, but with a considerable taste and firmness; Dr. Chalmers writes as if he used the feather end dipped in the ink—a real scrawl; Washington Irving writes a perfect lawyer's hand, as though he wished no one to read it but himself.

"Don't you call this all-fired hot weather?" said a fresh caught Yankee yesterday to an old resident. "Hot! Oh no; this is nothing. We use the short thermometer, now. Wait till time, when we get the long ones up, if you want to see real hot weather." "Thank you, I rather guess you'll see me takin' rather long strides for the northward-and-eastward after the season gets so hot that them cuss-thermometers can't give the idea. Mine's one hundred and twenty degrees long; when the mercury biles over in that, I'm o-p-h."—N. O. Procyon.

"The poets," says the Buffalo Courier, "are not all dead," and it gives this example:—"The Niles (Michigan) Intelligencer publishes a call for a meeting of the citizens to repair a 'conduroy' road near that place, and compels the muses to second the call in the following stanza:

"For now it's not passable—
Not even jacksasses,
And those who would travel it,
Should turn out and gravel it."

"Tell your contemptible general," said an old woman in a village through which passed the army of Napoleon, to one of his corporals, "tell him that I have a very despicable opinion of him." "I will," said the corporal, "if you insist upon it, madame—but you can't think how it will distress him!"

An Oxford student joined without invitation a party dining at an inn; after dinner he boasted so much of his abilities that one of the party said, "You have told us enough of what you can do, tell us something that you cannot do." "Faith," said he, "I cannot pay my share of the reckoning!"

The whole use of a hat is probably not generally known—it is of more use than covering the head. If, when a person fell over-board, he had the presence of mind to instantly take off his hat, and hold the brim of it to his chin, so that the hollow would be upwards, it would keep him above the water as long as ever he could hold it. This has been tried, and actually proved correct.

The lighthouse at Barcelona, in Chantauque county, is lighted by natural gas which escapes from fissures in the rocks near the shore. The supply is a never-failing one, and no light equals it in power. A rude reservoir has been erected over one of the fissures in the rock, by which the gas is conveyed in pipes to the light house.

An honest Irishman, fresh from Hibernia, caught a humble-bee in his hand, supposing it to be a humming-bird. "Och," he exclaimed, "how hot his little fut is!"

A son of Erin, while hunting for rabbits, came across a jackass in the woods, and shot him. "By my soul and St. Patrick," he exclaimed, "I've killed the father of all rabbits!"

When Dionysus, the tyrant, sent to Lysander some rich Sicilian garments, for his daughters, he refused them, saying, "He was afraid those fine clothes would make them look more homely."

The London Chronicle says—"Subscriptions are in progress for the erection of a magnificent Roman Catholic Cathedral in the west end of London. It is to be built in the Gothic style, and is to cost one hundred and fifty thousand pounds."

Though the word "honey-moon" is in common use, its derivation is little known, as nothing respecting it is found in the dictionaries or encyclopedias. Its origin is from a custom of the Teutones, an ancient people of Germany, who drank mead or methogen, a beverage made with honey, for thirty days after every wedding.

The best thing for stopping a leak in a cask, is whitening beaten up with common yellow soap; if this mixture be well rubbed into the leak, it will be found to stop it when everything else has failed.

There are those who are rich in their poverty, because they are content, and use generously what they have: there are others, who in the midst of their riches, are really poor, from their unsatiable covetousness or shameful profusion.

Lycurgus, it is reported, used to say that long hair made "the handsome more beautiful, and the ugly more terrible." Reader, look upon the young lads around you, and judge for yourself.

Theresting is the name of a tavernkeeper at the west. It would be enough to make a traveller dry to read his sign.

The authorities of Buffalo have imprisoned the little German minstrels, wandering the west and singing their songs.

EXTRACTS FROM "NIX'S MATE."

A novel by Rufus Dawes, in Colman's press.

CHILDREN.—How little do they who have grown up to man's estate trouble themselves about the feelings of children! It would really seem as if they fancied that children were destitute of all those fine and delicate springs of emotion, which are recognised in mature life, and are the sources of all our joys and sorrows. It is true that the grown-up world went to school to some one who has not forgotten the tender susceptibilities of childhood; that it may learn to sympathise with the little sufferers. The germinating bud has within its folded recesses all the beauty and the fragrance of the flower; the gentle distillations of heaven sink as sweetly in its secluded shrine, and the sunbeams fall there as soothingly, as on the proffer petals that would claim all to themselves. How many a sweet spirit withers beneath the blighting frown of an unempathising guardian; how many a one retires to weep in solitude, because it is not loved as it would be, and is not comprehended in its affection! We little imagine what arcanes we read, when the words "of such is the kingdom of heaven," pass our unheeded utterance.

LOVE.—There is an involuntary sympathy, an unconscious sympathy in our nature, and though the beautiful and adored object of his love was dreaming all the while of Seymour, the energetic mind of Fitzvassal broke in upon her pure Arcadia, and she murmured in sleep from the momentary influence of his passion. . . . Who shall go down into the depths of the human heart, and unriddle all its mysteries; who shall bring up its joys and its woes, and analyze them in his mystic crucible. Oh, love! human, passionate affection! There is more in your least emotion, than poet ever revealed or philosopher thought of; but there is a love of self, so like to its heavenly radiance that the angels are themselves deceived, while they rain down upon the heart the gladness of their happy paradise.

THE DRAMA.

The most distinguished actress now upon the English boards, Miss Ellen Tree, takes her departure for England on the eighth in the Shakespeare. The following address was delivered by her at the Park theatre on the night of her farewell benefit, in the part of Beatrice on the fourteenth of June. One of the most crowded and brilliant audiences ever assembled in New-York was present on the occasion.

MISS TREE'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The curtain falls. Closed is the drama's page:

Why linger Beatrice upon the stage!

Away, illusion! all is real here:

The sigh is faithful, and the grief sincere.

No mimic passion, no pretended woe,

Into my lips their borrowed ardour throw—

Should utterance tremble, should the tear-drop start,

Oh! do not doubt, its fount is in the heart.

Friends! I have proved you. Three swift years have passed,

Since on your shores a pilgrim I was cast,

And if some anxious fears were mine at first,

How on my soul your liberal welcome burst!

Ye cheered my steps—ye took me by the hand—

I was no more a stranger in the land!

A stranger, why! On every side I heard

My native accents in each spoken word;

And all the greetings which my toil beguiled,

Were from the "well of English undefiled."

The mighty poet, whose creation bright,

With reverence, I've personated to-night—

Did I not find his memory and his strains

Here as familiar as on Stratford's plains?

Your sires and his co-patriots were the same,

And do ye not with us partake his fame?

Ah! as the loiterer by some pleasant way,

Though Duty cry "begone!" would fain delay,

Review the prospect beautiful—retreat

Each glimpse of sunshine, each peculiar grace,

So would I linger, so would I forget,

It is, alas! that that we have met.

Yet ere I go, desponding Memory asks,

Is this the last of my too happy tasks?

Shall I no more a scene like this behold,

Nor tread these boards, in your approval hold?

Those plaudits, which yet echo in mine ear,

Are they the last from you that I may hear?

Too strong the chance that it must soon be so—

Fate answers "ay!" but, ah! Hope whispers "no!"

And yet, though mute the voice, though past the scene,

Though tempests roar, and oceans roll between,

Whatever hues may mark my future lot,

Still let me dream I am not all forgot!

That Shakespeare's fair abstractions may restore,

A thought of her who once their honours bore,

That Talfourd's pages, Knowles's tragic art,

Some memory of the actress may impart,

A look, a tone, a not ungrateful smile,

Let me believe, though vain it be the while!

But the night hastens, and the time draws near;

Why do I still, superfluous, linger here?

Ah! never yet so difficult a part

Tasked all my powers and filled my beating heart.

I cannot speak the thoughts my soul that swell—

I can but say, Friends! Kindred! Fare you well!

LITERARY NOTICES.

"The Adventures of Harry Franco, a Tale of the Great Pacific." In two volumes. New-York: F. Saunders.

This class of fictions to which this work belongs is that under which Captain Marryat's "Peter Simple" and "Snarleywoy," and Dr. Bird's "Robin Day" may be ranked, where the interest depends more upon the immediate and unconnected adventures of the hero, than upon the intricacies or ingenuity of the plot. We are no admirers of this facile and rambling style of novel-writing, more especially where it is unredeemed by touches of genuine humour, or striking delineations of character. There are, however, many good hits in "Harry Franco," and the sketches of life in our hotels and on board our steamboats, are often quite graphic and amusing. The author is likewise successful in many of his dialogues. The slang phrases, which he puts into the mouths of some of his characters, are but too faithful transcripts of the Americanisms, in which many of our young men rejoice. We cannot commend "Harry Franco" very warmly to the favourable regards of our fair readers, but as a picture of certain phases of life and manners in this country, it may be pronounced a work of decided talent.

"Precaution." A novel by the author of the "Spy," "Pioneer," &c. A new edition revised by the author. Philadelphia: Lea and Banchard. In his preface to this work, Mr. Cooper intimates, that it was not commenced with any view to publication, and when it was finally put into the publisher's hands "with all its imperfections on its head," the last thought of the writer was any expectation that it would be followed by a series of similar tales from the same pen. "More than this the public will feel no interest in knowing, and less than this the author could not consent to say on presenting to the world a reprint of a book with so few claims to notice!" Why, then, revive the recollection of such a juvenile indiscretion, Mr. Cooper? Why obtrude upon the public a work, which, as you very justly remark, has so "few claims to notice?" We have sought in vain through the pages of "Precaution" for a scintillation of that genius, which shone forth in the author's subsequent productions. It is throughout stale, flat, and unprofitable.

"A Treatise on the Culture of the Dahlia and Cactus." By E. Sayers, author of "The Flower Garden Companion." Boston: Weeks, Jordan and Co. Only inferior to the race for the maris multifida is the passion, as present, among florists, for the acquisition of choice and beautiful dahlias. The little treatise before us conveys much new and curious information in relation to the culture of this favourite plant. It is only within ten or twelve years that the dahlia was introduced into the United States. It is a native of the high sandy plains of Mexico, where it was first discovered by Humboldt, five thousand feet above the level of the sea. There are three distinct species of the flower, but so much attention has been paid of late to its cultivation, that the varieties and peculiarities of its shape and costume are almost incalculable.

The following beautiful lines are copied, with the permission of the publishers, from the new novel of Sydney Clifton, to be issued from the press of the Messrs. Harper in the course of a few days.

THE PAST.

The past, the past, th' insatiate past,
Within its broad domain
Crushed hopes and bleeding joys lie cast,
Like war's unburied slain!
We saw their plumes in triumph wave,
A bright and fair array;
The morning mists are curling o'er
The hill: but where are they?
The past, the past, th' embalming past—
Behold its march sublime.
Garnishing the harvest, prostrate cast
By the bald reaper Time!
We'll diamond shaft, and learning's tome,
Devotions lore divine—
Fame's glittering wreath and poetry's crown—
In added lustre shine.
The past, the past, the joyous past,
How bright its visions seem,
When age and youth the hours contrast,
Like some enchanted dream:
Love's honey'd kiss, and manhood's pride,
And pleasure's eyen strain—
The civic wreath, the sparkling cup—
All—all are ours again.
The past, the past, the shadowy past,
How dim the scene appears,
When eyes that on us look'd their last
Relume in after years.
The dazling chime in mockery throws
Its light o'er hopeless gloom,
Like a faint taper's flickering ray
Above the silent tomb.
The past, the past, the mighty past;
How boundless is its sway—
Hark! to its trumpet's summoning blast,
While listening worlds obey!
The conquering chief his helmet doffs—
The brandish'd sceptre falls:
And silence reigns where wassail shouts
Rang through the festal halls.
The past, the past, the storied past—
Here genius sits enshrined—
On this bright fane your offerings cast,
The Mecca of the mind!
Beneath three arches' vaulted roofs
Immortal spirits throng;
Here Shakespeare's radiant fancy beams—
Here Homer weaves his song!
The past, the past, the new-fledged past,
Even now, with raven wing
Its lengthening shadows grown more vast
Around my footsteps cling.
My fingers vainly sweep the lyre,
No answering tones arise;
Pale memory flees to happier breasts,
And hope to brighter skies!

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The lines to M. M. shall appear in our next. The previous contribution referred to by our fair correspondents has never fallen under our observation.—Thosias so mistakes in supposing that we are informed as to the movements of Mr. Forrest. We know nothing of the truth of the report that Charles Matthews has become the lessee of Covent Garden theatre—and have no good reason to believe that James Wallack will desert our own National for Drury Lane.—The statement of "Alcaeus" in Mr. Van Buren, is a little too hyperbolic.—To our correspondent "T. Z.," who so inquisitive as to the Altion exhibition, we can only say, that if the proprietors of the paintings will consent to their being sent on here, there is every prospect that the artist will receive from the exhibition a liberal remuneration. We really hope that the friends of Mr. Altion will take this matter into consideration. Another such opportunity may not soon occur again.—We know nothing as to the authorship of Charles Vincent.—The communications of "C. H. X.," "C. H.," "S. Y.," "Juan," and "O. P. Q.," are respectfully declined.—We are indebted to a friend at the South for several pieces of original music. They shall soon appear. A correspondent justly says:—"We were not a little surprised at perusing a quotation from the London Literary Gazette which appeared in the Mirror of June twenty-second, preceding the most touching heart-stirring lines we remember of having read. The quotation referring to the lines alluded to has the following sentence annexed:—'An effusion which will wring many a tear from the hearts of parents who have suffered a similar affliction.' We suspect the heart would yield no other tears than those of a sanguine nature. The quotation will not stand the test of physiological criticism."—We welcome Mr. CASTLE to our columns. His admirable paper respecting the "Rau-maker of the Mountains," which will be found in the Mirror of to-day, although now published for the first time, was written some years ago, and forms part of a volume now in the press and soon to be published.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JULY 6, 1839.

New-York thirty-six years ago.—We are reminded by the reminiscences of an antiquarian in the Express of the rapid advances of New-York in wealth and population during the last twenty or thirty years. From this source we learn that a successful effort was first made in 1802 to extend Broadway through to intercept the Bowery. The ground above Spring-street was nearly all fields and gardens. The road out of the city was through the Bowery. The Sand Hill Road, which is now Sixth and Art-streets, commenced at the Bowery, and ran across that part of the city now known as Waverley Place, on the north side of Washington-Square, then Potter's Field, the great cemetery of the poor. This improvement was considered an outrage on private rights; the owners of the property resisted it with great zeal, but the corporation ordered the opening. It is needless to say that this is now the most fashionable part of the city. Lots could then be bought for twenty pounds or fifty dollars, which at this day are worth from ten to fifteen thousand dollars. This was a year of considerable improvements. Beekman-street was ordered to be opened through from Pearl to Water-street, which was a great affair. Buildings were torn down to effect the alteration. Spring-street, then called Bammon-street, extended but a very short distance out of Greenwich-street, then the boundary of North River. Here Bammon kept a celebrated garden, near the corner of Greenwich and Spring-streets; it was the great resort of the citizens in the summer. There was then no street above Sugar Loaf, now Franklin-street, running across from Broadway to the North River, all above being meadows and fields. Nearly all the Eighth Ward was then under water, being known as Lisperand's Meadows. Spring-street was ordered to be opened to Broadway, and was opened. Since then Canal-street, and all the streets between Franklin and Spring, and Greenwich-street and Broadway, have been opened and the ground filled in. This section of the city, which was then mostly under water, now contains one of the most dense portions of our population, and has within its limits at least fifty thousand inhabitants.

Hoboken.—We wonder that this delightful spot is not more frequented by our citizens. Except upon holidays, it appears to be quite deserted. Its woods—its refreshing beach—its grotto, and its gardens are within a ten minutes' journey of the Astor House, and yet one may find himself as solitary in this "boundless contiguity of shade" at Hoboken, as in the middle of Lake Superior. Better would it be for our populace, if they would occasionally retreat from the dust and turmoil of the city to breathe the fresh air of the woods and fields, especially when it may be obtained within a gunshot of Broadway.

Our Plate Number.—We should be ungrateful did we not express our acknowledgments for the handsome and spontaneous notices, which the press generally has bestowed upon this journal, at the commencement of a new volume. It shall be no slight incentive to renewed exertions, to find that our efforts to render the Mirror an ornament to the periodical literature of the country, are generously appreciated by the most influential public journals of the United States.

Cleanliness of the city.—Never was a city so advantageously situated as our own for the preservation of perfect cleanliness throughout all its alleys and streets, and yet we doubt if there are any civilized cities where so little attention is paid to this important subject. Situated upon a narrow neck of land, with a noble river on each side, there is every facility for draining off all impurities immediately from our streets. Instead of this, we have open gutters, which, in hot weather, send up an intolerable effluvia—streets filled with rubbish—by-ways heaped with filth. Let every good citizen join in a general demand for a "reform."

Washington in summer.—Nearly all the foreign ambassadors are at present absent from Washington. Except the sound of the chisel and the trowel at the public buildings that are going up, the metropolis is as composed and tranquil at present as the most retired of our inland towns.

America Vespucci.—The city authorities of Louisville appear to have taken quite an interest in the Signorina Vespucci, who made an unsuccessful application to Congress last winter for a grant of land. With exemplary gallantry our fellow-citizens of Kentucky wish to make up for the refusal of the National Legislature by extending the hospitalities of the state to the fair Italian stranger. A St. Louis paper ridicules the pretensions of the Signorina in the following jeu d'esprit:—"A lively sensation should be created in this city, by the presence of a young gentleman of interesting appearance and polished manners who has recently arrived here from Jerusalem. He bears with him testimonials of good character; and authentic evidence of being a lineal descendant from Adam. He is unobtrusive in his deportment, and exceedingly intelligent. He does not claim anything of us, his relatives, but would feel gratified if he could procure an eligible site and a small tract of land on which to plant some of the fruit-trees which the great parent of the human family cultivated in Eden. It is understood that he has some knowledge of the alps which were cut from the tree of knowledge, and a few of the seeds of the identical apple which Eve plucked and ate in her transgression. Mr. Jehu Adam will apply to the next Congress for aid in the enterprise which he is about to undertake for the benefit of this country. It is believed that Congress will not neglect to fit an occasion for evincing their accustomed liberality and admiration of ancient families. There are some interesting passages in the history of this young nobleman's ancestry. On the day when Noah entered the ark with his family and creeping things, Mr. Jehu Adam's ancestor concealed himself among the coils of snake, and was not discovered until the ark was out of sight of land. Noah was very wrath when he found the intruder, and was resolved to throw him overboard, but his youngest daughter interposed and saved his life. In token of gratitude, the young gentleman espoused the damsel. Jehu Adam will produce, before the proper committee of claims, the marriage certificate, engraved, in Hebrew, on a piece of cedar wood. It is understood that Mr. Jehu Adam will be invited to attend the theatre, on one of the nights which will be devoted to charitable purposes, towards the close of the season."

Lynch Law.—In describing a recent instance of the exercise of Lynch law, a western paper significantly remarks, that "there are villainies committed for which the law makes no provision." Flimsy and fallacious palliation! In a civilized community nothing can extenuate the deep and thorough atrocity of this odious practice of lynching. A goaded bull is not more reckless and indiscriminate in the choice of his victims, than is an excited mob. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred it is misdirected, confounded and undeserved. How long shall we be sickened by occurrences so disheartening to every true friend of our republican institutions? By the way, while upon this subject, we may remark that we have reason to believe this new popular code was derived, with the rest of our jurisprudence, from England. There is an old English ballad, several pages in length, which begins,

"I oft have heard of Lyfford's law,
How in the morn they hang and draw,
And sit in judgment after."

Virgil's authority is also given, by an ingenious commentator, for the practice in a place even more suitable for it than Mississippi or Arkansas:

"Gnosuit hic Radamanthus habet durissima regna, Castigat, audique dolos."

Niblo's Saloon and Gardens.—The new saloon fitted up by Mr. Niblo, is now nightly thronged by large and crowded audiences. There could not be a more unexceptionable and attractive public resort. The grounds are laid out with excellent taste, and the botanist will here find many rare and beautiful exotics, which will alone amply repay the trouble of a visit. The little theatre is fitted up with much elegance, and the performances are of a superior and unobjectionable character. Burton has lately been playing "John Jones," "Wormwood," and other popular and mirth-inspiring parts to delighted houses. One meets with none but gentlemen and ladies at Niblo's. The price of admission being uniform, there is no distinction of persons, and the consequence is, that all are respectable, and that many, who object to attending our theatres on account of the tolerated infamy of a portion of the audience, may be seen at Niblo's with their families, without the apprehension of disagreeable contact. This consideration alone should be enough to commend the efforts of Niblo to the public patronage and approval.

New Magazines.—True to its announcement, Colman's Monthly Miscellany made its first bow to the public on the first of the present month. It is truly a comely production, so far as externals are concerned, and we do not doubt that its literary claims are equally imposing. Messrs. Grenville Mellen and William Cutler are the editors. Two etchings on steel, after the style of Cruikshank, illustrate the work, which contains contributions from Herbert, John Neal, and other well-known writers. Still another new magazine is announced—"The Monthly Chronicle of Original Literature," to be published by F. Saunders.

Rockaway Pavilion.—Mr. Thomas Howlett has taken this establishment and it is now open for the reception of visitors. The pavilion is a delightful summer resort, and the present occupant will do all in the power of his host to render it an agreeable and comfortable house.

The Sun.—We like the tone, taste, tact and talent with which this excellent journal is conducted, and we do not wonder that it has a daily circulation of thirty-two thousand copies! Besides its value as an agreeable companion over your toast and coffee, it is one of the best advertising sheets extant.

 voices keep time and our oars keep time; Soon as the woods on shore are dim, We'll cheerful-ly sing our part-ing hymn: Row, brothers, row, the stream runs fast, The rapids are near, and the daylight's past, The rapids are near, and the daylight's past.
 stream runs fast, The rapids are near, and the daylight's past, The rapids are near, and the daylight's past.
 stream runs fast, The rapids are near, and the daylight's past, The rapids are near, and the daylight's past.
 stream runs fast, The rapids are near, and the daylight's past, The rapids are near, and the daylight's past.

SECOND VERSE.

Why should we yet our sail unfurl—
 There is not a breath the blue wave to curl;
 But, when the wind blows off the shore,
 Oh! sweetly we'll rest the weary oar:
 Blow, breezes, blow, the stream runs fast,
 The rapids are near, and the daylight's past.

REMEMBERED MUSIC.

BY HENRY STANHOPE LEE.

It is the song she used to sing,
 When I was by her side,
 Ere hope had checked its upward wing,
 Or faithful love been tried.

It is the voice that used to thrill
 My heart with its soft tone;
 I hear its witching music still,
 Its magic spell I own.

Those up-raised eyes! they are the same,

Which on me used to shine:
 O! shall I speak her gentle name—
 Hark! does she whisper mine?

Her song is hushed; her fingers rest
 Upon the silent chords;
 Her dark curls fall around her breast,
 And—listen to her words!

"Why comes he not!" Behold, I come!
 Nay, do not start with fear!
 Is not the wanderer welcome home?
 Sweet Mary, I am here!

MISCELLANY.

FASHION.—The last absurdity in the vogue of fashion that we have seen noticed, is at present in vogue in France, in the article of head-dresses. The hair is drawn entirely back and formed into rouleaux and braids, with a large bunch of ostrich feathers hanging down on the neck, and a wreath of full-blown roses covering the ears and fastened over the cheek on one side. A belle, fashionably painted, and set out to advantage in this style, would unquestionably create quite a sensation among the savage tribes of the West. The taste seems to be decidedly aboriginal, and its effect can be matched only by the equipment of some of our Indian warriors. It is very amusing to learn that the beau monde of Paris are imitating the taste of our copper-coloured savages.

LATEST INFORMATION RELATIVE TO THE QUEEN.—Although the clouds yesterday wore a threatening aspect, her majesty signified her intention of taking a short walk in the gardens of the royal palace. Accordingly, at twenty minutes past two, her majesty, accompanied by four maids of honour, left the palace, and we deeply regret to state, that her majesty had walked only nine minutes and a half, when her worst fears were realized, for the rain began to fall in few, but unusually large drops. No sooner was this fact made apparent to her majesty, than, with that presence of mind which, on the most trying occasions, never deserts her, her majesty immediately opened and raised her umbrella. It cannot but be gratifying to her majesty's loving subjects, to hear that her majesty returned to the palace as little agitated, and apparently with as little concern at the untoward event, as did either of the maids of honour who accompanied her majesty.—London paper

GENTLEMAN.—"The word 'gentleman' is evidently no mark of wealth or station. 'You are no gentleman,' said a waiter in a tavern to a person who gave him threepence. Three pence more would have constituted the gentleman in the eyes of the waiter, and this three pence may have been withheld through poverty. 'What sort of a person,' said an individual to his landlady, 'is that who occupies your back parlour?' 'He is a tailor by trade,' said she; 'but very much the gentleman.' This meant that he paid his five shillings a week regularly. Thus it seems that the word is not confined by any regard to the station or trade of the individual. There is no doubt that we have all a vague conception of something when we hear of a man being a gentleman. If a man eat too heartily, he is not a gentleman; and if another have nothing to eat, he also is not a gentleman.

FRAGRANT ODOUR FOR SICK ROOMS.—A few drops of oil of sandal wood, which, though not in general use, may be easily obtained in town, when dropped on a hot shovel, will diffuse a most agreeable balsamic perfume throughout the atmosphere of sick rooms, or other confined apartments.

RUN-MAKING.—Mr. Eppy recently announced in Philadelphia, what it was a clear day there, that a storm was then raging at Charleston, S. C., and so it was. Remarking on this fact, the Louisville Journal asks:—"Will the storms tamely submit to such a system of evaporation?"

LITERARY REGENERATION.—Mr. Macaulay, Dr. Southey, Sir John Barrow, and other eminent men, have received at times one hundred guineas for a single article in the Quarterly and Edinburgh Reviews.

RULES FOR LADIES.

1. Marry not a profane man; because the depravity of his heart will corrupt your children and embitter your existence.
2. Marry not a gambler, a tippler or a haunter of taverns, because he who has no regard for himself will never have any for his wife.
3. Marry not a man who makes promises which he never performs; because you can never trust him.
4. Marry not a man whose actions do not correspond with his sentiments—because the passions have delirious reason, and he is prepared to commit every crime to which an evil nature unrestrained, can instigate him. The state of that man who regards not his own ideas of right and wrong, is deplorable, and the less you have to do with him the better.
5. Marry not a man who is in the habit of running after all the girls in the country; because the affectionate are continually averting—and therefore can never be permanent.
6. Marry not a man who neglects his business; if he does so when single, he will be worse when married.

TURKISH GALLANTRY.—A Mexican, when you praise his horse, immediately replies that the horse is at your service; which means no more than when in England you write to a man, that you are his "obedient, humble servant." A late Turkish ambassador in England actually did what the Mexican phrase professes to do. When any lady happened to praise one of the handsome shawls that decorated his person, he immediately presented it to her. This led to a very general expression of admiration for his excellency's shawls, and in consequence to a great diminution of the ambassadorial wardrobe. At last, when his excellency's stock was reduced to the one he wore, upon a lady's loudly expressing her admiration of its beauty, instead of his former reply, "Madame, it is at your service," he said, with Turkish composure, but with more than Turkish gallantry, "Madame, I am glad you like it; I shall wear it for your sake!"

CONSOLED.—"Father," said a sporting youth to his reverend parent, "they say trout will bite now." "Well, well," was the consoling reply, "mind your work, then, and you'll be sure they won't bite you."

ORIGINAL TALES FROM THE GERMAN.

THE GRAZIOSO.

BY MRS. ELLY.

IN THREE PARTS—PART THE THIRD.

The scheme designed to separate the lovers became the occasion of binding them still closer to each other. Fiametta, if she did not own her engagement publicly, treated the grazioso with a degree of respect and kind attention that made it evident what were her sentiments, and how much she despised the arts made use of to lower him in her esteem. But in Giovecchino's demeanour was the change most complete. Without renouncing his bizarre originality, he mingled with it so much of dignity as to baffle all the art of his enemies. He knew well that the sudden assumption of gravity would sit ill on him, and give occasion for fresh scoffing.

The prince, as he perceived the new aspect of affairs, blamed the marshal exclusively, and vented his rage upon him. He had resolved on undertaking the affair at first as a commonplace adventure of gallantry, but as his acquaintance ripened with Fiametta, his inclination grew into a real passion, which was the stronger as it was the first he had ever experienced.

"Find means," exclaimed he wrathfully to the marshal, "find means to win the girl! You projected the fool's scheme, whose issue has mocked me thus; make all right, or, by the saints! it shall be worse for you!"

Terrified by this threat, the courier withdrew to ask counsel of his friend the primo amoroso.

"In truth we have laboured in vain," was Antonio's remark.

"Fiametta is not to be led astray; now less than ever. There is but one way; let her be driven to submission to sar her beloved."

"You mean, we should accuse the grazioso!"

"Accuse! without grounds! No, no; he must be really guilty. The knave is a madcap, easy to entice and lay hold of. May it please your excellency to say what crime he must commit to bring his neck into jeopardy!"

The marshal seemed a little startled at this proposition, but after a pause he replied, "I must first speak with his highness. The lad must not be led too far, for our laws are severe, visiting often the smallest offences with terrible punishment."

"Ah! tanto meglio!" returned Montecavallo, we will consider of it."

But accident anticipated the wishes of Giovecchino's enemies. At this instant came an officer in, announcing the arrest of the grazioso of the Italian company, for having cuckolded the valet of his highness in a gallery of the castle. The valet had ventured on some insolent jest with the fiery youth. On hearing this, the marshal whispered the amoroso, "we are in luck; the punishment for this offence is, if not the loss of his head, the loss of his right hand; at least, severe imprisonment for an unlimited time. I hasten to the prince. See what can be done, in the meanwhile, with the haughty lady!" Swelling with demonic triumph, Antonio undertook the commission.

Piteous was the anguish of the poor damsel at the news. When the amoroso consoled her with the suggestion that help was not impossible—"Help! how!" asked she eagerly.

The villain smiled and with pretended friendship said, "His fate depends on you, beautiful Fiametta. You know as well as I, that the prince adores you, though you have chosen not to see it, for the grazioso's sake. You must now, for his sake, show the prince a little more kindness. A good word is a good deed, and speak you only the right one—I will venture upon it—the grazioso is free the same hour! That were great luck for him, otherwise must he lose his right hand, or languish in prison, perhaps the rest of his life!"

Fiametta listened to the amoroso with the deepest contempt. When he was silent, she still kept her eyes fixed on him, so that he dropped his on the ground.

"Poor wretch!" she said, "and is it thus! Would your evil arts drive me so far! Go, and say to those who sent you, that Fiametta loves the grazioso; ay, and will be true to him till death!"

"And if now," insinuated Antonio, "if now Giovecchino himself should have sent me, praying you to save him!"

Fiametta coloured deeply at this cruel intimation, but a moment's reflection convinced her. "Miserable liar, it is false! Could it be so, Fiametta had never loved him, had despised him even more deeply than she despises you! Go, I say, and take this answer to those who sent you—Fiametta loves the grazioso! let them shut him in their deepest dungeons, let them mutilate—let them kill him! Fiametta knows how to suffer—to die with her beloved, yet never to break the faith she pledged!"

"I shall obey, Signora Fiametta!" was the scornful answer of the amoroso as he left her.

When he was gone the unhappy maiden sank weeping on her couch. "Poor Giovecchino!" sobbed she, "what will become of us! Ah! my pride is brought low, there is no hope for me! yet feel I more than ever how inseparably I love thee, since our love is worth to me more than even thy life!"

Meanwhile the marshal had communicated with the prince, and informed him of the new project. A moment was his highness undecided; but passion and selfishness triumphed, and, forgetful of honour, dignity, duty, he consented to the plan, only with the condition that matters should be urged to a speedy conclusion. So passed many days. Fiametta remained firm, but her condition was frightful. The old impressario, while this took place, was not in the city; he had gone a day's journey off, to a castle belonging to his highness, where many of his noble's were to hold a festival, and where the impressario's presence was required. His business ended, he returned, without knowledge of what had passed, or the danger of his favourite, which he first learned from the despairing Fiametta. Spite of the tragic of the affair, the embarrassment mingled with the grief of the old man added not a little of comic, especially as this obtained more and more the upper hand. He demured himself most oddly, wringing his hands, rolling his eyes, sighing, and whimpering, ever and anon ejaculating "maladetto!" or some more harmless oath. At last he started up, and, quivering with the weeping girl be of comfort, clasped his hat on his head with the hinder side before, and rushed from the room, muttering as he went, "Yes, I must, I must—Santa Maria! I must to the gracious prince!"

The prince was sitting in his cabinet in gloomy mood, discontented, perhaps, with himself; certainly not satisfied with all around him, when the page announced the impressario of the Italian company. At the words, "Let him come in!" the page threw open the door, and, trembling like an aspen-leaf, bowing to the ground, and stammering a thousand excuses and compliments, Signor Ranuzio entered.

"Your business!" said the prince impatiently; "what is your wish? what private communication have you to make?"

"Your highness!" groined the old man, "I have presumed so far, to supplicate your mercy for poor Giovecchino, my grazioso."

"No more of him!" said the prince, frowning.

"But this once, your highness, I must not be silent! I must petition your grace for the poor Giovecchino!"

"Silence! I command you!"

"Punish me!" cried the old man, trembling violently, and with voice choked by tears, "but let the sun of your grace, my lord, shine on the poor boy, who without fault has lost it."

"Without fault!" repeated his highness scornfully. "To bear our first valet in the gallery of our castle, is that no fault! No, old man, the grazioso has violated the laws, and must lose the right hand he ventured to lift against my servant. We will consider of his further punishment."

The form of the impressario, while the prince spoke, had become more and more contracted; he stood a few moments in an attitude of the deepest humility. Then drawing himself up, though still faltering and trembling, "Your highness's pardon," he said, "but you shall not cut off the grazioso's hand!"

"How!" cried the prince, darting a furious look at his petitioner. Ranuzio went on with the boldness of despair, "Your highness's pardon, but I must say it, Giovecchino is the BROTHER of your highness!"

"Are you mad, old man?" exclaimed the prince, turning pale.

"Giovecchino," repeated the impressario, "the grazioso, is the brother of your highness; the natural son of the late prince your father."

"Proofs!" demanded the prince, while a sudden flush of shame chased away the paleness of his cheek. Ranuzio, in the deepest embarrassment, yet with courage to utter the truth, began the strange tale.

"It is known to your highness that the late prince, whose soul rests in heaven! when your highness was yet an infant, made a journey into Italy. A young maiden whom he saw one day in Naples, at her window, pleased him well; it was not long ere he found opportunity to form acquaintance with the fair Laura. Laura was young, inexperienced, and passionate; your highness's father noble and beautiful, as yourself, my lord! What marvel that Laura loved him! Giovecchino is their son. I myself had loved the fair Laura; when the prince returned to his own country, I loved her still, and, forgetful of the past, offered her my hand. But she had death in her heart; she bequeathed to me her boy, and these papers, which may witness that Ranuzio Spaciamino speaks truth! She died, my lord, and I have loved no soul since, but the little Giovecchino, the son of poor Laura and the rich prince. Your highness, here are the letters, in the prince's own hand. The boy knows not the secret; no man knows it save your highness and your servant Ranuzio. You would never have known it, my lord, I would have carried it with me to the grave, had not your highness threatened to mutilate the poor Giovecchino."

The prince took the papers mechanically, glanced through them, and sank trembling on his seat. "What will your highness do!" asked Ranuzio, after a long pause. The prince rose, walked quickly up to the old man, and said with emotion, "You swear to me, that the boy knows not, nor any other, what you have discovered to me! To avoid suspicion, he must remain another day in close imprisonment; then must he leave this city and this land, never to return. I know he loves the fair Fiametta; he may marry and be happy with her; I will make them rich; and you too, old man, shall not be forgotten. But the secret—"

"I will bear it to my grave, my noble prince!"

"Go, then, and comfort Fiametta; she suffers on his account! But Giovecchino must never know the secret!"

The old man again promised eternal silence and withdrew. The prince drew a deep breath when he found himself alone. "Over what an abyss I stood!" murmured he—"and who led me thither! Let him suffer—and I will be henceforth, as now, master of my passions!"—"The marshal," announced the page;—"May I leave the city—the sooner the better!" was the stern reply. In consternation the page delivered the message; the prince was very well pleased with himself. Yet he had no reason to believe that he kept his good resolutions; sudden transitions from evil to good generally prove the weakness of the character that undergoes such changes.

With rage and despair the amoroso learned from old Mariana the good fortune of Giovecchino, and the sudden cooling of the prince's passion for Fiametta. The marshal's disgrace convinced him of the total failure of his scheme of revenge; he burned with chagrin at the thought of witnessing the fortune of his enemy. Too cowardly to venture on a daring deed, long he brooded over a plot that promised to satisfy the demon spirit raging in his breast. Scarce could he repress his wild exultation at the fondlike conception. His mandoline on his arm, he stood the next evening leaning against a pillar of the circus, playing and singing. Around him in picturesque groups were the other members of the company jouncing about, as was their wont after the rehearsals. The children came forth, laughing and merrily chasing each other. As the sun set, his last rays streamed brightly upon the scene, tinting all with purple and gold; while the amoroso began a new song, whose refrain, as usual, was repeated by the other singers. It ran thus:

"Come, slender Hebe! bear to me
The cup with roses crowned!
Within this cool green myrtle bower
Let the swift hours go round!
I lean—oh, more than mortal blest!
Fair goddess, on thy gentle breast;
Let life a sea of struggles be;
The minute—yes—the minute's mine!
Let destiny her storms prepare—
I still am blest with love and wine!"

CHORUS.

Come, slender Hebe! bear the cup
Within the myrtle bower!
Goddess of youth, each reveller
Adores—and owns thy power!

Lo! follows one in Fortune's steps,
And woe in vain the flying fair!
With eager swoop disaster comes—
Then what remains but dark despair!
The fool's reward, methinks, is just!
No hope is worth a mortal's trust!
Seize, seize your joys—they fleet with breath!
Hold fast—embrace them long—
The end of rosy song
For ever lasts—'tis death!

CHORUS.

Oh! grasp the fleeting joys of life,
Drink, sing and love; and fly the shade!
The moment only is our own;
The fairest garland soon made fane!"

The mocking close of the song troubled not the cheerful singers; Fiametta only looked with secret horror on the amoroso, who had from time to time given her a glance such as the rattlesnake casts upon his destined victim. As twilight came on, the singers one by one left the circus, the amoroso last of all.

In his dungeon sat the grazioso, deep in thought. The jailer had removed his chains and asked if he wished anything; but inasmuch as what the old man had told him of the severity of the courtlaws had not contributed to inspire him with hope, the removal of his fetters and the unwonted courtesy shown him, he looked upon only as the effect of compassion for a poor sinner, whose sentence was passed, and for whom there remained nothing save his journey to the place of execution.

The prisoner sat gazing on vacancy, a cold and bitter smile on his lips. He feared not death; he despaired not of the future; but a storm of grief was in his breast.

"Poor Fiametta!" at length he murmured, "it had been well for her had she never known me! I have reproached her! What would I now give could she laugh at me! But none will laugh when the grazioso's bloody head rolls in the dust, not even Antonio."

The prison door opened, and the jailer entered, followed by a capuchin.

"This reverend father," said the jailer, "is sent, Giovechino, to speak with you of your soul's welfare. I leave you an hour alone—but an hour, for then all the prison doors must be shut." So saying, he quitted the cell.

"You are welcome, holy father!" said the youth; "and I thank you much. I have little, in truth, to say; but you can render me a great service, if you will undertake a commission to a beloved maiden—"

While speaking, Giovechino had stepped to the table and trummed the lamp; turning, he looked the capuchin in the face, and started back with an involuntary exclamation; for the holy father having thrown back his hood, stood before him none other than Antonio Montecavallo, the primo amoroso.

Antonio enjoyed the youth's astonishment for a few moments, then addressed him in a hypocritical tone, which, however, ill concealed his malicious joy.

"You seem surprised, Giovechino, to see me here; thinking, perhaps, I come to rejoice in your misfortunes. Far be it from me! I am sorry for you; it grieves me to see you so cast down; I will do my utmost to help you."

Giovechino listened quietly; his eyes fixed on his visitor, and answered as quietly—"I have often told you, Antonio, my opinion of you; misfortune has in no wise so humbled me that it is changed in the least. I need not your pity; I believe it not—I will none of it! I know you bring me no good—that no pleasant news come to me from your mouth. But the worst you can bring will not subdue me. I despise you, and will give you no triumph over me!"

"Proud—come il diavolo!" cried Antonio; "no triumph! Eh, grazioso—to the trial! Yes, I own it, I hate you, bitterly hate you! I rejoice over your folly and your punishment! I was glad to hear the grazioso must die or lose his right hand—who, though only a grazioso, was preferred to me! But I wanted no more—Giovechino! I am a man—no devil!"

"That fiendish smile gives your words the lie!" said the youth, turning his back with cold contempt.

"Proud fool! I will not hide my joy from you! Your pride, that now swells so high, at the breach of my mouth shall vanish into the nothing that originated it. You expect death—ha! you are prepared to see Fiametta broken-hearted, despairing, when her beloved ascends the scaffold! Ha! ha! ha! Take courage, grazioso! you shall not die! But a few days, and your prison doors will be thrown open; free, unimpeded for your crime, you will go forth, enriched too, and leave this city. And Fiametta becomes your wife by the prince's express command!"

"What prate you of, fool!" said the grazioso, turning hastily round.

"I speak truth!" coldly returned the amoroso. "Well, Giovechino, does not the good news please you!"

"You lie!" shrieked the grazioso. "No, devil! poisonous reptile!"

"I speak truth, Giovechino! This evening, this hour, while we speak together, Fiametta receives your pardon from the prince's own hand; ay, and wealth to secure your future fortune. Old Mariana told me of it; and she said Fiametta, splendidly attired, was in the red room, awaiting the prince. You know it well; it is the apartment where you had your last tender scene with your beloved!"

"Villain—it is false!"

"Nay, Giovechino—you believe me! What harm is there? Fiametta does it out of love to you, to save you!"

"I believe you not!" cried the youth, his whole frame shivering. "It is not possible! Is my miserable life—is her own—worth more to her than our love—I will not believe you, unless you swear by heaven, by all the saints! by your life's last hour—by your soul's salvation! Ha! you dare not—you cannot!"

"I can!"

"Can you!" asked the prisoner, growing deadly pale.

"I can!" repeated Antonio; and raising his hand solemnly, the villain pronounced the false oath with an unfeeling voice. Giovechino stood still. "Was it possible!" he groaned. "O what now is impossible!" and with a scornful laugh, in reply to his own question—"True, true love!"

"Compose yourself!" whispered Antonio; the youth answered slowly. "Yes, you are right, I must! How was it! this hour, you said—in the red room—death! they are there—"

"It is so."

With heavy steps walked the miserable prisoner up and down the floor of his dungeon; his enemy followed him with triumphant looks, in which the joy of a fiend was painted. "I pity you, Giovechino, I pity you," said he at length; "I grudged you Fiametta's love, but not her infamy!—Farewell!" He turned to leave the cell; but the maddened prisoner sprang like lightning to the door and prevented him. "Hold! not from this place! lend me your clothes. I must away!"

"Are you mad?" stammered the terrified Antonio.

"I tell you, give me your clothes!"

"And I?"

"You must stay here till I return, I will return, I pledge my oath! The hood and cloak, quick!"

"Hear me, Giovechino!"

"The clothes, man, and no noise, or I strangle you!" He grasped his throat.

"Madman!" shrieked Antonio, and with a violent effort, thrusting him away, he rushed to the door. A moquent, and he had escaped; but just then Giovechino plucked a stone from the prison floor, and with maniac force drove it into the skull of his enemy. Antonio fell dead with scarce a struggle. A moment the youth stood over the body; "murderer!" he groaned inwardly; then hastily pulled off the hood and monk's mantle, which he threw over his own person. He looked back once again before quitting the cell. The expiring lamp flung a red glare on the bleeding corpse, and showed a dagger gleaming in his girdle.

"Perhaps polished for my heart! Antonio!" cried the grazioso with a wild laugh; "I was beforehand with you! but I may need it!" He snatched the weapon from the dead man, hid it in his bosom and hastened out, closing the door.

"How does your prisoner, reverend father?" asked the jailer, who stood in the dim light of the passage.

"I have quieted him," answered Giovechino; "he sleeps."

"The saints be praised!" said the old man: "it is the first quiet night the poor boy has had!"

Without suspicion the jailer lighted the grazioso to the outer door; he, with the despair of the damned in his heart, rushed on through the gloomy streets, nor stopped till he reached the well-known house.

Unobserved he opened the door, and ascended the stairs in breathless silence, that led to Fiametta's apartment. The door was closed, but a light rustling, as of silken drapery, was heard within. The door opened suddenly; a stream of light rushed from the chamber, and Fiametta, splendidly dressed, came towards him.

At the first glance she started back alarmed; then recognizing him with a cry of joy—"Giovechino!" she threw herself into his arms.

"Traitor!" yelled the maddened youth; the dagger glittered in his right hand, and the next instant was buried deep in Fiametta's breast.

"Giovechino! beloved!" sighed the maiden, as she sank expiring at the feet of the grazioso.

MUSICAL ANECDOTES.

MADAME MALIBRAN AND THE KING OF NAPLES.—It is a rule at Naples, that every new actress, before she appears on the stage, must be presented to the king, and ask of him the favour of being present at her début. The day before that fixed for her first appearance, Malibran paid the required visit to his majesty, who received her very graciously. "Sure," said she, "I am come to beg of your majesty the favour, if it does not put your majesty to any inconvenience, of not coming to the theatre to-morrow!" The king, greatly surprised, answered, "Why so? I thought you came on purpose to ask me to attend!" "Yes; but, sire, the fact is, I have been told that in Naples, when your majesty is in the house, it is not thought proper to applaud unless the example is set by your majesty, and I am afraid you will forget it." The king laughed and reassured her, but finding that Madame Malibran still hesitated, he urged her to state frankly the reason of her embarrassment.

"Sire, since your majesty is good enough to allow me, I will mention one thing more; I am so much in the habit of being applauded by the public the moment I come on the stage, that if I do not hear loud applause before I am to begin, I cannot do any thing decently." "Very well," said the monarch, "I will begin the moment you come on the stage." Madame Malibran left the palace highly flattered by her reception. The next evening, while she was waiting by the side-scenes for the signal for her appearance in front, she cast her eyes up to the royal box, which was in front of her, and perceived that she had caught the monarch's eye. Immediately she held out her hands towards him, and went through the action of applauding, to remind him of his promise. She succeeded admirably, for the king, charmed with her originality and grace, gave the signal at once, to which the whole house responded by unanimous acclamation.

PERSEVERANCE.—Some thirty years ago, when Sibalt, the pianist, was the delight of all Paris, an amateur arrived there from Germany, who executed with audacious carelessness some of the most extraordinary and difficult variations on the piano that ever were listened to. Sibalt was anxious to see this unheard-of prodigy, and the two adversaries were brought together. The German phenomenon executed a morceau in a style that was enough to make his rival expire with delight, or envy, which ever you will. Sibalt requested him to repeat it a second, and then a third time, which he obligingly did. Fairly frightened at his tremendous execution, Sibalt begged our phenomenon to play a fantasia, which was the rage just then, adding that if he played it as well as the first piece he would yield the palm. "I cannot agree to play any other piece," said the stranger. "And why, pray?" "Because that is the only one I know." "And how long have you been studying the piece you played just now?" "Twenty-seven years." A good hint to modern amateurs.

SINGULAR FORESIGHT.

Six hundred years ago, a monk of the order of St. Francis foretold most of the great discoveries which have adorned later ages. This monk was Roger Bacon. His whole life was devoted to study, and he narrowly escaped being punished as a magician, through the envy and jealousy of his brethren. He has left us a work which earned for him the surname of "the Wonderful Doctor." In this book, the title of which is de Secretis Operibus Naturæ et Artis, there are many things that will astonish the scientific. "A substance may be prepared," says he, "which, even in very small quantities, will produce a violent report in the air, kindle like a train of fire, and destroy whole castles and armies." A century afterwards, a German taught the Venetians the use of powder, which was first employed in their wars with Genoa. "Moreover," says he, "we may cut glasses, or a kind of mirrors, some of which will be able to enlarge objects, or bring them nearer, and others to diminish, or remove them farther: some to make them appear upside down, others to right them again." Is not this the exact idea of spectacles, telescopes and microscopes, which made their appearance some ages afterwards! "It is possible," says he, "to discover a mode of moving in the air, of descending and walking about on the bottom of rivers and the ocean." Diving-bells and balloons have since been made known, to prove the correctness of Bacon's assertions. "It is moreover possible to build ships that might be managed by one man, and surpass in swiftness all ordinary vessels, even if full of rowers. Lastly, a kind of carriage may be constructed, which, without being drawn by horses, could go over an incredible space." Not to speak of our modern inventions, the attempts which have been made for five hundred years to resolve these two problems of Bacon's, are innumerable. Boats with wheels, propelled by a more or less ingenious mechanism, have been almost perpetually attempted since the days of our learned monk. In 1740, the canals of Belgium and Holland were covered with them, and in France and elsewhere new experiments have been made, and are still making, in this branch. As to the carriages without horses, it is well-known that in the middle of the sixteenth century, Simon Stevinus invented a car with masts and sails, which moved at the rate of about two leagues an hour. Maurice of Nassau, Prince of Orange, had a similar one, which he took great delight in, and so had William the third of England, who was fond of showing it off, to the great astonishment of the court and citizens. Many other carriages have been set in motion by a system of wheels and springs, like those of a watch. These inventions are doubtless far inferior to our steam, which moves not only boats and wagons, but ships and trains of cars; but it is an act of simple justice, to call to mind at times the far-sighted philosopher who, six hundred years ago, affirmed that such hidden powers existed.

AN ERROR OF THE PRESS.

Malherbe, in his elegy on the death of Rosette Duperrier, wrote at first only:

"Et Rosette a vécu ce que vivent les roses, L'espace d'un matin."

Luckily, the poet had forgotten to cross the u's in the word Rosette, and the compositor put Roselle in the proof. This was enough for Malherbe; his eye and fancy took fire at once, and he sent back the proof with only one e added, so that it read,

"Et, rose, elle a vécu," etc.

One of the most beautiful images in any language. After this let authors grumble, if they dare, at printers' blunders. Whatever sins compositors may commit, the balance will still be in their favour; they can never injure as much as they embellish here.

BIRTHPLACE OF COLUMBUS.

Hitherto the world has been in doubt as to the place that can claim the honour of having given birth to the discoverer of America. All his biographers agree that he was a Genoese, but the town in which he first saw the light has never before been ascertained. According to some he was beyond doubt a native of the village of Cogareo, to others, of Nervi; some claimed him for the city of Genoa, others for the little hamlet of Cagugari or Cuccaro, in Montserrat. This uncertainty, we are happy to say, exists no longer. M. Isnard, a Piedmontese antiquarian, has discovered that Columbus was born at Colognetto, in the republic of Genoa. The proofs of this fact he found in the archives of the city. In a letter from the government of the republic to Doria, its ambassador in Madrid, dated seventh November, 1586, we find the following passage:—"Christopher Columbus, of Colognetto, an illustrious personage, as, from being in Spain, you must yourself be aware of, has, as we are informed, ordained by his will that a house should be built at Genoa, to be called by his name, and an annual rent be fixed to keep it in repair," etc. etc.

THE COLISEUM.

A model of this magnificent building, fifty-five feet in diameter, has been forwarded from Rome to Paris. It represents the whole of the immense mass restored, as it appeared when Titus threw it open to the public of Rome. The completion of the model has cost twenty-two years of close application. It was originally ordered by the emperor Napoleon.

MARKET VALUE OF AUTOGRAPHS.

Mr. Pickering lately bought an autograph of Shakespeare for about five hundred dollars. The last quotations of the article in Vienna, to speak in terms of trade, were as follows:—A letter of Luther's, three hundred florins; Schiller, sixty; J. J. Rousseau, thirty-two; Erasmus and Mozart, twenty-five each; Napoleon, (signature only,) fifteen; Frederick the second, eleven; Goethe, nine.

STATISTICS OF AUTHORSHIP IN GERMANY.

There are said to be more than eighteen thousand authors living in Germany. Of this army, twenty-seven have published a complete collection of their works; six thousand nine hundred and forty have published only one work; while there are one hundred and eighty-three whose productions range from twenty to one hundred volumes each, but not their "complete works." Four thousand five hundred and one of the number confine themselves to scientific, and two thousand seven hundred and four to religious subjects. While the number of poets is one thousand five hundred and twenty-six, that of translators is three thousand eight hundred and ten. There are, besides, some ten thousand authors who write for periodicals, and have never risen to the dignity of a book.

NOVEL WAGER.

The Marquis de Caponi has written a letter to the celebrated antiquarian, Rosini, in which he maintains that he has discovered the true and only cause of all Tasso's misfortunes, and that it is neither his imprudent passion for the princess Eleonora, nor his cruel confinement in the hospital of St. Anne, as is commonly believed. The noble marquis has challenged his antagonist to the trial, before the academies of Turin, Modena, and Milan, the Literary Jockey Club, who are to decide the question, and has bet a hundred sequins on the result. The stakes are to be given to the poor.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO VERSE-MAKERS.

A French literary journal, in an address to contributors, begs its friends not to despair if their verses do not appear promptly; and, to excuse itself for its delay in inserting their favours, informs them that it has already six thousand four hundred and fifty-four poetical contributions waiting to be inserted in turn.

PROGRESS OF IMPROVEMENT.

There is now circulating in Constantinople the prospectus of a Journal of Fashions, got up by a Turk, who has spent many years in France and England. A still greater novelty is, that it is to be embellished with engravings, contrary to the express commands of the koran.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

THE FAIR INCENDIARY.

THE following singular story we have taken from a number of the Monthly Lev Magazine.—Some thirty years ago a young lady, the only daughter of a noble house in the north of Germany, from having been one of the most cheerful galls, became subject to fits of the deepest melancholy. All the entreaties of her parents were insufficient to draw from her the reason of it; to their affection she was quite cold, to their caresses rude; and though society failed to enliven her, she bore her part in it with a power and venom of sarcasm that were as strange to her former character as they were unbecoming her sex and youth. The parents contrived, during her temporary absence from home, to investigate the contents of her writing-desk, but no indications of a concealed or disappointed passion were to be found, and it was equally clear that no papers had been removed. The first news they heard of her was, that the house in which she had been residing had been burnt to the ground; that she had been saved with difficulty, though her room was not in that part of the building where the fire had commenced; that her escape had, at first, been taken for granted, and that, when her door was burst open, she was found still dressed and seated in her usual melancholy attitude, with her eyes fixed on the ground. She returned home neither altered in manner nor changed in demeanour, and as passively brilliant in conversation when forced into it. Within two months of her return the house was burnt to the ground, and her mother perished in the flames. She was again found in the same state as on the former occasion, suffered herself to be led away without eagerness or resistance, did not alter her deportment upon hearing of the fate of her mother, made no attempt to console her father, and replied to the condolence of her friends with a bitterness and scorn almost demoralizing. The father and daughter removed to a spa for change of scene. On the night of her arrival the hotel was in flames; but this time the fire began in her apartment, for, from her window were the sparks first seen to issue; and again was she found dressed, seated, and in a reverie. The hotel was the property of the sovereign of the little state in which the spa was situated. An investigation took place; she was arrested, and at once confessed that on each of the three occasions she was the culprit; that she could not tell wherefore, except that she had an irresistible longing to set houses on fire. Each time she had striven against it as long as she could, but was unable to withstand the temptation; that this longing first supervened a few weeks after she had been seized with a sudden depression of spirits; that she felt a hatred to all the world, but had strength to refrain from oaths and curses against it. She is at this moment in a mad-house, where she was at first allowed some liberty, but after an exhibition of homicidal monomania towards a child, of a ferocity most appalling, it was found necessary to apply the severest restraint. She still possesses her memory, her reasoning powers, and her petulant wit.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH.

We occupy a great deal of time in eating and drinking, and sit hours at table, while the French rise directly after nature is satisfied, and proceed to their employment. The two sexes separate with us, but the French men and women, at all times, and on all subjects alike, discourse together. No women have shown so much character, been so little given to flatter away their time, as the French. They instituted the order of the Sœurs de la Charité; Madame Roland de la Tour founded an order of Recluses, who shut themselves up all their lives in a cave, to lament some irreparable affliction. The Mail of Orleans, Charlotte Corday, Madame Roland of the Revolution, are instances of enthusiasm—Madame Dacier, Marquise Chatelet, Madame de Staël, show a depth of scientific learning, almost confined to the industry of men. If you read some of the writings of the authoresses of the present day, like Madame Dunevant, you will never believe they were the productions of a female so masculine in their character. The females exercise all the occupations, and gain the emoluments of men—they keep the accounts; they are at the bourse; and even at the gambling table; they are behind the counter; they act as clerks and negotiators; and often in manufacturing towns, get their own thousands leave. But our ladies must talk scandal, our farmers' daughters leave the dairy, read the last novel, and play the piano.

"But," say we, "the French are a trifling nation, because they think seriously about trifles, which make up the sum of life. Says an author, 'They have advanced everything to the rank of a science or an art—whether cutting your hair, tying your cravat, or cooking your dinner; they have manuals and instructions for everything, and everything worth doing at all they would do well—or, to use their own term, they would have perfectness.' The French, of all nations, are an occupied and busy people—they must be doing something; but we show a disposition to trifle away our lives—to risk them in trifles—cock fights, boxing matches, and simple chases. We praise ourselves as being very charitable people. What did we subscribe for the family of Sir Walter Scott? Less than ten thousand pounds; the French more than forty thousand pounds for Foy, and the most splendid monument in Pere la Chaise. The English are scattered all over the continent, unable to fix their thoughts or their feet, running over everything, considering nothing, and instance for their levity; but the French can stay in their own country, and find amusement among themselves, untroubled by our mania of locomotion. Their journeys are generally undertaken for business, private or public, or for education, or to make researches. They are pensioned by government, or they are exiles; or they are on a tour of propaganda, risking their lives in aid of their own parties and opinions, and in the conquest of foreigners. The French are to be respected for their genius and learning in society, while we treat them with comparative indifference, so that a great astronomer of our country said that he never knew he was anybody till he went abroad; and the way we treat the lions of one season, and forget them the next, certainly proves levity and puerile trifling in our character. We must, however, except the annuaries of the Scientific Association, when all the lions are paraded about the country like other shows, and so well fed that, like the animals in the menageries, the best time for seeing them is their feeding time.—English paper.

SYMPTOMS OF HYDROPHOBIA.

That such faithful creatures as dogs should be subject to the most frightful and fatal of diseases—a disease which they too frequently communicate in their madness to their beloved master or mistress, is one of those inscrutable dispensations that sets all our philosophy at naught.

But we may point out, especially as there is a good deal of misunderstanding on the subject, the usual symptoms that denote the rabid dog; for it frequently happens that a dog is destroyed as mad, when he has no disease of the kind about him; whilst, on the other hand, the rabid animal is often suffered to live and deal destruction around him. It is an error to suppose that a mad dog always shows aversion to water, as the name of the disease implies; he will, on the contrary, sometimes lap it—nay, swim across a river without manifesting any of the horror that marks the disease in man. The most sure symptom is a complete alteration of temper from the mild and the familiar to the sullen and the snarling; he snarls at all objects animate and inanimate, and gnaws them. Even in this state his behaviour often continues unaltered to his master or mistress; and hence the cases which have arisen from having been licked by the tongue of such a dog, on some part of the face or hands where the skin has been broken. Though he goes wildly about, apparently without an object, foaming at the mouth generally, and snapping as he proceeds, he rarely galls, but mostly keeps to a sullen trot with his tail down.

What produces the cruel disease in the dog, is a mystery; it can hardly be hardship or ill-treatment, for see what Sommi says of the dogs at Rosetta, where, though "repelled by man, to whose personal use nature seems to have destined them, they are nevertheless, incapable of deserting him." In modern Egypt the dog is considered an unclean beast, not to be touched without subsequent purification, and, therefore, carefully shunned by the Mahomedans. "There are few cures in the world," writes Sommi, "which contain so many dogs as those of Egypt; or, at least, there is no one which has the appearance of containing more, because they are there constantly assembled in the streets, their only habitation. There they have no other supplies of food but what they can pick up at the doors of houses, or scramble for by raking into filth and garbage. The females keep their young at the corner of some retired and unfrequented street; for a disciple of Mahomet would not permit them to approach his habitation. Continually exposed to the cruel treatment of the populace, assailed sometimes without mercy by an armed mob; subjected to all the inclemency of the elements; hardly finding the means of supporting a wretched existence; meagre; irritated to madness; frequently eaten up by a mange which degenerates into a species of leprosy; hideous even from the torments of their condition; these miserable animals inspire as much compassion, as they excite contempt and indignation against the barbarians among whom they live. It is undoubtedly astonishing that amidst a life of misery and suffering, many of these dogs should not be subject to attacks of the hydrophobia. But this malady, rare in the northern parts of Turkey, is still more so in the southern provinces of that empire, and is totally unknown under the burning sky of Egypt. I never saw a single instance of it; and the natives whom I consulted on the subject, had not so much as an idea of the disease."

We willingly drop this distressing part of our subject; but we must not conceal that though hydrophobia generally makes its appearance in man between the thirtieth and fortieth days after the communication of the virus, fatal cases have occurred after a lapse of eighteen months are on record; and there is not wanting a high authority for the assertion that a person cannot be considered perfectly safe till two years at least have passed, reckoning from the time when the injury was received.

"I'll bet a sheep," said an old Merodith to his other half, "that our boy Otho is going crazy—for he is grinning at the plough, and he is grinning at the barn, and he is grinning at the table, and is grinning to himself wherever he goes." "Bad dog!" replied the old woman, "don't you know he got a love-letter this morn'g!"

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

LANGSYNE

LANGSYNE!—how doth the world come back
With magic meaning to the heart,
As Memory roams the sunny track,
From which by Hope's dreams were loath to part!
No joy like past joy appears;
For what is gone we seek and pine.
Were life span out a thousand years,
It could not match Langsyne!

Langsyne!—the days of childhood warn,
When, tottering by a mother's knee,
Each night and sound had power to charm,
And hope was high, and thought was free.
Langsyne!—the merry schoolboy days—
How sweetly then life's sun did shine!
Oh! for the glorious pranks and plays,
The raptures of Langsyne!

Langsyne!—yes, in the sound, I hear
The rustling of the summer grove;
And view those angel features near
Which first awoke the heart to love.
How sweet it is, in pensive mood,
At window's mantle to recline,
And fill the mental solitude
With spectres from langsyne!

Langsyne!—ah where are they who shared
With us its pleasures bright and blithe!
Kindly with some hath fortune fared;
And some have bow'd beneath the scythe
Of death; while others scatter'd far
O'er foreign lands at fate's repine,
Of wandering forth, 'neath twilight's star,
To muse on dear Langsyne!

Langsyne!—the heart can never be
Again so full of guileless truth;
Langsyne! the eyes no more shall see,
Ah no! the rainbow hopes of youth.
Langsyne! with life resides a spell
To raise the spirit, and refine.
Farewell!—there can be no farewell
To thee, loved, lost langsyne!

SELF.

This insignificant intruder is at all times one of the most important companions in the world: you may try every art and contrivance in your power to get free from his troublesome conversation: the creature will press upon your retirement, and force himself upon you in spite of your teeth: will be meddling in your affairs, setting them in such a light as cannot fail of putting you out of humour, or teasing you with reflections that make you weary of your life. No place is safe from him. He will force himself into the closet, hover about the bed, and penetrate through the thickest darkness, into the deepest recess; will travel with you by land or sea, and will not quit you, though you be in banishment. There is a very whimsical character, at the same time, attendant upon this paradoxical character. Most people are reproached with loving him with the greatest partiality and boldness; and are greatly delighted, it is said, to hear him praised, yet very few seek to come to the knowledge of him or cultivate his acquaintance; nay, the greatest part, by all possible means, avoid encountering him. It is surprising to see, say they, the pains that are continually taken, and the contrivances used to get rid of this continued phantom: some flatter him; some bully him; some endeavour to impose upon him, some carry him to the gaming-table, others to the bottle, and the like; but he never fails to detect their frauds, and to resent them with severity; like the reckoning, he appears after the banquet is over, and not unfrequently reproaches one with profusion, and another with satiety. Nay, some galling are his reprehensions, and so troublesome his intrusion that there have not been wanting instances, even in high life, of some, who not being able to help him otherwise off, have called to their relief the halber, the dagger, or the pistol; and fairly removed themselves into another world, to get rid of him.

FORGIVENESS OF INJURIES.

It is the mild and quiet half of the world, who are generally outraged and borne down by the other half of it; but in this they have the advantage; whatever be the sense of their wrongs, that mild stands not so watchful a sentinel over their forgiveness, as it does in the fierce and froward; we should, all of us, I believe, be more forgiving than we are, would the world but give us leave, but it is apt to interpose its ill offices in remissions, especially of this kind: the truth is, it has its laws, to which the heart is not always a party; and acts so like an unfeeling engine in all cases without distinction, that it requires all the firmness of the most settled humanity to bear up against it.

GOOD SENSE.

It will preserve us from censoriousness; will lead us to distinguish circumstances; keep us from looking after visionary perfection, and make us see things in their proper light. It will lead us to study disposition, peculiarities, accommodations; to weigh consequences; to determine what to observe, and what to pass by; when to be unmoved, and when to yield. It will produce good manners, keep us from taking freedoms, and handling things roughly, will never agitate claims of superiority, but teach us to submit ourselves one to another. Good sense will lead persons to regard their own duties, rather than to recommend those of others.

DISEASE.

It may be said that disease generally brings that equality which death completes. The distinctions which set one man so far above another, are very little preserved in the gloom of a sick chamber, where it will be vain to expect entertainment from the gay, or instructions from the wise; where all human glory is obliterated, the wit clouded, the reason perplexed, and the hero subdued; where the highest and brightest of mortals find nothing left but consciousness and innocence.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF REAL LIFE.

THE ILLUSTRIOUS OBSCURE.

BY WILLIAM COX

CHAPTER X

Of Miss Smuthers, and what befel her.

Now many of the lodgers laughed at those complaints of Craggs, and winked their eyes knowingly at each other, but Miss Smuthers deeply sympathized with him, although she admitted she was somewhat startled and scandalized by the amount of a spirit-merchant's bill which she accidentally discovered in her nephew's pockets.

The tint of this good lady's mind remained as cerulean as ever, but clouds of a darker hue of late years not unfrequently overshadowed her mental horizon. As she declined, unwillingly, "into the vale of years," her aversion to matrimony increased to such a degree, that not only did she profess the greatest horror of it herself, but she disliked very much to see any of her younger female friends entangled into it, and edifying dissertations on the faults, follies and levities of such were sure to form the staple of her conversation for some time afterwards. Reduced to the necessity of wearing spectacles, she, by their aid, saw much more clearly than formerly into the frivolities and vanities of life; and as she gradually lost her teeth, she became more and more averse to sniggering, smiling, giggling, laughing, and all species of light-heartedness. Her nerves, too, like those of most people of fine feelings and fanciful imaginations, were in rather a rickety state, and in order to allay the feeble excitement which occasionally agitated them, she used to swallow vast quantities of certain fashionable pills, at that time all the rage, which a philanthropic individual (mis-called by the prejudiced faculty "a quack") used to manufacture for the special benefit of the public, at an immense sacrifice to himself.

One fatal evening Craggs brought her home a fresh box from the shop. She retired very early to bed, and her nephew, after procuring some loaf sugar, a lemon, and a jug of hot water, proceeded to his study, alias bed-room, to compose.

It so happened that the various lodgers and their friends, with the exception of Miss Smuthers and the poet, had that evening clubbed together to form a snug social party. At about twenty minutes past the witching hour of night, when they had pretty well brought their hilarious proceedings to a conclusion, they arose to depart to their respective beds, and were making their adieux with the fervour and sincerity generally consequent upon the sipping of cordials and punch, when the room door suddenly opened and a figure (such a figure!) glided into the room! It was attired in a chintz wrapping-gown, its hair was in papers on one side of the face and hung down in elf-locks on the other, and its head was enveloped in an immense mob cap, that appeared to have kept its distance from soap and water for some time past.

Upon closer examination the apparition was thought to be something like Miss Smuthers, but whether it was that lady in her own proper person, or it was her spiritual essence clothed in her ordinary habiliments, the company could not exactly tell.

All doubt, however, was soon dissipated. The lady smiled, curtsied, begged them to be seated, and sank herself in a languishing and picturesque manner, into a corner of the sofa. The boarders, as well they might, were mute with astonishment. It was just as well they were mute; for had they been ever so much inclined for remark and conversation, there was but scant opportunity for indulging therein, Miss Smuthers proceeding to exercise her tongue with a rapidity and continuity of which no one but a married man could possibly have formed the slightest conception. Far different, however, were her themes from those to which the married man usually listens. She discoursed of loves and doves, rosy Cupids, hearts, darts, refined and ethereal feelings, soft susceptibilities, romantic attachments, and so on; in most juvenile and boarding-school fashion. She said she was by nature tender and indomitable, but avowed, with apparent inconsistency, that she had been a most unfeeling woman in her time, having rejected seventeen excellent proposals of marriage, the consequences of which rejections were self-exile, bankruptcy, misery, or death, to seventeen reputable tradesmen, well to do in the world, all of whom were driven to, and destroyed by, the immoderate use of intoxicating liquors, in consequence of her relentless determination to preserve the name of Smuthers!

The company began to be seriously alarmed, and seemed not a little puzzled how to proceed. At last one of the party—a young medical student who studied theatricals—advanced, took gently hold of her arm, and applied his fingers to her pulse. Upon which she looked tenderly and compassionately towards the young man, said she pitied him from the bottom of her soul, conjured him to triumph over his feelings and forget her, but, if he found that to be impossible, begged him, at all events, to treat her with that respect and decorum which virgin bashfulness, the presence of the company, and her unquestioned and unquestionable purity imperatively demanded!

The embryo doctor said her pulse was one hundred and twenty per minute, and that her senses were wandering.

The latter part of his assertion she soon verified to the entire satisfaction of the company, for she began to talk of woodbine cottages, retirement from the world, halcyon days, shady walks, honeysuckle and jasmine, and anticipated the time when she should be the happy mother of a large and smiling family!

After this she went into violent hysterics, collapsed, and was carried to bed by a portion of the company, the rest following in a high state of fermentation.

CHAPTER XI.

The Discovery.

Almost as soon as the doctor entered the unfortunate lady's room, his eye fixed, instinctively as it were, on a pill-box which lay on the dressing-table. He advanced, examined the contents, started most dramatically, and exclaimed—

"Gracious powers!"

No sooner had he uttered this exclamation, than the good people who were officiating in carrying Miss Smuthers, deposited her on the bed with all convenient speed, and thronged around the doctor to know what he meant by "gracious powers!"

The doctor looked round upon them mysteriously and impressively, laid his finger on his lip, and then slowly announced that the pills were of opium—that one was a dose—two delirium—three death! and that he rather surmised the ill-fated Miss Smuthers had swallowed three! Then, as if a hurried idea seemed to break in upon him, he hastily demanded who had furnished the deceased (he already spoke of her in the past tense on the strength of his supposition, although she breathed very audibly) with the destructive—the fatal drug!

After a death-like pause, the maid recollected that it was "young Mr. Craggs."

The different portions of the company looked inquiringly at each other: dark suspicions filled every bosom; whispers—murmurs flew around; the excitement became tremendous.

"Young woman," said the doctor, in a low and tremulous voice, and with the fore-finger of his right hand patting the palm of his left in most Keen-like fashion, "are you sure of that?"

"Quite sure," said the young woman.

"Enough!" said he, "more than enough! Fly, girl, and summon the officers of justice!"

The girl, not being angelic in her nature, did not fly, but she ran as fast as her legs would carry her.

CHAPTER XII.

The reveries of genius interrupted.

There was a loud knocking at the door of Craggs's bed-room, but no answer being forthcoming, it was broken open with a tremendous crash.

A scene of considerable confusion presented itself. On a table, before the poet, stood an empty bottle, an empty jug, and an empty glass. Various sheets of paper, some pure and unstained, some dignified with the impress of his thoughts, and some discoloured by the accidental upsetting of the inkstand, lay scattered around. The fender and fire-irons had been upset, a chair had been tumbled over, a half-smoked and unextinguished cigar lay smoking itself, and the candle having burnt an inch or two below the level of the socket, ever and anon flared up in an ominous and ghastly manner.

Apparently Craggs himself had been indulging often in a widering reverie or a profound slumber, but, awakened from his trance by the forcible entrance of about twenty people, he started from his seat and gazed wildly around. His appearance was certainly more striking than prepossessing. His manner was confused and effusive, his face flushed, yet haggard—his eyes wild, bloodshot, and vacant—and his hair towered perpendicularly and in strange disorder above his flat and retreating forehead. In the eyes of the spectators he had not at all the appearance of conscious innocence; and great genius and great crimes being ordinarily connected together in the common mind, they came at once to the conclusion that he was the poisoner of his aunt.

Before the rest of the company, stepped forward the doctor. He slowly raised his arm, pointed his finger most dramatically towards the poet, and exclaimed in a tone that thrilled the hearts of the bystanders—

"Behold! Seize the murderer!"

And two police officers advanced and seized Craggs.

CHAPTER XIII.

Illustrating the truth of the old adage that misfortunes come in clusters.

Before breakfast-time the next morning, Miss Smuthers came to herself again. It appeared she had only swallowed two pills. Her unfortunate nephew was therefore set at liberty. But alas! how poor a reparation was this! Had he not been branded as the possible perpetrator of the most horrid of crimes? Was he not even now looked upon with dark suspicion—ay! more than suspicion? Men and women shuddered as he approached; and unsophisticated children, untaught to conceal their innocent thoughts, artlessly expressed their opinion that he "ought to be hanged!" His aunt, too, when informed by her friends what an exceeding fool she had made of herself the preceding evening, was wroth exceedingly. Her nephew did the best he could to appease her, and wipe off the horrid stain which clung to him, by protesting that he had made a mistake in the boxes in consequence of his thoughts being distracted by an acoustic which he was engaged in composing; but, as it was generally known that Miss Smuthers had been well, leaving the whole of her little property to him on her decease, his protestations and exclamations of course received not the slightest credence. He was generally looked upon as a monster—a fiend in human shape; and his landlady, after seizing his wearing apparel for arrears of board and lodging, civilly requested him to take his departure, and expressed her anxious hope that her honest doers might never again be darkened by such a black-hearted villain!

As he was walking along the passage to comply with his landlady's request, the street-bell rang, and when the door opened, the postman presented himself with a letter "for Mr. Craggs."

CHAPTER XIV.

The letter.

Eagerly did Craggs seize that letter, and with trembling fingers and a palpitating heart did he break the seal, for in the superscription he recognized the handwriting of his beloved Catherine.

His landlady and the maid stood ready to close the door after him as soon as he had relieved the house of his hated presence, but not a step would he budge until he had read the epistle, on which all his future hopes of happiness depended.

It was, in truth, an answer to the poetical proposal of marriage; but, oh ye gods! who can describe the chaotic state of her mind, or the laceration of her feelings, when, instead of a bashful assent to his overture, the lady civilly, but most decidedly, declined the honour of becoming Mrs. C.

But this was not all, and scarcely even the worst, for that worst of impertinence, good advice, followed.

She regretted exceedingly, (she said,) and took shame to herself for having, in the slightest degree, encouraged the poetical propensities of a young man for whom she entertained sentiments of the greatest friendship and esteem (ahem!) She had always thought that those small rhyming effervescences (the jade!) in which Mr. C. appeared to take pleasure, would evaporate as he advanced in years and entered into the serious business of life; that sorry was she to perceive this was not the case, and that Mr. Craggs was throwing away his chance of becoming a respectable tradesman and useful member of society in futile attempts at versification which could not, under any circumstances, be either profitable to himself or acceptable to the public. She trusted that what she was saying in a candid and friendly spirit would not be misconstrued, and hoped that the sound, wholesome, though perhaps unpalatable recommendation to a young poet contained in a few lines which she had accidentally met with in the course of her reading, and which she begged to subjoin, would have its due weight with Mr. C. when he called his natural good sense to his aid (ahem!) and came to look at the matter in a calm and impartial manner. The lines to which she alluded were from the pen of perhaps the most skillful and deep-searching moral anatomist who had written in the English language; and who, she added, with even his great, and almost unequalled abilities, had not found the steps of Parnassus strewn either with cash or flowers. They were as follows:

"Of all the good that mortal men pursue,
The Muse has least to give, and gives to few.
Curb, then, O youth! thy raptures as they rise,
Keep down the evil spirit, and be wise.
Follow your callings, think the Muses' foes,
Nor lean upon the pestle and compose."

"The pestle and compose!" Death and furies! And this from a chit of a girl to confirmed genius!

Craggs, as soon as he had finished, struck his hand violently against his forehead, and rushed, he knew not whither!

"Ah!" said the landlady, who had been watching his proceedings, to the maid as she closed the door, "see the effect of an evil conscience!"

CHAPTER XV.

Containing more misfortunes.

When the excited youth came again to the full possession of his faculties, he found himself seated in a tavern with a pot of beer before him, and the daily newspaper in his hand. How he came thither was never distinctly known, not even to himself, but it is conjectured it must have been either through the power of instinct or the force of habit.

After reading the news and drinking the beer, he stalked mechanically to his shop.

It was the first of May, and when Craggs arrived at the shop, there stood the landlord awaiting the payment of his rent! Craggs protested that he had not given the thing even a thought—that he was utterly unprovided with cash, but said that he had a large assortment of manuscripts by him which he felt quite assured would bring more than double the sum required, and which he offered to make over to the landlord on payment of the supposed balance!

This overture drove the landlord to profane swearing. He bestowed many maledictions upon Craggs—called him everything but a genius or a gentleman—said that he wanted none of his trash (trash!)—that he was not to be "done" in that fashion—that he came for his rent, and his rent he would have, or he would forthwith seize his stock in trade.

The rent, of course, was out of the question, and the landlord being a man of his word, the stock was consequently seized; so that in one brief day Craggs found himself bereft of shop, lodgings, lady-love, and all ulterior pecuniary prospects as far as Miss Smuthers was concerned.

Ah! provident was the care, and deep the foresight of the worthy tallow-chandler. Full well did he perceive the ultimate consequences of the success of the "Monody on the Tortoise-shell Cat."

CHAPTER XVI.

Of Craggs's present condition, with some notice of his works.

The annuity secured to Craggs was quite sufficient to keep him from starving, but it was equally insufficient to supply him with the drink, snuff, and cigars which his matured and confirmed habits absolutely required; and to which innocent indulgences he had lately superadded, now that he had no business to attend to, a growing taste for the intellectual game of bagatelle.

The world is averse to credit. To meet these expenses something was to be done. The bad taste of publishers has long been proverbial, and the unfortunate's happiest strokes and most splendid efforts were severally and successively rejected. As a last resource he took to the composing of poetical puff advertisements, and sang (and yet sang) the brightness of blacking and the excellence of hats in glowing couplets, for which, however, his remuneration is trivial.

But is this a fitting employment for one of his mark and likelihood? Is this to be the end of the glorious promises shadowed forth by the monody and confined by the ode? Alas! the cold, harsh, unfeeling world has blighted his genius in the bud, and it may never blossom or bring forth fruit again!

We disclaim any undue partiality towards Craggs. We avoid comparing him with the living poets of his own land lest we might be supposed to be influenced by personal feeling or biased by prejudice; and we equally scorn to elevate him at the expense of either Byron, Scott, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Moore, Campbell, Crabbe, or any other of his illustrious contemporaries. Let him stand or fall by his own merits alone. All we have mentioned were great men—all were eminently gifted with the "power and faculty divine"—all were unequalled in their several departments; and, while we cordially bear testimony to the gloomy grandeur, the intense passion, the wit, humour and knowledge of the world displayed by Byron; while we are invigorated as by a breeze that has swept over lake and heather by the free, fresh, spirit-stirring minstrelsy of Scott; while we deeply feel and reverentially acknowledge the thoughtful beauty and calm, majestic power of Wordsworth; while we are borne away by the wonderful imagination of Coleridge, and lulled, as by the murmuring of waters, by the inimitable beauty of his versification; while we revel in the exquisite melody of Moore, or feel as if the softness of youth had come back upon our heart in reading "O'Connor's Child," or "Gertrude of Wyoming;" or pause, and think, and read, and pause again, over the nervous and soul-searfully pages of Crabbe; still, for all that, we are prepared fearlessly to assert, and without dread of contradiction, that in chaffade, enigma, or acrostic, Craggs was not equalled by any of those great masters, and that in this peculiar line he yet remains unequalled—unapproached and unapproachable! It was here, alone, perhaps, that he put forth the full force of his powers; but yet no one who has perused his noble "Ode on Thunder" but must have been struck with the sonorous strength and majestic march of some of the couplets, contrasted with the easy and almost careless flow of others. Take, for example, the opening verse—

"Hark! what hollow, rumbling sound,
Rolls and reverberates around!
Shew, on the mountains old and forests hoar—
Matching old Ocean in his wild uproar—
While from the spongy clouds,
Dark as funereal shrouds,
The liquid rain,
Descends amain."

O'er all the verdant green and flower-besprinkled plain!"

We cannot descend to point out minute beauties, but yet we would advert to the felicitous application of the dissyllable "liquid" in the above verse. Yet it is by no means a rare merit. The works of Craggs abound with equally well-chosen epithets. Neither is this great writer found wanting when he condescends to lower his eagle flight. What playful tenderness and sportive delicacy is there in his verses addressed to "Catherine," commencing—

"When we roamed around the Battery,
In the spring of the young year,
You said I dealt in fattery—
That my vows were insincere," etc.

whilst his lines on "Moonshine," are allowed to be most happily in unison with the subject.

But whether would our zeal in the cause of illustrious obscurity hurry us? Enough has been said: and who that has read the above simple history but feels his blood boil with indignation at the cold, calculating, mercenary spirit of the age which permits such a man to waste his precious time over a bagatelle board? Who that has perused the above brief extracts but feels the most poignant regret that such an one as the author of the "Ode on Thunder" should be obliged to sing the praises of blacking, however excellent that blacking may be!

But so it is. Amid the universal neglect, however, the author of this little memoir has at least the proud consciousness of having done his duty; and, with the fate of Craggs before his eyes, has only to say at the end as he said at the beginning—

"The world knows nothing of its greatest men."

COMMUNICATIONS FROM ENGLAND.

A STATE BANQUET, AND SO ON.

London, June 10.

MY DEAR — Since my last letter to the western side of the Atlantic, most of the anticipations therein contained have been realized. Among them, the arrival of His Imperial Highness the Hereditary Grand Duke Alexander of Russia has taken place—rather a hard title for you unostentatious republicans! I must give a brief account of this lion. He is anything but aristocratic in his appearance, an every-day-to-be-met-with personage. His dress consists of a black suit, and generally a white neck-cloth, with a broad-brimmed hat. I need scarcely say that he was banqueted, balled, supped, and danced to repletion. The royal carriages were at his service, and the queen herself appeared to think that too much attention could not be paid to his Imperial Highness. I write in the past tense, he having departed in the government steamer "Firebrand," on his return for the Hague. The following account of an entertainment may amuse.

On Sunday evening a state banquet was given to his imperial highness the hereditary grand duke of Russia by the Marquis and Marchioness of Londonderry, at their splendid mansion in Park-lane. On this occasion the whole suite of state-rooms, together with the private apartments of the noble marchioness, were thrown open for the reception of the distinguished guests; and it is not too much to say, that, for elegance, and a display of consummate taste, they are not to be surpassed in London. The staircase, which is a chef d'œuvre of P. Wyatt's, decorated with a variety of flowering exotics, was brilliantly illuminated; while a number of mirrors, by an ingenious arrangement, presented to the eye of the spectator a large and dazzling star, which cast its reflected light on a beautifully-executed bust of Pitt, and supported by four figures of Victory in Rosso Antico, the present of Pope Pius to the noble marquis on the conclusion of the treaty of Paris. The drawing-rooms and salons de reception were literally filled with costly presents from the late and present Emperor of Russia, the King of Sweden, the King of Prussia, Louis the eighteenth of France, and the various continental sovereigns. The draperies, coverings of the ottomans, sofas, etc., were of white damask, embroidered with gold; and rare articles of sertu and bijouterie were displayed in endless but elegant profusion. In the throne-room adjoining the gallery was a splendid picture of his late majesty George the fourth. The banquet itself took place in the statue gallery, which, among others of high merit, boasts of the most exquisite productions of Canova's chisel. The Hercules and the Paris excited especial admiration. It is also adorned by several fine full-length portraits, those of the late marquis, and of the present marquis and marchioness occupying one side; and of the Emperor Nicholas, King George the fourth when prince-regent, and the duke of Wellington the other. The two latter are from the pencil of Sir Thomas Lawrence. The portrait of the illustrious duke, taken immediately after the conclusion of the war, is considered the most perfect and best-executed likeness extant, and is so highly prized by its noble owner that he has refused every application for permission to copy it. At the upper end of the gallery was a magnificent vase, the present of Louis the eighteenth on his restoration, and the dinner-table was also ornamented with various vases, also presents from the allied powers. Covers were laid for fifty-two. The dinner, which was of the most raffiné description, was served on massive plate, and the dessert in service china. A banquet of sumptuous gold-plate was also set out for the occasion. About eight o'clock the company began to arrive, and were received by the noble host and hostess with all the honours due to their rank. The great lion of the evening was of course his imperial highness the hereditary Grand Duke of Russia. All the guests were in full dress. The grand duke sat in the centre of the table, immediately opposite the portrait of the emperor, to which, allowing for the difference of age, he bears a most striking resemblance. The Marchioness of Londonderry sat between the Grand Duke and the Duke of Cambridge; and immediately opposite to the noble host, Prince William Henry, and the Duke of Wellington, to whom and to their noble entertainers the guests paid the most marked attention. After dinner the health of the queen was duly honoured, and the Marquis of Londonderry rose and briefly expressed his high gratification at the honour which had been conferred upon him in entertaining the illustrious prince who sat before him; and honoured, as he had been, with the confidence and kind consideration of his august father on many occasions, it was with feelings of peculiar gratification that he proposed the health of the Emperor of all the Russias, the House of Russia, and the Czarovitch. The grand duke returned thanks, and the company shortly after retired to the drawing-rooms, where a brilliant evening party was assembled to do honour to their royal highnesses.

The queen dowager's return to England was warmly greeted. Her majesty is a kind, benevolent woman, and much regarded. Victoria, our most gracious and worshipped little queen, honoured Ascot Heath races with her presence. On the first day twelve carriages and four proceeded from Windsor castle to the course. In the first were her majesty, her royal highness the Duchess of Kent, the grand duke of Russia, and prince William Henry of the Netherlands. The cortege could not be more brilliant. A vast concourse of people were present, and never were these races more interesting.

Mr. Price has been engaged in obtaining a strong vocal corps for the ensuing season at New-York. Mrs. Martin (late Miss Inverarity) and her husband will be among those to charm your ears and fascinate your senses.

Charles Matthews has Covent Garden theatre for the ensuing season. All the Olympic company will be there.

Mr. Van Amburgh is at Dublin with his lions. A few nights since the lioness and tiger had a terrific fight on the stage of the theatre. It was feared that the "beast tamer" would have furnished a mouthful for the infuriated creatures, in his endeavours to separate them. Van Amburgh succeeded at length in calming their wild spirits, and they crouched at his feet like whipped spaniels.

Charles Kean has been staring at the Haymarket. He was well received. You must not make too much of him when he arrives in New-York—he has a tolerably large opinion of himself. However, he is an excellent actor, and bears an irreproachable character.

The family of Thomas Haynes Bayly will have a benefit, under the patronage of her grace the Duchess of Beaufort. Poor Bayly, he was under great pecuniary difficulties. His family were left almost without a shilling.

I heard the sister of the lamented Malibran sing last week at the distinguished soirées musicales in E—. She is exceedingly opposite to Malibran in appearance, being, to speak the truth, very plain—you must not call me ungallant—her voice is very beautiful, and her execution good.

We are still singing "such a gettin' up stairs." Adieu. Au revoir.

Fathers and mothers, be kind and affectionate, but firm and resolute; and above all, always reasonable; so shall you command the respect and obedience that your station at the head of a family so imperiously requires.

JAMES SHERIDAN KNOWLES.

Knowing that the numerous admirers of this eminent dramatist and warm-hearted man take a lively interest in everything relating to him, and in reply to many inquiries respecting his whereabouts and future prospects, we take the liberty of an old comrade in copying some passages from the last private letter that has reached us from his hand. Mr. Knowles, while in the United States, secured many ardent and enduring friends, and, when he left us, carried with him the best wishes of all who knew him, as well as a substantial token of regard from the citizens of New-York, to which he never fails to allude in his letters, and has done so again in that which we subjoin:

MY DEAR — I almost rejoice in the fault that has so thoroughly proved the steadfastness of your friendship. God bless you, as noble Curtis said to me when he sent the account of the complimentary benefit. Dear —, a heart oppressed with cares—endless—is the cause of my deflection in writing—not an abatement of respect, or gratitude, or love. I often think of you and yours, to whom I commend me—and always ask after you when I meet any one from New-York. Four years have now elapsed since I was among you—all but a few days—and fresh is the feeling of regret with which I parted from you and your free-hearted, free-handed brethren! Ah, —, were my own country as enthusiastic about me as yours was, I should now be an independent man; but, out of a hundred benefits which I have taken since my return to England, there has not been one which has produced the sixth part of the amount that my complimentary benefit in New-York yielded me—upwards of six hundred pounds. I often mention it.

I have not any news to send you except that our little queen has lately presented her subjects with a heart-trait brighter than all the jewels in her crown. "By the goddesses, she is the trump of sovereigns. But you will have heard of this long ago.

I hope I shall not die without treading your shore once more. Indeed I cherish the hope that I shall see America again. Time has not abated my enthusiastic admiration for your people. Let me know if Commodore Stewart is well. To Curtis—to Noah—remember me. Tell me how Dr. Holland is, and how theatricals are going on. I shall write you a better letter next time. It is only to-day that I received yours, as I have been four months and upwards out of town acting in the provinces. Once more farewell; notwithstanding the lack of promotion on the part of your drum-major expectant, your sincere friend,

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE REGGAR OF FLORENCE.

BY D. L. L. HILLHOUSE.

BELMONT had been born a beggar, and the recollection of his early life only carried him back to the time when he wandered through the streets of Florence, clad in tattered garments, and led by his mother, whose habiliments were akin to his own, and well corresponded with their condition. They slept in the open air; sometimes beneath the portico of the Pitti palace, and sometimes within the corridor of the Strozzi, and not unfrequently in the fishermen's sheds that lay scattered along the banks of the Arno below the storehouses of the Medici. One day while he was asleep on the steps of the cathedral his mother left him, and he never saw her more; whether some accident befell her or not he could never learn, and being tolerably well bred to the trade of beggary, it gave him very little uneasiness; henceforth he pursued the profession on his own responsibility, and met with that success which was commensurate with his merits. He had no relations, and consequently had no cares but such as were necessarily connected with his own personal comforts. Indeed, he sometimes doubted whether she were his mother who early initiated him into the mysteries of his calling; still he felt a sense of gratitude towards her for her kind protection, and would fain indulge the thought that she did not willfully abandon him. But the idea of adding a portion to the wealth of society, or of enlarging the blessings of this life by personal industry or individual exertion, never entered his head; he supposed that all the riches of this world had been absorbed by one portion of society merely to deal out a part gratuitously to another. Yet he sometimes wondered why those who had the bounties of Providence in their special charge did not let it out equally to all at once, and thus put an end to all importunity.

Although Belmonte felt tolerably well satisfied with his condition, as long as he could silence the cravings of hunger, still he was not quite philosopher enough to look upon the splendid domes of the affluent without envy; and although he had never seen the interior of any of those costly piles of commercial grandeur, yet he often suffered his fancy to rove among their classic beauties, and pictured to himself the gorgeous scenes within, necessary to correspond with the courtly magnificence without. On some occasions he contrasted his own dirty robe with the gay frocks and showy finery of the Florentine youth, and felt a disposition almost to repine; but then the ease with which his time-worn trappings clung to his person, from old habits and long acquaintance, soon reconciled him to his lot.

Belmonte had now arrived at the age of twenty years, when early one morning, as he was wending his way along the streets towards the great quay where lay the ships of the Medici, he was accosted by a brother mendicant, who belonged to the Lazzaroni.

"Mr. Knowles alludes, as the reader will perceive, to the refusal of the queen to discard the ladies of her household, at the demand of Sir Robert Peel."

saying—"Ah, Belmonte, have you heard the news! Glorious times now! Signior Lorenzo di Medici has taken charge of all the good people of Florence—he feeds all the poor, and they say he intends to give up his palace to them, as he is tired of living there."

"So, so," replied Belmonte, thoughtfully, and then cast his eyes down his sides as if to take a close survey of his personal appearance; then, with an air of doubt and hesitation, added—"Will he leave his wardrobe and all his provisions there?—he'll find no independent Florentine to live there without."

"Ay, to be sure he will," rejoined Francisco; "but then what is one to do for villains, as them proud nobles call poor folks what work, as nobody will have to work now, nor beg, nor steal—I'll not live there; 'twouldn't suit me."

"If one could marry a Pisani, now," said Belmonte, still musing on the extraordinary prospect before him, "it would be pleasant; but where will Signior Lorenzo live?"

"O, we must vote for him to be chief of the republic, and then he'll live amongst us, I suppose; sometimes with you, Belmonte, if you take the palace."

"Well, that's fair. Signior Lorenzo is a great man, and we must kill all the nobles that don't vote for him—but what's that noise?"

"It's the people; that is, the free citizens, as they call us now: go up to the great church; Lorenzo has ordered bread and wine to be placed under the portico—ah, Belmonte, we shall see no more such days if we don't make him chief of the republic—come, come, let's follow on."

The crowd soon came up, and Francisco and Belmonte joined the throng, and mingled their shouts with the tumult in loud praises of the Medici. In every quarter of the city groups of men, women and children were seen gathered around the storehouses of the Medici, clamorous with excess of joy. Belmonte and his companion wandered from place to place, their appetites growing by what they fed on; at length, as evening began to close in, a large concourse of these citizens passed the Strozzi palace followed by Belmonte and Francisco, locked together by the arms, and reeling beneath the bounty of the Medici, which they had taken from the wine-cup. As they made a pause to gaze on the splendour of this noble pile, Belmonte caught a glimpse of a beautiful female in one of the windows of an upper chamber, the sight of whom seemed to overcome all his faculties. "Let's rest beneath the corridor," said he, and he broke from his companion and fell on the steps at the side of a marble lion, one of which adorned each side of the entrance.

Francisco looked on him for a moment, and as he began to snore right lustily, exclaimed—"Well, the beast may take care of you tonight," and left him to his fate. Soon soft music came floating on the breeze, like the voice of some lone bird in the wilderness; anon the symphony began to swell, and grew louder and louder, until a wild, harmonious strain burst forth on Belmonte's enraptured soul, and made him start from his flimsy couch with wonder and amazement. It seemed as if he had been transported to the gates of paradise, and that they were thrown open to his bewildered eyes. At the door of the palace, a few feet from the entrance, stood the lovely being that first arrested his attention from the window; she was clad in white, with a full-flowing robe that trailed behind her some two or three feet, the rich texture of which, added to its graceful disposition, seemed like the rich shading of the most exquisite form. Her veil was partly thrown aside, and discovered a cheek of the softest bloom, and a countenance expressive of the most endearing gentleness. She beckoned Belmonte to advance, who instantly obeyed, and as he gained the entrance, at the summit of the steps, she flew to meet him, and seizing one of his hands and clasping it with her delicate palms, she exclaimed—"Dear Belmonte, how rejoiced I am to see you; this is indeed a condescension I could not have hoped for, but for the known benevolence of your disposition; come, let me show the Pitti, the Medici, and the Caponi how much I am indebted to you for this kindness."

So saying, she led him through a long hall, the pavement of which was adorned with the richest mosaic, formed of various coloured marbles, inlaid with the most exquisite taste and workmanship. The walls exhibited some of the most splendid scenes, painted in fresco by the most eminent Italian masters; here and there the most finished statuary of a Leonardo and an Angelo, graced the brilliant spectacle, and stood out in bold relief with such perfect harmony of form and feature, as if the daring hand that guided the chisel had contended with the creator for the palm, whilst the more softened beauties of the pencil seemed like the calm and bright creations of a sinless world.

This scene, so new to Belmonte, filled him with the most ravishing delight; alternately he stopped to gaze upon the miniature world around him, then with wild amazement on his fair conductress, and could hardly believe such a transcendent vision real; at length he paused before a Venus of Leonardo, veiled in light pink drapery, so transparent that it served only to throw a glowing lustre over the features of the goddess rich as the hues of life. Behind lay stretched far away the groves of Elysium, from the pencil of Raphael, in which the most lovely nymphs lay reclining in the shade, veiled only with the soft blush of innocence, while others sported on the banks of a silver lake and seemed to glisten from a submersion in the cooling waters as the crystal drops stood like beads on their rosy forms, or like pearls gleamed rolled from their fair bodies to the earth. Belmonte began to suspect that it was all enchantment, and in the midst of his amazement and ecstasy once he essayed to speak; he turned to look upon the fair being who held his hand in her delicate grasp and led him through these ravishing scenes, when the winking smile of her countenance, blended with the soft and lustrous expression of her large, dark eyes, seemed to stifle every effort, and without breathing a whisper, he passively followed on. Soon they passed through a long train of attendants and came to a spacious archway, closed with folding-doors. They had no sooner arrived at this spot, than the doors flew open and discovered such a blaze of light as caused Belmonte to start back with affright, which circumstance produced a loud laugh from his companion, accompanied with a more tightened grasp of the hand.

When the first shock of surprise had subsided he again permitted himself to be led forward, and as he passed the splendid portals he saw himself and his companion reflected in a large mirror on the opposite side of the apartment, and was astounded to find himself clad in the richest robes of the Florentine nobility. How this change had been effected he knew not, but ere he had time to recover from this new surprise, he was led forward and introduced to the females of the Medici, the Pitti, the Caponi, and the Pazzi, as the most distinguished guest of the Strozzi, to all of whom he addressed himself with becoming courtesy, and even wondered at his own self-possession and ease in a scene so entirely new. He found himself the lion of the palace; all the ladies were eager to receive his attentions, and hung with rapture on his discourse, whilst all the gentlemen seemed anxious to obtain his opinion on matters of state.

Finally, Lorenzo di Medici led him through a long train of nobility, up to the farther end of the chamber and seated him on a temporary throne, saying—"Signior Belmonte, be chief of this great Republic; govern with wisdom and with justice; you have been chosen by the nobility to represent the state, and all the people have ratified the choice; in order to strengthen your administration, it is necessary that a bond be formed between the nobility and the citizens, and to effect this, I would suggest a matrimonial alliance with the Strozzi, as the most agreeable; she who conducted you before this august assembly is alone worthy of your hand. We wait your answer ere we conduct you before the great council of the state; the Signorina has already met to receive you with all those honours due to the chief magistrate of the Florentine republic."

When this salutation had ended, Belmonte's surprise had increased to the last degree of wonder and astonishment. He cast a hasty glance over that brilliant assembly, gathered together in the most splendid apartment of the Strozzi palace to do him honour, and felt that Fortune, though tardy in administering justice, had at length paid him back her long arrears with more than interest. Still he distrusted his powers to serve the state as effectually as he could wish, and rose from his seat with that modesty so peculiar to conscious virtue and integrity when suddenly drawn from retirement and thrust before an admiring world, to express his gratitude for this distinguished mark of approbation. But before he had uttered a sentence, he discovered the crowd simultaneously to part in front of his seat, and an open space to extend in a direct line down to the brazen doors, which were thrown open; a man then hastily advanced up this avenue and was within ten feet of the chair of state: when Belmonte recognized the intruder as Francisco. The sight of his old associate, so unlooked for, called up for a moment a thousand recollections of his former life, and produced a confusion in his manners and appearance which it was impossible to conceal. He turned first on one side, then on the other in his seat, and seemed utterly at a loss how to proceed. At length he resolved to appeal to the nobility and command them to respect his elevation, which he owed to their generosity, so far as to rid him of the presence of the importunate intruder.

"It is our sovereign will and pleasure," said Belmonte, "that the commencement of our administration be distinguished by a strict regard to the welfare of the state; that we swear not from the most rigid examples of justice, therefore we banish all paupers and idlers from the Tuscan territory." Scarcely had he uttered these words when he felt a strange and chilling sensation creeping over his whole frame, accompanied with something like an electric shock in the right foot. The lights seemed gradually to fade before his eyes—the assembly became mute; he attempted to go on, but only vented his anguish in a hollow groan, and awoke on the cold steps beneath the marble lion to find that the day had already dawned, and that Francisco was dragging him by the heel.

"Wake up, wake up, Belmonte," said he, "Medici's wine has made you sleep like a beast all night under the lion."

A lady requests the publication of the following lines. They are beautiful in the extreme, and reflect credit upon the good taste that made the selection.

Kathleen, mavourneen! the gray dawn is breaking,
The horn of the hunter is heard on the hill,
The lark from her light wing the bright dew is shaking,
Kathleen, mavourneen! wist, slumbering still!
Oh! hast thou forgotten how soon we must sever?
Oh! hast thou forgotten this day we must part;
It may be for years—or it may be for ever!
Oh! why art thou silent, thou voice of my heart!
Kathleen, mavourneen! awake from thy slumbers,
The blue mountains glow in the sun's golden light;
Ah! where is the spell that once hung on my numbers!
Arise in thy beauty, thou star of my night!
Mavourneen, mavourneen, my sad tears are falling,
To think that from Erin and thee I must part;
Mavourneen, mavourneen, thy lover is calling,
Oh! why art thou silent, thou voice of my heart!

MISTAKEN OF PRINTERS.—Compositors sometimes make mistakes of a ludicrous character. A newspaper makes its correspondent say in the opening of his communication—"Mr. Editor, I felt myself much flattened at the manner in which my former remarks were received," &c.

DUTY AND LOVE.—The cares of life are quite sufficient without being obliged to make a duty of love.

THE PARTING WORD.

BY O. W. HOLMES.

I must leave thee, lady sweet!
Months shall waste before we meet;
Winds are fair, and sails are spread,
Anchors leave their ocean bed;
Ere this shining day grow dark,
Skies shall gird my shoreless bark;
Through thy tears, oh lady mine,
Read thy lover's parting line.
When the first sad sun shall set,
Thou shalt tear thy locks of jet;
When the morning star shall rise,
Thou shalt wake with weeping eyes;
When the second sun goes down,
Thou more tranquil shalt be grown,
Taught too well that wild despair,
Dims thine eyes, and spoils thine hair.
All the first quiet week
Thou shalt wear a smileless cheek;
In the first month's second half
Thou shalt once attempt to laugh;
Then in Pickwick thou shalt dip,
Slightly puckering round the lip,
Till at last in sorrow's spite,
Samuel makes thee laugh outright.
While the first seven mornings last,
Dolled in thy chamber fast,
Many a youth shall fume and pout,
"Hang the girl, she's always out!"
While the second week goes round,
Vainly shall they ring and pound;
When the third week shall begin,
"Martha, let the creature in!"

Now once more the flattering throng
Round thee flock with smile and song,
But thy lips unweaned as yet,
Lisp, "Oh, how can I resist?"
Men and devils, both contrive
Traps for enticing girls alive;
Eve was duped, and Helen kissed,
How, oh, how can I resist?"

First be careful of your fan,
Trust it not to youth or man;
Love has filled a pirate's sail
Often with its perfumed gale.
Mind your kerchief most of all,
Fingers touch when 'kerchiefs fall';
Shorter ells than mercers' call,
Is the space from hand to lip.

Trust not such as talk in tropes,
Full of pistols, daggers, ropes,
All the hemp that Russia bears
Scarcely would answer lover's prayers.
Would you prove them quite sincere,
The rope beneath their ear,
Ask each Romeo if he'll fall;
Half a pound would hang them all.

Fiercely some shall storm and swear,
Beating breasts in black despair;
Others murmur with a sigh,
Thou must melt or they will die.
Painted words on empty lies,
Grubs with wings like butterflies;
Let them die, and welcome, too;
Pray what better could they do?

Fare thee well, if you efface
From thy heart low's burning trace.
Keep, oh keep, that hallowed seat
From the tread of vulgar feet;
If the blue lips of the sea,
Wait with icy kisses for me,
Let not flame forget the vow,
Sealed how often Love, as now!

NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT.

We find in a London paper the following account of a newly invented musical instrument.—The nobility and amateurs of the musical world are now enjoying a high treat by the performance of one of the most extraordinary and magnificent instruments ever brought to perfection by the perseverance and skill of man. This instrument, called the Grand Euterpeon, is the production of a well-known German artist, M. Blessing, who devoted upwards of twenty years, and expended more than five thousand pounds, to the designing, forming, and perfecting it; it is, in point of fact, a most complete specimen of mechanism, and stands unrivalled in every respect. It is wholly self-acting, not requiring the aid of any one while playing, and produces the effect of a full first-rate band. The overtures to Guillem Tell, Mosart's Othello, Mozart's G. Symphony, Haydn's Creation, are executed in the most masterly style, and the performance does ample justice to their eminent composers. It can also be used as a piano and organ, having two rows of keys for the fingers, and stops, and a row of pedals for the feet, which may be played ad libitum; indeed, it is only by hearing it that its wonderful powers can be properly appreciated. The instrument, we are informed, contains nearly sixteen hundred trumpets, clarinets, oboes, &c., etc., with a drum of large size, a triangle, and everything constituting a military band; and from its extraordinarily grand appearance and highly finished mechanism, we should say that it is truly deserving of a conspicuous place in a palace, mansion, or public institution. It may be necessary to state that it stands twelve feet high, is seven feet six inches wide, and four feet deep, and weighs nearly four tons; it contains twelve bellows and sixteen stops, and, when closed, has the appearance of a costly piece of cabinet furniture.

A pleasant, cheerful wife is a rainbow set in the sky, when her husband's mind is tossed by storms and tempests—and darkened indeed must be the spirit from which the radiance of affection and tenderness does not dispel the gloom.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"The United States Magazine and Record of all the Volunteers, together with the Army and Navy." Philadelphia: Hoady and Duval, 1859.

THE third number of this handsome quarto, adorned with three coloured lithographic engravings, has been laid upon our table. The first plate is inscribed to the "National Greys" of Philadelphia, and represents an officer in full uniform, and a private resting on his musket. The chief, "on yonder rock reclining," we presume is intended to represent that gallant soldier and "prince of good fellows," Colonel Fritz; but the likeness is not striking. The second plate is dedicated to the "Tompkins Blues" of this city, and is far more spirited than the first. The third engraving is a view of the encampment of the "Montgomery Greens" of Philadelphia, and is better executed than either of the others. Besides the embellishments, the work contains eight pages of letter-press, exceedingly interesting to the uniform militia of the country, who ought to afford it every encouragement.

"The Monthly Chronicle of Original Literature." July, 1859. New-York: P. Saunders, 237 Broadway.

Another new magazine has been started. It professes to be eminently an American magazine, and to have for its object the fostering and encouraging of the genius of our own country. The present number promises well. The poetry is of a very superior character. There is much spirit and energy in the stanzas by Mr. Warren, and the little poems by C. D. McLeod are quite above the current poetry of the day. In its critiques upon the drama, literature and the fine arts, the Chronicle will aim to be impartial. We do not doubt the undertaking will be successful if persevered in with industry and good taste.

Lewer's Republications of Foreign Periodicals.

The republications of the London and Edinburgh Reviews and Magazines are issued with their accustomed promptitude. The late numbers have been unusually rich. The Foreign Quarterly Review for June contains an article in relation to Mr. Redfield's theory of storms, which will be read with considerable interest at this time. The same review contains an eloquent article upon German literature, in which we find the following translation of Goethe's inscription to Faust, a translation of which, from the pen of Mr. Halleck, was published in the Mirror of Week before last. We think the version of the American poet is at once more beautiful and more true to the original:

DEDICATION.

- "Again ye swarm around me, shadowy train!
Once went in youth this sorrowing gaze to meet;
And will ye now, for my bestrest, remain?
Still shall my heart's forgotten pulses beat!
Ye throng me round—well, rule me once again,
Since thus through mist and gloom my soul ye greet:
While drinks my breast again, with youthful bound,
The magic breath your presence breaths around.
- "Ye bring with ye the forms of other days
Where many a cherished image glads my eyes:
And still, like faded, half-remember'd lays
Past memories of love and friendship rise
Each pang renewed, each plaint recalled, betrays
What labrynths wandering life supplies.
And mourns the loved of brighter hours, o'ercast
And shorn of bliss, who leave me, here, the last.
- "They hear no more these closing notes of song,
The hearts for whom I waked its earlier lay;
For ever cold that sympathizing throng,
And ah! its' plaintive echoes dead away.
My sorrow mourns a stranger-crowd among,
Whose very praises sadden and grieve;
And all to which my strains had gladness borne,
If yet surviving, far sadder torn.
- "And now my still unwonted yearning owns
For that still calm, the spirit's phantom reign:
And float and fall in undetermined tones
My feeble numbers, like th' Æolian strain
A cloud comes o'er me, tear on tear beacons,
And yielding manhood's pride of soul is vain.
All that is left me, distant seems to be,
And all I've lost,—my sole reality."

"The Pocket Lacon; comprising nearly one thousand extracts from the best authors, selected by John Taylor." In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Ranshaw.

We can best convey an idea of the character and merit of these selections by quoting from the titlepage the following motto:—"A work that, dip where the reader may, will find a field of knowledge; and which he may continue to peruse, lay down, and take up at pleasure, without breaking the thread, or interrupting the chain of reasoning."

"The Knickerbocker and New-York Monthly Magazine."

This periodical will not suffer in comparison with the best British magazines. Since it has been enriched with Washington Irving's invaluable contributions, we think it quite equal, in interest and literary pretension, to any periodical issued from the Edinburgh and London press. The number for July is uncommonly spirited. Mr. John Inman has contributed an admirable essay, entitled "The American Merchant;" and Geoffrey Crayon, in the "Adalantado of the Seven Cities," has given a "sketch" in his choicest vein. The sylvan verses, by Mr. Street, are remarkably beautiful and true in their descriptions. It would be discreditable to the patriotism and good taste of the country, if the "Knickerbocker" were not liberally sustained.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The "Ways of Providence," excellent; if not too long for our columns, shall appear.—A "Tale of the Revolution" shall be read, and an answer given in our next.—The communication of "Y. R." "Senex," "An Artist," "Thompson," and "C. G. D.," are declined.—We replied to "X." in our last. He must be aware that we are overburdened with communications upon the subject on which he writes.—"Albion" is too long for our pages. The pure good-will expressed towards us by innumerable kind-hearted readers and correspondents, whose economy it is worth a struggle to deserve, encourages us to proceed on our literary journey with new spirit and vigour. The path of an editor is seldom strewn with flowers; but we feel confident, if the wishes of many long-tried and sincere friends could be realized, that ours would be a pleasant one to travel. Our thanks are due and respectfully tendered to all well-wishers, and they seem to us to be about as numerous as the leaves of the forest. We take occasion to state, once for all, that the Mirror will not, in a single instance, be sent to new subscribers, unless the year be paid for in advance. We take no letters from the office unless they come to us free of postage.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JULY 13, 1859.

Fourth of July accidents.—It is truly distressing to read the long catalogue of accidents and disasters which happened on the "glorious Fourth." In our own immediate vicinity, the frightful explosion on the railroad, and the fatal casualty on board the steamboat from Staten Island, were alone enough to characterize the day as a day of catastrophes. But, in addition to these, the papers from all parts of the country teem with accounts of maimings and deaths, from fireworks, explosions, the pressure of crowds and similar causes. It would seem as if we celebrated the anniversary of our independence, as the Hindoos commemorate the festival of Juggernaut, by crushing victims under the wheels of the idol's ponderous car. Indeed, so much is it now regarded as a matter of course by editors, that they will be called upon to record a chapter of "horrid accidents" after one of these anniversaries, that a portion of our newspapers is now reserved for these chronicles as regularly as for the returns of votes after an election. Why is it that these fatalities are so frequent upon the great holiday of our national calendar? We can discover a cause only in the circumstance, that our holidays are too "few and far between." As the Fourth comes but once a year, our population seem resolved to make up for the rarity of their amusements, by excess upon this great holiday. In Europe, where the annual holidays are five times as numerous, we hear of no such accidents as characterize the celebration of the Fourth in the United States. Neither do we there witness upon festival occasions the scenes of intoxication and debauchery, which sully the anniversary. The character of the day is diametrically opposed to all such scenes, and we heartily wish that our people would find some other mode of commemorating their independence than by placing their lives in peril from the myriad accidents, which so regularly signalize the glorious occasion.

The progress of dilapidation in New-York.—The correspondent of the Baltimore Transcript, writing from New-York, says, with considerable truth, that the principal business in our goody city seems to be to unmake what has cost years of labour and heaps of money in the erection. Never was the organ of destructiveness more prominently developed among any people than among the New-Yorkers. No sooner has a splendid pile of buildings been erected, and the occupants become comfortably settled, than a new whim arises, the work of demolition commences and another "castle in the air" is made to take its place, but fated, like the former, to be prostrated by the wild whirlwind of speculations, which are always bursting, like the winds from the caves of Æolus, over the devoted city. Perhaps one reason for the frequent renewal of houses in New-York, is the frail character of the brick used here in architecture; it certainly appears in many instances to be nothing more than half-burned clay. In Wall-street, however, the same reason does not exist, though there, also, the hand of destruction, under the semblance of improvement, has laid a large number of buildings in ruins. They had cost immense sums and were built of costly materials, but had stood so long, (perhaps five whole years,) that they had become antiquated and disagreeable to the modern taste of the new race who had come upon the stage within a year or two past. The Custom-house is in full progress, and will be a massive and magnificent structure. The Exchange, also, is going forward as fast as so extensive and solid a building can be expected to advance. It will be one of the most splendid of the kind in the country. The avidity with which good stands are seized upon in this city is illustrated by the fact, that some of the apartments on the first floor are already occupied, although the street is filled with bricks and masses of stone, and the building overhead is raised to but half its intended height.

Miniature painting.—Mr. Southworth.—The art of miniature painting has attained a high degree of perfection in this country. Among those distinguished in this branch of painting, to whose merits we have had an opportunity of bearing testimony, we know of none whose productions more plainly carry the impress of genius and evince matured powers of execution than the likenesses by Mr. N. Southworth, a native artist, established at Boston, but who has recently made a brief visit to this city. His miniatures have been much admired here, and he had more orders than he could execute during his limited stay. His colouring is remarkably beautiful, and in his likenesses he is highly successful. There is quite a demand for Mr. Southworth's return to New-York. In the meantime, those of our friends in Boston who desire to obtain good "comfartent presentments" of themselves or friends, will do well to look in upon the artist in Joy's Buildings.

Theatrical vicissitudes.—The London Morning Post has the following article in relation to our two principal theatres. We doubt the entire correctness of the estimate:—"The weekly expenses of the Park theatre (Simpson's) are calculated at one thousand nine hundred and sixty dollars, including everything, excepting 'stars' and extras attached to new pieces. The expenses of the National (Wallack's) with the same reservation, are one thousand eight hundred and ninety dollars, being seventy dollars less than the Park. During the season from the first of September, 1858, the average receipts of the Park amounted to two hundred and fifty dollars per night, making forty-six thousand two hundred and fifty dollars for the season, the expenses being for the same period (thirty weeks) equal to fifty-eight thousand nine hundred dollars; exhibiting—much to be deplored—a loss of twelve thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, exclusive of 'stars.' On the other hand, and clearly demonstrating that the fluctuating nature of theatrical property extends across the Atlantic, at the National, from the first of September to the first of April, (one hundred and eighty-five nights), the receipts, averaging at the low rate of six hundred dollars per night, made one hundred and eleven thousand dollars for the season. The expenses of this theatre for thirty weeks, at one thousand eight hundred and ninety dollars per week, would be equal to fifty-six thousand seven hundred dollars, leaving to pay profits and 'stars,' fifty-four thousand three hundred dollars. The 'stars' received at the National—Coleste, eight thousand six hundred and eighty dollars; Forrest, five thousand four hundred dollars; Miss Shroff, nine thousand dollars; Wilson, eight thousand six hundred dollars; all others, five thousand, total, thirty-six thousand six hundred and eighty dollars. Thus leaving nearly twenty thousand dollars profit on the season."

The pedestrian in New-York.—A contemporary enumerates some of the evils which fall under the observation of a stranger, who is not "to the manor born," in treading the streets of our crowded metropolis. We have taken the liberty of swelling the list. First, running at large of hogs, who are the true aristocrats upon our sidewalks, and manifest considerable ingenuity in dashing between the legs of inoffensive foot-passengers or spattering them with mud. Second, throwing all rubbish into the street, instead of waiting until the carts come round for it on stated days. Third, the villanous noise made by the milkmen, instead of delivering the milk quietly as in the eastern cities. This nuisance is the more abominable because we have it during divine service, morning and evening, on the sabbath. Fourth, smoking in the street; a blackguard custom. Fifth, allowing wheelbarrows and handcarts on the side-walk. Sixth, dogs running at large. Seventh, awning-posts on narrow side-walks, instead of fastening them up by braces as in Boston, Hartford, and Providence. Eighth, iron gates at the Battery and Park, instead of iron posts, which would be much more convenient. Ninth, firing squibs or crackers in the streets, contrary to law. Tenth, street-beggars by the thousand; hand organ and monkey, singing girls, etc. But we must stop, for we shall need another sheet if we go on. It would take a week to enumerate all the evils which cry loudly for reform in our city. We trust that the hints we have thrown out may meet with some degree of attention from those "having authority."

National music.—When shall we have in America a characteristic national music! The popular airs of every country are not only the product of the national feelings, but express the national feelings, and hence every nation has or ought to have a music of its own, original and distinguished from that of all others. Thus we are, in a great measure, without, as yet; but whoever shall collect and embody the stray airs of America, and furnish them a medium, through which suitably to express themselves, will deserve well of his country.

Music in Constantinople.—A plan of founding a theatre in the environs of Constantinople is very likely to be completed. The plan is to bring out Italian and French operas. The brother of Donizetti, the celebrated composer, is director of music to the Sultan. The Italian company from Odessa performed the opera of "La Straniera" by Bellini, and "L'italiani in Algeri" before the Sultan, at which he seemed highly delighted.

Dramatized works.—Charles Dickens, "Boz," has entered a protest against the practice adopted in many English theatres of dramatizing his works before they are finished, thus misrepresenting his characters, and, in the necessity of making a denouement to every version, anticipating his own intended conclusions. The practice must naturally be annoying to Mr. Dickens, but we doubt if the sale of his works is not rather increased by it than diminished.

A modern Sappho.—A suicide is mentioned in the London papers which may bring contrition to the heart of some one here. A young woman, named Mary Ann Nightingale, who followed her lover to the United States and was here rejected by him, returned to England and poisoned herself at Boonfield, near Peterborough.

Paganiini.—Our readers will be sorry to learn that this renowned violinist has been so reduced by illness, that he is forbidden by his physicians to hear the sound of his favourite instrument.

Poetical union.—The London newspapers inform us that Robert Southey, the poet-laureate, was married to Miss Caroline Bowles in the first week of June. Miss Bowles is the author of some of the most touching lyrical pieces in the language. May the union be propitious.

The British Queen.—This noble steamer, which was advertised to sail from Liverpool on the fourth of the present month, is now hourly expected. What a revolution in the intercourse between the old world and the new has been produced in the short space of one year by the establishment of steam navigation!

OH! GAZE NOT UPON ME WITH SADNESS.

WORDS BY MR. HAZLEHURST—ADAPTED TO AN AMERICAN AIR BY GEORGE H. THOMSON.

ANDANTE ESPRESSIVO.

Oh! gaze not upon me with sadness, Though death each pulse in throbbing plays, But give thy smiles me bright of gladness, My sunshine hap-pi-er days: Dim not the tears of sor-row, These still pure of love; yet time the our hearts - a - bove.

SECOND VERSE.
Fair visions are shining before thee,
Fond hope tinge her spell round thy brow;
Though the loved one of years bendeth o'er thee,
His tears fall unfelt by thee now;
Young flowers gem the spot where the slumbers,
Whilst the soft plaintive voice of the dove
Seems to sing in her soul-touching numbers,
Their true hearts shall mingle above.

THIRD VERSE.
List! the heart-broken wail of a mother!
She mourns o'er her beautiful-her brave!
Lift the sod—let its green turf now cover
Two hearts that loved on to the grave:
And many a pure tear of sorrow
Bedews this and spot—whilst the dove
Turns sweetly to sing on each morrow,
Their true hearts have mingled above.

Original.
THE TREE OF LOVE.
Love cannot be the alce tree
Whose bloom but once is seen;
Go, search the grove, the tree of love
Is sure the evergreen.
For that's the same in leaf and frame,
'Neath cold or sunny skies;
You take the ground its roots have bound,
Or it, transplanted, dies!
That love thus roots and firmly shoots
In woman's heart we see,
Through smiles and tears, in after years
It grows a fadeless tree.
The tree of love, all trees above,
For ever may be seen,
In summer's bloom, or winter's gloom,
A hardy evergreen.

PORTIA.

MISCELLANY.

A BROAD HINT.—Lady Isabella Finch, daughter of the earl of Winchelsea, was lady of the bedchamber to the Princess Amelia; Lord Bath one evening, having no silver, borrowed a half-crown of her; he sent it next day, with a very gallant wish that he could give her a crown. She replied, that "though he could not give her a crown, he could give her a coronet, and she was very ready to accept it."

APPROPRIATE.—It is said there is a mercantile house in Boston, under the firm of Kneal and Pray. That is a partnership which ought not to be dissolved. We knew, eight or ten years ago, a firm in Portsmouth, N. H. named "Pray and Neal." They were ship-builders. We have heard of a firm in New-York with the captivating title of "Ketchum and Kissam."

TAKING IT COOLLY.—"Sir, you are a fool!"—"Do you call me a fool, sir?"—"Yes, sir!"—"You do, sir?"—"Yes, sir. I would call any man a fool who behaves as you do."—"Oh! you would call any man a fool. Then I cannot consider it personal. I wish you good morning, sir."

A TOUGH YAK.—The Picaresque tells a story of a clergyman who lately read the following announcement:—"I am requested to state, that immediately after this evening, there will be a race just back of the church, two mile heats, for a purse of three hundred dollars; two nags entered, and some hopes of another. I trust you will all be there."

SIMPLE REMEDY TO PURIFY WATER.—It is not so generally known as it ought to be, that pounded alum possesses the property of purifying water. A large table spoonful of pulverised alum, sprinkled into a hoghead of water (the water stirred round at the time) will, after the lapse of a few hours, by precipitating to the bottom the impure particles, so purify it, that it will be found to possess nearly all the freshness and clearness of the finest spring water. A pailful, containing four gallons, may be purified by a single teaspoonful.

THE WORTH OF A GOOD COMPANION.—A companion that is cheerful, and free from swearing and scurrilous discourse, is worth gold. I love such mirth as does not make friends ashamed to look upon one another next morning; nor men, that cannot well bear it, to repent the money that they spent when they were warned with drink. And take this for a rule: You may pick out such times and such companions, that you may make yourselves merrier for a little than a great deal of money—for "tis the company, and not the charge, that makes the feast."

CUPID'S STAKE.

One bright morning as he lay,
On his mother's lap divine,
Little Love at dice did play;
The stake—this foolish heart of mine.
Who is me! for to my cost,
I know the little urchin lost.

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.—If paper, linen, tow, wool, cotton, mals, straw, wood-shavings, moss, or soot, be imbued slightly with linseed or hempseed oil, and placed in the sun and air, especially when wrapped or piled in a heap, they very soon become spontaneously hot, emit smoke, and finally burst into flames. If linseed oil and ground unguine be triturated together, the soft lump so formed will speedily become firm, and, ere long, take fire.

MAN.—Philosophers have puzzled themselves how to define man, so as to distinguish him from other animals. Burke says, "Man is an animal that cooks his victuals." "Then," says Johnson, "the proverb is just, which says, there is reason in roasting an egg." Adam Smith has hit the case. "Man," says he, "is an animal that makes bargains. No other animal does this—no dog exchanges bones with another."

MONEY WELL Laid OUT.—"No money is better spent," says Dr. Johnson "than what is laid out for domestic satisfaction. A man is pleased that his wife is dressed as well as other people, and the wife is pleased that she is well-dressed." This must have been said when Mrs. Johnson had just worried the doctor out of a new gown.

TELLING A LIE.—Richmond bridge is now opened free every day except Sunday to foot-passengers. "I wonder," said X., meeting W., in the Strand, "if one can cross Waterloo bridge without paying?" "Go and ask," answered W., "and you'll be told!"

PASSAGES FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

Women, with their bright imaginations, tender hearts, and pure minds, create for themselves idols, on whom they lavish their worship, making their heart's temples, in which the false god is adored. But alas! the object of their best and fondest feelings generally too soon proves to be of base clay, instead of pure gold; and though pity would fain intervene, to veil its defects, or even to cherish it in despite of them, virtue, reason, and justice combine finally to destroy it; but in the deed they too often injure the face in which it was enshrined.

The aristocracy are prone to ridicule the elevation of the middle class to high official situations, not reflecting it is easier to transmute men of talents into gentlemen than it is to convert mere gentlemen into men of talent.

A gentleman, who at breakfast the other morning broke an egg, and disturbed the repose of a sentimental-looking buddy, called the waiter, and insinuated that he did not like to have a bill presented "till he had done eating."

Existence is only felt to be valuable while it is necessary to some one dear to us. The moment we become aware that our death would leave no aching void in a human heart, the charm is gone.

Guard, if it be possible, your friends from injuring you, lest they, by so doing, become your bitterest enemies, never forgiving the wrongs they have themselves inflicted.

Never eat while you speak, as a man's throat is too narrow a channel for words to pass up, and good meat to pass down at the same time.

Most people seem to imagine that advice, like physic, to do good must be disagreeable.

BUNKER-HILL.

Hail, glorious height! New-England's proudest soil,
Woe from the brave in battle's hottest toil!
Say, does the blood which fell like April rain,
Demand no tribute to the heroes slain!
Without one name from all that sacred band
Shall yonder shaft in silent mockery stand!
No! let each lip in quivering scorn be curled—
Let every stone from top to base be hurled—
And as the morn when freedom's martyr died,
Let waving grass its deep foundation hide;
Then—then, you see, we felt no withering stain—
Without disgrace let Bunker-Hill remain.

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE GERMAN.

WALPURGIS-NIGHT.

BY HEINRICH ZSCHOKKE

WALPURGIS-NIGHT is the eve of the first of May, at which time German superstition fancies the powers of evil to be abroad on the earth with peculiar power.* On this night Goethe makes Faust and Mephistopheles take their journey through the regions of the air to the witches' festival on the Blocksberg.

CHAPTER I. The tempter.

I was far from home, busied with my affairs at Prague. Pleasant as the place was, I could not suppress a longing after my home, where my young wife had for seven weeks been waiting my return. We had never been so long separated since our wedding-day. Fanny sent me letters, to be sure, regularly every week; but these pages, full of love, anxious longing and mournful tenderness, were old to the fire, and I bitterly wished Prague four-and-thirty miles to the north-east behind me.

He who has not a lovely blue-eyed little wife of two-and-twenty, beautiful as Love's goddess, with two blooming cupids playing round her; he who, after five years of wedlock, is not five hundred times as much in love with such a being as he was the day before his marriage, to such a man I tell the story of my home-sickness in vain.

Enough, I thanked heaven with shouts of joy when my business was at last finished. I took leave of my few friends and acquaintances, and demanded my bill of the landlord. I was to set out by post the next day.

On the appointed morning the landlord made his appearance, my most humble servant to command, with a bill of formidable dimensions. I found I had not cash enough to discharge it and pay my expenses on the road besides. I determined, therefore, to cash a bill. I felt for my pocket-book in all my pockets, and in every corner of them. It was gone. I was troubled, for there was more than fourteen hundred dollars worth of good paper in it, and that is no trifle in this world of ours. Fanny's letters, too, were in it.

I hunted round the room, but in vain; my pocket-book had disappeared.

"I thought so!" said I to myself. Whenever a man feels happy for a moment, the devil sits behind the curtain, waiting to trip up his heels. We should take pleasure in nothing in this world, then, should we have less trouble and anguish. I have always found it so.

Then, though it is not my besetting sin, I began to curse and swear. If the devil still goes round about as he used to do in the good old times, even though in the guise of a roaring lion, I would strike a bargain with him on the spot. While I was thinking this, a shape occurred to my mind, which I had seen a week before at the billiard-room, clad in a seedy, scarlet coat, and which struck me at the time as belonging to one of the powers of evil in human shape. A cold shudder passed over me. And yet so desperate was I, that I thought—be it so! Even if he is such, I could welcome him now if he only brought me my pocket-book back again.

Meantime some one knocked at my chamber-door. "How now?" thought I, "will the tempter take my joke in earnest?" I ran to the door. The red-coat was in my mind, and I actually expected it would prove to be him.

And lo! to my boundless surprise, when I opened the door, the tempter I had been thinking about walked in, with a slight nod of the head.

CHAPTER II. Further particulars.

I must state where and when I had become acquainted with this figure, that people may not take me for a wild dreamer.

I went one evening into a coffee-house, where I hoped to find the latest newspapers. Two gentlemen were deep in thought over a game of chess at a side-table. Several young men sat by the window, in animated conversation on the subject of apparitions and the nature of the human soul. A little, oldish man, in a scarlet overcoat, was walking up and down the room with his hands behind his back. I busied myself with a glass of Danziger and the newspapers.

No one attracted my attention so much as the red-coated promenade. I forgot even the newspapers and the war in Spain. In his dress and mien there was something elegant and repulsive. He was below the middle size, but stout jointed and broad-shouldered, perhaps from fifty to sixty years of age, and walked with his head bent like an infirm old man. Coal-black, shining hair, lay thin and straight round his temples. His countenance, with its yellow complexion, its hawk nose and prominent cheek-bones, had something fearful in it; and while all his features were cold as ice, his large eye gleamed brightly as that of an ardent youth; yet there was no order, no soul in it.

"That fellow," thought I, "was born to be a criminal judge or grand inquisitor, a robber chief or gipsy king. I should not like to travel through a wood with him alone. Surely he never could smile in his life."

I was mistaken. He listened to the young men at the window, and smiled, sometimes, at their conversation. But, heaven help us, what a smile! It brought an icy shudder over me. The malignant regions of hell seemed to grin out of all his features. "If that red-coated rascal is not the devil himself," thought I, "it is his own brother." I looked involuntarily at his feet for the well-known hoof, and sure enough he had one human foot like ourselves, and the other was a clump foot in a laced boot. He was enough to make a Voltaire superstitious.

As the red-coat passed the chess-board, one of the players said in a tone of triumph to his perplexed and gloomy antagonist, "You are gone, without a chance." He in scarlet stood still a moment, cast a keen glance at the game, said to the conqueror, "You are mistaken—in three moves you are infallibly check-mated." The conqueror laughed proudly, his adversary shook his head in doubt, and moved—at the third move the fancied victor was, in fact, check-mated.

While the combatants were arranging the pieces again, one of the young men by the window said hastily to red-coat, "You smile, sir; our dispute seems to interest you. But your smile tells me that you differ from us in opinion as to the nature of the world and of the Deity. Have you read Schelling?"

"I have," answered he.

"And what does your smile mean to convey?"

"Your Schelling is a sharp-witted poet, who mistakes the freaks of his imagination for truth, because the little devil within him is in receipt with other dreams. Philosophers act now as they always did. Blind men dispute about theories of colours, and deaf ones over the true principles of music. Alexander would have liked to have made a bridge of boats to the moon, to conquer it; and philosophers, unsatisfied within the bounds of reason, are willing to become irrational."

So spoke he of the scarlet suit. A dispute then arose; he, however, did not remain, but took up his hat and glided away.

I had seen him smile, but did not forget that striking figure with the hellish face, and was afraid that it would rise up in my dreams. And now he stood unexpectedly before me in my room.

CHAPTER III. The temptation.

"Excuse me for disturbing you," said he. "Have I the honour to address Mr. Robert *****?"

"I am he," answered I.

"How do you prove that?"

"A strange question," thought I; "doubtless a spy of the police." A letter lay half open on my table. I showed him the address to me on the outside envelope.

"Very well," said he, "but your name is so common a one, that one finds it in every corner of Germany, Hungary and Poland. Give me some further particulars. I have business with you. I have been directed to you."

"Sir," said I, "excuse me; but I cannot think of business at present. I am on the point of leaving, and have still a thousand things to attend to. Perhaps, too, you are mistaken in the person, for I am neither a statesman nor merchant."

He measured me from head to foot with a stare, and said, "Indeed!" He was silent for awhile, and seemed about to turn away when he began—"You have, however, done business in Prague. Is not your brother on the point of bankruptcy?"

I must have turned red as fire, for that fact I thought no one but my brother and myself knew. The tempter laughed his fearful malignant laugh again.

"Sir, you are still mistaken," answered I. "I have a brother, to be sure, and more than one, but none that thinks of bankruptcy, or need fear anything of the kind."

"Indeed!" said the tempter, and his features became hard like iron again.

"Sir," said I, with some emotion, for I did not like the idea that there was a person in Prague who knew my brother's circumstances, "you have certainly addressed yourself to the wrong person. Excuse me if I request you to be brief. I have not a moment to lose."

"Have patience for a single minute," rejoined he, "it is important for me to have some conversation with you. You seem uneasy and confused. Has anything unpleasant happened to you?"

Thereupon he laughed, or rather grinned, again, as though he wanted to buy up my soul. His actions became more and more suspicious to me. I quivered at his clump-foot, and superstitious fear came over me. In no case did I wish to enter into relations with this suspicious being; and said, "I need no money. However, since you are so polite in your offers, may I ask you your name?"

"My name cannot concern you," replied he, "and has nothing to do with the business. I am a man-devil.* Does the name give me more trustworthiness in your eyes?"

"A man-devil!" said I, and in strange confusion did not know what to say, nor whether the whole thing was jest or earnest.

Meantime some one knocked at the door. The landlord came in, and brought me a letter just received by the post. I took it.

"Read the letter in the first place," said red-coat, "we can talk further afterwards. The letter is, doubtless, from your amiable Fanny."

I was more confounded than ever.

"Do you understand at last," continued the stranger, and again he grinned, "who I am and what I want of you?"

I was on the point of saying, "Sir, I take it you are Satan, and want to make a breakfast on my unfortunate soul," but I restrained myself.

"Further," said he, "you are going towards Eger. My road lies through that town and I set off to-morrow; will you accept a place in my carriage?"

I thanked him and told him I had already engaged post-horses.

He became more uneasy and said, "I cannot say I find you very sociable. But I must make the acquaintance of your Fanny and of little Leopold and Augustus as I pass by. Don't you divine yet who I am and what I want! In the name of the devil, sir, I wish to be of service to you! Speak!"

"Well, then," said I at last, "if you are a wizard, I have lost a pocket-book, and I know how I shall find it."

He looked again with fearful friendliness and asked, "Will you take counsel as to this matter? What will you give me to make good your loss?"

He looked strange and sharply at me as he spoke this, as if he wished to suggest my answer.

"I will give my soul," I lay on the tip of my tongue. But as I kept silence in my confusion, he put his hand in his pocket and produced my pocket-book.

"There is your treasure," said he. I was beside myself.

"How did you come by it?" cried I, as I turned over the leaves and found that nothing was missing.

"Yesterday afternoon, about four o'clock, I found it on the Moldau-bridge and put it in my pocket."

I had crossed the bridge just about that time, had the book in my hand and put it in my pocket, as I thought.

"I stayed an hour on the bridge," said the red-coat, "waiting for some one to come in search of it. As no one came, I went to my hotel. I read the contents, in order to ascertain the loser by that means. A letter learned me your name and that you resided at this hotel. For that reason I have come to you now; I was here last night but did not find you."

How can physiognomy deceive one! I could have fallen on my man-devil's neck. I said the most endearing things to him. My joy was as extravagant as my dislike had been: He, however, would listen to nothing.

"Greet your lovely Fanny from me," said he; "a pleasant journey to you. We shall meet again once more." And he went his way.

CHAPTER IV. The return home.

I took extra post-horses and flew towards my beloved home. On the way the strange man-devil still recurred to me. I could not forget the figure with the scarlet-coat, the clump-foot, and the hideous features. I now recollected, too, that a bush of his black hair stood out straight over his forehead. He probably had a little hair under it, and so then was a Beelzebub, perfect, from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot.

He had, to be sure, brought the pocket-book back; no one could act more honourably. He had read Fanny's letters, and my brother's instructions to me, and might by that means have become acquainted with my private affairs. But then his face—No! nature writes no illegible hand. Enough, if I had never believed in the existence of a Mephistopheles, I could not have doubted it at that moment.

I clung to this thought in my day dreams, and will not deny that I gave myself up readily to the workings of my fancy. It diverted my impatience and I dwelt upon it till I believed my honest man-devil might very well be the very devil himself, his honesty only excepted.

* Mannefeul is literally man-devil, an ancient and respectable German surname; like Mandeville in English.

I was two days and a night on the way from Prague to our town. On the second it grew late. In vain did I hurry and scold the post-boys, in vain ply them with money—it grew still later, still darker, and I still more anxious. Alas! for nearly three months I had not seen my Fanny; nor my children, who sported round their young mother like two rosebuds beside a just opened rose. I trembled in transport as I thought that the loveliest of her sex, my wife, would be that day in my arms.

It is true, I had learned to love before I knew Fanny. I once had a Julia, who was torn from me by her parents' pride and married to a rich Polish nobleman. Our love was first love—bordering on mutual adoration and madness. Even in the parting hour we swore eternal love to each other beyond death and the grave, and kisses and tears sealed our vow. But we all know how these things end. She became the Starost's lady and I saw Fanny. My love for her was holier, deeper, tenderer. Julia was once the goddess of my fancy, but Fanny the only adored of my heart.

The town clock struck one as we entered the sleeping streets. I alighted at the post-house, left my servant with the trunk behind, as I intended returning in case all were asleep at home, and glided out to the suburbs, at the extremity of which my welcome home, shadowed by tall fruit-trees, glimmered before me in the moonlight.

CHAPTER V. An unseasonable visit.

And everything was asleep. Oh Fanny, Fanny, hadst thou been awake how much woe and terror had been spared me! They were asleep—my wife, my children, my servants—no light was to be seen. I stalked ten times round the house; everything was closed. I was unwilling to break any one's rest.

I luckily found the summer-house open. I entered. There was my Fanny's work-basket on a table; and I saw by the moonlight my children's hobby-horses, drums, and whips, on the ground and upon the seats. They had probably passed the afternoon there. Oh, I rejoiced almost as much in these trifles, as though I stood by the loved ones themselves. I stretched myself on the sofa, and determined to pass the night there. The night was clear and mild, and the odour of the budding fruit-trees and of the garden-flowers entered my apartment. To him who has not slept for forty hours every couch is a soft one. I soon fell asleep in my weariness. But hardly, however, had I closed my eyes, when the creaking of the summer-house door on its hinges woke me again. I raised myself up and saw a man enter, whom I took at first for a thief. But, imagine my astonishment! it was my friend in the red coat.

"Where have you come from?" I asked I.
"From Prague. I set off again in half an hour, to be as good as my word. I wished, though, to see you and your Fanny on the way. I heard from your servant that you had just arrived, and expected to find all awake at your house. You do not mean to spend the night here in the damp cool air, and bring on a fit of sickness?"

I walked out into the garden with him, and trembled in every limb, so much his sudden appearance alarmed me. I laughed, to be sure, to myself at my superstitious fear, but still could not shake it off. This is human nature. The hard features of my friend from Prague, were, in the deceptive moonlight, far more horrible, and the lightning of his eyes far more brilliant than ever.
"You really frightened me," said I; "I tremble all over. How did you come to look for me in the summer-house? you seem to be omniscient."

He grinned with malignant joy, as before, and said, "Do you now know who I am, and what I want of you?"

"Really, I know you now no better than I did in Prague. But, for the joke's sake, I will tell you what you then seemed to me to be. Do not take it ill, but I thought that unless you were a sorcerer, you might very well be the devil himself!"

He grinned again and answered, "Supposing, for the joke's sake, I were the latter, will you make common cause with me?"

"You must offer high before I close with you; for, to tell you the truth, Mr. Devil, (allow me to call you so in jest,) my happiness is perfect."

"Oh! I shall offer you nothing, give you nothing. That was, to be sure, the custom in the old times, when folks believed in a devil and therefore took more care to avoid him; then we had to make terms. But now-a-days, when no one believes in a devil, and all trust to reason for everything, the children of men are to be had dog-cheap."

"I hope my soul is not to be had so easily, although I do take the devil to be an old woman's story. An ounce of reason gives us more strength than a hundred weight of superstition."

"There it is—your proud security, ye mortals, (allow me to speak in the character you have been pleased to ascribe to me), your proud security raises more recruits for hell than all the recruiting-officers that wear Satan's livery. Ever since you began to deem eternity a problem and hell an eastern fiction, ever since you look on honesty and stupidity as virtues of the same calibre, sensual pleasure as an amiable weakness, selfishness as greatness of soul, public spirit as folly, and roguish cunning as worldly wisdom, we of the lower regions give ourselves no trouble about catching you; you come of yourselves. You have reason on your lips and an army of a hundred passions in your heart. The most holy of your effeminate race is he who has the fewest opportunities for sinning."

"Spoken like a true devil," said I.

"Unquestionably," answered the gentleman in red, and grinned again. "But I speak the truth, and have done so ever since you ceased to believe it. While man held truth holy, Satan was the father of lies; it is now the reverse. We poor devils are always the antipodes of humanity."

"In this point at least you are not opposed to me, for I think as you do, most philosophical friend."

"Good; then you are mine already. When one gives me a hair, his whole head is mine. It is cool here, my carriage is already harnessed, and I must be off. Therefore, farewell."

He went away. I accompanied him back to the post-house, where the horses were just harnessing to his carriage.

"I thought you would perhaps walk in with me and drink a glass of punch at parting, which I bespoke before I went to see you."

I accepted the invitation. It revived me to step into a warm room.

CHAPTER VI. The temptation.

The punch was already on the table when we entered the room. A strange traveller was walking up and down, dark and silent; a tall, lean, old man. Trunks and bundles lay on the chairs around; I also noticed a lady's shawl, straw-hat and gloves.

While we were drinking, the stranger said to the waiter who came to fetch the baggage, "Tell my wife when she comes that I have gone to bed. We leave at the first dawn."

I also did not like to go back to the chilly summer-house, and bespoke a bed for the night. The stranger left us; we drained the punch-bowl, talking on all sorts of subjects. The fire of the rum refreshed and glowed within me. The red-coat hurried to his carriage, and, as I assisted him in, said, "We shall see each other once more." The carriage rolled away.

When I went back into the room, a lady had come for the hat, shawl, and gloves. As she turned towards me, I came near losing my senses entirely. It was Julia; my first love, on the point, as I afterwards learned, of making a tour of pleasure in Italy. She was not less terrified than I was.

"For heaven's sake, Robert! is it thy spirit?"

"Julia!" I stammered I, and all the rapture of first love awoke again within me. I approached her respectfully. Her eyes were full of tears, and her arms were open. I lay and wept on her bosom.

When we recovered ourselves she observed for the first time that she was half undressed: "This is not my apartment," said she, and threw her shawl around her. "Come, Robert, we have much to say to each other."

She left the room. I followed her to her apartment. "Here we can tell our stories freely," said she, and we sat down together on the sofa.

I felt once more the feverish glow of an old flame, which I had supposed was long since extinguished. Julia, unhappy with the Starost, clung to me with her former dependency. Forgive me, Fanny, thought I, 'tis the first and last minute in my life. 'Tis but a dream of a few hours. The flame of passion was wafted from soul to soul in kisses.

A magic which I cannot possibly describe lay in Julia's words and actions. The whole past was again distinct before us—our first acquaintance at the bell on her sister's wedding-day, and the emotions which agitated us then; our second meeting in the garden of the ducal palace; then our excursion by water with our parents; and how we, in the paradise of Waritz, confessed love, and swore faithfulness. Then—but enough—for the past alone existed, not the future we forgot that we did not belong to each other. Alas, how frail is man!

All at once the door flew open. The tall man entered, with the question, "Who is that with you at this hour, Julia?"

We sprang up in terror. The Starost stood awhile speechless, pale as a corpse; then, with three steps, he sprang to Julia, twisted her long chestnut hair in his hand, buried her, sobbing, to the ground, and dragged her round on the floor while he exclaimed, "Wretch! traitress!"

I tried to help her. He thrust me back with such force that I fell backwards on the floor. As I rose, he left the wretched Julia, and cried out, "Now it is thy turn!"

In my despair I snatched a knife from the table and threatened to plunge it in his body, unless he desisted. But my furious enemy flung himself upon me, and grasped my throat tight. I gasped for breath. In my desperation, I thrust with the knife in every direction. I struck at him repeatedly: on a sudden the unhappy man fell backwards. The knife was in his heart. Julia lay sobbing on the ground beside her ravished husband. I stood like a statue. O, thought I, would that it were a dream, and that I lay awakened on the sofa in my summer-house. Cursed be the red-coat! accursed the pocket-book! O, my poor children! O, my beloved, wretched, sadly Fanny! From the threshold of my domestic paradise, I am hurled back into a hell I never dreamed of. I am a murderer!

The noise in the room had aroused the people of the house. I heard questions, curses, and footsteps. Nothing was left but to fly, before I was discovered. I snatched up a lamp to light myself home.

(To be concluded in our next.)

AMERICA VESPUCCI.—The following is a copy of Miss Vespucci's letter to the editor of the Louisville Journal.—"Louisville, June 26, 1838. Dear Sir:—I most humbly refuse the private subscription just opened for me at your office; and I beg of you the kindness to let me express my warmest thanks and gratitude to every one of my friends in Louisville. A national boon will ever honour the memory and the descendant of America Vespucci—but America, even as an exile in the United States, cannot accept an individual favour, however delicate may be the manner in which it is proffered. I am eager, dear Sir, publicly to acknowledge the kind support you have lent to my cause. I respectfully and very gratefully remain, your friend, AMERICA VESPUCCI."

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

I'LL BE A CHILD NO MORE.

I SAW ONE in the morn of life,
A glad and gleesome-thing,
Who little knew of worldly strife,
And thus I heard him cry—
"I'll throw this useless toy aside,
I'll turn a fresh leaf o'er;
I'll gaily stem life's lucid tide,
And be a child no more."
I SAW ONE in the noon of life,
Joy lit his large, dark eye,
With lofty hopes his soul was rife,
And thus I heard him cry—
"I've won a high and noble name,
And glittering, golden store,
I've early trod the path of fame,
And am a child no more."
I SAW ONE in life's cheerless eve,
With frowns on his brow,
And thus I heard that old man grieve
(Mechanic's hour now)—
"My childhood's hours were bright and fair,
My manhood sorrow wore;
Could I blot out my age of care,
I'd be a child once more."

DOINGS IN PARIS.

THE annual meeting of the Académie Française took place in June. It reminded me of what is told of the representation of Aristophanes' Lysistrata—it was invaded by the fair sex, and the four-fifths of the seats occupied by them. The reason? you will ask. A sufficient one, you will allow, when I inform you that a lady has taken off the prize of poetry from thirty-five male competitors. The lady's name is Madame Louise Collet. The subject was Le Musée de Versailles. The laws of the academy do not permit a lady to read even her own verses, so that a proxy was to be found. M. Villermain performed the part; but his literary voice did not improve the lady's verses. She suffered grievously from the induction. The ladies were most enthusiastic in their applause; and it must be allowed that the composition, as a whole, is worthy of praise.

Menjaud, the representative of lovers at the Théâtre Français, took his benefit last week. Madlle. Rachel played in Bayezet, and Madlle. Mars in Les Passions Confinées. The beneficence played in the latter, as well as in the Originaire, taken from a piece of J. Fagan. The receipts amounted to twelve thousand francs. At the conclusion two bouquets were thrown on the stage. Madlle. Rachel took up one and presented it to Madame Menjaud, and kept the other to herself. Much controversy has arisen among her admirers as to the propriety of this act. I remember reading an anecdote of Madame de Staël, which seems something à propos. Talleyrand was seated between that lady and the beautiful Madame Recamier, when he exclaimed, "I am now between beauty and wit!" "Yes," said Madame de Staël, who was remarkably plain, "so you are, yet 'Madame Recamier is, in my opinion, pretty enough.' She had subjected to herself the attribute of beauty, well knowing that she could not be denied her. Various opinions arose at that period; it is said, on this saying of Madame de Staël. Some said she intended to award wit to the other lady, and thus pay her a compliment, whilst others maintained that nothing was farther from her intention. Madlle. Rachel is now in the same predicament. Who can decide what her intentions were? Men and was about to retire from the stage, but now he consents to remain three years longer. Babstine, jun., the most grave, and at the same time the most amusing actor of his day, has just departed from the earthly stage. He scarcely ever laughed, but his power over his audience was wonderful. He had a large, long face, and the very appearance of it was quite sufficient to put an audience in good-humour. I always thought that he laughed with his eyes only. He had arrived at his eightieth year, another proof that the theatrical profession is not an unhealthy one. Le Naufrage de la Méduse has been brought out at another theatre, the Renaissance, with extraordinary effect as an opera, the music being by Pilata and Flotow. The rift scene is wonderfully fine, and cost forty thousand francs. The actors were grouped after the famous picture of Hercault, at the Louvre. Many of the theatres have brought out little pieces ridiculing the exhibition of the products of French industry. They are generally but poorly written. Madlle. Nathan has been playing still more successfully than at first. She possesses a high soprano, and great execution. I was surprised at the swing frock with which she played Rachel in Le Juive, particularly as her predecessor was famous in the part. She will decidedly be an acquisition to the theatre.

At the ball given at the English embassy in honour of Queen Victoria's birthday, all the ladies came, according to her ladyship's ordinance, in white and pink costumes. This exhibition of the two tenderest colours presented not a few strange and amusing features. There are in Paris many very young and very lovely daughters of Albion, but our perfidious neighbour sends us some also who would pass for women of forty-five to seventy, if a woman would ever attain such an age. Now, one may easily conceive what an effect must have been produced by the ladies of this class wearing white trunks and covered with real roses, for everything artificial was banished from the British fete, and the flowers which bloomed in the morning were alone admitted at the embassy. Lord Granville had ingeniously thought that the birthday of a queen in the spring of her days could be celebrated but with vernal colours and flowers. As for the sumptuousness of the fête, it left nothing to be desired. As in all English assemblies of the same description, the ices, sorbets, cakes, and refreshments of all sorts were lavished with profusion; the supper was splendid, and the champagne overflowed.

As far as the season has yet gone, Paris must be pronounced dull. The concourse of strangers has been great during the last few days, but the brightness and gaiety which distinguish this capital are wanting. Perhaps we may have a change when the summer has fairly set in.

CREDULITY.—To distrust all, and believe all, is equally bad and erroneous; of the two, the safest is to distrust. For fear, if it be not immoderate, puts a guard about us that does watch and defend us; but credulity keeps us naked, and lays open to all the sly assaults of ill-intending men; it was a virtue when man was in his innocence; but since his fall, it abuses those that own it.—Pelham.

EXECUTION OF AN OPIUM-EATER.

The last accounts from China contain the following particulars of an execution:—"Desirous of witnessing this scene, says an eyewitness, I approached the mob, and in a quarter of an hour the Testang of Nidra arrived, and with him from fifty to sixty police runners. A few minutes after, the Yew-foo military officer from Casa Branca, the Heang-Shan-Hen-Min-foo of Casa Branca, came in totation, followed by the unfortunate culprit, in a bamboo cage, borne by the two executioners, and guarded by about one hundred of the imperial infantry. There were two matted bamboo sheds built up for this occasion, the distance between them being from thirty-five to forty yards. One of these sheds was furnished with chairs and tables, where the mandarins seated themselves, after having exchanged the customary civilities with one another; the other was the place for the execution, and was consequently fitted up in a less expensive style, containing merely a slight wooden cross about six feet in height, with a hole in the upper part immediately above the horizontal cross-piece. Three guns were fired as a signal to prepare for the execution of the culprit. With his arms and legs heavily loaded with shackles of iron, he was literally shaken out of the cage, a most pitiable-looking object, covered with filth, and so emaciated from an existence of four months in a Chinese prison, as to seem more dead than alive. He was dragged to the place of execution, and placed standing on a piece of brick, touching the cross with his back,—the executioners lashing a rope round his legs, under the arms, and then through the hole in the upper part of the cross, after which it was passed several times round his neck, and again through the hole. They then made use of a sick, resembling a long arrow, about five feet in length, which was woven through the loops of the cord, and twisted round several times for the purpose of tightening the rope, in order to effect strangulation. No apparent signal other than the removal of a piece of brick under the feet, was given for the fatal turning of the sick. The expression of the man's countenance did not change, nor was he observed to make any struggle. When he had been dead about ten minutes, the mandarins departed under a salute of three guns, and shortly afterwards the executioners followed, but not until they had fully assured themselves, by examination of his eyes and mouth, that he was dead. The body was to continue hanging on the cross for three days, as a spectacle and a warning to all dealers in opium and others, after which his friends would have permission to remove the body, on paying for the kept. The name of this unfortunate man was Kowk Ping. He kept a small shop for twenty years at Shale-wo, a village on the inner harbour, in the neighbourhood of the place of execution. He bore an excellent character among all those who had any dealings with him, and he was seized for having sold only a few balls or cakes of opium on account of another party. In the exaggerated report made by the viceroy to the emperor, these balls or cakes of opium were multiplied into as many scores of chests, and he was represented as being one of the largest dealers in the drug, and as residing, for the sake of security, in the secluded village above-named. Kowk Ping was forty-five years of age, and had left three wives and several children.

CONTRIVANCES OF ARTS.

A gentleman in the Island of St. Croix instituted several experiments with reference to ascertaining the truth of what he had often been told, of the ingenuity, and apparent reasonings of the art of that beautiful island. Having slain a centipede, which had been sent him by a friend, he laid it on the window-stool within his apartment where, though not a single individual of that mischievous race of vermin had been seen, to his great gratification, in the course of a few hours, one solitary ant suddenly made its appearance through a crevice in the casing, attracted, probably by the odour of the dead body. Shortly after, having surveyed the premises, it disappeared, but speedily returned, with a host of companions, to whom the discovery of a prize had unquestionably been communicated; a more careful survey of the magnitude of the object was evidently instituted, the whole company then disappeared simultaneously through the crack; but an army was put in requisition, for the third appearance was a multitude. Having mounted the carcass, examined minutely its exact position, and satisfied themselves that it was not a single individual of its kind, and that no danger would be incurred from their premeditated operations, a new and unlooked for series of labours were commenced, bearing such a striking analogy to human reason, as manifested in what is commonly called contrivance, that if there is no intelligence in it,—why, the metaphysicians have in reservation an unexplored field of observation. Not being able to move the mass entire, they divided themselves into platoons, and cut the body into portions of about half an inch in length, which was effectually and skilfully done, between a late hour in the afternoon and the following night, and each piece transported to their citadel, through some contiguous aperture, of sufficient diameter to allow the loads to pass. When the observer arose at daylight, every part had been carried away, but the head, which was really moving off towards the hole, surrounded by an immense concourse of admiring spectators, probably on the qui vive, happy in the delightful anticipation of future feasts and revellings. On further scrutiny, he found that the decapitated head was mounted on the backs of about a dozen bearers, who, like a Roman phalanx with a testudo upon their shoulders, were marching off in an orderly manner, towards the same office through which all the rest had disappeared.

ON THE ART OF WALKING.

A dancing-master's walk is, as compared to the march of the warrior, what a linen-drapers small-talk is to the sustained and burning eloquence of a distinguished senator, or what a little boy's whistle is to the breathing roar of a cathedral organ, or what a fashionable modern lyric is to the epic strength of a Dante, a Homer, or a Milton. The dancing-master, in fact, cannot be said to have any kind of walk at all. The progressive consists of a series of pickings of the earth with two long instruments something like men's legs—picking like those of a fowl with its beak when it is dining off the seeds which lie scattered about a farm-yard. Could not the reader swear to a dancing-master by his walk, in nine cases out of ten at all events? We are presumptuous enough to flatter ourselves that we could. And again did the reader ever encounter a sort of an "Im Sir Oracle" personage in the neighbourhood of the West End, about five feet ten or eleven in height, broad-chested, and of enormous proportions, having the aspect of a sort of perambulating human edifice, paddled along by the steam-engine power of his two arms, which worked up and down with all the nervous strength of a couple of Herculean pump-handles. The most immense idea that ever existed is the idea that that gentleman has of himself. Homer never had an idea half so big, nor Milton, nor Wordsworth, nor even Shakespeare. The Egyptian Pyramid is nothing to it in point of size; he lives in it, it forms his atmosphere as well as his tenement, he subsists on it; he is the vainest and most pompous of men, and all this is to be ascertained with the very least difficulty, and by the commonest discrimination, from the style in which he walks. His shuffling of his back, the sweeping carelessness of other people's convenience and comfort with which he swings his ostentatious arms, his vandy, elevated and pointed chin, the slight sideling of his backward-flung shoulders; the energetic straightness with which each leg tramps the pavement, the conviction he feels (as we learn from the satisfied curl of the lip, and the patronizing raising of the eyebrows) that all whom he passes are honouring themselves by beholding and admiring him; all these details of his outward aspect go to prove beyond a doubt that he is the vainest and the most pompous of living men, at all events that his vanity and pomposity cannot possibly be surpassed. Next comes the walk of a dandy—of your mere top, your fellow inventor merely as a showman for West End tailors, the creature of the ninth part of a man, and with an intellect not so comprehensive as a button-hole and an idiosyncrasy about as socially important as that of a house-fly—whose side-locks are his darling hopes, whose whiskers his consolation in the hour of trouble, whose mustache the object of his tenderest and most pleasurable caresses, who passes over his pantaloons and boots many hours of happy reflection, within the folds of whose coat lie all his happiest feelings, and who regards his walking-stick as the walking-stick of the universe. By all that is weak in man, what a walk hath this little human insect! With what a screwed expression of hurried disgust at the existence of such enormities in the world which he inhabits, does he pettishly pick his legs over that concentration of everything that is objectionable in aquatics! How anxiously, directly afterwards, does he investigate his boots and pantaloons, to see if one spot from that "dim'd puddle" has tarnished the black brilliancy of either of the former, or irreparably destroyed the perfect keystone of the latter! From the stunted depths of that tremendous puddle he looks down in him a mystery of two or three hours' duration. That puddle hath positively slaughtered, pro tem, the happiness of his existence: but put him among many puddles, and the "little, fluttering, foolish thing," is about as perfectly helpless as a fly in a basin of mock trout. And now, reader, do you not really think that as much dependence is to be placed on Walkington as an astrologer, or that more modern impostor on the public—Meteorology?

FACTS RESPECTING CLOUDS.

Mr. Monk Mason, who, it will be recollected, made an aerial excursion to Germany, dwells, in his Aeronautica, on the discovery, that clouds often appear in layers, with clear intervening horizontal spaces between them, and states, as a general rule, that wherever a fall of rain is present, and the sky is entirely overcast with clouds, "there will be invariably found to exist another stratum of the same bodies at a certain elevation above the former;" and, on the contrary, "whenever, with the same apparent condition of the sky, rain is altogether or generally absent, the aeronaut, upon traversing the canopy immediately above him, may indubitably calculate upon entering into an upper hemisphere, either perfectly cloudless, or so far destitute of such bodies as not much to interfere with the general character here bestowed upon it." This observation, which, independent of its value in other respects, is an addition to the stock of the meteorologist which he could never have obtained without the co-operation of the aeronaut, may be relied upon; it has been corroborated by the experience of Mr. Green, throughout a course of nearly two hundred and fifty ascents; and corroborated by that of various other aeronauts, both at home and abroad. * * * Varied as are the positions of the clouds, and the forms under which they present themselves, the station which they occupy in the realms of space is confined enough, and comparatively speaking, but little removed above the immediate surface of the earth itself. As a general rule, the natural region of the clouds may be stated to be a stratum of the atmosphere lying between the level of the first thousand feet, and that of one removed about ten thousand above it. Not but that, occasionally, clouds may be found that trespass very considerably on both sides of the bounds here assigned to them; sometimes penetrating in wreaths of mist to the depths of the lowest valleys, while, on the other hand, long after the aeronaut has passed the other level of these fancied limits, some faint indications of their existence may still be seen, partially obscuring the dark blue vault above him; such excesses, however, are by no means frequent, and may, in fact, rather be considered in the light of exceptions to a rule than as evidences tending to impugn its general correctness. * * * Should the condition of the sky prove to be of the nature of that alluded to (where, for instance, a dense layer of clouds completely intercept all view of the earth), the aeronaut will probably have an opportunity of observing another phenomenon connected with the disposition of the vapour strata, the beautiful manner in which even when under the influence of rapid motion, they seem to accommodate themselves to all the variation of form in the surface of the adjacent soil, rising with its prominences and sinking with its depressions; displaying, in short, a "counterfeit presentment" of the country over which they lie, and enabling the spectator to form, as it were, a sort of phrenological estimate of the character and disposition of the material world within. Indeed, I have heard Mr. Greene declare that with the bird's-eye knowledge of the country his long experience has conferred upon him, he has frequently been able to determine beforehand the district into which he was about to descend, at times when, from the general concealment of the landscape, such information must have been otherwise altogether unattainable.

INTERVALS BETWEEN MEALS.—As a general rule, an interval of from five to six hours should elapse between the meals; but this must, of course, vary according to circumstances, and depend upon the appetite. Persons engaged in business frequently do themselves much mischief, by disregarding its monitions, amidst the bustle and excitement of trade: after a time, it is true, the appetite subsides, but the necessity for food is not thereby removed. It is no unusual thing for a merchant to breakfast at eight o'clock in the morning, ride several miles to town, and return to dine in the evening between six and seven o'clock, without having, during all that time, eaten anything. This long fasting is injurious, and the subsequent full meals still more so. In such cases a luncheon ought certainly to be taken.—London Medical Journal.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE SEVENTH PLAGUE OF EGYPT.

BY REV. GEORGE CROLY.

"Twas noon—the rising splendour roll'd
On marble towers and roofs of gold;
Hall, court, and gallery below,
Were crowded with a living flow;
Egyptian, Arab, Nubian there,
The bearers of the bow and spear;
The hourly priest, the Chaldean sage,
The slave, the gemm'd and glittering page—
Helm, turban, and uara, shone
A dazzling ring round Pharaoh's throne.

There came a man—the human tide
Shrank backward from his stately stride;
His cheek with storm and time was tann'd;
A shepherd's staff was in his hand;
A shudder of instinctive fear
Told the dark king what step was near.
On through the host the stranger came,
It parted round his form like flame.

He stoop'd not at the footstool stone,
He clasp'd not sandal, kiss'd not throne;
Erect he stood amid the ring,
His only words—"Be just, O King!"
On Pharaoh's cheek the blood flush'd high,
A fire was in his sullen eye;
Yet on the Chief of Israel
No arrow of his thousands fell!
All mute and motionless as the grave
Stood chill'd the satrap and the slave.

"Thou'rt come," at length the monarch spoke;
Haughty and high the words outbreak:
"Is Israel weary of its lair,
The forehead peep'd, the shoulder bare?
'Take back the answer to your hand:
Go, reap the wind; go, plough the sand;
Go, vilest of the living vile,
To build the never-ending pile,
Till, darkest of the nameless dead,
The vulture on their flesh is fed.
What better asks the howling slave
Than the base life our bounty gave?"

Shouted in pride the turban'd peers;
Upland, and the golden spears,
"King! thou and time are doom'd!—Behold!"
The prophet spoke—"The thunder roll'd;
Along the pathway of the sun
Sail'd vapoury mountains, wild and dun.
'Yet there is time," the prophet said—
He raised his staff, the storm was stay'd.
"King! be the word of freedom given—
What art thou, man, to war with heaven?"

There came no word.—The thunder broke!
Like a huge city's final smoke,
Thick, lurid, suffing, mix'd with flame,
Through court and hall the vapour's came.
Loose as the stubble in the field,
Wide flew the men of spear and shield;
Scatter'd like foam along the wave,
Flew the proud pageant, prince and slave;
Or, in the chains of terror bound,
Lay, corpse-like, on the smouldering ground.
"Speak, king!—the wrath is but begun—
Still dumb!—Then, heaven, thy will be done!"

Echoed from earth a hollow roar,
Like Ocean on the midnight shore;
A sheet of lightning o'er them wheel'd,
The solid ground beneath them reel'd;
In dust sank roof and battlement;
Like webs the giant walls were rent;
Red, broad, before his startled gaze,
The monarch saw his Egypt blaze.
Still swell'd the plague—the flame grew pale;
Burst from the clouds the charge of hail;
With arrow keenness, iron weight,
Down pour'd the ministers of fate;
Fill man and cattle, crush'd, congeal'd,
Cover'd with death the boundless field.

Still swell'd the plague—prose the blast,
The avenger, fit to be the last;
On ocean, river, forest, vale,
Thunder'd at once the mighty gale.
Before the whirlwind roar'd the sea;
A thousand spears were on the wave—
Where are they!—Ask that foaming grave!
Down go the hope, the pride of years,
Down go the myriad mariners;
The riches of Earth's richest zone,
Gone! like a flash of lightning, gone!

And, lo! that first fierce triumph o'er,
Swell'd Ocean on the shrinking shore;
Still onward, onward, dark and wide,
Engulf'd the land the furious tide.
Then bow'd thy spirit, stubborn king,
Thou serpent, reft of fang and sting;
Humbled, before the prophet's knee,
He groan'd, "Be injured Israel free."

To heaven the sage uprais'd the wand;
Back roll'd the deluge from the land;
Back to its caverns sank the gale,
Fled from the noon the vapour pale;
Broad burn'd again the joyous sun;
The hour of wrath and death was done.

RUNAWAY BALLADS.

BY G. W. HOLMES.

NO I.

After the manner of the olden time.

WAKE from thy slumbers, Isabel, the stars are in the sky,
And night has hung her silver lamp, to light our altar by;
The flowers have closed their fading leaves, and droop upon the plain,
O wake! thee, and their dying hues shall blush to life again.

In such a sacred hour as this, how beams the eye of love,
When all is mellowed shade below, and all is light above!
And oh, how soft a maiden's sigh melts on the midnight air,
When scarce a wanton zephyr breathes, to wave her silken hair!

The rattle of the soldier's steel has left the silent hall,
The mastiff slumbers at the gate, the sentry on the wall;
And there, by many a stately barge, that rocks upon the tide,
A bark is floating on the wave, and dancing at their side.

And when before the flowing wind she spreads her eagle wings,
And like a halcyon from her breast the shivered billow flings,
Though many a proud pendant flies before the ocean breeze,
No keel can track her foaming path, that sweeps the sparkling seas.

Then come to me, my lovely one, and haste we far away,
And we will reach the distant isle before the break of day;
Let not thy gentle eye grow dim, thy rosy cheek grow pale,
For thou shalt find a beating heart beneath a warrior's mail.

NO II.

After the manner of the modern time.

Get up! get up! Miss Polly Jones, the tandem's at the door;
Get up, and shake your lovely bones, it's twelve o'clock and more;
The chaises they have rattled by, and nothing ails around,
And all the world, save you and I, are snoring safe and sound.

I broke a drunken watchman's nap, and he began to mutter,
I gave him just a gentle tap that helped him to the gutter;
The cur-dog growled an ugly growl and grinned a bitter grin,
I tipped the beast a ratsbane pill, 'to keep his music in.

When Squaresome stumps about the house, and doesn't find you there,
And all the folks are in a touse, my eyes! how did we stare!
He locked and double locked the door, and saw you safe abroad,
And never dreamed a jailer's paw would scratch a booby's head.

Come, hurry! hurry! Polly Jones, it is no time to snooze,
Don't stop for a quarter petticoat, nor fidget for your shoes;
I have a quilted wrapper here, your tender limbs to fold,
It's growing mighty chilly, dear, and I shall catch a cold!

I've got my gony uncle's bay, and trotting Peggy too,
I've lashed their trapes with oats and hay, and now for love and you;
The lash is curling in the air, and I am at your side,
To-morrow you are Mrs. Snaggs, my bold and blooming bride.

ORIGINAL TALES.

QUITE A PRETTY PROPERTY.

BY HENRY STANHOPE LEE.

CHAPTER I.

Maiden curiosity and maternal prudence.

"Why, mother, what can you find so agreeable in Harry Singleton?"

Mary Milson was half afraid to ask the question, but as she sat crumpling a most voluptuous rose, and scattering its leaves about the ottoman, in momentary expectation of my friend's approach, she was disposed to extract from the reflective good sense of her mother a sufficient apology for falling desperately in love.

"Why, my dear, how can you ask the question? Didn't you observe the very marked attention that was paid him at Madame La Mode's last evening? Young gentlemen don't receive such attentions in that quarter, let me tell you, unless there is good reason for it. Everybody is delighted with him."

"But, mother, you would really oblige me by giving me your own opinion. Just analyze his good qualities for me, as I am sure I should never have patience to do it for myself. As papa says, you must tie a bill of particulars, if you wish to bring his case before the court of Hyems."

"He is very handsome, to begin with; and the best dressed gentleman in our society."

"True enough, and he shares these merits with Mr. Spencer; and yet the man never indulged a reflection, deeper than the surface of his looking-glass."

"Then he is very well educated—he graduated at Harvard, with the highest honours, and was considered the most promising young man of his day."

"Yes, and so was Tom Morris; and I'll venture to say that the big wig of the Med Facer never covered another such blockhead. I am tired of these college prodigies; they are always dunces."

"Then he rides well, dances well, and plays a most delightful game of chess."

"He can't dance like Papanti, nor ride like the man at the circus, nor play chess like the automaton."

"Then, in addition to all this, my dear, though this is a very secondary consideration, Mr. Singleton is a young man of quite a pretty property."

Mary looked inquisitively, and unconsciously repeated, "quite-a-pretty-property?"

"Yes, my child, a very pretty property; not enough, certainly, to make him an object, but enough to make him very comfortable for a family."

Mary acquiesced in silence. She was much too indolent and too diffident to argue the point with her mother; but she could now divine the charm by which Mr. Singleton was such an universal favourite, with so many gay mammas, rejoicing in marriageable daughters.

CHAPTER II.

A grammar college.

Harry Singleton was left an orphan at an early age, and passed through college with the reputation of possessing a "very pretty property." This, of course, brought him up at the end of his term, with a liberal circulation of floating bills for liquors had and received; an uncertain amount of stable scores of long standing; and a few quires of tailor's accounts, commencing with a pretty picture and flourish, and winding up with "Received payment," indicative of hope on the part of Ship, rather than fruition. Now, if Harry had not been heir to a pretty property, he would have passed soberly enough, perhaps, through his college course, and have been able to snap his fingers at tailors, stablemen, and taverners.

Harry, however, was a man of business; and assuming up all his courage with his bills, he wrote a very amiable billet-doux to his guardian of the following tenor:

Cambridge, August 10th, 18—.

MY DEAR GUARDY AND UNCLE. Enclosed are a few curiosities, of which I desire your acceptance. They are the autographs of some of the most distinguished men of the craft in our three cities. You will find here the handwritings of the Watson, who has done more for the fame of Philadelphia than her Girards and Biddles; of Wheeler, whose science has astonished the old world, and proved that American coats will find their way where American books have not yet penetrated; of Cutler, too—"the lost, the lamented"—whom Boston yet mourns, and of whom it may with truth be said that the present age knows not his equal, antiquity cannot point to his superior. All these interesting specimens of chirography, with some clerical correspondence annexed, are very much at your service, and you will oblige me by defraying at your earliest convenience the expenses that have accrued in their collection. Many of them must assume an additional interest, in your eyes, from the fact that they have been so long in my possession. Very truly, my dear uncle, your affectionate nephew,

HARRY SINGLETON.

In reply to this affectionate epistle, Harry received a day or two afterwards the following note, which closed for the time the correspondence.

Boston, August 11, 18—.

MY DEAR WARD—I have received your note and the accompanying manuscripts, and find that the expense of collection has been little short of six thousand dollars. I do not think that you can afford to indulge your passion for autographs at such a sacrifice. It has anticipated the probable income of your property some two years. I regret exceedingly the indiscretions that will compel me to part with a portion of your stocks to redeem your credit. Your property is really a pretty one, and a part of it very capable of improvement; and if you will only husband it, you may be quite easy in your circumstances. But your own good sense must teach you the end of such thoughtless follies as you seem inclined to indulge. Your affectionate uncle.

T S

"Hang this pretty property," said Harry. "Husband it—or wive it—there are two ways, thank heaven, if I am not ruined in advance. Why the deuce couldn't I have been born to a pair of hands, or to something worth having?"

CHAPTER III.

Tramping for the bar.

Of course, there is only one path for an educated and ambitious young man in this country, with a pretty property; say Harry entered his name in the office of the celebrated Mr. W. as a student at law. By the end of his third year he had read Blackstone entire, with the exception of some twenty chapters, which are popularly esteemed among students as unnecessary to professional accomplishment. With the assistance of a clerk he had filled half a dozen writs; and had actually hunted up the title to a piece of his own property in the Registry-office.

To complete his education, he defied in the police court a dove-eyed, interesting young lady, accused of stealing a roll of blue ribbon, to "tie up her bonny brown hair." Harry's speech was a model of police eloquence, and it would have melted Recorder Riker to tears. Judge S was made of sterner stuff; and though the young advocate was ready to pledge his "life, his fortune, and his sacred honour" for the innocence of his client, the result was a mitimus for three months to the House of Correction.

His summers he killed, of course, at Nahant, Newport, and Niagara; for what young man of pretty property could be expected to study his profession anywhere else during the hot weather? One of his three winters, he dawdled away in New-Orleans and Charleston, and another he shivered and waltzed away among the lions and lionesses of Washington. Northern winters kill students, and his health required the sacrifice. All this was merely incidental to the main business of his life, the mastery of the law.

While at home, he dined daily at Gallagher's—for mine host of the old Stackpole mansion was still alive, and there was the wherewithal in his cellar and larder to tickle a subtler palate than that of Harry Singleton. The early hours of his evenings he loitered away at the theatre, and the close at some ball or party, where he was in the highest feather with mothers of interesting misses, for his agreeable chat and pretty property.

Thus Harry passed very creditably through the preparatory period of his profession. His display at the police-court had been pronounced, unanimously, by the constables in attendance, the most brilliant débat ever witnessed before that tribunal. For the inconceivable sum of three dollars and fifty cents, paid to the clerk of the court, and on the due administration of the oath, he became a member of the bar; filled a few shelves with such oracles of the profession as Shakespeare and Sir Walter Scott, raised a tin-plate, issued a card; and with foils, boxing-gloves, a looking-glass, well-stuffed rocking-chairs for friends, and a straight-backed, hard-bottomed settee for clients, opened an office for the practice of law! It was thus that he expected to pay the debt which, ages tell us, every man owes to his profession.

Such was Harry's "position" at the epoch of his introduction to our readers.

CHAPTER IV.

Springes to catch woodcocks.

Mary Milson was, by reputation, a pulseless coquette—without soul-soil enough for the growth of an affection. She was esteemed cold, artful, and selfish; but was beautiful as a rose, and fly-like in much else besides neither toling nor spinning. Among half a dozen sisters, pretty creatures all, and with no "inconsiderable expectations," Mary was by far the loveliest. Her mother was a woman of the world, and the daughter and mother were regarded as well worthy of each other. The good lady had fixed her eye upon Harry Singleton, and had resolved that he should be the husband of Mary, or Rose, or Susan, or Ninette, or Lavina, or Desdemona—she did not much care which. So stood matters at the raising of our curtain, and we will now shift the scene back again to the parlour of Mrs. Milson.

Mary had by this time completely demolished the rose, and was reclining in a semi-dozed upon the sofa, when Harry Singleton entered. It was about the proper time for a morning call. Mrs. Milson was gloved and bonneted, and ready with her card-case, as if in the act of sallying out to go the rounds.

"Mr. Singleton," says the good lady of the house, "you are just in season to be my gallant. I shall claim the right of your arm for the next hour, and shall reward you by an introduction to the sweetest girl in the city, a black-eyed Georgian, with a whole county for a plantation, and always enough for an army."

"My pleasures seem to conflict," replied Harry, casting a glance towards the sofa. "Is not Miss Milson to be of the party?"

"Mary, my love, ring for your bonnet—but, no matter—there is not time. I shall return in half an hour, and if Mary will amuse you while I am gone, Clara Wells shall return with me. She is a dear little creature—a niece of mine—and I am resolved you shall have that plantation."

"With an eye to the plantation, then," said Harry, laughing. "I will remain. Since you leave me in such agreeable custody, Mrs. Milson, and with so brilliant a prospect, you will not think it necessary to exact bonds for my appearance on your return."

"You have really made a prisoner of Mr. Singleton, mother, he is hardly left a free agent. Clara spends the evening with us to-morrow, and we shall be very happy to see Mr. Singleton, if he will favour us with his company."

"Mr. Singleton, you shall see this niece of mine before you sleep. She is not pretty; but she is a charming, sweet, sensible girl, and rich as a princess. I have known you too long to make a stranger of you, and though not given to match-making, I am more than half tempted to make a trial for both your sakes."

"I am most happy to be the object acted upon," replied Harry; and Mrs. Milson left the apartment. She was satisfied of two things. Harry had permission to wait her return; this would afford an excuse and opportunity for a tête-à-tête, which she could prolong to as late an hour as she might deem judicious. Again, she had turned his thoughts to Clara Wells and matrimony, and could manoeuvre on this pretence to bring Harry and her daughter together. And the plain but wealthy Clara Wells would make a capital foil for the beautiful Mary Milson. She knew that a spark had been kindled in Harry's heart, and she now only desired occasion to blow it into a flame.

ORIGINAL LETTERS FROM ENGLAND.

LONDON AND ITS VICINITY.

London—A new feature—Spring—Panorama of New-York—Reminiscences.

MY DEAR —. After an absence of some time, I am again in London, and will write to you, when I find leisure to look around me, about such matters, literary, theatrical, political, and miscellaneous, as may occur, likely to prove interesting to you.

Every one who enters London, even if it be for the twentieth time, thinks it necessary to say something of the innumerable streets, the endless, interminable, and bewildering rows of gas-lamps, and the unceasing fermentation which is continually going on amid the immense and restless population of the modern Babylon, and to express his wonder thereat. I will spare you all this, taking it for granted that you have had a sufficiency of foreign correspondence to enlighten you amply about those matters.—New-York itself, I suppose, by this time, will afford a pretty fair sample of bustle, streets, and gas-light.

But this time I approached London by sea from the northward, and certainly I was somewhat struck, in sailing along the coast, to perceive the endless succession of vessels, with sooty rather than snowy wings, coming from and speeding to, the mammoth city. At one point of our journey there was not less than between two and three hundred sail in sight at one time. It was a fine clear evening, and, as far as the eye could discern, the sea was overpread with ships, some laden like pack-horses, and tacking and contending with an adverse wind to reach the great mart with their burdens—coals; others light, and flying before the wind back to the inexhaustible mines of the north for a fresh supply. And when I reflected that this went on unceasingly—day after day, week after week, month after month, and year after year—and that this immense investment of capital, and employment of labour—this constant exertion of human ingenuity, skill, industry, and enterprise was all directed to one simple end—the supplying of one single city with one single article—the aforesaid coals, it certainly struck me as a new feature; a something I had not taken into account before, in my previous estimations of London's extent and vastness.

The spring this year is really and truly spring; not a mockery and a delusion, a compound of the worst parts of autumn and winter as it has been for some seasons past, but the mild, genial, Edenian weather we read of in the British Classics. Women and fruit-trees look beautiful, and rhymsters are mending their pens and looking out of the windows for inspiration. To avail one's self of the phraseology of the almanac—"There will be much poetry about this time." But so variable is the climate that even when I am writing, perhaps an easterly wind, laden with fog from the marshes and mud-banks of Holland, is on its way to blight the trees and give the women of London's extent and vastness.

Went to see a panorama of New-York. Was pleased, yet disappointed. The views did not come up to my expectations and reminiscences. Besides, the artist had committed a capital fault in not giving the finest view that pencil could have been employed upon—the peculiarly striking and picturesque approach from the Narrows to the "Queen of the West"—I may be allowed to apply a monarchial compliment without hurt or detriment to your republican feelings. The views of the interior of the city were faithful enough, as far as they went. True, the panting, as Fanny Kemble says, "There was naught," but then, the associations! There was Wall-street, where I used to invest my money; and Park-row where I used to spend it! There was the City-hall, with the terror of evil-doers, grim Bridewell, in the distance—and tender thoughts of Jacob Hays stole pensively into my mind. There was that noble triumph of architecture, the Park theatre! But shall I speak slightly of these, old friend, because they face in place, thy exterior homely? Forbid it, gratitude—forbid it, pleasant remembrances—forbid it, distance! For what says the song—

"Absence makes the heart grow tender—
Shade of Richings, fare thee well!"

By the way, whenever I meet a copy of the Mirror, it is sadly sent of theatrical criticism. "Say, why is this, wherefore, how should this be?" There is no record or mention of old favourites; Hilson, I know, is dead; does Barnes no longer take pleasant liberties and sing "Barney leave the girls alone, 'on new-year's eve!" Have Piccadilly and Mrs. Wheatley become shadows—dreams? Is Peter Richings, the historic Hercules, "Peter the Great," no longer? Has his innocent pride in a cap and plume for ever passed away? Is stately Mrs. Sharpe, and gentle Mrs. Hilson, stately and gentle no more? Are the blood-thirsty propensities of Woodhall at length quelled; and hushed for aye the melody of Simpson's tones? Forgive these queries, but everything about New-York interests me so strongly. I went to Covent-Garden two or three seasons ago, to see Macready and Collett! Collett, the man funbus on a time at the Park for enacting murderers, dancing hompicks, and, above all, for making bows. He played on this occasion, as was indeed his wont, a subordinate part, and bowed as he retired from the presence of his stage superiors. That bow! Byron rhymes something about things trivial in themselves (I quote from memory)—

"A word, a sound,
Striking the electric chain wherewith we are strongly bound."

That bow annihilated time and space, confounded the present with the past, and transported me over four thousand miles of weltering water! I was again in Park-row.

But to return to the Panorama. The view changed, the band playing "yankee doodle" the while—they never think of those things here—and I was looking down Broadway. There was St. Paul's, and old Trinity, the City-Hotel, and the Franklin; and oh! unwonted sight, a flock of sheep driving into Maiden-Lane, imparting quite a pastoral character to that celebrated mart for dry-goods. But there was no view of the Battery! or, at best, it was so "dim and distant" as to be scarcely recognizable or distinguishable from any other place, even with the help of fancy and the aid of recollection, and with that disappointment I came away.

Indifferent as the sight was, however, believe me, I would not have missed it for a trifle.

Excuse the too frequent use of the personal pronoun, and, indeed, the altogether gossiping and egotistical tone of this epistle, and, with the kindest remembrance to all who yet remember your "London correspondent," for the present, adieu. O.

THE ENGLISH CABS.

The following extract of a letter from London contains some valuable hints to such persons as wish "to turn an honest penny:" "The cabs, or, as they are briefly called, 'cabs,' are of the greatest convenience in this vast metropolis. They are now of various shapes and colours, but nearly all well adapted for rapid and cheap conveyance. The charge is little more than half that of the hackney-coaches, which are fast disappearing from the successful opposition to their mail-like pace and extravagant charge. 'Hansom's patent cabs' are most patronized, on account of their easy motion and safety. They are very singular in appearance, and rather awkward looking; but admirably suited for comfort to the rider. I cannot imagine the reason that these conveyances are not introduced in New-York. Paris, here, and most large European cities have them—then why not New-York? The impertinence and extortion practised by the drivers of hackney-carriages there would be checked, if not stopped, by adopting the Parisian regulation of having a list of the fares—from a particular part of the city to others, placed in the vehicle. This should be enforced, for the conduct of these men is so disgraceful to strangers, that it becomes an imperative duty to put an end to the outrage. If some one would undertake the scheme of starting cabriolets in New-York, with strict and good rules, he would merit the thanks of his fellow-citizens, and, I am certain, reap a splendid harvest. Give my opinion to that spirited, speculative genius, Niblo."

SPIRIT OF THE PARISIAN JOURNALS.

NOVELTIES FROM THE FRENCH.

Translated for the New-York Mirror.

RAILROADS.

UNDER the interesting title of "Railroads considered with reference to Gastronomy," a Parisian author discourses most learnedly on the influence of railroads on gastronomy, a subject of the first importance, and one that has been strangely neglected. Thus saith our philosopher—"If railroads are called to exercise an immense influence on politics, if they are destined to hasten the march of civilization, they must likewise act most officiously on gastronomy. This view of the matter will cause a smile on the faces of those men who have not been gifted by nature with an organization sufficiently delicate to enable them to appreciate an exquisite dish, of those ignorant philosophers, who, with all their acquirements, have not yet learned to consider the science of eating in its relations to that of political economy, and the immense services it renders to agriculture and commerce. It is gastronomy that, as Brillat Savarin expresses it, respects men and things, in order to import from one country to another all that deserves to be known; it is the common bond that unites town and country, nation and nation, which makes of Paris an abridgement of the globe, where every thing agreeable that it contains is brought together. A fact not sufficient by noticed by historians and economists is, that gastronomy has really brought about the most important commercial revolution of modern times; it was she that established permanent relations between the two worlds, and transports from one pole to the other sugars, coffee, spices, wines, oranges, yea, even eggs and peas. Without gastronomy, sugar would still have remained a medicine, and the discovery of America have led to no results! Gastronomy is destined to do as much for railroads as it has done for commerce. Commerce transports only such articles as can be preserved, while railroads bring in those which must be devoured in the spring-time of their freshness. Commerce furnishes only those colonial products which serve for the seasoning and edification of our repast, but form no repast in themselves, while railroads will bring to our doors those substantial materials which afford nourishment to the famer as well as pleasure to the palate; fresh game, fresh fish, fresh fruit and vegetables. We must be satisfied now with fish some days old, with milk manufactured in town, and with fruits that ripen in our cold north. All this is to be changed. But let us leave these generalities, delightful as they are, and confine ourselves to positive facts.

It will be logical to commence our gastronomic observations with oysters, a necessary preface to every satisfactory dinner. We now get these precious morsels by cars, which make six hundred trips each way a year. But, alas! whatever be the speed of the horses, their freight always suffers more or less from its fatiguing journey. But, by means of railroads, we can obtain oysters in all their verdure, as soon as their education is completed. To let you appreciate the importance of this mollux, it may be well to state that the consumption of oysters has increased one-third in Paris in ten years. Paris now swallows six million dozen of oysters annually, or about seven dozens for each individual. Oysters, for which we pay ten or twelve sous the dozen, are sold wholesale for five, so that the prices double before they reach the consumer. The reflections we have taken the liberty of presenting on the subject of oysters, will apply equally well to most of the departments of fish. Sea fish are not transmitted in any appreciable quantity to a greater distance from the shore than twenty-five or thirty leagues. The only exception to this law is in favour of Paris. The article of fish has now a regularly organized system of conveyance. Who has not seen those huge wagons covered with straw, that pass through our streets on a trot, and exhale an odor which may often raise legitimate doubts as to the quality of their contents? Two-thirds of the fish consumed in Paris come from Boulogne and Dunkirk, the other third from the coast of Normandy. Our salmon are forwarded from Rotterdam, via Antwerp. Thus it will be seen that the great lines of railroad, most loudly called for by the commercial community, are likewise those which will most largely promote the interests of the piscivorous amateur. It is our interest to cultivate the friendship of England and Belgium, if we want to have our fish fresh and cheap. The middling and lower classes consume a larger proportion of fish than is generally supposed. Paris consumes annually six million kilogrammes, (the kilogramme is about two pounds), of fish, at an average of eight sous per pound at wholesale.

The retail price will average twelve sous, about the same as meat of middling quality. Thus, though the alimentive qualities of a pound of fish are far less than those of a pound of meat, people in moderate circumstances may indulge in it from time to time to vary their diet. The annual consumption of fish is about fifteen pounds per head, and two-thirds of the quantity sold is made up of herring, mackerel, and other cheap and common kinds. Supposing the fish disposed of, let us proceed to poultry. Game is unfortunately as costly as delightful, and the poor are deprived almost wholly of its enjoyment. The annual consumption of birds of all kinds in Paris is supposed to amount to about eight millions of francs. The greater part of these are chickens, turkeys and pigeons. There are sold in a year only one hundred and thirty-one thousand partridges, seventy-seven thousand rabbits and twenty-nine thousand hares. It will be seen that game still continues a luxury of the aristocrat; it is for railroads to popularize it. Of eggs, the metropolis consumes seventy-five millions per annum; of milk, thirty-six million litres, (the litre is nearly a quart); twenty-three million pounds of butter. But might we not have a purer and more creamy milk than we are now forced to swallow? And to turn to fruits. Why should we not see the fig of Marseilles, and the apricot of Auvergne alongside of the peaches of Montreuil and the grapes of Fontainebleau? Thus are railroads destined to enlarge the domain of gastronomy. The Parisian epicure will extend his conquests far and wide; his digestive powers will reach their acme, and he will luxuriate in enjoyments from which he seemed to be cut off for ever. It is true, as Brillat Savarin asserts, that the fate of a nation depends on the way in which it is fed, what may not be the destiny of Paris, placed in the centre of a net of railroads, that bring within reach of its cupboards the riches of England, Germany and the Mediterranean? But not Paris alone, but the whole of France, will be enlarged in the sphere of its enjoyment; fertilized and enriched. It opens to us project of universal happiness of a gastronomic utopia.

SINGULAR RENCONTRE.

"You are about to become one of our neighbours. I see, sir!" "Yes, sir." "I am very happy to hear it. I like to meet gentlemen so amiable as you seem to be." "Sir, you are too kind. I am a stranger to you, and—?" "No matter, I am a physiognomist, and am seldom mistaken." "I thank you for the good opinion you have been pleased to form of me; but excuse me, my furniture is coming in, and I must see to arranging it." "Do not inconvenience yourself! if you will allow me, I will assist you, as I have nothing whatever to do." The person who spoke thus was a little man of fifty, with a lively and open countenance; the person he addressed, M. N., who was about taking possession of apartments he had hired in the Rue St. Honoré. The officious neighbour accompanied his new acquaintance to his rooms, where they found the furniture heaped up in most admired disorder. Near the window was a stand, on which a number of little articles had been placed; among them a pile of old cards of address, on which M. N.'s name was written in a very large hand. The neighbour took one of them up mechanically, and seemed all at once to be very much troubled. "What is the matter," said M. N.; "that is my name on those cards." "Ah, yes—very well," rejoined the other, flinging the card away, as though it burnt his fingers. "Why, do you know me?" asked M. N. "Not at all," said his neighbour. "Oh heavens, I shall faint!" And, in fact, he grew very pale, and his knees bent under him. M. N. hastened to his aid, placed him in a chair, and went for a glass of water. When he returned, what was his surprise when his guest threw himself on his knees, and said in a contrite tone—"Sir, I am a villain, and must make you immediate retribution." "How so," said the other, "this is the first time I have ever seen you; at any rate, choose a more seemly posture, and let us talk the matter over calmly." "You treat me with too much kindness; but pray preserve that feeling for me till you have heard all, for I shall need it. Did you not go to Marseilles in 1823?" "I did." "Did anything happen to you on your journey?" "I lost in a hotel at Lyons a portfolio with fourteen thousand francs in bank bills. All the inquiries I made were fruitless, but I have always thought that the people of the house took it." "You are mistaken, I stole it." "What!" "Yes, I; but let me tell you how it happened. I was in business at that time, but bankrupt, and in desperate circumstances. At Lyons, I lodged in a room alongside the one you occupied and which you had just left. Just as I was leaving, I found that I had forgotten some papers, and went up stairs for them. Our rooms joined each other, were of the same size, and furnished alike, so that I mistook yours for my own. I did not see my papers, but found your portfolio, which you had left in a closet. What shall I say! Instead of returning you the property, which I could easily have done, for your address was written on it, I made use of it to relieve myself from my troubles. My little golden guinea prospered so well in my hands, that I have paid my debts and made some money. I have been a thousand times on the point of restoring you your money, but false shame prevented me. But now that chance has brought us together, I have only to say, that your money is at your service with legal interest, and I can but humble myself before you, and beg of you to pardon my villainy." While saying this, he made another effort to throw himself at M. N.'s feet, but the latter hastened to give him his hand in sign of forgiveness. He would not even take any interest, but merely the original sum stolen.

NEW TITLES FOR JOURNALS.

A literary paper has appeared at Munich, under the name of (Therblatter); tea-leaves; and another at Brussels, called the Blue Sticking.

THE TWO ROTHSCHILDS.

A German paper informs us that "a Jew of the name of Joseph Rothschild was engaged in business at Pesth, (Hungary). His little shop brought him in nothing, his wife was on the point of presenting him with an infant, and went stared him in the face. Finding that he could do nothing at home to relieve, his family, he determined to go to Vienna, and endeavour to obtain goods on credit from his brethren. Two days after his departure, a fine boy saw the light, but its poor mother was almost starving. In her extremity she wrote to her husband, begging him to return at once, and not knowing where to direct her letter, addressed it simply to Joseph Rothschild, Vienna. Chance, which often does so much harm, did great good this time. The letter was taken to Rothschild the banker, who had no sooner read it, than he sent the poor woman a bill for a hundred florins, and then ordered the other Dromio Joseph Rothschild of Pesth, to be searched for. He was soon found, and made his appearance in the great banker's palace, not without fear and trembling. The financier received him kindly, and congratulated him on having become a father. The poor fellow was mute with surprise, till his namesake handed him his wife's letter, and added—"You must have a godfather: choose me, and do not be uneasy as to the future fortunes of the young gentleman, I will provide for him." A liberal gratuity completed the good work. Many more such incidents might be told of Mr. Rothschild.

CANDIDATES FOR OFFICE.

The French Department of Justice is besieged by candidates soliciting the rather odious post of chief executioner, which is now vacant. The usage is to grant this disgusting office only to members of a family already in the profession. The salary is ten thousand francs, besides which, the Paris official receives an additional ten thousand for the expenses of scaffolds, etc. Of the unprofessional applicants for the office, it is observed that the great majority are from professions that familiarize men with blood, butchers, medical students, and old soldiers. The patent of nomination of an Executioner-General never receives the signature of the minister, but only of a clerk.

GREAT CROP OF LITERATURE.

This year's crop of books, says a French journal, promises to be the most abundant, if not the most excellent ever known. In the first quarter of 1839, no less than one thousand new works were published, of which four hundred were in French, two hundred and twenty in Italian, one hundred and seventy-two English, one hundred and eighteen German, forty-eight in Spanish, forty in Latin, and one hundred and ten in other languages.

A KING'S PRIVY PURSE.

We learn from Rome, that Don Miguel, while hunting near Nebtuno, was attacked and robbed by six persons in disguise, his suite, his valet and coachman were seized with such tenour at their approach as to offer no resistance, but the prince defended himself bravely till he fell, overpowered by numbers and severely wounded in the neck. The brigands were much astonished at finding in a king's purse only a few crowns and a silver watch, while his servants had plenty of gold, and gold watches.

CARRIAGES IN PARIS.

Great complaints are making in Paris of the crowds of vehicles that block up the streets. This is not surprising, for while in 1815 there were only fifteen thousand in Paris, the number is now quadrupled, being no less than sixty-one thousand in 1838, viz.: cabriolets, hackney-coaches, diligences, and omnibuses, twenty thousand; cabs, etc. thirty-eight thousand; private and livery carriages, six thousand.

HINDOO LITERATURE.

The Ibad has lately been translated into Sanscrit. Besides, a Sanscrit translation of Euclid's Elements has recently been discovered, which is supposed to be at least six hundred years old.

THEATRICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM THE SIAM MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.
COLLEY CIBBER, JR. Park Theatre, June, 1839.

DEAR SIR—We never had the pleasure of an acquaintance, either proximate, or remote, with your august sire, but, from our ripening love and affection for you, we assure you that he would have held no minor place in the catalogue of our affections. Were it not for "one peculiar position," the particulars of which you will glean from the context, we would insist upon offering you the honour of a serenade. We are not, it is presumed, considered as any "great shakes" in the list of Mr. Manager Simpson's wealth, nor are we very noisy on the nights of performance, except by implication, yet I assure you, as relatives, though several degrees removed, we claim to be as inharmonious and irritable as any other members of the great musical family. As we are seldom allowed to make a noise, we desire on this occasion to be heard. We generally perform musical parts in a most unaccountably silent manner, and, like great men in the world, we perform our labour by proxy, being evidently destined for the same great and noble aim, as the mustached fellow who will occupy the hand stage-box, that is, to make an empty show. We are not unlike the razors of a celebrated hero of an epic poem, one Peter Pindar, which were made to sell; the difference is, we were made to go.

Our numerical force is sufficiently large and our variety sufficiently great, to stock a respectable orchestra, were it not that we are like the watchful sentinels of an eastern harem, mute. We may bear and see, but to shame the nightingale or enrage the goldfinch by our tuneless lays, is not within our power. Roughly shaped by the hands of Mr. —, carpenter to the theatre, we are expected to do as much as instruments of the finest workmanship and finest finish. Were our misfortunes our own, without a murmur would we bear them, but think of the unfortunate wight who brings us on the stage! Behold Mr. Jones (a most excellent man, by the way, permit us to blow just this one puff) as the Prince in Cinderella, he puts an apparent horn to his lips, and goes through with all the motions and contortions of a Norton or Gambatti, puffs out his cheeks, gets crimson in the face, and persuades his body to perform any quantity of musical gyrations; and yet the horn is unblowable, and the gentleman from the orchestra has been too-toting beside Mr. Durie, the while.

A gallant cavalier comes to the bowery of his fair to serenade his dulcinea; he throws the blue riband gracefully over his shoulder, and, looking unutterable things, touches, what ought to be, strings of his guitar, but no music follows; the player in the orchestra has not tuned his instrument, and the lover and the lady look vastly ridiculous.

Why should we multiply examples; every night, almost, is pregnant with some ridiculous matter of the kind, and actors curse the stage-management for thrusting them into parts where they not only render themselves ridiculous, but extend the feeling to your humble servants.

THE SIAM MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

With the next communication we have taken some liberties; mostly with the orthography and the punctuation, which were both rather various in their styles. I have, myself, sympathized with the wounded feelings of the unfortunate "sapes," and have rather looked upon their occupation as, approximating to the last business I should pursue previous to suicide.

LETTER FROM THE SUPERNUMERARIES.

Park Theatre.

MR. CIBBER—RESPECTED SIR—Do you not look upon us as a peculiar specimen of good-nature and amiability? We certainly bear "a grievous burden," and yet we would not repine not, if there were more of us. As if our labour was not sufficient for us, the scarumouches who sit in the gallery call us "supes" every time we appear, as though the audience were not aware of our presence. Our outward man is criticized, too. A few evenings since, one of us overheard a dandy say, and, by the way, his father grew rich in the sale of the article, "Where does that fellow purchase his blacking? haw, haw!" What right have we, who have walked into other men's shops, to keep them clean, I should like to know?

But the hardest duty is that performed by the soldiers. Richard III. and Richmond always have the same troops until the last act, when we divide, three privates and three officers to each king; so, you perceive, it renders the contest pretty even, as we know each other's prowess well. After a hard-fought battle, we certainly ought to have the privilege of reclining under the shade of our laurels; or making up for the grief engendered by our defeat; but no, sir, will you believe it, we are turned into chorus-singing fishermen or villagers, or even compelled to don livery, the livery, blue coat and red collar, and carry in a letter. No bad evening's job, too, and expence a night.

Our wardrobe is sometimes turned into ridicule, not alone by the audience, but the players, and we never have a tall spear, that Mr. Povey does not say, "There, that fellow has grown out of his clothes again," as though the clothes were made for us and not we made for the clothes. Perhaps you are a military man, (heaven forbid,) if you are, your eye, used to the beauty and uniformity of real troops, must have smiled at our strange appearance. I assure you, the uniform now worn are the remains of all ever possessed in the establishment. I must except the performance of Rienzi, for then we all had two suits a piece, and six additional supes. We dressed quickly, and thereby managed to come in at the head of the procession, and after changing our appearance, coming in again in the rear, thus swelling the army mightily.

Mr. — acts as though we were real soldiers, and insists upon our learning to march and carry our arms in a proper style, but we got over that trouble by appealing to the manager, who said he never heard of supernumeraries appearing like anything but supernumeraries. I never have thought so before, but that must be the reason why we are placed in an old cavern or around an ale-house board to drink molasses and water out of japan tumblers, and sing all manner of enlivening songs, for no one but supernumeraries ever did such things, I am convinced.

It is really astonishing what enmity there is between the actors and us; this would be nothing were it not for the influence they have over the press, who are afraid to notice any of our good points for fear of exciting the ill-will of the actors.

We are getting up a society, which we shall soon have in the full tide of successful experiment. It is to be called the "Anti-making-fun-of-the-supernumeraries-without-cause-society." Hoping you will encourage our feeble efforts, we remain, dear Mr. Cibber, yours truly,

THE SUPERNUMERARIES

A LARGE PIECE OF CHALK.—On the South-eastern and Dover Railway, in England, an enormous mass of chalk, of several thousand tons weight, suddenly fell from the facing of the rock forming the entrance to the tunnel through Shakespeare's Cliff. No less than seventy-eight men would have been crushed by the fall, had they not been warned of their danger in time to make their escape by the previous falling of some particles. This accident has afforded a rare treat to geologists, as it has laid bare the vertebrae of an immense animal, and it is hoped that on the removal of the fallen rubbish, the remainder of the skeleton will be found.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

RECIPE FOR COUGHING IN A PLACE OF WORSHIP.—The Rev. Mr. Binney is very impatient of anything like noise in the chapel, while he is preaching. In the winter of 1837, I heard him deliver a sermon, on a Sabbath afternoon, in the Adelphi Chapel, and, it being the season of colds, there was a very general coughing in the place while he was in the midst of his discourse. Unable to bear it any longer, he paused, and begged them to desist, in order that he might preach. The audience, who were in some cases, they could not comply with his wishes; still, in some cases, they could not help themselves. When he came to the conclusion of the head of his sermon, on which he was dilating, he paused for some moments, and then said—"Now, my friends, if any of you wish to cough now, I'll wait a little till you have done." The observation was followed by a considerable pause on the part of the preacher, but the invitation to cough was addressed in vain to the audience: I never knew greater stillness to prevail in any place of worship. The truth was, the congregation were surprised beyond measure at the observation; and the more so, because they felt utterly at a loss to know whether the reverend gentleman was serious in making it, or only intended to be ironical.

SINGULAR BEING.—At a place commonly called the World's End, near Keighley, Yorkshire, resides a man named William Sharp, who will attain the age of sixty-two years in January next, who has kept his bed for a period of about thirty years, though neither lame nor sick. The cause of his first taking to bed is said to be from his father having, at two different times, taken from him three guineas, which he had saved (gold being at that time very valuable); and, on the second three guineas being taken from him, he declared he would never work any more, and took to his bed, which he has never since left. He has his meals regularly four times a day, seldom refusing anything that is brought him—never speaks, but generally lies rolled up in bed like a hedgehog, from which he is removed once a month, in order that clean sheets may be laid on the bed, etc. His head is grizzled, his hair silvery white, and most enormous teeth project from his lips. It was said that at his father's death he became entitled to considerable property, but is prevented enjoying it by his determined perseverance in this most singular resolution.

PRINTING.—A curious legend exists relative to the discovery of printing. One evening of the fifteenth century, Faust was travelling towards a town in Opfurny; just before him rode a traveller on horseback: the shoes of his horse left on the even, soft ground, distinct and regular impressions, repeated with exactness each step. Faust observed this: the next day printing was invented. There is a singular account given of the discovery of lithography, which took place only forty years ago. One night Aloys Senefelder, chorist of the Munich Theatre, entered his small room, with three things in his hand—a hone for razors, an order to draw his month's pay, and a printer's ball, charged with printing ink—for it was he who made, on the theatre cloaks, the little mark, changed each time, to prevent fraud. Scarcely had he laid the order on the mantelpiece, when it was blown off, and fell into a basin of water. Aloys snatched up the precious paper, wiped it, and, replacing it on the mantelpiece, put on it, to prevent its being blown away, the new razor hone, which, on the way, had rubbed against the ball. The black marks made by this contact were observed the next day, transferred, with admirable precision, to the damp paper. The chorist, Aloys Senefelder, observed this, and lithography was invented.

"MOTHER, IT'S GETTING LATE."—The following anecdote is told by a Paris letter-writer:—"We have had something amusing here at the recent masquerade-balls. Suppose a gentleman and lady were talking together—you know how easily talk is commenced and continued, when the conversationists are masked—the trick is, just when Monsieur was trying to persuade Madame or Mademoiselle to unmask for a moment, that he might see if the reality was like what his "fancy painted her," for a couple of yonks to come up, and, gravely accost the lady with a "Maman, il fait tard; allons-nous-en!" When the male mask heard his chamer accosted as the mother of a couple of young men as old as himself, his anxiety would be to get rid of the ancient lady; she would be too much annoyed, perhaps, to raise the mask, and the intruder would walk away to "spoil sport" between another pair! But the pleasure, "Mother, it's getting late, let us go," has grown into a cant, and is lodged in on all occasions, whether applicable or not."

AN INDIAN MOUND.—The St. Louis Bulletin, of a late date, says:—"A gentleman living about four miles from the city, a few months ago, removed a small mound, immediately in front of his house, and found in it the skeletons of two or three hundred Indians. The skeletons were all close together, and, from their broken bones and other attending circumstances, it seems probable that, at some remote period, a battle was fought there, and that these are the relics of those who fell in the fight. As an honour to their memories, the survivors threw over their bodies this immense heap of earth, and it is probable that nearly all of these mounds have originated in the same way. To our own knowledge, bones of Indians have been found in several."

UNPROFITABLE DELIBERATION.—One half of human life is made up of wasted consideration. The highways of the world are strewn with the sand of thoughts cast away. The events over which we have no control affect our destinies a thousand fold more than the few that we can govern; and while we ponder over our decision, fate decides for us, and the game is played.

CANDIDATES FOR OFFICE.—In Mississippi, the candidates for office are not allowed to treat their friends with "strong drink," during the time of their being known as such, but their friends are not prohibited from treating them. There are probably some folks who would like to live in that state, and be known as candidates for office all the days of their life.

ENTHUSIASM A DESIDERATUM.—A mother should give her children a superfluity of enthusiasm, that after they have lost all they will lose on mixing with the world, enough may still remain to prompt and support them through great actions. A cloak should be of three-ply, to keep its gloss in wear.

COMPLIMENTARY.—A German writer says:—"The Dutch are a cheaper edition of the Germans, on unsized paper, and without copiers."

ENVY.—It is the fate of those who are most exalted in their talents and reputation to be assailed with rancour and bitterness; and their enemies, whenever occasion is given them, will strive to render them as odious as themselves.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"The Characters of Schiller." By Mrs. E. L. Boston: Ous, Broaders and Co. Pp. 236.

Thus fine discriminating powers of Mrs. Elliot are here exerted upon a subject well worthy of her pen. Schiller is, unquestionably, next to Shakespeare, the greatest of modern dramatic writers, and his works are pure models of dramatic composition. A writer in the North American Review, in the course of a friendly notice of this volume, takes occasion to remark that it is inferior to Mrs. Jameson's well-known work upon the female characters of Shakespeare. We disagree with the critic. Whatever inferiority there may be, proceeds from the subject and not from the commentator. Mrs. Elliot has displayed a thorough knowledge and appreciation of the beauties of the great German poet, and her translations are rendered with a spirit and power not unworthy of Coleridge himself. We may search in vain in the works of Mrs. Jameson for a passage superior in philosophical truth and energy of style, to the opening remarks upon the genius of Schiller. We trust that our readers will be induced, from the following quotation, to purchase and peruse the whole of this most agreeable, instructive, and ingenious work:

"There is much truth in the remark of Madame de Staël, that men are more apt to pride themselves on the possession of taste than of genius. This may be because taste in literature is like la loi for a society, regarded as indicative of aristocratic origin or rank, and of the habits belonging to such distinction; while the wreaths of genius are not unfrequently bound on vulgar brows. Besides, the reputation of taste implies a less questionable, if a more conventional superiority. The dominion of the critic is absolute so far as his supremacy is acknowledged; and there are thousands willing to submit to the imposition of such an authority, while they are subject to no new and startling demands. We are less reluctant to suffer ourselves to be guided in the perception of what shall be admired or rejected, than to understand and decide upon new appeals to our judgment.

"The form in literature, rather than the matter, lies peculiarly within the province of the critic, who is liable to mutations which do not affect the other; for the one is drawn from varying life and the material world, while the other has its being in man's spiritual essence. Hence the principles of true criticism are not subject to caprice; they have survived the shocks of ages, that change nature herself. The ideal is far more enduring than the actual."

"In Schiller's writings the spirit of taste is paramount; the form is indeed so eminent in his regard, that he often loses, in the elaborate chasteness of his conception, the original ease and freshness of unfettered nature. That he was justly distinguished as a critic, as well as a poet, no one who reads his elegant and finished essays upon æsthetic culture, will presume to doubt. He gave, in fact, an example of the very highest and most exclusive devotion to the art of criticism; for in the plenitude of his powers and the zenith of his success he offered up to it—himself. He brought the accumulated treasures of his scholarship, the freshness of his untroubled genius, the fire of his imagination and the vigour of his understandings, and with self-sacrificing zeal delivered them up to the shrine of the goddess of his idolatry, consecrating them for ever and for ever to her service. Many bleared his devotion and proposed an unimpaired result; and such would probably have been the case with a mind of less power. When it forsook the guidance of pure nature, ever simple and open in her means and her ends, and a rare, through the mazes of metaphysical subtleties, to reach an ideal beyond nature, or one that should supply her place, he adventured in the midst of dangers of which he was not aware. An inferior spirit would have sunk under difficulties destructive to the original fire and force of genius; nor were the powers of the poet unimpaired and his enthusiasm unchilled, by his influence. But Schiller's was too noble a mind to be long held in check even by the nature of such a sacrifice. With impetuous, almost incredible efforts he bore himself beyond restraint; and rushed forward into excellence through the path he had chosen. The system did not assuage or elevate him; it was he who embodied the system, by enlarging and bringing it as nearly as possible to perfection.

"This new scene after the beautiful—this endeavour to make art a second nature, is perceptible in all the works of our author, giving rise to many of his defects, and to some of his beauties. His philosophy was undoubtedly erroneous; the true poet is indeed always philosophical, but his knowledge of nature is intuitive, not derived from the study of theoretical truths. The vigour of youthful imagination never owes its energy to the collection of opinions, though its growth may be thereby strengthened and its exuberance pruned. Shakespeare's characters are a study for the metaphysician, yet the creative intellect of that greatest poet was never confined within the limits of theories: had it been so, he might have produced mighty monuments of art, but could never have reached the summit of human excellence. If Schiller's genius emerged from the cloud, to shine in the admiration of succeeding ages, his success must be regarded as affording proof of the transcendent powers of the poet, not of the truth or safety of his philosophy.

"There is no greater happiness bestowed on man than the enjoyment of the ideal. 'The end of art,' Schiller remarks, 'is unquestionably the same with that of nature—to produce delight.' She gives us sportively what we obtain with difficulty from her serious sisters; bestows freely what is elsewhere the fruit of laborious exertion. By diligent industry we gain the pleasures of knowledge; by severe abstinence the joys of sense; by sacrifices we obtain the approbation of reason. Art alone offers enjoyment that need not first be earned, that does not sacrifice in followed by no repentance. True, but effort is first necessary to prepare the mind to receive and appreciate this enjoyment; and to make this preparation, to turn the rough soil and dispose it to receive seed that shall spring forth in perennial flowers, is the earliest and most arduous achievement of the labourer in the garden of taste. A hard conflict must be sustained with the indolence and timidity of untutored nature. Not without significance did the Grecian fable represent the Goddess of Wisdom as having sprung fully armed from the head of Jove. Schiller has forcibly painted in his essays, the forlorn condition of the human mind in its uncultivated state, before the contemplation of excellence beguiles man to pleasure, and softens his asperities. 'Ever uniform in his aim, ever unvariable in his judgment, selfish without knowing his own interest, fearless without being free, and a slave without obeying a rule!'"

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received during the past week a number of long manuscript communications, which we will peruse the first of July. With the thermometer at ninety it cannot be expected that the pleasantest obituary should be very tempting to the eyes. The obituary stanza by "Florio" are a little too much to the Laura Matilda vein. They would have answered very well half a century ago.

The only favour that a subscriber can confer upon us, is to comply with the conditions on which this journal is issued. Those residing at a distance, where there is no regular agent, will please remit the amount of their bills by mail. A lady correspondent says that "those who meddle with the flame of love must expect to burn their fingers."

Notices of the Expositor, the Gazette, the Times, and Hunt's Merchant's Magazine, are unavoidably omitted until our next number.

The stanzas of "Eva" are full of blunders, but the last four lines are beautiful. We quote them:

"Like sweet bells o'er the waters
They tones fell on our ear
That faintest of earth's daughters,
My song-bird paused to hear."

A correspondent suggests that we were in error in declining to commend the new novel of "Harry Francis" to the favour of our "fair readers." Our opinion was formed from incidentally meeting with two or three vulgar and unpleasing expressions in the course of a hurried glance through the volumes. If we have done injustice we shall be anxious to rectify it.—We have not yet met with the new work by the author of "Vivian Grey," to which "K." alludes. The contributions of "L. N. T." and "E. Y. T." are declined. We have no use for the papers left by a "Traveler" but are much obliged to him for his attention.—"C." is assured that there was no personality intended in Mr. Cox's amusing sketch entitled "The Illustrative Obscure." The comedians must have been entirely accidental.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JULY 20, 1839.

Newport.—Now is the season for Newport. When there, select a fine day, and driving or riding along Easton beach, visit Purgatory. Gaze awhile into its deep, dark chasm, and then cast your eyes over the illimitable blue ocean that opens before you. Continue your drive over the sand—and see there—mark Block Island looming up, in its dim purple shadows, spirit-land-like, far off in the waters! And now you are on your way to Paradise, and having left your horses, you are threading the long line of sycamores, and clambering over the rocks to its summit. The view about you, how magnificent! Sit down in the shadow, and write half a dozen sonnets after the manner of Wordsworth. There are subjects enough scattered in all directions. Bishop Berkeley's old house will furnish you fourteen lines. What do you say to the old tower: that is unfortunately no Scandinavian relic, but merely an honest old mill, which has been made to grandiose poetry of late years than corn. Then the historic recollections! The bay is full of them. Little more than half a century ago, and what might you have seen here! Tents and banners, regiments of soldiers, an armed fleet, and all the "pomp, pride and circumstance" of war. And now, everything how placid and serene! There is nothing but the battlemented pile, frowning at the entrance of the harbour, to remind you that there are times when nations have need of defence. "Newport illustrated!" What a beautiful volume might be made of it! A dozen fine pictures, taken at the most interesting points, with prose sketches and poems and "short sonnets" by way of letter press. Sea views, land views, with an old building or two, Fort Adams, and such other scenes as the skill of the artist and poet might invest with interest. Such a book must be made.

Bathing.—The weather is now truly delightful, and the pure and healthy exercise of the bath is becoming exceedingly popular. How refreshing and invigorating is a plunge into the sea-water after labour or study in the enervating heat of the day. If resorted to betimes in the morning, before the arrival of business hours, how calm and clear does it make the mind! how active and vigorous the body! how well does it prepare us for physical or mental fatigue! Setting aside all considerations of strength and cleanliness, how admirably does it qualify us, by the acquirement and cultivation of the difficult science of swimming, to meet, to laugh at, and to conquer danger in the event of accident, to which a sea-going population, whether for profit or recreation, are exposed.

How to make a puff.—The ingenuity of booksellers in extracting the sweet from the bitter of a review, sweepingly condemnatory of their wares, is sometimes amusing. An instance is mentioned in which a literary notice commenced something in this way: "Aware of the pains taken in the production of this volume, and feeling nothing but sincere friendship for the amiable author, we should be happy to say it is an ornament to American literature. But"—and here followed a long string of denigratory criticisms and objections. The publishers selected the phrase, "It is an ornament to American literature," and inserted it in their advertisement, credited to the paper in which the attack appeared.

Characteristics.—Philadelphia is the city of brotherly love—Boston the city of notions—Baltimore the city of monuments—and New-York—what is New-York the city of, papa? "asked a bright-eyed miss of fifteen, the other day. "The city of newspapers, to be sure," was the reply, as the old gentleman took up the fifth new newspaper, that had been left for his subscription that week.

Rapid travelling.—Passengers are carried on the railroads between Albany and Auburn, a distance of one hundred and ninety-two miles, in one day. A person leaving Syracuse in the morning arrives at Saratoga Springs in time for tea in the evening.

Revolutionary heroes.—William Pierce, aged ninety-six, one of the last relics of the "Tea Party," was present at the Faneuil Hall celebration on the fourth at Boston. He was helped into his carriage by another revolutionary lad aged eighty-six.

Letter from an idle merchant.—Mr. MIRROR—I have recently returned from a flying trip to London. My time was so fully occupied while there, that I had no leisure for memorandums of "Incidents of Travel," or "Pencilings by the Way." Now that I am safely home again, I take pleasure in remembering what I heard and saw during my absence—and in recounting it too. But I have related my adventures over and over again to my friends, until they are weary with the recital, and have left me no longer a lion in their estimation, because I can roar no new note. I am a merchant—my account books are all in perfect order, every receipt, letter, and bill filed, and in its appropriate place; few notes to pay this month, no discounts to ask for, a good bank account, and, worst of all, no customers to expect—what shall I do with my leisure hours? How employ them more pleasantly than in giving to the public the thrice-told tale! To be sure, I am not accustomed to writing for the public, except such articles as the printer is sure to send in a bill for inserting; but this shall not deter me from taking this first step to immortality. I shall not trouble you with a tedious description of my voyage, but will commence with a time when—I had seen most of the "great attractions" of the metropolitan city, and was merely gleaning the field from which I had already gathered abundantly, as I one morning espied over a door a small sign with this inscription—"Mental Daguerroscope." Something new under the sun! Just what I came all the way to London to see—and I immediately walked in. The room which I entered exhibited equally the appearance of a chemical laboratory, and an ordinary engraver's office. Here was an electrical machine, and there an engraver's stone—here a galvanic battery, and there a pile of designs; with a countless number of other things, presenting in itself a sight, no doubt as curious as the workshop of a "Jabez Doolittle," but when compared with the wonderful results of the art which I afterwards saw there, it was nearly forgotten. Upon my making some inquiries respecting this art, of which I had never before heard, I was informed that it was a new method of taking impressions of objects, which method had first been suggested to the author by the lunar Daguerroscope. He said they would soon take an impression, in seeing which, I might obtain a better idea of the process than by any description he could give. A sheet of drawing-paper which had received the solution preparatory to taking an impression was first placed in a perpendicular position. In front of this was seated the engraver, for so he was called, in a large arm-chair, covered with a kind of cloth which had rendered it nonconductor of the electric fluid; his dress was of the same material. He was now thrown into a profound "magnetic slumber," and while in this condition was charged with electric fluid until his eyes flashed open. He immediately fixed them upon me, and that with such an unearthly glowing, that I could think of nothing but his satanic majesty, and began to retreat. Just as I moved, he took his eyes from me and fixed them upon the paper before him, and I saw in an instant my own likeness there, in its full and perfect proportions. As fast as the impressions were taken, the sheet was removed and a new one substituted, until they became so faint as to be scarcely perceptible. This was the "mental Daguerroscope." There is no part of it secret except the preparation of the paper previous to being engraved upon. I was now shown several specimens of landscape engravings by the same method, which rivalled everything in that line, as much as nature has heretofore excelled the most bungling productions of art. The lunar Daguerroscope has reached perfection in this establishment, as you will readily believe when I tell you that, in taking a landscape impression a few days since, a perfect human figure, with long, flowing hair, and a fine pair of wings, appeared, flying through the air at a little distance from the earth. Unseen by mortal eyes, unknown his presence; from whence, or whether bound, all a mystery; yet leaving his shadow to gladden our hearts with the belief that good spirits hover over us. Messrs. Editors, if you, or any of your curious readers, would see these wonders, just make a trip to London—not in a steampacket, or a packetship, but as I did, in a—dream. Yours, A

Advantages of a country excursion.—It has been said, on medical authority, and every one's experience will confirm the truth of the observation, that a short trip into the country, even for a single day, is exceedingly beneficial, by diverting the mind from the ordinary objects of contemplation, and removing from it for a time that load of anxious cares, which, if suffered too long to remain, destroys its elasticity. For a few dollars, a person may enjoy the different varieties of lake, river, mountain, forest and sea-side scenery. He may store his mind with the recollection of the beauties of nature, and of the occurrences that befall him while absent from home; and in the midst of the crowded city, and of pressing occupations, he may often relieve and amuse his harassed mind by the contemplation of these intellectual images.

Our neighbourhood.—Jump into the railroad car at the City-Hall. Get out at Forty-second street. Two minutes walk will find you in a shady grove, on the banks of the East river. You have escaped the heat of the city. You sniff the pure air. You reinvigorate your weary limbs. You refresh your tired spirit. After rambling about an hour or two, you find your way back as you came. And all this for the inconsiderable sum of two shillings, metallic currency.

Serrenading.—The custom of serenading has been quite prevalent during the hot nights of the past week or two. There could not be a more appropriate season, if the music be good. But, oh ye impatient practitioners on the German flute, and oh ye tyros in the mysteries of the "fa, sol, la," disturb not our slumbers with your midnight violations of harmony. St. Cecilia preserve us from all such infractions.

TWENTY YEARS AGO.

'Twas in the flush of summer time,
Some twenty years or more,
Since Earnest lost his way, and crost
The threshold of our door
I'll ne'er forget his looks of jet
His brow of Alpine snow,
His manly grace of form and face,
Some twenty years ago.

The hand he asked I freely gave—
Mine was a happy lot,
In all my pride to be his bride
Within my father's cot.

The vow he spoke he never broke:
His faithful heart I know;
And well I trow I love him now

POLITICAL.—"I say, you Sam Johnson, does you know anything about dis woman, Polly Ticks, dat white folks talk so much about?" "Well, I doesn't. You are too hard for dis child dis time." "Why, Sam, I tort you knowed eberyting." "So I doz. I know Polly Jones, what sells coffee in de vegetable market, and I knows Polly Tunson wat does gwoin out to day's work up in Canal-street; but when it comes to Polly Ticks, I'm bodered. Gess you 'd better ax white folks, Pete; dey peer to know al. about her."

LAWFUL REVENGE.—Many years since, a gentleman in Newington, a parish of Wetherfield, Connecticut, who was a very religious and conscientious man, married one of the most ill-natured and troublesome women who could be found in the vicinity. This occasioned a universal surprise wherever he was known, and one of his neighbours ventured to ask him the reasons which had governed his choice. He replied, that having had but little trouble in the world, he was fearful of becoming too much attached to things of time and sense, and thought that by experiencing some afflictions, he should become more weaned from the world, and that he married such a woman as he thought would accomplish this object. The best part of the story is, that the wife, hearing the reasons why he married her, was much offended, and, out of revenge, became one of the most pleasant and dutiful wives in the town; declaring that she was not going to be made a pack-horse to carry her husband to heaven.

NOISY DECLAIMERS.—There never was any party, faction, sect, or cabal, whatsoever, in which the most ignorant were not the most violent; for a bee is not a busier animal than a blockhead. However, such instruments are necessary to politicians; and perhaps it may be with states as with clocks, which must have some dead weights hanging at them, to help and regulate the motion of the finer and more useful parts.

OBSCURE ADVERTISEMENT OF POPE.—"Daily Post, June 14, 1728. Whereas there has been a scandalous paper cried about the streets, under the title of a "Pope upon Pope," insinuating that I was whipped in Ham Walks on Thursday last; this is to give notice that I did not stir out of my house at Twickenham, and that the same is a malicious and ill-grounded report.—ALEXANDER POPE."

CURIOUS INSCRIPTION.—A fellow who married a termagant who drove him to desperation, and, finally, to death, just before dying, requested a friend to have the following brief yet pungent inscription upon his tomb:—"Slain by a jaw-bone."

ARABIAN SYMPATHY.—"Weary and faint from the fatigue of our journey," says Lieutenant Willstead, in his Travels in Arabia, "in order to enjoy the freshness of the evening breeze, I had spread my carpet beneath a tree. An Arab, passing by, paused to gaze upon me, and, touched by my condition and the melancholy which was depicted in my countenance, he proffered the salutation of peace, pointed to the crystal stream, which, sparkling, held its course at my feet, and said, 'Look, friend, for running water maketh the heart glad.' With his hands folded over his breast—that mute but most graceful of Eastern salutations—he bowed and passed on. I was in a situation to estimate sympathy; and so much of that feeling was exhibited in the manner of this son of the desert, that I have never since recurred to the incident, trifling as it is, without emotion."

Gossip.—Gossip is a thing that thrives amazingly upon minced meats, daintily conveyed into its mouth with a pap-spoon; but set substantial fare before it, and let it feed itself with a ladle, and within four-and-twenty hours it lies at your feet, dead of surfeit.

WOMAN.

Who longest lingers at the bed of death,
With kisses winning back the fleeting breath?
Who longest at the chill, lone tomb, shall stay,
Pale scummel o'er cold and paler clay?
"Last at the cross and earliest at the grave,"
Oh, woman! 'tis thy chosen hour to save,
When manhood's haughty crest is fallen low,
Shattered and broken by the stunning blow.

CHAPTER VII.

As I descended the stairs, I determined to hurry home to awaken my wife and children and press them to my heart once more, then to fly abroad into the world like a Cain, to escape the hands of justice. But while I was on the stairs, I saw that my clothes were sprinkled over with the Starost's blood. I trembled to be seen.

The street-door was closed. As I was hurrying back to escape through the court-yard, I heard footsteps hurrying down the stairs, and exclamations, and calls, behind me. I fled across the court to the barn. I knew that through it I could come out into gardens and fields without the town. But my pursuers were too quick for me. I had hardly reached the barn when one seized me by the coat. In utter desperation, I tore myself loose, and hurled the blazing light into the high heaps of straw around me. Flames burst forth. I had hoped to rescue myself by this step, and it succeeded. They loosed their holds of me to take steps to extinguish the fire. Thus I reached the open fields.

I plunged blindly on, over fences and ditches. To see my Fanny, my Augustus, my Leopold, again was not to be thought of. The instinct of self-preservation drowned the voice of every other human feeling. When I thought on my return home the day before, and my hopes for the morning which was now drawing nigh, I could not realize that what had passed was possible. But my bloody dress, and the keen morning breeze that pierced through me, proved the contrary only too plainly. If I had had a weapon, if a river had been at hand, I should have ceased to live.

Breathless, dripping with sweat, prostrate in every nerve, with trembling knees, I pursued my flight slowly. I had to stop sometimes to recover myself, and still was often on the point of falling. In this way I reached the next village. While I stood before it, and was still considering whether I should go round or pass boldly through it, for the sun had not yet risen, the town-bell in the tower began to ring. Soon the sound of bells from other distant hamlets rang around me. It was the alarm-bell.

Each stroke crushed me to the earth. I looked. Oh heavens! a broad dark-red glow behind me—a huge pillar of fire flickering up to the clouds, swayed backwards and forwards over my home. The whole town was in flames—I! I was the incendiary. Oh, my Fanny, oh, my children, what a fearful awakening from your morning slumbers has your father prepared for you!

Then it seemed as though I was caught up by the hair and raised on high, and my feet felt light as feathers. I ran round the village into a forest. The flames of my home shone with the brightness of day, and the sound of the alarm-bells echoed threateningly in my ears.

When I had reached the darkness of the wood, and plunged so deep into it that I could not see the ruddy light of the conflagration, I could go no further. I fell on the damp ground and yelled in despair. I beat the ground with my forehead, and tore up the grass around me. I wished to die and knew not how.

Faithless, murderer, incendiary, all this within an hour! The red-coat was right, "there are no righteous men among us, save those who want opportunities for sin. Offer the devil a hair and your whole head is his." What accursed fate brought that Satan to me in the summer-house! Had I not drank the punch, I could have seen Julia without forgetting Fanny, the Starost would not have been slain, I would not have wrapped my home in flames, nor would I have been lying here, abandoned by myself, accursed by mankind. Meantime the alarm-bells rang out unceasingly, and frightened me up from the ground. I was glad that it was not day yet, for I might hope to get a good distance undiscovered.

But I sank down again in tears as I recollected that it was the first of May, my Fanny's birthday. How had we happy ones so solemnized it heretofore within the family circle! And now—what a day—what a night! Then the idea passed through my mind, it is Walpurgis-night. Strange! ancient superstition always made this a night of terror, in which the spirits of evil held their festival, and the devil assembled his sorcerers on the summit of the Blocksberg. I could have believed the wildest fancies. The suspicious red-coat with his strange words occurred to me more vividly. Now why should I deny it, I would have given up my soul to have him save me, to make me forget the past, and to restore me to my wife and children in any corner of the world where we might live undiscovered. But the alarm-bells rang louder—I felt the approach of dawn. I sprang from the ground and fled along through the woods till I reached a highway.

CHAPTER VIII.

Cain.

Here I breathed freely. "All that had passed was so horrible, so sudden, that I could hardly realize it." But I looked round, and through reflection the red flame of the conflagration glared. I felt myself, and stained my finger in the Starost's blood.

"This will betray me to the first one that meets me," thought I, and I tore my blood-stained garments off, hid them in the bushes, and washed my hands clean in the dew. Then, half-dressed, I ran along the highway.

"What art thou at now!" said I to myself; "whoever sees thee will pursue thee. None but murderers and madmen run naked through the woods. If I meet a peasant, that I can master, I will make him give me his frock. Then I should be safe for the moment. I can remain hid in the thickets during the day, and confine my flight at night. But where am I to find nourishment—where money?" It now struck me that I had left my pocket-book in the coat I had thrown away, and thus robbed myself of all my money.

I stopped, and was undecided. I thought for a moment that I would turn back and look for my pocket-book. But—the Starost's blood! I would not have seen it again for a million—and to go back—to have eternally before my eyes the fire-glow playing through the trees—no—the flames of yawning hell sooner! So I wandered on.

I next heard the rolling of a carriage. I plunged hastily into the wood, trembling like an aspen-leaf. A handsome open travelling-carriage, drawn by two horses and loaded with trunks, came slowly by. One person was in it. He drew up near me, alighted, walked round the carriage and examined it on every side, then went across the road into the wood.

"Once in the wagon and you are saved," spoke a voice within me. "Your limbs are broken down, they can drag you no farther. Once there, clothes, gold, rapid flight, all is at your command. Heaven means to protect you. Profit by the moment."

No sooner said than done, for there was not a minute to waste in reflection. We all look out for ourselves as best we may. "Every eye for himself in this world," thought I. "Despair, like necessity, knows no law."

One spring and I was out of the woods in the road, and from the road in the carriage. I seized the reins and turned the horses round, away from my burning home. The owner hurried out of the wood, and just as I was making the horses feel the whip, he tried to stop them.

He placed himself in front of me. I scoured them more fiercely, for it was too late to hesitate. The horses reared and dashed on. The owner fell and lay under their feet. I drove on over him. He cried for help.

"A voice went through me—it was a well-known voice—a beloved one. I did not believe my ears. I stopped and leaned out of the carriage to look at the unfortunate man. I saw him—but, I shudder as I say it, I saw my brother, whom I had left in Prague!

I sat there as though struck helpless by lightning. The poor wretch lay writhing and moaning under the wheels. I dragged myself slowly out of the carriage. I sank down by my dear brother's side. The heavy wheel had passed over his breast. I called on his name in low, trembling accents—he heard me not—his troubles were over. I was the wretch who had robbed him of a life which was as dear to me as mine own. Horrible! two murders in one night! both involuntary, indeed, both done in desperation. Still they were done, and were the consequences of that first fault which I might and should have avoided.

My eyes moistened, not with drops of spew over my brother, but with tears of furious rage against my lot, and against heaven. I had never in my life sullied myself with a crime. I had been full of sensibility for the beautiful, the good, for virtue and for truth. No pleasure had been sweeter to me than that of making others happy. And now an accursed want of thought—a moment of unholiest forgetfulness—and the turn of chance or fate, had made me the most miserable, despicable wretch beneath the sun. On let no one boast himself of his virtue, his strength of mind, his judgment! We have only to lay out better principles, aside for a minute—a single minute—and he who was pure as angels, is capable of any deed of shame.

I will hasten to the end of a tale more horrible than any which a poet's imagination ever devised.

CHAPTER IX.

Repentance.

I kissed my brother's pale forehead. Then I heard voices in the wood. Should I let myself be apprehended over the body of the beloved one whom I first tried to rob and then murdered? Before I could even think, I was in the thickest wood and left horses, carriage, and corpse to their fate. The all-powerful instinct of life was alone awake within me, everything else was dead. I moved on torpidly through bush and brier; wherever the copse was darkest, the foliage the thickest, I hurried. "Whoever finds thee," said the voice within me, "will slay thee, Cain, murderer, fratricide!"

I sat down wearily on a rock in the centre of the wood. The sun had arisen without my remarking it. A new life breathed through nature—the fearful Walpurgis-night was now past, but its results fitted, like fiends from below, around my path. I saw my mourning Fanny with her orphan children—I saw the family of my unhappy brother refusing to be comforted. I saw the tribunal—the procession from the prison to the scaffold—the fatal block.

I rose and walked, I knew not whither. After I had travelled awhile, the wood grew lighter. I chanced upon a narrow forest-path and entered on it at once, careless whither it might lead me.

CHAPTER X.

The tempter.

At a turn in the road, I saw directly before me horses, a carriage overturned and with a wheel broken, and to my terror and delight at once, the well-known red-coat standing by it.

As he looked upon me he grinned according to his custom, and said, "Welcome here. Did I not say that we would meet again? I have been waiting all night. My postilion has gone to town for help and has not come back."

"Help is more needed there than here, the whole town is in flames," said I.

"I thought so!" rejoined he, "for I noticed the redness of the sky. But what are you doing here in the woods? Why don't you help them to extinguish it?"

"They have other things besides timber to extinguish," sighed I. "I thought so. Did I not tell you so beforehand?" was the answer.

"Rescue me!" exclaimed I. "I am a guilty wretch, faithless husband, murderer, incendiary, highway-robber, fratricide, all since the moment you left me—all within three hours. And yet, I swear to you, I am not a bad man."

The red-coat stamped in anger with his clump-foot on the ground, but his features remained hard and icy. I told him the unexampled misfortunes of that night. He remained unmoved.

"Do you know me now?" said he at last, "and what I want of you?"

"My soul! my soul!" shrieked I, "for now I begin to believe you are really he for whom I took you in sport."

"And who was that?"

"Satan."

"Fall down before me, then, and worship me," thundered he in a frightful tone.

I fell on my knees before him like a madman, raised my clasped hands and exclaimed, "Save me! save my wife and children from destruction! They at least are innocent—bring us into a desert, where we may have bread and water and a hole to creep into, and we will fancy ourselves in paradise. But wash the memory of last night from my brain, else paradise itself is a hell!"

As I said this he raised his clump-foot and struck me a blow with it in contempt, so that I fell backwards. "See there," said he, "the pious, devout, good-feeling man; see the proud mortal in all the majesty of reason; see the philosopher who denies the existence of the devil, and brings eternity into a learned doubt! He crowns his deeds of guilt by worshipping the father of evil!"

"Thereby, Satan, do I know thee!" cried I in my rage. "That soft pity which dwells in the hearts of the children of men has no place in thy iron breast. I ask no sympathy from thee who art capable of naught but scoffing and cruelty. I only wished to buy thy favour, to buy it with my soul. I may yet amend it, may find out the way of repentance, and of grace." I may yet escape thee when thou thinkest thyself most certain of it."

He answered me gloomily, "No, sir, I am not the fiend, as you supposed. I am a man like yourself. You have been a criminal, you are now a madman. But he who has once been found wanting to his better faith, soon makes way with his reason too. I despise you, and in truth, if I could, I would not help you. Your soul I do not ask for. It is ripe for hell already. Satan will not bid you a suppliance for it."

CHAPTER XI.

Hope.

I stood for awhile doubtful and confused before him. Shame and anger, penitence and readiness for any crime which could save me for the moment, were struggling within me. I cannot describe what I felt. The history of a fleeting moment would swell into a volume beneath my pen, and yet not be completed.

"Since you are not he I took you for," said I, at last, "I must wish you were. Save me else am I lost. 'Save me, for you alone are the cause of my fearful fate.'

"So it is with man!" said he, gnashing his teeth, "He will seek always to wash himself clean, even when bathed in his brother's blood!"

"Yes, you are the first cause of all the nameless horrors of this night! Why did you come by night to the summer-house where I was sleeping peacefully and quietly? Had you not awakened me all this had never happened."

"But did I wake you to faithlessness, arson, and murder? You might as well call your breath the cause of your guilt, for you could not commit a sin without it."

"You are in the right—but could I foresee all things? Only think on the horrible train of circumstances."

"You should have thought of that. Could you not think of the Starost's coming while you held his wife in your arms? of the conflagration, when you flung the light into the straw? of fratricide when you drove the horses against their owner's breast?"

"It may be so. But do not drive me to deeper despair. You will grant, at least, that the first fault might have happened without these other horrors, had not the most strange and frightful circumstances combined against me."

"Who grants you that? What was there strange and frightful in the Starost's coming to look for his wife? or in there being straw in a barn? or what, in your unfortunate brother's travelling peacefully homewards?"

"O!" exclaimed I, "till this night I was pure and innocent; a good father, a faithful husband, free from crime and without reproach—and now I am without peace, without honour, without comfort!"

"Even in that I must contradict you. You have not become the being-in-evil you now are—but were the same long before. We do not change from angel to fiend in an hour, unless we have before a lurking wish to become a fiend. You only wanted an opportunity to develop yourself earlier; you only wanted Julia and solitude. A spark falls into a sleeping magazine, and half a city with all its happiness is hurled to heaven in dust and ruins. Let no one praise the devout ones who escort the poor sinner to the gallows in all the pride of innocence. Want of opportunity is the only reason they are not swinging these themselves."

"For heaven's sake," said I, fairly beside myself, "save me, for my time is short. Rescue me, my wife and children. I can repent and reform."

"It may be so. But you are of a feeble temper. Weakness is the minister of the wildest deeds. I will save you if you can save yourself. Do you know me now and what I want of you?"

"You are an angel! my guardian spirit."

"I did not appear to you in the garden, before these horrors were committed, in vain. I warned you. But courage; he who keeps his faith keeps everything."

CHAPTER XIII.

Rescue.

While the red-coat spoke thus, it seemed to me that his ruddy garments shone like bright flames, and grew fiercer shot up round him—but it was only the trees. They played and changed colours before my eyes wondrously. At last all vanished, and I lay in a swoon.

When I opened my eyes the old man swam before me in friendly seriousness, as though upon clouds. I saw no longer the hard iron features, but a mild expression in his radiant visage. But the splendour dazzled me, and I closed my eyelids again and dreamed on. I could not move a limb. "What is the matter with me and what will become of me?" thought I, for I fancied I heard the tumult of cities and villages rolling by me, now the rustic of waving woods, now a stream breaking over rocks, and then the tinkle of a sheep bell and the distant song of the shepherds. "Where do I come from?" sighed I slowly, with great effort.

The old man's visage hung over me, and his eye was anxiously bent down towards me. "I will rescue thee," said he, in a tone of unshakeable softness. "Fear no longer, thou hast seen thy life and thy death. Weak one, become a man. I will not rescue thee a second time."

Then a cloud rose again before my eyes, and I seemed to myself to be in a hollow among rocks into which the daylight streamed through narrow clefts. But the old man still hung over me. "Then said he—'Now thou art saved, and I leave thee. I have fulfilled thy desires.'"

"But," sighed I, "give me my Fanny, my children."

"They are thine already," answered he.

While he spoke thus he disappeared above me like a vapour, and I gazed as the gray mist rose over my head and understood nothing. But I felt inexpressibly relieved, and yet all seemed like a fairy tale.

While I was yet gazing at the rocks above me, an invisible being pressed its lips to mine. I felt a sweet warm kiss.

CHAPTER XIII.

The new world.

The kiss made me earthly. I thought I had my eyes open, but I found that they were shut, for I heard light steps rustling around me and yet saw no one in my care.

Then a breath breathed upon me as two soft lips rested again on mine. The perception of life returned to my external senses. I heard children's voices whispering. Dream and reality swam in confusion together, and separated themselves farther and farther till I came to clear consciousness and distinct feeling.

I fancied I lay hard and uncomfortably. I thought I was on the sofa in my summer-house. I opened my eyes, and my Fanny hung over me. She had awakened me with her kisses. Our children clapped their hands for joy as they saw me awake, climbed up on the sofa and over me, and cried out together, "papa, good morning, papa!"

And my wife clasped me fast, and yet, with her eyes full of tears, reproached me for having slept the cold long night in the summer-house; and had not our man, Christopher, come from the post-house a quarter of an hour before, and given the maids in the kitchen the alarm, and informed them of my arrival, no one would have known of it.

But the gloomy Walpurgis dream had disturbed me to such a degree that I lay long, and could not trust either to my eyes or ears. I looked for the desert cavern; to my fancy it was still the summer-house. The drums, hobby-horses and whips still lay on the ground. Fanny's basket still stood on the table, as if I had found it when I chose it for my sleeping-place.

"And has Christopher just come from the post-house," said I; "has he slept there all night?"

"Certainly, you strange creature," said Fanny, and caressed me again. "He insists that you yourself ordered him to do so. Why didst thou not drive us out of our beds? How gladly we would have got ready to receive you!"

I fairly jumped up for joy. "Did you, then, sleep quietly last night?" asked I.

"But too well," said Fanny. "Could I have dreamed that you were here, in the summer-house, there would have been no sleeping for me; I would have glided to you like a ghost. Besides, do you know that it was Walpurgis-night, when all the spirits and kobolds are about?"

"I knew it but too well," said I, and rubbed my eyes and smiled for joy, that all my crimes were only a dream; that neither the post-house nor the town was in flames; that neither the red-coat of Prague, nor the long-forgotten Julia, had paid me a visit.

I pressed my lovely Fanny closely to my heart. With her and my children on my bosom, I felt more clearly than ever the happiness of a pure heart and a good conscience. A new world bloomed around me: more than once it seemed dubious to me—like another dream. I looked often at the friendly roofs of our village, to convince myself that I had not thrown a blazing torch into the straw. I never, in all my life, dreamed a more connected, clear or frightful dream. Only at the close, where it united itself with my awakening, was it more dream-like and fantastical; but, even then, the current of thought was livelier and clearer than it usually is in such cases.

We moved in triumph through the beautiful garden, to my peaceful home, where all my people gave me a heartfelt welcome. After dressing, I went, loaded with all sorts of playthings for my children, to Fanny's room, to breakfast. These saw the young mother, by her crowing children. Each look at the beloved ones poured new transports through me. I sank on Fanny's breast, in silence; I gave her, with tears of joy in my eyes, the presents bought for her in Prague, and said, "Fanny, this is thy birthday." "I have never celebrated it more joyfully," said she, "than this time. I have thee again. I have also invited thy friends and my playmates to commemorate the day of thy return, right joyfully. You will not take it ill that I have done so. Now, sit down by us, and tell me how things have gone with you."

But the fatal dream was still too near me. I thought the best way to shake it off would be by recounting it, Fanny listened, and became very serious. "Surely," said she, smiling, "as indeed we must believe in the incantations of Walpurgis-night, you have dreamed a whole sermon. Be more pious—the more cautious and serious, hereafter; for certainly thy good angel hath spoken with thee. Write your dream-stories: such a dream is more remarkable than many a fable's life. You know I think a great deal of visions; they mean nothing, but yet they often signify much, namely—ourselves: they are, at times, the clearest mirrors of the soul."

CHAPTER XIV.

The tempter and the temptation.

A not extraordinary, to be sure, but still remarkable circumstance, on the same day, increased the interest of my Walpurgis-dream.

My wife had invited our male and female friends, out of the town, to a little family party. We dined, on account of the heat at noon, in the spacious upper-room of the summer-house. The Walpurgis-dream was already half effaced from my memory, by a more agreeable reality. My servant announced a stranger, who wished to speak to me, a Baron Manneville, Von Drosow. Fanny saw that I started. "Thou wilt not tremble before the tempter, nor the temptation itself, when I am by thy side." I descended; there, on the very sofa where I had slept, sat the red-coat of Prague, in propria persona; he stood up, greeted me like an old friend, and said, "You see I keep my word. I must now make myself acquainted with your lovely Fanny, whom I learnt to know through her letters to you, by mere accident. Be not jealous! And," continued he, pointing into the garden; "I bring a couple of guests with me, besides—my brother and his wife. My sister-in-law is already acquainted with you. We met, unexpectedly, in Dresden, and are now travelling in company."

I expressed my pleasure. Meantime, a stout, strong-built gentleman stepped out of the garden into the cabinet where we were talking; with him a lady, in a traveling-dress. "Think of my fright: it was Julia, the Starost's wife!"

She was less confused than I was, though she too changed colour at first. After the first ceremonies, I led my guests into the upper-room: I presented my Fanny to them: the baron paid her the most flattering compliments. "I became an admirer of yours," said he, "in Prague, where, without your husband's knowledge, I happened to learn all the little secrets which you entrusted to him."

"I know everything," said Fanny, "you paid for the letters with fourteen hundred dollars; still, you are a bad man, for you have caused my husband a restless night."

"That is not the end of it, Fanny," said I, "for here is the dear tempter, said there—I presented her to the Starost's wife—Julia, the temptress."

Fanny was confounded for a moment; but women are never confounded long. She embraced Julia as a sister, and placed the tempter on her right hand, and the temptation on her left; "as far from you as possible," said she, with a malicious threat.

Fanny and Julia, though they had never seen each other before, were soon sworn friends, had a great deal to say to each other, and delighted in making me the subject of their mischief.

"Twas a strange, peculiar treat to me to see both these women; both lovely—but Julia only a beautiful woman—Fanny an angel."

Julia, as I learned from her as we walked in the garden, was very happy. She loved her husband, on account of his noble spirit, from the bottom of her heart; but, for her brother-in-law, the red-coat, she had the tender, unbounded reverence of a child. He had, as she told me, travelled for a long time, and now lived in Poland, on a small estate, near her husband's, a beneficent philosopher, dividing his time between books and agricultural pursuits. She talked of him with a sort of enthusiasm, and maintained that a nobler man did not live on the earth; whereupon, I made to myself the useful remark, that we must not trust to physiognomy too blindly.

"Why, then, did you ask me, in Prague?" said I, afterwards, to the estimable red-coat, "the mysterious question, 'Do you know me now, and what I want of you?' These words struck me in Prague, and afterwards were echoed, most loudly, in my dream."

"Good heavens!" said he, "I wanted to tell you, when I brought the pocketbook, what my business was, and to intimate to you that I was the finder, that you might put confidence in me, and give me some token of your loss; but you held back, as though I was the most suspicious of mortals. At the same time, I saw you were uneasy, and yet could not doubt but that I had found the right man."

I now told him my dream. "Long live the Walpurgis spirits!" said he; "the dream deserves to be made a chapter on moral philosophy and psychology. If you do not recollect it to the letter, I will write it down, and send it to you in print. There are wondrous golden lessons in it. I am glad, at any rate, that I have the honour to shine as an angel of light at the conclusion; otherwise, I should just wish your Walpurgis-night dream to be further spoken of."

We spent a happy day together; I with the truly wise man-devil—Fanny with Julia.

As we separated at evening, we accompanied our dear guests. Fanny said to me, as we stood at the post-house door, "Here we will take leave, and not accompany the fair temptation further. Thy Walpurgis-dream contains good lessons for me, too."

"Do you not know me now, sir, and what thy Fanny wants of you?"

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

THE HUMMING-BIRD.

THE brilliant and lively race of humming-birds, so remarkable at once for their beautiful colours and diminutive size, are the peculiar natives of the American continent, and adjoining islands; and, with few exceptions, are principally confined to the hotter regions. Their vivacity, swiftness and singular appearance, unite in rendering them the admiration of mankind; while their colonies are so salient, that it is not by comparing them with the analogous lines of other birds that we are enabled to explain, with propriety, their peculiar splendour; but by the more exalted brilliancy of polished metals and precious stones: the ruby, the garnet, the sapphire, the emerald, the topaz, and polished gold, being considered as the most proper objects of elucidation.

It is not, however, to be imagined that all the species of humming-birds are thus decorated; some being obscure in their colours, and, instead of the prevailing splendour of the major part of the genus, exhibiting only a faint appearance of a golden green tinge, diffused over the brown or purplish colour of the back and wings. The genus is of great extent, and, in order that the species may, with greater readiness, be investigated, it has been found necessary to divide them into two sections, viz.: the curved-billed, and the straight-billed. The exact limits of the two divisions are, however, difficult to determine.

The mode of life in the humming-birds appears to be uniform. They live by absorbing the sweet juices of flowers, which they extract with their tubular tongue; and though small insects are said to have been sometimes observed in their stomachs, yet this seems rather accidental than regular or natural.

A magnificent work has lately appeared on this genus, by M. Sr. Vieillot and Audubon, in which a laudable attempt has been made to exhibit the splendour of the natural colours, by means of powder or shell gold, impressed on the plates. It must be confessed that it has not succeeded, in all instances, as completely as might be wished. The work, however, is extremely valuable, not only as containing good figures of the major part of the established species, but also of numerous varieties; and is preceded by an elaborate and ingenious dissertation, relative to the structure of the feathers, and many other particulars.

It may not be unamusing to the reader to place after this the parallel account of Buffon, which, though not in the most full-dressed style of French author, contains one or two passages which remind one of Sterne's way of "immersing in the ocean," when contrasted with the more English style of Dr. Shaw. We quote

Buffon from an English translation, not happening to have the original at hand:

"Of all animated beings, the fly-bird (Oiseau mouche, angl. humming-bird) is the most elegant in its form, and the most brilliant in its colours. The precious stones and metals polished by art, cannot be compared to this sort of nature. Her miniature productions are ever the most wonderful; she has placed it in the order of birds, at the bottom of the scale of magnitude; but all the talents which are only shared among the others, humbleness, rapidity, sprightliness, grace, and rich decoration, she has bestowed profusely upon this little favourite. The emerald, the ruby, the lapis, sparkle in its plumage, which is never soiled by the dust of the ground. It inhabits the air; it flutters from flower to flower; it breathes their freshness; it feeds on their nectar, and resides in climates where they blow in perpetual succession. It is in the hottest part of the new world that all the species of the fly-birds are found. They are numerous, and seem confined between the two tropics; for those which penetrate, in summer, within the temperate zones, make but a short stay. They follow the course of the sun; with him they advance and retire; they fly on the wings of the zephyr, to scintillate in eternal spring."

At this, methinks we hear a French critic exclaim, exquisite, beautiful, delightful vein of eloquence! Not so the more philistine English. The bird-orator proceeded:

"The Indians, struck with the dazzle and glow of the colours of these brilliant birds, have named them the beams or locks of the sun. The Spaniards call them toninnes, on account of their diminutive size, toninne signifying a weight of twelve grains. I saw, says McRemy, one of these birds weighed, with its nest, and the whole together did not amount to two toninnes. The smaller species do not exceed the bulk of the great gad-fly, or the thickness of the drone. Their bill is a fine needle, and their tongue a delicate thread: their little black eyes resemble two brilliant points: the feathers of their wings are so thin as to look transparent; hardly can the feet be perceived, so short are they, and so slender; and these are little used, for they rest only during the night. Their flight is buzzing, continued and rapid. Marenge compares the noise of their wings to the whirr of a spinning-wheel; so rapid is the quiver of their pinions, that when the bird halts in the air, it seems, at once deprived of motion and life. Thus it rests a few seconds beside a flower, and again shoots to another, like a gleam. It visits them all, thrusting its little tongue into their bosom, and carressing them with its tongue; it never settles, but it never quite abandons them. Its playful inconstancy multiplies its innocent pleasures; for the dalliance of this little lover of flowers never spoils their beauty."

Bravo, M. le Comte! "A little French gallantry to crown all! Goldsmith, though an excellent poet, is not half so poetical. He says, with more precision, perhaps, than any other describer:

"They who imagine they have a complete idea of the little tribe of mankind birds, (the probably includes the creepers,) from the pictures we have of them, will find themselves deceived, when they compare their drafts with nature. The shining green, the emerald purple, and the glassy red, are beyond the reach of the pencil; and very far beyond the coloured pump which is but a poor substitute to painting."

Dr. S. has very properly cautioned his readers that they are not to expect an equal degree of brilliancy in all the humming-birds, and that some are even of dusky colour. The shining green, the emerald purple, and the glassy red, are beyond the reach of the pencil; and very far beyond the coloured pump which is but a poor substitute to painting."

LAST MOMENTS.

The manner in which remarkable persons have met the great enemy of mankind, would form a curious history. To contemplate the different moods and tempers with which frivolity and philosophy have met the king of terrors—whether the one has displayed great weakness, or the other the greatest strength of his great change—to ascertain whether the bold recklessness of the pygmalion, who has through life scoffed at the dangers and perils of death, has accompanied his last moments—or whether the equanimity with which the good man has contemplated the change while health seemed to place it at a distance, has deserted him in the hour of trial—would be a curious speculation, and form a great moral lesson to mankind.

Gallani, when dying, said, "The dead had sent him a card of invitation."

Wood died clasping in his dying hand the papers of the Athenæ Oxoniensis. Here was the ruling passion strong in death.

A Dane, condemned to death, thus addressed his executioner:—"Be quick in cutting off my head, for we have often debated at Tonsburg whether any service is returned after the head is off. I will grasp the knife, and I will see if my head is off. If I let it drop, it will prove the contrary. Make haste, therefore, and end the dispute."

George Keith, a marshal of Scotland, when dying abroad, sent for Mr. Elliot, the British envoy:—"I have sent for you, sir," said he, with his usual gravity, "because I think it pleasant enough that the minister of King George should receive the last breath of an old Jacobite. Besides, you may perhaps have some commissions to give me to Lord Chatham; and as I lay my account for seeing him to-morrow, or the day after, I will carry my despatches with great pleasure."

James Butler, second Duke of Ormonde—famed for his extraordinary politeness, and who died at Madrid in 1745—when he was in the agony of death, expressed the expression of his countenance in his pain might shock the friends standing by his bedside, said, as his last words, "Messieurs, j'espère que vous excuserez la grimace."

Haller died feeling his own pulse, and when he found it almost gone, said to his physician, "My friend, the artery ceases to beat."

Lord Cobham, of whom Pope says that his last words were—"Save my country, heaven!" not being able to carry a glass of jelly to his mouth, was in such a passion at feeling his own weakness, that he threw jelly and glass into Lady C's face, and expired.

EMPLOYMENT FOR THE UNHAPPY.

The unhappy are indisposed to employment: all occupations are wearisome and disgusting, in prospect, at a time when everything, even life itself, is full of weariness and disgust. Yet, the unhappy must be employed, or they will go mad. Comparatively blessed are they, if they are set in families where claims and duties abound, and cannot be escaped. In the pressure of business there is present safety, and ultimate relief. Harder is the lot of those who have few necessary occupations, enforced by other claims than their own harmlessness and profitableness. Reading often falls: now and then it may beguile; but much oftener the attention is languid, the thoughts wander, and associations with the subject of grief are awakened. Women, who find that reading will not do, will obtain no relief in sewing: sewing is pleasant enough, in moderation, to those whose minds are at ease the while; but, it is an employment which is trying to the nerves, when long continued, at the best; and nothing can be worse for the harassed, and for those who want to escape from themselves. Writing is bad: the pen hangs idly suspended over the paper, or the sad thoughts write themselves down. The safest and best of all occupations, for such sufferers as are fit for it, is intercourse with young children. An infant might beguile Satan and his peers, the day after they were couched on the lake of fire, if the love of children gladdened to linger amid the rums of their angelic nature. Gardening is excellent, because it unites bodily exertion with a sufficient engagement of the faculties, while sweet compassionate nature is ministering sleep to every spouting leaf and scented blossom, and beckoning sleep to draw nigh, and be ready to follow up her benignant work. Walking is good: not stepping from shop to shop, or from neighbour to neighbour, but stretching out far into the country to the furthest fields, the highest ridge, and the quietest lanes. However selfish the imagination may have been, however its gaze at home, here it cheers up and smiles. However listless the limbs may have been when sustaining a too heavy heart, here they are braced, and the lagging gait becomes buoyant again. However perverse the memory may have been in presenting all that was non-zening, and insisting only on what cannot be retrieved, here it is first disregarded, and then it sleeps; and the sleep of the memory is the day in Paradise to the unhappy. The mere breathing of the cool wind on the face, in the commonest highway, is rest and comfort, which must be felt at such times to be believed. The fields are better still; for there is the lark to fill up the hours with mirthful music, or, at worst, the robin and the flock of fieldlarks, to show that the hardest day has its life and hilarity. But the calmest region is the woodland, where the rained rooves from the peasant's nest to the spire town—from the school-house to the church-yard—from the diminished team in the patch of fallow, or the fisherman's boat in the cove, to the viaduct that spans the valley, or the fleet that glides, ghost-like, on the horizon.

I LIKE RAILROADS.

Any-one can hate railroads, despise railroads, and rail at railroads—but I like railroads. I like to arrive at a railroad-office a quarter of an hour before starting; I like to be shown into a nice warm room, where a quarter of an hour passes quicker than five minutes in a dirty coach-office, or a coffee-room, where the waiters try to look you into a glass of brandy and water, for the sake of the house, or out of a suspicion for the sake of themselves. I like to go in at one door and out at the other—a thing you can never do in a prison. I like to have my luggage and baggage taken from me when it is taken care of, and have to have it waited on the top of a coach, or stolen from the coach-office while the book-keeper is looking at some lady at a crossing, who does not wish to wet the fountains of her gown. I like to have to do with porters who charge nothing for being civil, and cannot put their hands in their breeches-pockets, which is a vulgar and idle habit. I like to wait for anything. Men must wait, and horses must; and pretty women must wait, when agreeable young men, whom they admire, are engaged to charming young women; (precisely my case.) But steamcoaches know no dependence, and are never in love. I like the ample room of a steamcoach, where there is no necessity for your neighbour, should he be old and ugly, to lay her soft head upon your soft shoulder. I like to travel fast. I dread vicious horses; I feel for distressed ones. I hate going down-hill—drag-chain breaking, coach upsetting, coachman dying, leaving a wife and twelve children; myself with a broken leg, going to be married next week!

THE AUTHOR OF CATLINE.

Dr. Croly appears to great advantage in private conversation, provided the right means be taken to draw him out. Few men enjoy a joke at the dinner-table with greater zest. He is generally the lion of the party.

He loves occasionally to take advantage of the homage accorded to him in this way, by working up the expectation of something brilliant, to the highest pitch, and then saying some ludicrous thing. Some time ago he was at dinner in the house of a friend; when the conversation of the party, which I should observe consisted exclusively of literary men, turned on the important discoveries which had of late years been made in the arts and sciences. "And now, gentlemen," said Dr. Croly, "what do you consider the greatest discovery of the present day?" Some mentioned discoveries in chemistry, some in mechanics; some named the discovery of the power of steam, and some that of flying through the air in balloons. It is a word, there was scarcely a discovery of any importance, which has been made in the present day which was not mentioned by some one or other of the gentlemen present, as the greatest discovery. "But, Dr. Croly," said one of the company, after everybody else had expressed their opinions on the subject, "you have not told us what you deem the greatest discovery of the present age." "Oh," said the doctor, with the greatest gravity possible, "if my opinion on the point is thought worthy of anything, it is quite at the service of the company. It is certainly very different from any opinion I have heard this night expressed." There was a breathless silence to hear what the reverend gentleman's opinion was. "My decided conviction, gentlemen," resumed Dr. Croly, "is, that the immeasurably the greatest discovery which the present age has witnessed, is that of roasting potatoes in tin canisters, in the streets. A potstove toasted in this way is the greatest luxury I ever tasted, especially if eaten on a cold night as you walk along the streets." A loud and universal burst of laughter greeted the delivery of the odd conception. It was felt to be a new illustration of the old affair of a Rodin's trumpets preceding the entrance of Tom Thum.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

A SABBATH HYMN FOR A SICK CHAMBER.—BY JAMES MONTGOMERY.

THOU HAST, O Lord of hosts! this day

Around thine altar meet:

And tens of thousands throng to pay

Their homage at thy feet.

They see thy power and glory there,

As I have seen them too;

They read, they hear, they join in prayer,

As I was wont to do.

They sing thy deeds, as I have sung,

In sweet and solemn lays.

Were I among them, my glad tongue

Might learn new themes of praise.

For thou art in the midst, to teach,

When thou thy name they call;

And thou hast blessings, Lord, for each;

Hast blessings, Lord, for all.

I, of such fellowship bereft,

In spirit turn to thee.

A blessing, Lord, for me!

The dew has thick on all the ground,

Shall my poor fleece be dry?

The manna rains from heaven around,

Shall I of hunger die?

Behold thy prisoner; loose my bonds,

If 'tis thy gracious will.

If not, contented in thy hands,

Behold, thy prisoner still!

I may not to thy courts repair,

Yet here thou surely art.

Lord, consecrate a house of prayer

In my surrendered heart.

To faith reveal the things unseen:

To hope the joys unfold;

Let love without a veil between,

This glory now behold.

Oh! make thy face on me to shine,

That doubt and fear may cease;

Lift up thy countenance benign

On me, and give me peace.

INDISTINCTIBILITY OF MIND.

Man, at the age of twenty, retains not a particle of matter in which his mind was invested when he was born. Nevertheless, at the age of eighty years, he is conscious of being the same individual he was as far back as his memory can go—that is to say, to the period when he was four or five years old. Whatever it be, therefore, in which this consciousness of fidelity resides, it cannot consist of a material substance, since, had it been material, it must have been repeatedly changed; and the source of identity must have been destroyed. It is, consequently, an ethereal spirit, and as it remains the same, throughout all the alterations that can take place in the body, it is not dependent on the body for its existence; and is thus calculated to survive the ever-changing frame by which it is encased. The frame becomes stiff, cold, and motionless, when the circulation of the blood ceases; it is conigned to the earth, and is separated by insects into a thousand other forms of matter; but the mind undergoes no such transformation; it is unassailable by worms. If matter, subject as it is to perpetual changes, do not, and cannot, possibly, perish, how can the mind perish, which knows of no mutation? There is no machinery prepared, by which such an object could be accomplished; nor could machinery be prepared for such a purpose, without an entire subversion of the laws of nature. But as these laws emanated from the wisdom of the Creator, they could not be altered, much less subverted, without involving the inconsistency, into which it is impossible for Divine wisdom to fall.

GRACE BEFORE MEALS.

The most ancient example, perhaps, to be met with of a grace, or short prayer before meat, is at the feast which Ptolemy Philadelphus gave to the seventy-two interpreters; and it is thus mentioned by Josephus:—"When they were thus sat down, he (viz., Nicæon, who had been appointed by Ptolemy) bade Dorotheus attend to all those that were come to him from Judea, after the manner they used to be mustered to in their own country. For which cause he sent away their sacred heralds, and those that slew the sacrifices, and the rest that used to say grace; but called one of those that were come to him, whose name was Eleazar, a priest, and desired him to say grace, who then stood in the midst of them and prayed. 'That all prosperity might attend the king, and those that were his subjects.' Thereupon an acclamation was made by the whole company, and when that was over they began to sup." The next example we have is the practice of the Essenes, both before and after meat related in Josephus's "Jewish War;" and the next is that of our Saviour, Mark vii. 8. And we have also a form of grace or prayer for Christians at the end of the fifth book of the Apostolical Constitutions, which seems to have been intended both for before and after meat.

THE CONNECTION OF INDUSTRY WITH HEALTH.

Persons whose circumstances enable them to dispense with labour, and who, having no activity of mind, pass their days in listless idleness, are, of all men, least to be envied. Not only are they too frequently led into various infirmities to health, but the nervous system, becomes the victim of sloth—mania, hypochondria, indigestion, afflict these unhappy mortals, who not seldom put an end to their miserable existence by suicide. Let the man who depends for subsistence upon the toil of his muscles or of his brain, console himself by pondering on these facts; and let those who are independent of labour recollect that man is of social being, and that the Creator has ordained that useful exertion is essential to individual happiness.

READING.

No entertainment is so cheap as reading, nor any pleasure so lasting.

STANZAS,

IN RETURN FOR A RING BEARING THE IMPRESS "FORGET ME NOT."

"FORGET me not!"—Ah, words of useless warning
To one whose heart is henceforth memory's shrine!
Sooner the lark might fail to greet the morning,
Than I forget to think of thee and thine.
Sooner the sunflower might forget to waken
At the first radiance from the god of light,
Than I, by treasured thoughts of thee forsaken,
Part with the recollections now so bright.
"Forget thee not!"—When strong winds wildly sweeping,
Drive our lost ship along the stormy sea;
When to the clouds the foam-topped waves are leaping,
Amid the tumult, I will think of thee.
Oft, when at night, the lonely deck I'm pacing,
Or gaze on some effulgent, tremulous star;
Perhaps past scenes of happiness retracing—
How can I then forget thee, though afar?
Thy image in my dearest, brightest hours,
Will burst like sudden sunshine on my mind;
Or like the balmy breath of summer flowers,
Borne from some isle of verdure on the wind.
And, ah! sweet lady, when from home departed,
I count the weary leagues I am from thee,
And feel quite thoughtful and impatient-hearted,
Say, wilt thou sometimes—sometimes think of me!
Sometimes at evening, when the wine-cup passes,
And pleasant friends are met in social glee,
O, midst the flash of wit, the flash of glasses,
Lavish one kind remembrance upon me.
O, I shall not forget thee! and may heaven
See thee, by every joy of life caress'd,
And unto me, at least may it be given,
To know, whatever my fate, that thou art bless'd.
Farewell! my father-land is disappearing,
Faster and faster from my straining sight;
The breeze is freshening, and thick clouds are rearing
Their ebullient flags to hasten on the night.
Farewell! the pilot leaves us—onward gliding,
Our brave ship dashes through the angry swell,
Sustained by hope—remembering—still confiding,
I'll not forget—friend of my soul! farewell!

ORIGINAL LETTERS FROM ENGLAND.

LONDON.

"Nothing new under the sun"—Fashion—Novels—Literary Copyright—Haynes Bayly—Richelieu—Lady Bulwer.

Two sparrows are not more alike than is one London spring to another. Nature's spring varies, but the town spring of eighteen hundred and thirty-nine is pretty much the same as the town spring of eighteen hundred and nineteen. There is the same ceaseless din, bustle and confusion; whether arising from the pursuit of business or pleasure, and about the same number of people are run over in Regent-street. The same quantities of fair forms and fair faces are whirled round the parks in the morning by their horses, and whirled round the rooms at Almack's at night by their partners. There is the same display of "beauty and fashion" at the opera; the Court Gazette records about an average quantity of "Marriages in High Life," and the ordinary number of "Extraordinary Elopements" and "Delicate (query) Investigations." True, the actors change—fops flourish and fade, and beauties bud, and bloom, and wither; belles become grandmothers, and babies belles—but events and outward appearances are the same. The "World of Fashion" announces the same round of old novelties—hats a little larger, coat tails a little smaller, or vice versa; gown skirts wider and sleeves narrower, or sleeves narrower and skirts wider; the fashionable colours of last year are of course odious this, and the fashionable colours of this year will of course be odious next; and so on until they have rung the changes upon the colours, and what is now only odious again becomes fashionable.

Fashion! most capricious yet monotonous goddess! how stale are thy tricks, how old and dull thy inventions! Yet how imperative art thou—how overbearing—how all-powerful! A single touch of thy wand, and reason, common-sense, and propriety lie prostrate.

Dames of France—arbitresses of civilized society—be judicious in your decrees—merciful in your modes. Mar not nature's workmanship overmuch!

In literature there is not much of novelty this year either. The publishers announce about the average quantity of extraordinarily clever novels, and the usual number of illustrations "little knowns," who, according to the modest paragraphs at the corners of the London newspapers, are ordained to create a prodigious sensation, and make Bulwer and Boz "look to their laurels." They have left off threatening Scott.

"Dunston is in his grave;
After life's fitful fever he sleeps well."

The tricks of publishers cannot "touch him farther." They touched him nearly and deeply enough in his life-time, in all conscience.

I suppose you will have prated and performed Bulwer's "Richelieu" by this time. It is worth honestly paying for. But then, alas! how can that poor indigent creature, the public, be expected to pay such an affluent, purse-proud set of authors for their labours! It is unreasonable to expect such a thing. And yet some people pretend that the public is selfish, dishonest, and inconsistent in appropriating the fruits of one man's brain, while they respect the labour of another's hand. But may not "sweet charity" suggest a better motive on the part of the much-abused public. It is well-known that race-horses and greyhounds are kept thin and spare by the judicious people who have the charge of them, in order to enable them to fulfil the ends for which they are allowed to live with greater ability. May not this be the feeling of the public towards authors! It may be fearful that if authors were paid in full for their labours, they would over-diet themselves, grow lazy and luxurious; and then what would become of their laurels and the public's amusement! It is, perhaps, then an anxious solicitude for their good which causes the far-seeing public to retain nine-tenths of the short-sighted author's earnings for its own use and benefit. It makes the complaining tribe work harder, and rack their brains more than they would otherwise do. And if they happen to have a wife and family dependent upon their exertions, so much the better; it makes them work harder still, and rack their brains still more. Perhaps ill-health is the consequence, and they pine for a little rest and leisure. Let them not be indulged. Will rest and leisure make their laurels grow, or supply the public with novelties? Certainly not. And as for ill-health, it has been held by many eminent physicians that ill-health quickens the fancy, stimulates the imagination, causes a preternatural development of the energies of the brain, and is productive of a nervous acuteness of feeling such as cannot be expected from a strong, robust person.

But then it may be contended that this may kill the man before his time. Well, suppose it does. What is one individual in comparison with the public good? And do not the newspapers speak well of him after he is gone; and does not the public, who retained the greater portion of his hard-earned earnings in its hand for his own good, provide "places of refuge for the poor and destitute," wherein his weeping widow and fatherless children may hide their heads? And if any improper feeling of pride prevents the widow from seeking one of those sheltering recesses with her family, but causes her rather to subsist in a state of semi starvation by her own exertions, is the public to be blamed for her squeamishness, forsooth! Oh! no.

Generous public! Unreasonable, ungrateful authors! But one suggestion may be made to that public, which, as it is for its own benefit, it may perhaps attend to. In its solicitude to keep authors poor and in proper writing trim, it may overdo the thing, and kill the goose—(for what are many authors but gifted geese—creatures who cannot take care of themselves)—for the sake of the golden eggs. The records of literature are not by any means barren of cases in point; and in our own time, the public, nearly—very nearly—lost the "Parish Register," the "Borough," the "Tales of the Hall," and the rest of those vivid and startling pictures of human life from the pen of "Nature's sternest painter, yet her best," by too rigid an application of the starving system. The laurel is a poisonous plant. It is very well as an ornament; but when a man has to live upon his laurels, he speedily declines housekeeping, and goes to seek a better provision in, it is to be hoped, a better world.

These reflections have led me away from Richelieu, and before I return to it, I may mention, as a pendant to the above, that Haynes Bayly, the popular song writer, died a few days ago at Cheltenham. The newspapers announce his death in too common terms—"Mr Bayly has been for some time in a declining state of health, and in reduced circumstances." That is quite sufficient. A volume of sorrow and suffering is comprised in that brief sentence.

Bayly, though no world's wonder, was a man of ability. We all recollect when "Oh! no! we never mention her," was sung by all who could sing, played by all who could play, and whistled by those who could do neither the one nor the other; and his "Isle of Beauty," and other songs, were deservedly popular, at least as compared with nine-tenths of our modern ditties. He succeeded to a certain degree, in a very difficult line; for though it is very easy to write a song, it is very difficult to write a good one. If any rhymer doubts the assertion, let him try.

Richelieu is perhaps the best of Bulwer's dramas, and it is a good sign when a man's last is his best. In the development of female character it is far behind the "Lady of Lyons," or even the "Duchess de La Valliere," Julia Montemar being a mere novelty, and a most unnatural French maid of honour of that period. The character of the cardinal, however, is capital, and it is not exactly true to history, is perhaps truer than history. "It is true to nature, as perverted by art, courts, and the world, and true to itself. Mr. Bulwer, too, has also not placed over great reliance upon mere poetry, smooth lines, and flowing periods. He has condensed to study etate effect, and has studied it to some purpose. His plot is not too intricate, nor yet too meagre, and if his incidents follow each other in rather over-rapid succession, they are at all events skilfully managed. His kings are his least successful sketches, for they cannot be called portraits. Of Louis the Thirteenth, in the present play, the mere tool of his principal characters, he could not be expected to make much, but then he is absolutely nothing; and his Louis the Fourteenth, in his first dramatic effort, the most gay and gallant man of his time, is a more stately puppy; a cold, princely piece of ostentation, unworthy the love of any true woman. However, if Bulwer goes on improving, as he is likely to do, he will soon be as unquestionably successful as a dramatic writer, as he is at present as a novelist.

* This letter, which bears the date of April, was not received till a few days ago.

I see his lady, as if determined not to let her liege lord have the field all to himself, has broken herself to novel writing also, and has come out with her three volumes of quantity, whatever may be the quality. Of the latter I know nothing, not having read her ladyship's effort, and I dislike opinions gleaned from newspapers and reviews, and plead guilty to the singularity of not feeling competent to criticise a book, the leaves of which I have not cut open. It is entitled "Chevrolet, or the Man of Honour." Heaven forefend, however, that it be too clever, or man and wife will be jealous of each other's popularity.

It perhaps would have been as good taste to have been satisfied with a reflected honour, and to have been contented to be known as the wife of the author of Renzi. But if the baronet's lady be determined upon the wearing of blue stockings, far be it from any one but her husband to insist upon her wearing white ones.

ORIGINAL TALES.

QUITE A PRETTY PROPERTY.

BY HENRY STANHOPE LEE.

CHAPTER V.

A dash preliminary and sketches by candlelight. Harry begins to suspect his situation, and conducts accordingly.

HARRY had an eye for beauty, and the interesting companion of his tete-a-tete was radiant. With a figure petite and slender, the most gracefully-curved neck in the world, to say nothing of swimming, hazel eyes, that were enough to turn a steady brain than Harry Singleton's, she was a sufficiently dangerous companion for a young man of pretty property.

Mrs. Million played her cards dexterously. Clara Wells was introduced. The assigned motive of Mrs. Million was a sufficient veil for all her future operations. From a masked battery, she pointed all her female artillery against her hero. Was there a play to be seen, Harry was, of course, in requisition, as the gallant of the wealthy Georgian; but it was always arranged that his seat in the box should be by the side of Mary. Was there a ball, his hand for the first dance was for the protégée of Mrs. Million—but his curtailed tete-a-tete for the daughter.

"A dear creature, is she not?" said Mary, as she was playing with the neck of an eagle that had been just cut from the iced effigy at the supper-table. It was at one of Mrs. Peacock's music-parties.

Harry followed the eyes of the speaker, and saw them resting upon Clara. He could not avoid the contrast. Mary intended that it should be drawn. "Very dear, Miss Million, she is your cousin."

It was the first time that he had ventured on even so distant a suggestion. Mary was quick at drawing inferences, and looked tenderly confused. She was as entirely collected as the small coin of a congregation on a begging Sunday; she was brought up to be so. She handed the hardly-touched-ice to her chevalier, whose heart was dissolving much more rapidly than the cream. In the act she dropped her handkerchief. Harry was on his knee, and remained there for his princess to receive his trophy from him in that attitude of submission.

"You shall be rewarded for your gallantry," says the lady, with a smile, and taking a rose-bud from her bouquet, dropped it at her feet. The gift was accepted more tenderly than it was bestowed. Harry was really in trepidation. He was ready to swear perpetual fidelity on the spot. But his fate was deferred—not evaded. One of those bores who infest society, and take a malicious pleasure in interrupting agreeable interviews, made a most inopportune intrusion. He took the words from Harry's lips.

Pardon me for disturbing a flirtation, Mrs. Million, but it is quite too selfish in Mr. Singleton to appropriate you exclusively, when there is a room-fall below waiting for the song you promised us. I have been formally deputed to escort you to the piano." He extended his arm as he spoke.

Harry was provoked at his impertinence, but was silent. He fondly imagined that the lady would plead hoarseness and fatigue. How men in love will deceive themselves! Mary looked at the parties half a moment in silence, then laughing, took the proffered arm of the intruder. "It might make my cousin jealous if I should decline this invitation," said Mary, beckoning to the young mistress of half the plantations of the county. She was woman enough to know that an occasional pique gives a most decided impulse to an affair of the heart. With a reluctance which it required all his politeness to conceal, Harry very courteously offered the expected service, and taking on his arm the opulent lass of the south, followed the captive and her kidnapper to the drawing-room.

His mood, however, was far from amiable. Mary, of course, sang like an angel; it is expected of all young ladies. But if a choir were assembled, of all the angelic singers of my acquaintance, what harmonious discord they would make of it! The more Mary sang like an angel, the more Harry felt like its antipode. I am confident that my last pronoun is strictly accurate. There is some pretence that angels are all of the feminine gender. I am willing to compromise the matter, and adopt the neuter. The idea of a male angel is among the impossibles.

Every word and look that Mary returned for the many kind speeches and glances that were lavished upon her for those touching little songs, was galled and bitterness to Harry. He could not understand what right she had to receive them so graciously. Standing at some distance from the instrument, he watched the play of her fingers, and still more narrowly the play of her countenance. She was evidently pleased with the flatteries and nonsense that the coxcombs about her were pouring into a facile ear. They only meant to be polite. Harry was ready to challenge the whole of them, individually and collectively. "Puppies—puppies!" he muttered be-twen his teeth. It was an insult that they should dare even to admire, but profanation that they should be permitted to address her. Mary was not thinking of them, or of her songs. Her reflections were all wandering to the "young man of very pretty property," who was standing in a corner, looking and feeling as yellow as a dusty caste of the dying gladiator. Mary was as lovely and as cold as the last statue of Greenwich. I believe she was the very lady, by the way, who suggested that it would be delicate to drape the chanting cherubs. So much for education!

Mary knew very well what she was about, and when a clever young officer, who had just distinguished himself in killing Indians, was listened to with a smiling attention much more intense than was at all necessary, under all the circumstances, Harry's patience was quite exhausted. He strode across the room with a flushed face and curling lip, and made his way to the supper-room. I have noticed that this is a favourite retreat of the jealous and unhappy. Does not your experience coincide with mine in this matter?

"Hang the woman!" exclaimed Harry, as he entered the now deserted supper-room. He meant so, religiously, but he ought have kept it to himself. It is always hazardous to soliloquize. Trees have ears and brooks tongues, but humanity has a reader aural, and is a more babbling linguist.

"Amen!" responded a friendly voice to the pious ejaculation of the disconsolate. The soft soot by the door Harry passed without perceiving that it was occupied. Even had he been aware that he was not alone, he could hardly have restrained the smothered and hearty expression of his real sentiment for the time being.

"I'll join in a bumper to that toast of yours, if you will only strike out the definite article and apply it to the sex." Mr. Dangle was another of the disconsolate—for this night only. Piqued lovers are very savage animals. Mr. Dangle was desperate. Harry was absolutely dangerous. There they stood—a couple of them. We must take a sly glance, however, for they will resent anything that appears like impertinent observation.

Harry knew that he was expected to escort the ladies home—Mrs. Milford had offered him a seat in her carriage with Clara. He would have given up his nightly cigar for the pleasure, and consider it no sacrifice. But he was in a positive rage. He called down general imprecations on everybody and everything within the range of his imagination or memory. The oysters were cold, the ice was warm, the Madeira was corky, the Sherry tasted like brandy and water, and the Champagne wine was very new Newark cider. Jealousy deranges the palate, as much as it jaudices the countenance. "Fool, fool that I am," thought Harry; "fool, fool, to be so pestered by a coquette. Why, why should I be so bothered? There are prettier girls in society than Mary Milford—richer girls—wittier—more sensible—better matches," as the world say, in all respects, and unreluctant to receive the addresses of less likely lovers than Harry Singleton," and his eye ran through a vista of ice pyramids, fruit-baskets and candelabras, and rested in a momentary satisfaction on the dazzling mirror beyond them.

It would not answer. Mary Milford was still the star of the ascendant, though veiled in a most inauspicious cloud. Champagne has no particular tendency to soothe irritation, and, to his astonishment, Harry found that he had made some progress in a second bottle. He made a desperate effort. "It may annoy her—and it certainly will surprise her!"—thought Harry, and he left the supper-room. Giving his cap a knowing and jaunty slant, and throwing his cloak over his arm, he passed Mary with her cousin on the stairs as they were just seeking the retiring chamber for their shawls. Mary could not help looking half-reproachfully, and Harry passed her with the most humble obeisance and most gracious smile, looking and feeling all the while like a musket charged to the muzzle with ball cartridges, and ready to go off at a moment's warning.

"Drive me to the Tremont." It was past eleven when he reached the portico.

"At what time shall I call, sir?" said Jehu, most respectfully, for he had reason to remember that he had been driving a young man of "very pretty property."

"At eleven to-morrow. But it's of no consequence. Go to thy lodgings in the morning, and send Tom to me."

It was a dirty night, a very black-guard sort of night. As it was set down in the calendar for a moon, the gas-saving mayor and aldermen had not seen fit to illuminate its darkness. It was not till the last rattle of the carriage wheels had died away on the pavement, that Harry suddenly be thought himself—"What the deuce did I come here for?" It was no place for any very long self-examination, so he dragged himself lazily up stairs to find a satisfactory response for his interrogatories.

He paced doggedly once or twice across the entry without recognizing any of the gentlemen who crossed his path. He tried the door of the supper-room, and was very glad to find it locked. He walked into the reading-room to find some one to have a chat with, to his great satisfaction it was occupied by entire strangers. He next passed to the smoking-room, but its only remaining inmates were half a dozen land-speculators, who were very busy over a map—talking of water-courses, saw-mills, so many thousand feet per acre, and the whole dog-cheap at ten dollars. Harry turned on his foot, and cursed all Maine from Portland to the disputed territory, and more particularly the city of Bangor. He had just paid, by the advice of his former guardian, ten thousand dollars to get his neck out of an eastern speculation. If he could have found a provocation, he would have been well pleased to have got into a quarrel with them. He next strayed to the bar—for the use of the house only. John was just turning the screw of the last gas-light; he thought it quite time for all honest people to be in bed. There was no one to drink with him, and Harry called for a light.

"What number, John?"

"Peter! bring a candle, and show Mr. Singleton to number seven."

Mr. Singleton passed up one flight of stairs. "Peter!" said he, "how far is it up?"

"Up one more flight, sir."

"Well, I'm not going to sleep up two flights of stairs to-night. I've changed my mind. Run down to Niles's and send me a carriage."

Peter took his hat and descended obediently into the porch, while Mr. Singleton paced the entry. After two or three minutes, Peter returned with the information that Niles was closed, and no carriage was to be had for love or money. Not that Peter had been such a fool as to wade through the gutters at that time of the night to ascertain this, but he felt justified under the circumstances in assuming the truth of his assertion.

"Niles is shut up, sir, and no carriage to be had, Mr. Singleton."

"Well, I'll walk."

"Very stormy night, sir; very wet and dirty. Good chamber up stairs, sir."

"Peter, I'll not go up another flight of stairs to-night, to sleep on a bed of down, sustained by pillars of gold and ivory."

Indignation makes a man eloquent even with porters and valets. Harry carried through his resolution. It was dark as Erebus. The rain poured in torrents. The streets were overflowed. Harry was in silks and pumps, and yet in a mood of mind when he derived a sensible satisfaction in making such a pilgrimage, in preference to a comfortable bed under a dry roof. It really seemed to him that all this self-punishment was a revenge upon Mary Milford, for her neglect and heartlessness.

SPIRIT OF THE PARISIAN JOURNALS.

NOVELTIES FROM THE FRENCH.

Translated for the New York Mirror.

ARAB HORSES.

EL KHAÏL is the generic name given by the Arabs to the horse. They are divided into five great races, which are kept distinct with the greatest care, and which are said to be descended from the five favourite mares of the prophet.

While Europeans agree with Buffon in deeming "the conquest of the horse to be the greatest one ever made by man," they are far from regarding their useful servant with the affection felt for him by Eastern nations. The Arabs do not regard the usefulness of the horse alone; they look upon him as nobler and more intelligent than all other animals: they say, "next to man, comes the horse; the noblest of employments is to rear him; the pleasantest of situations, a seat on his back; the most praiseworthy of household duties, to feed him." "A man gains daily," says the prophet, "as many indulgences as there are grains in the ration of barley he gives his horse." Mahomet describes the creation of the animal thus: "When God wished to create the horse, he called for the south wind, and said, I will form, out of thy substance, a new creature; lay aside thy fluidity; and he was obeyed. Then he took a handful of this new substance thus made solid, and breathed upon it, and the horse arose; and the Lord said to him, thou shalt be a fountain of wealth and honour unto man, and he shall be glorified in mounting upon thee."

The Arab horses are generally of delicate constitution, but inured to fatigue, of wonderful speed, with small bellies and ears, and a short and tapering tail. These are the principal marks by which they can be readily distinguished. "We may add, that they are almost always free from anything like deformity, and so tame and gentle that they are groomed and led about by women and children, and often sleep under the same tent with them. They are never shod or saddled till they are four years old. They can endure thirst for whole days together, and are generally fed with camel's milk. The qualities that the Arabs prize most highly in a horse are, a long and arching neck, ears delicate and nearly meeting at their extremities, the head small, the eyes large, and full of fire, the jaws lean, the face sharp, the nostrils well opened, the belly slender, the legs muscular, the pasterns short and flexible, the hoof large and hard, the breast broad, the crupper high and rounding. However, if the head, neck and crupper are good, the animal is considered unexceptionable. The colours of their horses are, bright and dark bay, sorrel, white, grey and iron-grey. Black and cream colour are unknown, and are found only in Turkey and Persia. The horses of the Nedjed are considered the noblest, those of Yemen the hardiest, the Syrian the richest in colour, the Egyptian the fastest, and the Mesopotamian the most gentle.

All the Eastern writings are full of the praises of the horse. Libia praises his steed thus:—"He walks with head erect, like the palm-tree, whose lofty branches protect its fruit from the greedy hand that strives to pluck them; he flies swifter than the ostrich; he seems to try to escape from the bit that restrains him, and pursues his course with the speed of a dove that flies, perched with thirst, toward a cooling stream." Says Aurel Dais, "He burns with a noble impatience, and the murmurings of his ardour are like the bubblings of water in a brazen vessel. While the best of other horses leave the prints of their hoofs in the dust, he leaves it smooth; he has the body of the gazelle, and the legs of the ostrich, the trot of the wolf, and the gallop of the fox. When he stands near my tent, the shining polish of his back is like that of the marble in which perfumes have been mixed for a young bride, on the day of her marriage." But the most pompous of all eulogies on the horse is to be found in the fugitive pieces of Ghefour, a Persian poet. A short extract will serve as a specimen:—"This courser is so rapid, that you would say his veins ran with quicksilver. At the sight of his graceful proportions the antelope hides her head in confusion, and the warlike leopard envies him his hoof: he is firm as the earth, rapid as the torrent, ardent as fire, and light as air: his forehead is the throne of pride, courage flames in his glance, his nostrils are burning; he has the boldness of the lion, and the docility of a dog." Let us conclude with a stanza or two of an Algerine poet on the same subject: "He moves with the speed of the meteor that shoots across the sky; when he moves in his pride he seems to touch the earth with his hoof: he outstrips the hound of the desert, and hides the light of day in the whirlwinds he produces."

We will give our readers the form of the certificate of pure blood which is given with Arab horses:

"In the name of God, the clement and merciful! From him alone do we look for all help and favour! The prophet hath said, let my people never assemble together to commit iniquity. This is the object of this authentic paper. We, whose names are subscribed, declare before the Supreme Being, swearing by our Destiny and by our graves, that the horse or mare (here follows the colour, age, marks, etc.) is descended from noble and illustrious parents, by three direct and successive generations—that he is born of a mare of the race of —, and a stallion of the race of —, and that he possesses the good qualities of those precious animals of whom the prophet hath said: their body is a treasure, and their back a seat of honour! Fortified by the testimony of our predecessor, we repeat that the horse in question is of a race as pure as milk affirming, moreover, and taking the same oath as before, that he is renowned for his swiftness, for his power of enduring fatigue, thirst, etc. In faith of which, we have prepared the present certificate, from what we have seen and learned for ourselves, God being, moreover, in all things, the best witness." Then follow the seals.

The Turkish and Persian horses differ from the Arabian in being heavier, with a coarser hair. It is generally said, too, that the Arab horses are remarkable for their dislike to pure water, while they delight in such as is foul. We may add that, as regards horsemanship, there is a proverb which says: The Arab is without grace, he rides mechanically—the Persian active and headlong—the Kurd awkward, but bold—the Turk proud and formidable.

ORIGIN OF RACINE'S COMEDY OF "LES PLAIDEURS."

This comedy was invented and written at a tavern supper, at which were present Chapelle, Racine, Boileau, Lafontaine, Furetiere, Cavois, and M. Brihaac, a counsellor of parliament, the witliest, and also one of the most learned of that grave body. While they were sitting over their wine, some one proposed to write a satire, each one of the guests to furnish a line, in turn. Chapelle began.

"Un jour, rendant visite à monseigneur Charon,
On dit qu'il arrive."

"Stop, stop!" said Boileau, "only one line, that's the rule. It's M. Brihaac's turn." The poor gentleman thus called upon, was in a state of most comic perplexity. Though a man of wit and accomplishment, he bit his fingers and rubbed his forehead without manufacturing the required line. In vain was he told how naturally Manu would rhyme with Scaroon, he could not produce even a syllable, and sat, in shame and confusion, till irritated by the laughter of the company at his diliness, he cried out, "Ah, if it was a comedy, now, and not a satire, a comedy on law and lawyers, I should get along well enough." And then, without stopping to take breath, he ran on with a sketch of the judges, counsellors and courts, so rich in wit and humour, so full of delicate satire, faithful portraits and grotesque caricatures, that the whole company listened in admiration. The proposed satire was quite forgotten. There was a general silence around the table, and Racine, especially, listened with the most fixed attention. When Brihaac passed, his brilliant sketch was greeted by thunders of applause. "What a comedy it would make!" cried Racine. "Where is Molière? how gloriously he could do it!" "What of that, Racine," answered Cavois, "you are here, why not try?" Boileau caught at the idea in a moment. "Come," said he, "we will all of us help you, let's write the comedy." Chapelle ordered in a fresh stock of good wine. Brihaac repeated his sketches: he gave portraits and imitations of the judges, the counsel on both sides, the clients, crier, etc.; in short, all the characters that figure in the comedy. While he dictated, Racine, Chapelle, and Boileau, made the verses. Furetiere arranged the plot, Cavois and his friends threw in jokes and wit by handfuls, and Lafontaine, like the wolf in his fable of the Sick Animals, "turned a kind of clerk." The good wine meantime went briskly round the board, and the play was written and afterwards read over among the tinkle of glasses and shouts of laughter.

A NEW DISCOVERY.

We wish some good friend would tell us what to make of the following announcement, which is seriously given in one of the leading French journals. We are tolerably well acquainted with our American comic authors and actors, but it has never been our lot to hear of Mr. Paul Kaschurter. There is, indeed, Mr. Paul-Ding at Washington, our worthy Secretary of the Navy, to whom the same compliment might be justly paid, but fortunately his epitaph is yet to be written. "The first comic author of Washington and the United States, M. Paul Kaschurter, died lately. The following inscription has been engraved on his tomb:—Here lies Paul Kaschurter, who made us laugh for thirty years, and never made us weep until when he died."

TURKISH DERSIVISHES.

The poet Sadi gives the following description of a true dervish: "The dervish has the following qualities of a dog: he never eats to satiety, he has no fixed abode, he is content with the lowest place, and gives it up to any one who claims it, he watches the greater part of the night, remains faithful to his master, no matter how badly he is treated, and leaves no heir when he dies." One of the sultans asked a dervish once if he ever thought of him: "Sometimes," was the answer, "when I forget to think of God." The tyrant Hhadjade asked another to give him the benefit of his prayers. "Merciful Allah!" exclaimed the dervish, "take him quickly to thyself!" "Wretch, what sort of a prayer is that?" cried the angry king. "The best that I could imagine, both for thee and the nations whom thou dost oppress," was the bold answer. Once as the sultan Ibrahim Ehdem was sitting at the door of his palace, surrounded by the grandees of his court, a venerable dervish, with staff in hand and a wallet on his back, approached the gate. "Where are you going, old man?" cried the attendants. "Into the caravansary," "You are mistaken, this is the palace of the king of Bokhara." The prince caused the old man to be brought before him, and asked him, "How comes it, father, that you take my palace for a tavern?" "Who was the first owner of this building?" asked the dervish. "My father." "And who inherited it after his death?" "I." "And when you shall be no more, to whom will it pass?" "To my son." "By the beard of the prophet!" exclaimed the old man, "a place into which one comes in as another goes out, is not a palace, but a tavern."

CAMOENS.

A great deal of sympathy has been expended, in prose and verse, on the melancholy end of the great poet of Portugal, who is pretty generally supposed to have died of actual want. Some documents have recently been discovered in Lisbon which show that if he ever did want, it was owing to his own extravagance, not to the want of liberality of the government. These documents are a series of receipts, in Camoens's handwriting, coming down to the year 1577, or two years before his death, by which it appears that he was in the receipt of an annual pension of fifteen hundred reals, or about eighty dollars, a sum which, small as it seems now, was very considerable at that period. So that writers hereafter, when expatiating on the sufferings and neglect which are the lot of men of genius, will be under the necessity of omitting the name of Camoens.

PROGRESS OF MUSIC.

An Italian troupe, on their return to Europe from South America, by the East Indies, lately remained six months at Macao, where the Chinese listened, for the first time, to an Italian opera. The crowd was very great, and much astonishment was expressed at seeing women on the stage, as in the Celestial Empire the female parts are played by boys. This same troupe performed at the Cape of Good Hope some of Rossini's music. His operas are the first that have been heard of the world.

A VALUABLE SERVANT.

It is well known that the Italians are passionately fond of all games of chance, and especially of lotteries. The duke of Bonelli lately had a servant who used to steal everything he could lay his hands on. "Why don't you discharge him!" his friends would ask. "Because he dreams lucky numbers."

THE CELESTIAL SISTERS.

BY HENRY R. SCHOOLCRAFT.

WAUPEE, or the White Hawk, lived in a remote part of the forest, where animals and birds were abundant. Every day he returned home from the chase with the reward of his toil, for he was one of the most skilful and celebrated hunters of his tribe. With a tall, manly form, and the fire of youth beaming from his eye, there was no forest too gloomy for him to penetrate, and no track made by the numerous kinds of birds and beasts which he could not follow.

One day he penetrated beyond any point which he had before visited. He travelled through an open forest, which enabled him to see a great distance. At length he beheld a light breaking through the foliage, which made him sure that he was on the borders of a prairie. It was a wide plain covered with flowers and grass. After walking some time without a path, he suddenly came to a ring worn through the soil, as if it had been made by footsteps following a circle. But what excited his surprise was, that there was no path leading to or from it. Not the least trace of footsteps could be found, even in a crushed leaf or broken twig. He thought he would hide himself, and lie in wait to see what this circle meant. Presently he heard the faint sounds of music in the air. He looked up in the direction they came from, and saw a small object descending from above. At first it looked like a mere speck, but rapidly increased, and, as it came down, the music became plainer and sweeter. It assumed the form of a basket, and was filled with twelve sisters of the most lovely forms and enchanting beauty. As soon as the basket touched the ground, they leaped out, and began to dance round the magic ring, striking, as they did so, a shining ball as we do the drum. Waupee gazed upon their graceful forms and motions from his place of concealment. He admired them all, but was most pleased with the youngest. Unable to restrain his admiration, he rushed out and endeavored to seize her. But the sisters, with the quickness of birds, the moment they desisted the form of a man, leaped into the basket and were drawn up into the sky.

Regretting his ill luck and indiscretion, he gazed till he saw them disappear, and then said, "They are gone, and I shall see them no more." He returned to his solitary lodge, but found no relief to his mind. Next day he went back to the prairie, and took his station near the ring; but in order to deceive the sisters, he assumed the form of an opossum. He had not waited long, when he saw the wicker-car descend, and heard the same sweet music. They commenced the same sportive dance, and seemed even more beautiful and graceful than before. He crept slowly towards the ring, but the instant the sisters saw him they were startled, and sprang into their car. It rose a short distance, when one of the elder sisters spoke, "Perhaps," said she, "it is come to show us how the game is played by mortals." "Oh, no!" the youngest replied, "quick, let us ascend." And all joining in a chant, they rose out of sight.

The White Hawk returned to his own form again, and walked sorrowfully back to his lodge. But the night seemed a very long one, and he went back betimes the next day. He reflected upon the sort of plan to follow to secure success. He found an old stump near by, in which there were a number of mice. He thought their small forms would not create alarm; and accordingly assumed it. He brought the stump and sat it up near the ring. The sisters came down and resumed their sport. "But see," cried the youngest sister, "that stump was not there before." She ran affrighted towards the car. They only smiled, and gathering round the stump, struck it in jest, when out ran the mice, and Waupee among the rest. They killed them all but one, which was pursued by the youngest sister; but just as she had raised her stick to kill it, the form of White Hawk arose, and he clasped his prize in his arms. The other eleven sprang to their basket and were drawn up to the sky.

Waupee exerted all his skill to please his bride and win her affections. He wiped the tears from her eyes. He related his adventures in the chase. He dwelt upon the charms of life on the earth. He was incessant in his attentions, and picked out the way for her to walk as he led her gently towards his lodge. He felt his heart glow with joy as she entered it, and from that moment he was one of the happiest of men. Winter and summer passed rapidly away, and their happiness was increased by the addition of a beautiful boy to their lodge. Waupee's wife was the daughter of one of the stars, and as the scenes of earth began to pall upon her sight, she sighed to revisit her father. But she was obliged to make these feelings her husband. She remembered the charm that would carry her up, and took occasion, when the White Hawk was engaged in the chase, to construct a wicker basket, which she kept concealed. In the meantime she collected such rarities from the earth as she thought would please her father, as well as the most dainty kinds of food. When all was in readiness, she went out one day, while Waupee was absent, to the charmed ring, taking her little son with her. As soon as they got into the car, she commenced her song, and the basket rose. As the song was wafted by the wind it caught her husband's ear. It was a voice which he well knew, and he instantly ran to the prairie. But he could not reach the ring before he saw his wife and child ascend. He lifted up his voice in loud appeals, but they were unavailing. The basket still went up. He watched it till it became a mere speck, and finally it vanished in the sky. He then bent his head to the ground, and was miserable.

Waupee bewailed his loss through a long winter and a long summer. But he never relented. He mourned his wife's loss sorely, but his son's still more. In the meantime his wife had reached her home in the stars, and almost forgot, in the blissful employments there, that she had left a husband on the earth. She was reminded of this by the presence of her son, who, as he grew up, became anxious to visit the scene of his birth. His grandfather said to his daughter one day, "Go, my child, and take your son down to his father, and ask him to come up and live with us." But tell him to bring along a specimen of each kind of bird and animal he kills in the chase." She accordingly took the boy and descended. The White Hawk, who was ever near the enchanted spot, heard her voice as she came down the sky. His heart beat with impatience as he saw her form and that of his son, and they were soon clasped in his arms.

He heard the message of the Star, and began to hunt with the greatest activity, that he might collect the present. He spent whole nights, as well as days, in searching. A every curious and beautiful bird or animal. He only preserved a tail, wing, or foot of each, to identify the species; and, when all was ready, they went to the circle and were carried up.

Great joy was manifested on their arrival at the starry plains. The Star chief invited all his people to a feast, and, when they had assembled, he proclaimed aloud, that each one might take of the earthly gifts such as he pleased. THE BANQUET CONDEMNED.

A morality from the French of the fourteenth century.

Among the quaint little moral dramas of former times, was a piece with the above title. It opens with the following personages, enjoying themselves at table:—Good Company.—I drink your health.—I pledge you.—Frequent repetition.—Supper.—Pastime.—Gallantry.—Daintiness. These gay fellows are watched through a variety of scenes very ill-disposed towards them. Amplify. Paraphrase. Epitaph. Pleasure. Cold. Squandering. Hydrophobia. Jaw-drops, and others of the same nature, not less formidable, grotesquely habited, and armed with bludgeons. After some time Supper, who betrays his guests, admits his whole cohort of enemies. A dreadful battle ensues. The table is overturned, and its contents dashed to pieces. At this instant enters a personage, more traitorous still than Supper; this is Banquet himself, who affects to protect the jolly company, seats them again at table, and they begin to survive; but are once more surprised by the diseases, who prevail against their falsity. Good Company is the only one who escapes; and resorts to Dame Experience with his complaints. This sage dame causes Supper and Banquet to be arrested by Sobriety, Medicine, Philosophy, and Fasting, by whom they are led away to prison. He afterwards held council with Hippocrates, Galen, Avicenna, and Averroes. The criminals are condemned. Remedy passes sentence on them. Banquet is executed. Supper is pronounced not guilty, as to himself; but by reason of his having admitted too great a number of variety of dishes to the table, he is sentenced to wear a badge on his arm, to lead up down the whole front of his sleeve; and forth to approach dinner, modestly and moderately tinct, nearer than the distance of six hours, at the least.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

BREAKING A BUTTERFLY UPON THE WHEEL.—In the republic of Quito, and some other parts of South America, there is a small insect called the comenja, whose destructive qualities are so active, that in the space of one night it will eat through the hardest wood, or any other solid substance. In that short period it has been known to penetrate, through and through, a bale of paper containing sixteen reams. The insect builds its nest under the eaves of the houses, of a glutinous clay, similar to that used by the swallows in the fabrication of their nests; but the comenja continues his work for several yards in length. The natives sometimes doubt their nests with tar, which is sufficient to disperse the whole swarm; for, if disturbed, they will divide into different societies, and each will separately search for a convenient place in which to form a settlement. In the archives of Quito there is a curious royal decree of Carlos III. respecting this insect. A number of cases of gun-flints had been sent to Panama from Spain, for the purpose of being forwarded to Lima; but their non-arrival at this place caused the viceroy to repeat his request to the court for the necessary supply. This gave rise to an investigation—the flints were traced to Panama, and the governor was ordered to account for them. In his answer to the minister, he stated that the comenja had destroyed the cases in the royal magazine. The minister, being ignorant of what the comenja was, an order was issued under the royal seal, commanding the governor of Panama to apprehend the comenja, to form a summary process on the crimes which he had committed, then to send the prisoner and documents, with the necessary guard, in custody to Spain, that he might be dealt with according to the extent of his criminality!

MANY-COLOURED STARS.—The light of the stars is by no means uniform: the ray of Sirius, for instance, differs not merely in intensity, but in kind, from the ray of Vega; and in countries where the atmosphere is less humid and hazy than ours, the difference is striking to the naked eye—one star shining as an emerald, another as a ruby, and the whole heavens sparkling as with various gems. This attribute of variety of colours also characterizes the double stars, but the most remarkable thing is, that in many instances, when one is of one marked colour, its companion is of the opposite. Instances abound in which a red and green star are associated, or a yellow and blue. When the stars are of different degrees of brilliancy, this contrast may originate in an optical delusion—in that tendency which disposes the eye, when gazing on any bright colour, to endow fainter objects near it with the opposite or complementary colour by way of relief; but the explanation is not universally borne out, inasmuch as many couples, in precisely similar circumstances, show no such contrast. Sir John Herschel was at first decidedly inclined to attribute this phenomenon to an actual difference of colour; and although he has since—perhaps on good grounds—half relinquished that conclusion, yet he has not abandoned the testimony of Struve, founded on observations with the Dorpat telescope, whose clearness has never yet been rivalled, so that we may not absolutely part with the early pleasing speculations of the British astronomer. "It may be easier suggested in words," says Sir John, "than conceived in imagination, what variety of illumination two stars—a red and a green, or a yellow and blue one—must afford a planet circumambulating either; and what cheering contrasts and grateful vicissitudes, a red and green day, for instance, alternating with a white one and with darkness, might arise from the presence or absence of one or other, or both, from the horizon!"

A CONTEMPORARY'S ESTIMATE OF SHAKESPEARE.—The diary of one John Ward, who lived at Stratford-upon-Avon, during the life-time of Shakespeare, has been lately published in London. The following is, we believe, the only allusion he makes to the great bard in the course of two tedious volumes. What an immortality might have been won by Mr. Ward, if he had been more liberal in his particulars in regard to his illustrious contemporary! "Shakespeare had but two daughters, one whereof, Mr. Hall, the physician, married, and by her had one daughter married, to wit, the Lady Bernard. I have seen or heard of her, but I have never seen or heard of her without any art at all; he frequented the plays all his young time, but in his elder days lived at Stratford, and supplied the stage with two plays every year, and for it had an allowance so large that he spent at the rate of one thousand pound a year, as I have heard. Shakespeare, Drayton, and Ben Jonson, had a merry meeting, and some drank too hard, for Shakespeare died of a fever there contracted. Remember to peruse Shakespeare's plays, and be much versed in them, that I may not be ignorant at that matter. Whether Dr. Heylin does well, in reckoning up the dramatic poets which have been famous in England, to omit Shakespeare. A letter to my brother, to see Mrs. Quenry, to send for Tom Smith for the acknowledgment."

BRAZILIAN VESPER BELLS.—In Brazil, all journeys are suspended at the Ave Maria, that is, the vespers to the virgin, which commence after sunset. Instead of a curfew, a very simple and pleasing circumstance announces this period in the country. A large beetle, (called Pelidnota testacea), with silver wings, just then issues forth, and, by the winding of its small but solemn and sonorous horn, proclaims the hour of prayer. A coincidence so striking, and so very agreeable, is so frequent in its occurrence, as this was not likely to escape the honour of a religious superstition to account for it. Accordingly the Brazilians regard it as a sacred institution, supposing that the insect is a herald expressly commissioned by the virgin to announce the time of her evening prayer. Hence it is constantly called Escaravelho Ave Maria, that is Ave Maria Beetle. "On the hill of Santa Theresa," says Dr. Wailes, "I have heard of an evening humming round the convent, and joining its harmonious buzz to the sweet chant of the nuns within at their evening service."

STARS AND STRIPES.—We stopped in a store, where were several British officers; after asking for articles which I wanted, I saw a broad roll of riband, which appeared to be of black and white stripes. "Go," said I to the officer that was with us, "and reckon the stripes of that riband; see if they are thirteen?" (with an emphasis I used the word, and he went too!) "Yes, they are of thirteen, as my word, madam." "Do hand it me." He did so: I took it, and found that it was a narrow black riband, carefully wound round a broad white. I returned it to its place on the shelf. "Madam," said the merchant, "you cap buy the black and white, too, and tack them in stripes." "By no means, sir; I would not have them slightly tacked, but firmly sewed on." The above-mentioned officer sat on the counter kicking their heels; how they gaped at me when I said this! but the merchant laughed heartily.—Letters of Eliza Wilkinson.

THE VIOLET—FROM THE GERMAN OF GOETHE.

In a solitary place,
A lowly violet grew;
Unfolding silently its leaf
To the sunbeam and the dew.
A lovely maiden tripped
That far-off field along;
And the quiet woodland glen
Was gladdened by her song.
I would I were the fairest
Of all the flowers that blow;
That all my leaves were blushing
With tints of loveliest glow;
That she who idly wanders here
Might see me where I rest,
And pluck me from my solitude,
To slumber on her breast.
Thus thought the modest flower,
The maid passed heedless on;
Its beauty crushed with hasty step—
The bloom of life was gone:
Though trampled thus, the violet
Sang out, in very glee,
"O! 't is a passing happiness,
Even to die by thee!"

MISCELLANY.

DESCRIPTION OF THE SEA.—"Thou hast never been on the sea," said the lady to her waiting-maid, "and knowest nothing of that dread loneliness which settles on the spirit, when the last headlands have disappeared, and one wide waste of tumultuous waters are heaving around, bounded only by the dull and evening sky. Thou hast not felt that mighty dread, which overwhelms the timid wayfarer on the ocean, who watches the little ship stagger from wave to wave, or heard the shrill wailing through her cordage, until the masts bend like a reed in the storm. Thou hast not looked on the pathless waters, where nothing moved but the black hull on which we stood, and the rolling mountains of waves, the smallest of which might close over the bark for ever, and leave not a vestige to tell that ought living ever glided above those depths. But more, thou never hadst one whom thou didst love dearer than thine own life, journeying over those perilous paths, and thus far away, dreaming of the death to which he is exposed, or pining to be a partaker of his dangers."

AVARICE AND EXTRAVAGANCE.—Among the many properties of human nature, which almost exceed comprehension, comes the parsimony of the rich, and the extravagance of the poor. Some rich men spare to-day, as if they feared starving to-morrow; and the indigent often consume in an hour, what they may feel the want of for a year. These properties are the more unaccountable, because parsimony is chiefly found to predominate in old people, who may expect death every day; and extravagance chiefly in the young, who may reasonably hope to live long; as if old people hoarded money, because they cannot want it; and young ones throw it away, because it is necessary to their subsistence. This conduct must be ascribed to the inconsiderate passions, or folly of man; for I can see no sense or reason in it.

EPITAPH ON THE LATE MR. KEAN.

Pause, thoughtful stranger: pass not heedless by
When Kean awaits the tribute of a sigh
There, sunk in death, those powers the world admired,
By nature given, not by art acquired.

In various parts his matchless talents shone,
The one he failed in was, alas! his own.

HINTS TO TRAVELLERS.—A day passed among the crowds of a great capital—in the streets—in the unvisited purlieus—in the markets—in the bazaars—wherever the moving living multitudes may be seen, is more instructive, ay, and more amusing, than a dozen of days spent among glittering rooms and gingerbread pleasure-gardens; and he who could faithfully describe what he sees in such scenes, would make a more attractive book, and deserve better of his country, than all the marvel-hunters that ever wrote. A single hour spent in the heavy vapours of an hospital, or in the cold cells of a public prison, full of sad and painful thought as that hour may be, will give more real insight into the spirit and character of a nation, than can be drawn from whole months flittered away among the thousand artificial sights which the idle most delight in.

THE MISER AND THE SQUANDER.—The hoarding miser punishes himself; and the spendthrift punishes the innocent. The hoarder thinks so much of the time to come as to forget the present; the squanderer has his thoughts so taken up with the present as to neglect the future. The first lives as if he was never to die; and the last as if he had but a day to enjoy. Both are unprofitable members of society; the one occasioning a stoppage in the circulation, and the other a hemorrhage. The hoarding miser is like a fog that infects the air; the prodigal resembles an outrageous storm that overturns all in its way. The hoarder passes restless nights, though he has nothing to fear: the squanderer sleeps soundly, and leaves want of repose to his creditors. The hoarding miser is a ridiculous creature, and the prodigal a noxious animal.

EXCERPTS.

One fault wilfully committed, authorizes the imputation of many more. When the ear is opened to accusations, accusers will not be wanting; and every one will officiously come with stories against a disgraced person, where nothing can be said in their favour. I never knew a man who deserved to be well thought of himself for his morals, who had a slight opinion of the virtue of the other sex in general.

The darkest and most contemptible ignorance is that of not knowing one's self; and that all we have and all we excel in, is the gift of God.

Persons of accidental or shadowy merit may be proud; but unborn worth must be always as much above conceit as arrogance. In the general scale of beings, the lowest is as useful, and as much a link of the great chain, as the highest.

There is but one pride, pardonable: that of being above doing a base or dishonourable action.

The grace which makes every other grace amiable is humility.

WORTH TRYING.—In an English miscellany is the following:—"The danger of being suffocated by smoke, to which persons are exposed who enter premises on fire, may be effectually obviated by tying a wet silk handkerchief singly over the face. A gentleman, who lately tried the experiment, was enabled to remain in a room which was on fire, in most dense smoke, and work a small engine, until he succeeded in extinguishing the flames."

THE WHEELBARROW

With a big bottle-nose and an acre of chin,
His whole physiognomy frightful as sin,
With a huge frizzled wig, and triangular hat,
And a snuff-besmeared handkerchief tied over that;
Doctor Bos, riding out on his fierce Rosinante,
(In hair very rich, but of flesh very scanty.)
Was a little alarmed, through a zeal for his bones,
Seeing Hodge cross the road with a barrow of stones.
"Hip! friend," roared the doctor, with no little force,
"Prutsee set down the barrow, 'twill frighten my horse."
Hodge as quickly replied, as an Erskine or Garrow,
"You're a great deal more likely to frighten my barrow."

THE GREEN MOUNTAINS OF VERMONT.

GIRLDE of freedom's stalwart band!

Ye twine around that patriot land

In infant-like repose;

Piled not like Atlas in your might,

Nor Alps, nor Andes in your height,

Crowned with perpetual snows.

Proud cradle of the Vermontese!—

Where healthful floats the mountain breeze;

O! give me but again

To track that valley, green and fair,

By Ammonooski wandering there

In brightness to the main.

O beauteous! first when balmy morn

Lifted the mantle of the dawn

From off your glittering sides,

Ye broke upon my raptured view,

In robes of mist, and pearls of dew,

Bedecked like eastern brides.

Updrew your veils of gauzy sheen—

There lay your pastures, all in green,

Outspreading 'neath the sun;

Nor toil'd your husbandmen in vain—

High o'er ye waved the yellow grain,

Crowning ye, every one.

The knee bowed on each grassy steep,

There, on your summits, browsed the sheep,

And o'er ye winged the bee:

All flashing lay the mountain springs;

The sparkling rills, like living things,

Leaped downward, joyously.

Short time I breathed your mountain air,

Or lingered 'mong your valleys fair,

Or by that winding river;

But oh! your loveliness to me

Is pictured bright in memory,

Aye to endure, for ever.

DANIEL SCHLESINGER, THE PIANIST.

NUMBER ONE.

EARLY DAYS OF AN ARTIST.

"The sculptor in his chiselled stone,

The painter in his colours blent.

The bard in numbers all his own,

Raises himself his monument;

But he whose every touch could wake

A passion, and a thought control,

He who, to bless the ear, did make

Music of his very soul!

Who sound for us in golden chains,

The golden links of Harmony,

Naught is left us of his strains,

Naught save their fading memory.

Then, while a trace of him remains,

Shall we not cherish it tenderly?"—Burial of Schlesinger.

EARLY IN June last, death robbed our city of a great artist. In him the musical profession lost a bright ornament and society an estimable member. In honouring the dead, biography benefits the living, by holding up the examples of the virtue and merit she records; and the memory of the good and great, thus ennobled, becomes an incitement to the nobler efforts and sentiments of the head and heart. But the life of a distinguished artist may, moreover, serve to illustrate the peculiarities of his calling—to designate the honour due him, as one of those who have laboured to perfect his art, as well as to trace the current of its influence upon his nature, and the reciprocal action of his individuality upon the source from which he drew inspiration.

Whilst, in this country, biography has familiarly disclosed to us the lives and characters of painters—marked by the incidents which associate them with the memorable personages of their time, and by the legends of the creations the engraver's steel is sending forth, in outline, to the remote portions of the earth—she has but rarely made us acquainted with the musicians, and then in disconnected narratives only, having little or no reference to the growth of art or the flow of musical tradition; so that the marvellous in their works, enlivened with half-remembered superstitions, or viewed through the mists of ignorance, has, at times, assumed a fantastic, at times a fabulous, aspect. Yet, if indelible links connect artist with artist, from Johannes Van Eyck down to Leopold Robert—and the interval is, like the arch from one point in the horizon to its opposite, a vault of stars vying with each other in glory—composer is yet more firmly enchain'd to composer, from Sebastian Bach to Franz Liszt; and their labours, entwined more closely with the growth of enthusiasm and the progress of human ingenuity in the fabrication of instruments, are as a chain in which master-spirit is riveted to its successor and predecessor; here a link of jewelled gold, there one of silver—the two, mayhap, united by one of iron—and the whole is a canto in the Epic of Genius, admirable and soul-striving in the highest degree.

But a Stuart, an Allston, a Malbone, a Weir, a Cole, a Sully, and many a star beside—to which the rays of others, as bright, may be seen ascending, in the luminous dawn—have arisen, and enabled us, by their works, to animate the colourless print, and to appreciate the art which designed it; whilst, from our soil, scarcely an artist, and no composer, has sprung, to interpret the works, or follow the paths, of great masters—to maintain and perpetuate the glory of an art less palpable, but more ethereal than the limner's.

Although sound and rhythm, soothing the spirit and hushing the sense, may be said to generate every ear and thrill all nerves, yet painting is infinitely more a gift than melody. Art is the only medium through which many an unspeakable emotion may be audibly expressed; the musical sounds around us, the choral chant, the popular air, the festive dance, came from the depths of Germany, from the snows of Russia, from the perfumed fountains of Stamboul; and may be the echoes of voices which, centuries ago, murmured their death-prayer. The reproduction of natural sounds is not spontaneous, like the imitation of visible beauty. The eye, gazing with unconscious delight upon the thousand hues of colour—associating, with the changing seasons, the graceful features, the majestic and the lovely expressions of nature—inhalings light from the radiant eye, and love from the transparent cheek of beauty—now lurking beneath a glossy curl, now floating upon the heaving bosom—the eye is a reader conductor of sentiment, through sense, to the inner soul, than the ear, which a thousand noises assail. The vibrations of its grosser strings are wont to overpower the trembling of the more delicate chords of the hearing harp; and be who listens to the mysterious voices of the air, and to the eternal symphony of all living things, is nearer the spirit-land than his brother of the pencil: he communes with the invisible.

There is, consequently, as romantic a charm in the lives of Pergolesi, Sebastian Bach, Handel, Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, and the inspired band who dwell with them in the paradise of harmony, as in those of Da Vinci, Michael Angelo, Raphael, Titian, Correggio, Murillo, and that army, the trophies of whose genius are the proudest ornaments of palaces inhabited by a thousand historic memories; and, in the former, the initiated recognize a higher spiritual character. It requires a greater self-oblation to condense, as in music, the fleeting suggestions of the busy fancy than to arrest upon canvases Outline and Shade, Form and Colour.

But it is not easy to picture to one's self the composer's life and struggles, without a knowledge of their results, and of the mode in which these have been attained. Could we, for a moment, identify ourselves with Shakespeare pouring out his flood of song, if it were denied us to hingle with the visionary beings who embody his heaven-inspired revelations of the human heart? or could we realize his creative genius, without comparing some of his characters with the players around us! The picture you contemplate is a visible testimony of the art which produced it: it demonstrates itself; for it impresses you with the conviction that it is beyond you. So also can we not know Mozart or Beethoven until our spirits have been uplifted to the world which their melodies are the language

"Music," said Beethoven to Bettine Brentano, "music is the true intermediary between sensitive and spiritual life. Would that I could speak of this with Goethe. Melody is the corporeal life of poetic. Does not the spiritual sense of a poem become, through melody, a physical sentiment? In Mignon's song does not the melody render us alive to all its sensuous tension, and this sentiment exerts to new productions! . . . Music is the only incorporeal entrance into a superior world of cognition, which comprehends man, but is not within his grasp. . . . Although spirits live by it, as bodies subsist by air, it is difficult of spiritual comprehension."

Entertaining, as we do, a desire, not unsustained by hope, that the arts of Harmony may follow the successful footsteps of those of Design, in our land; and believing that, wherever hearts beat, bosoms will be found in which the echo waits only to be roused by the voice of melody, we trust that the following sketch of an artist, who was likewise a composer—a story of inspiration and culture, guided by patience, and not discouraged by disappointment—whose life, like our own, began in a dream, from which it is man's destiny to awake to death alone—will interest those who respect moral energy, and reverence genius; who feel how impotent are our efforts between the Alpha and Omega of human existence, whose faith in humanity is fortified by the contemplation of the past achievements of our race, and whose self-reliance becomes more firmly nerved by each record of individual effort and prowess.

Besides many an imperishable thought and passion, born of our age and independent of historical tradition, it is to Germany that the world owes the greatest masters in the art we are extolling. Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, all sprang from the land of Faust and Luther, of Goethe and Schiller: it likewise gave birth to Daniel Schlesinger.

He was born at Hamburg on the fifteenth of December, 1799, of a father whose premature death prevented him from being developed the early promise of this child of his predilection, and of a mother who lives to regret the brightest flower in her maternal chaplet. He was the youngest but one of nine brothers and one sister. Of his brothers, one died of a fever at St. Thomas, a second was slain by the French, fighting beneath the walls of his native city, and six survive the three now numbered with the dead.

It was in his fifth year that Daniel exhibited the first tokens of his musical disposition, by picking out on the pianoforte with his tiny finger the notes of a tune his father's maçons were singing, while at work in the garden. Struck by this early indication of a musical ear, his parent, who himself was a passionate lover of music, had the boy instantly instructed by one Meschonic, the organist of the Petri church of Hamburg, who was at that time giving lessons to his sister. Under his tuition the child's musical abilities developed themselves rapidly, and he soon became a tasteful amateur upon the pianoforte. His performance of a sonata of Mozart's, standing before the keyboard, has not been forgotten by the relative who kindly furnished us with these details.

A letter from the north of Europe, dated September, 1809, conveys the thanks of a gentleman to whom Daniel had sent an andante of Mozart's, which he was fond of playing. Although his father was no more, she, on whom devolved the care of so large a family, and who displayed such eminent maternal qualifications, continued the musical cultivation of the youthful artist. He took lessons of Beer on the violin, and by the year 1811 had attained remarkable proficiency upon this most difficult and charming of instruments. We are not aware how long he subsequently devoted himself to it; he used to speak sometimes of his early skill upon it, and the writer recollects an evening in the winter of 1836, on which, for a wager, he played correctly the violin part in a trio of Beethoven's, remarking, "that he had not touched the instrument for twenty years." His notes were all well-formed, his measure, of course, exact, but the right hand being destined to the bow, the performance, naturally enough, lacked ease, expression, and smoothness. This may be cited, en passant, as an instance of his very extraordinary memory.

If he still pursued the violin, it was by no means at the expense of the piano, which he continued to study with unabated ardour under the direction of Herr Grund, who was much his earlier teacher's supercort. Subsequently, although we are unable to assign their date, he took lessons of Andreas Romberg, the renowned musical interpreter of Schiller's song of the "Bell."

It was in 1811 that he composed and dedicated to his uncle, Ezekiel, in Copenhagen, a waltz, which, though never published, obtained great fame among the Hamburg musicians. He had, moreover, made notable progress for his age in the sciences of thorough bass and counter point. Indeed, his mind was as keen in the pursuit of principles and combinations, and his spirit as ambitious of subduing their intricacies, as his ear was attuned to harmony and his soul absorbed by its irresistible fascinations.

Before the above waltz had been transmitted to Copenhagen, his uncle writes towards the close of the year, (1811), "I had the pleasure of hearing two boys, one of eleven and the other of twelve years old, perform on the violin; and my delight was doubled by the reflection that you, my dear Daniel, will also one day delight men. Am I wrong? Write me how the piano and violin come on, and tell me the name of Spohr's new opera. Your dear mother wrote me the other day that she would send me something of your composing. Have you already written an opera?"

On the fifteenth of February, 1812, the same affectionate relative thus mentions the reception of the waltz:—"I had already announced to your mother the arrival of your letter and of the waltz—but have deferred until to-day the expression of my thanks for this present. They will come late, but they flow from the heart, and I experience in offering them a pleasure which I venture to liken to that of the giver and composer himself. Your dedication of this waltz to me, afforded me extraordinary delight. Though I cannot repay you in kind, I will present you with something besides acknowledgments, out of gratitude, but not for encouragement's sake. For you must already have felt how precious a thing it is to develop one's self into a useful man, to provide one's self with internal sources of happiness, and; by this very act, occasion pleasure and satisfaction to those around us."

To us these letters appear to breathe respect as well as affection for the youthful amateur, and we do not think it extravagant to suppose that the boy bore the elements of that earnest, self-respecting character which the lovers of single-heartedness so sincerely admired in the man. Indeed an earlier letter from an elder brother, dated Leipzig, August, 1810, furnishes evidence that Daniel was then already addressed as a reasonable being.

"Thy little epistle is moreover written with great clearness and how should it be otherwise? Thou art now ten years old, born in Germany of German parents, and were it not a shame thou couldst not tell me distinctly the various matters thou hast to communicate. As regards thy apology, should the style of thy letter prove defective, that it is a long time since thou wrotest such a composition! Must one make compositions to write suitably to a brother? My dear boy, write down thy thoughts and feelings freely, and when the letter is finished it will be time enough then to efface and amend."

It was in 1806, when the French came to Hamburg, that Daniel lost his father. It had been a primary object with the reputable old merchant to provide for his sons by teaching them to provide for themselves. He had attended to the education of each as a sacred duty, and if the subject of this notice was early suffered to bestow on music unusual attention, the accomplishment was subsequently cultivated in the hours of repose from other studies; from the earnestness with which he pursued it, we may doubt if it became a relaxation; but the boy thrived; his hours were filled; his energies strengthened and none of the vices of idleness crept in here and there to rust a virtue.

The paternal estate was small and inconsiderable—the widow's heritage; her other sons were scattered over the old and new world in pursuit of fortune; each, when his time came, had resolutely bid his mother adieu and grasped the condemner's stake; and when Daniel numbered fourteen years, it became his turn to choose a calling. To his musical attainments he united the thorough education of all the well-born youth of Germany, whose minds are not tutored and shaped to a certain measure and mould, but in whom tastes and inclinations are unfolded not repressed, and the nature of each is encouraged to develop itself. While at school he had also displayed remarkable mathematical talent, and could readily compute very intricate questions; indeed, he was attached to such speculations in all his after life.

When the decisive day arrived, Daniel declared it his ardent wish to make music his profession. In reflecting upon his position his mind had not been idle, and he felt in his heart that, for the calling of his predilection, he could endure and labour much. Besides experiencing all the enjoyment of a sensitive spirit for congenial pursuits, he was inspired with that fervent hope in art, which none can know save its votaries; they who look upon it as the oracle of another world, and who emulate the lives of the great masters, the inventors of the imperishable. But the times were troublous. With its political equilibrium Europe had lost that stability in commercial affairs which patent Germany had once believed to be immovable. The atmosphere was still clouded, the sky portentous, and young Schleier's mother and brothers, apprehensive lest the musician's should prove a precarious existence, dissuaded him from his choice, and besought him to select some less hazardous vocation. In the face of these obstacles Daniel's choice was soon made. "If I become a merchant," said he, "and am fortunate, I may secure enough to retire before it is yet too late to give myself up to music the remainder of my days." So he chose the counting-house. Vain expectation! Like many an ardent spirit equally hopeful and affectionate, the poor boy, relying upon the sagacity of those who loved but were unequal to direct him, relinquished the lost-ard towards which his aspirations looked, to follow the dim track that guided duller spirits through the gloom of life. Like many a child of genius, as much as he trusted in others' wisdom, he lacked confidence in his own; and, like them, alas! discovered the error, late, still in time to show, by what his energy enabled him to accomplish, under painful disadvantages, how much he might have achieved had he been left to his own promptings.

In 1814, he accordingly became a clerk in the extensive banking and commission house of Herr Rohmow, of Hamburg, and, as the biographers of remarkable men are wont to express it, "entered with ardour upon the duties of his new vocation." And for the artist, what a vocation! How rough is that first contact with men in business—armed to the teeth with the mail and spikes of their own interests—fiercely and roughly encountering you at every corner—callous to the finer sensibilities, and as unconscious as the iron they are mailed in, of the wounds and bruises they may inflict! If we marvel sometimes at the weight and size of the armour shown us in London and Dresden and Vienna, as the war habiliments of knights of ancient days, still more incredible to them, could they rise from their ashes, would appear the moral arms and armour of the gigantic pigmies of our time. The hearts which beat with nobleness beneath their massive hauberts, and were alive to the kinder affections, would shrink from the indifference and sang froid, the keen avarice and selfish ambition, which are the defence and weapons of the men of this day. As they exercised the bones and muscles of the body, so would we often seem to practise those of the mind, that they may subserve passions and interests as unworthy as the knightly ambition was noble and single-hearted. In the days of chivalry the minstrel's place was the banquet hall, the tapestried chamber. In the nineteenth century the ceaseless battle of interests has been the destined field of many like him we are lamenting.

With that earnest singleness of purpose which he had brought to bear upon whatever he had essayed to do, Daniel Schlesinger devoted himself during four years to the drudgery of the bureau. His duties there frequently detained him until midnight, after which, on his return home, he would often sit at the piano for hours, unconscious of the winter's cold or of the summer's heat and exhaustion. In truth, he was sometimes whole weeks without any other opportunity of cultivating the art he loved. Where the enthusiasm of many would have been damped by such obstacles, his ardour acquired fresh intensity with each new act of energy. Like all men of firm purpose, who, in presence of hindrances of every kind, undeviatingly pursue a cherished object—the scholar, his book, the painter his ideal, the savant his problem, the philosopher his bubble—our young virtuoso suffered no opportunity to pass of heightening or perfecting his musical taste and skill.

We have already mentioned that his brothers were following in different countries, at home and abroad, the profession Daniel had embarked in. One of them was well established in St. Thomas, and, when the elementary commercial education of the lad was finished, he sought a more active field for enterprise; it occurred that his brother's prosperous condition might enable him to advance his views. He accordingly embarked for St. Thomas in 1819. In this island he was welcomed by the relative who had attracted him thither, and his hope of a release from business at no remote day brightened as he saw before him that prospect of speedier accumulation which, at a greater risk of life, proportionate increase of profits held out in southern climes. It was here that he was doomed to encounter his second disappointment. The climate of the island threatened to try his constitution so severely as to force him, in self-preservation, to return to Europe in the year following. The blind goddess is not propitious to the children of art. Censured that they are gifted with resources beyond her reach, she seems in justice, and, as it were, instinctively to bestow her favours upon such of the candidates for them as are unobscured by any other enjoyment.

After reaching his native shores, young Daniel appears to have remained several months without employment. In this interval it may be imagined his fingers were not idle, and he returned to music, as to a beloved mistress, with all the ardour engendered by a long separation. Before his trip to the West Indies, the British metropolis had presented itself as an advantageous market for the youth, the industry and the ability which, as a faithful accountant, he had to offer, and several letters upon the subject had passed between him and the brother, from whose correspondence we have already made an extract. Anxious to obtain some profitable occupation he turned his steps towards England, and we find him in Manchester at the close of 1820, and in London at the opening of the new year. He lived here with a brother, who occupied a responsible post in an important house, and who shared with Daniel his moderate income. While waiting the turning up of employment the latter naturally mingled with his countrymen, who, as fervent lovers of music, were charmed with his talent, and sought to gratify his desire of being brought in contact with the artists and amateurs of the capital.

It was about this time that an incident occurred which, as often befalls those setting out on life's journey, changed the whole current of his existence by giving it a new direction. He was invited one night to a friend's house. It was an unceremonious reunion; some came there to contribute to the amusement and others to enjoy it. In the course of the evening Mr. Schlesinger was invited to play some variations of Ries's, which he sat down to the piano and performed in his usual unpretending manner. Fancy his surprise when the master of the house introduced him to the author; and his pleasure at hearing Ferdinand Ries, who had stood behind him, warmly commend his skill and good taste. The latter was, on his side, not a little astonished to learn that so skilful an interpreter of his music was but an amateur, and advocated his immediate adoption of music as a profession with such persuasive eloquence, that before he left the room, the counting-house was for ever banished from the thoughts of the young virtuoso, who resolved to devote himself henceforth to that art which, besides happiness, promised him glory.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

GAMBLING ABROAD.

BARBARON, of French notoriety, is the present lessee of the gambling-tables at Baden-Baden; he has laid out a large sum (two hundred and fifty thousand francs), in enlarging and decorating the assembly-rooms, but up to the present moment the prospect of remuneration is not promising; in fact, the play-tables would be completely deserted were it not for the ex-calcator of Hesse and some old stagers from Paris, amongst whom are the agents de change, who lost a large sum in the last days of Frezelet, and Monsieur M. from Marseilles, who never stakes less than a rosin, fifty napoleons. The full season does not commence until July; up to this time every one complains that Baden is horribly stupid, and the departures are more numerous than the arrivals. Baden will not be so fashionable a watering-place as it has been; the beauty of the surrounding country, the good living, and moderate charges at the hotels, will always induce a number of strangers to visit it. An Englishman, who rejoices in the rare name of Smith, has taken a house for the season; he gives suppers to young men who are supposed to possess more money than wit. After supper cards are introduced; and a few evenings since a young Spaniard was a loser to the amount of fifty-two thousand francs, of which Mr. Smith was a winner of fifteen thousand francs, a Mr. Tobin, an old acquaintance of Sir Vincent Cotton, fifteen thousand francs, and a Frenchman, M. Bonheur, twenty-two thousand francs. The confederates have, however, only pocketed ninety napoleons in cash. The young Spaniard gave bills on his guardian, the Spanish Ambassador at Paris. The ambassador refused to pay the drafts, as the young man is a minor—thus rests the matter.

THE POET'S WIFE.

As by his lonely hearth he sat,
The shadow of a welcome dream
Pass'd o'er his harp—disconsolate
His home did seem.
And the sweet vision, faint and far,
Rose on his fancy like a star.
"Let her be young, yet not a child,
Whose light and inexperienced mirth
Is all too winged and too wild
For sober earth—
Too rainbow like such mirth appears,
And fades away in misty tears
"Let youth's fresh rose still gently bloom
Upon her smooth and downy cheek—
Yet let a shadow, not of gloom,
But soft and meek,
Tell that some sorrow she hath known,
Though not a sorrow of her own.
"And let her eyes be of the gray,
The soft gray of the brooding dove,
Full of the sweet and tender ray
Of modest love;
For fonder shows that dreamy hue
Than lustrous black or glorious blue
"Let her be full of quiet grace,
No sparkling wit with sudden glow
Bright'ning her purely chaste'd face
And placid brow;
Not radiant to the stranger's eye—
A creature easily pass'd by;
"But who, once seen, with untold power
For ever haunts the yearning soul
Raised from the crowd that sell a moment's hour
To dwell apart.
All haunted and enshrined to be
The idol of a memory!
"And oh! let Mary be her name—
It hath a sweet and gentle sound,
At which no glories dare to fame
Come crowding round,
But which the dreaming heart befriends
With holy thoughts and household smiles;
"With peaceful meetings, welcomes kind.
And love, the same in joy and tears,
And glowing intercourse of mind
Through faithful years:
Oh! dream of something half divine
Be real—be mortal, and be mine!"

RAILROAD TRAVELLING.

The poetry of travelling is gone—the romance of road-side adventure is at an end; in vain will the modern novelist attempt to distinguish his heroine in the passing train—her form and face gleam like the mingled colours on a schoolboy's whipping-top—an amalgamated mass of hues which the rapid motion seems to blend into one. Elopements may now be made in safety, if the lovers can only secure the fast train; astutest old guardians can never give chase—the rapidly with which the vehicles move will prevent the short-winded from breathing; no being overtaken by brothers-in-law, discharging and carrying horses and separate rooms at an end—our light literature must now become woven with steam—our incidents must arise from blow-ups, and love be made over broken legs, while here the novelist will have to record the falling in of a tunnel, the only chance left for a touch at the sphinx.
The good old days of chance courtship are vanished: if a lady happened to let her glove fall from the coach, there was an opening for some gallant to leap off and return it with a good grace. But now there is no stopping; one might as well call upon the wind as upon the conductor to check the speed of his Fervid dragon; 'tis as much as the guard can do to make him hear with his shrill whistle; ere one can say, "my hat's blown off," we have shot a mile ahead, and the conductor mourns the accident at the next station; and there is no lack of sympathy at the distance of thirty miles. The tables within the carriages are like those which held fine feasts of the enchanters: whatever is laid upon them less weighty than a brick, is whisked away by a viewless spirit, and earned you not whither. We be unto the night that laveth down his gloves, the duchess, or umbrella—that unloosest his pocket-book to spread out his letters, for they will be given as a prey unto the winds, unless he carryeth his own curtaining, or is rich enough to travel in a first-class carriage. Then there are those gloomy tunnels opening their grim portals to receive us, and darkening around us like the valley and shadow of death. You are immersed within the bowels of a black cavern—the grinning monster which has born you away utters his most hellish moans in the darkness—flakes of fire here and there flutter along the low bowed vault—the earth seems rocking beneath, while one dull, prolonged echo throws back the continued clatter. Perchance a solitary lamp is fixed in the roof of your carriage, and the sickly yellow light falls upon the face of some wrinkled old man who has closed his eyes from fear. All beside is dark—nothing is visible but that hideous face in the distance. At first he appears like a fiend; you cannot separate him from the lakes of red fire, the darkness, and the howling of the monster. By degrees he becomes a bandit: you have seen just such a face in the caverns in Salvator Rosa's pictures; then he is dead—his face grows sharp and thin in the yellow light—his eyes move not under the hard gleam—you are in the tomb with him! By-and-by you feel the wind of heaven upon your cheek—the daylight breaks in upon you, and you are again rolling between upheaved banks, or on the brown backs of massy arches—rushing the flakes of soot from your face, or writhing under some sharp particle which has chosen your eye for an abiding-place; you seem as if racing against the wind, and that, out of sheer vexation at being beaten, it blows with all its might, as if it would lift the heavy train from the ground.

A GOOD HIT AT SOMEBODY.—The Bunker Hill Aurora says—"We admire to have a man too busy to busy at his bill—it shows that he means to pay it as soon as he gets time."

MORALS OF HANGING.

"The annexed startling and terrible extract," says the American, is re-published by the Commercial from the Albany Daily, under the head of "Morals of hanging," and with the remark that it "bears hard against punishment by death, than a whole acre of homily." Not so—the moral, to be just, should have been headed—Morals of public Executions; and the testimony it bears is not against punishment by death, which we hold to be indispensable for the crime of willful shedding of blood, but against making that a spectacle and a show, which should be a solemn act of justice, and a fearful but certain punishment. The laws of the state of New-York have prescribed the true course in this matter. He who maliciously takes life, is by them condemned to lose his own—not in the public gaze, nor before spectators, (where he may be obliged to play a part), but within the narrow enclosure of the prison walls, and with none to look on but the stern officers of justice, and the self-dying; no music of the cross, who abandons not, till the final moment, the hope and the attempt to induce penitence, however late."

THE JUDGE AND THE HANGMAN.—Did your lordship never attend a killing time at the Old Bailey? If not, pray favour me with your company; not on the gallows, but staying in the street, amid a crowd that always assemble when I am at work for you and the sheriff. Perhaps it will add to the zest if you come when I have a young woman to stuff, and a pair of gloves. Will this flatter you? her particular, as she swings in the wind, produce a pleasant sound in your ears, my learned master? Fail not to watch the people; the men, women and children—good, bad and indifferent—who have gathered to behold the sacred majesty of the law. You will see such flashing of eyes, and grinding of teeth—you will hear sighs and groans, and words of rage, and hatred, with fierce curses on yourself and me; and then laughter, such as is of an unnatural kind, that they will make you start, yets on the dead, to tell me, will make you sick! You will feel—no—way should you feel any more than your faithful journeyman! We shall go to our breakfasts with good appetites, and a firm conviction that every hanging but changes many pillers into savage robbers, fit for murder.

A few years ago I was called out to the gallows to hang a little boy who had been convicted of killing with malice aforethought. I felt guilty, he must have been in the habit of going to executions. Ten thousand came to dabble in the poor creature's blood. That was the youngest fellow creature I ever handled in the way of our business; and a beautiful child he was, too, as you have seen by the papers, with a straight nose, large blue eyes, and golden hair. I have no heart, no feelings; who has in our calling! But those who come to see me strange that tender youngster, have hearts and feelings as we once had. Here I—no—had, for what they saw was fit to make them as hard as your servant, or his master.

"Then," said the "stripling," "I am going on to the gallows; his smooth cheek of the colour of dew—his little limbs trembling; and his bosom heaving sigh after sigh, as if the body and soul were parting without my help.

"This was a downright murder, for there was scarce any life to take out of him. When I began to pull the cap over his baby face, he made his small hands together, (his arms, you know, were covered fast to his body,) and he gave me a beseeching look, just as a calf will lick a butcher's hand. But cattle do not speak; this creature muttered, "Pray, sir, don't hurt me." "My dear," answered I, "you should have spoken to my master; I'm only a journeyman, and must do as I'm bid." This made him cry, which seemed to relieve him, and I said, "I should like to cry myself if I had not heard shouts from the crowd—'Poor lamb!—chance!—murder!—murder!'" "Quick," said the sheriff. "Ready," said I. The reverend gentleman gave me the wink—the 'drop fell—one kick and he waved to and fro, dead as the feelings of the Christian people of England.

The crowd dispersed; some swearing some weeping with passionate exclamations; some swearing as if hell had broke loose; and some laughing while they cracked blackguard jokes on you and me and the person and the dangling corpse. They had come for the sight: they would have come to see an angel murdered. They had come to get drunk with strong excitement; they went back feeling as if they had killed a man. They had come to see the passions of fear and pity; they went back, some in a fever of rage, some burning with hate, some hardened in heart, like me or you; all sunk down in their own respect ready to make light of pain and blood, corrupted by the indecent show, and more fit than ever to make work for us—the judge and the hangman.

(O some law-makers!) who think to soften the hearts of the people—to make them gentle and good—give them a feeling of respect for the law, and others, by showing them a sight like this.

THE BEAR AT SCHOOL.

The private journal of a traveller lately returned from North America to Paris, contains the following story. In New-Hampshire, on the northern borders of the United States, a peculiar species of bear is found, black in colour, small in size, and of a general of a peaceable disposition. These animals live on wild honey and fruits, and never attack man, or the lesser animals, excepting when pressed by hunger, in the very severe winters. On one occasion, some years ago, a boy found a very young bear-pup near Lake Wimpsee, and carried it home with him. It was fed and brought up about the house of the boy's father, and became as tame as a dog. Every day this youthful captor had to go to a school at some distance, and by degrees, the bear became his daily companion. At first the other scholars were shy of the creature's acquaintance; but, ere long, it became their regular playfellow, and they dived in snoring with it the little store of provisions when they brought for their day's sustenance, in small bags. After two years of civilization, however, the bear wandered to the woods, and did not return. Search was made for him, but in vain.

Four succeeding years passed away, and in the interval changes had occurred about the school already. An old dame had succeeded to the ancient master, and a new generation of pupils had taken the place of the former ones. One very cold winter day, while the schoolmistress was busy with her humble lessons, a boy chanced to leave the door half open on his re-entrance, and suddenly a large bear walked in. The consternation of the old lady and her boys and girls was unexpressed. Both schoolmistress and pupils would have been "abroad," but the bear was in the path, and all that could be done was to fly as far as possible, and hide behind the tables and benches.

But the bear troubled nobody. He walked quietly up to the fireplace, and warmed himself, exhibiting much satisfaction in his countenance.

tenance during the process. He remained thus about a quarter of an hour, and then walked up to the wall where the provender bags and baskets of the pupils were suspended. Standing on his hind feet, he then took hold of these successively, put his paws into them, and made free with the bread, fruit, and other eatables there contained. He next tried the schoolmistress's desk, where some little provisions usually were; but finding it firmly shut, he went up again to the fire, and, after a few minute's stay before it, he walked himself finally out by the way he came.

As soon as the schoolmistress and her pupils had courage to move, the alarm was given to the neighbours. Several young men immediately started after the bear, and, as its track was perfectly visible in the snow, they soon came up with it, and killed it. Then it was, that, by certain marks upon its skin, some of its pursuers recognized in the poor bear no enemy, but an old friend of their own recent school-days. Great regret was felt for the death of the creature. It was like killing a human friend rather than a wild animal.

HAZARDOUS SEA ADVENTURES.

The arrival of the tiny iron steamboat at New-York, from London, has called up many reminiscences of former voyages on the great deep, performed by crafts of a similar size.

A friend relates for us a more daring and perilous voyage than any we have yet seen mentioned, and which we are sure must eclipse any yet untold.

An American sailor made his escape during the war from the British prison ship at Bermuda, and crossed the ocean alone, in an open sail-boat, to the Virginia shore, a distance of over two hundred leagues.

Thomas King, of Charleston, South Carolina, who had been captured in the United States brig Vixen by the Southampton frigate, was the hero of this exploit. He engaged a fellow-prisoner to accompany him in the enterprise. A pocket compass was procured; some provision was saved from their scanty allowance; and the prison ship's sail-boat, which was to be used, had kegs of fresh water for ballast. The fourth of July, 1813, the enterprise was determined on. When the evening arrived for putting the plan into execution, the heart of King's companion did waver, that was to be, filled him, and he could not be induced to leave the ship with that of his more resolute comrade, in the little boat. But King, unopposed, though thus abandoned, determined to make the attempt alone.

He got out at a port-hole on the evening of the third of July, swam to the boat, which was towing astern, got into it, cut the painter and drifted some distance, then made sail for old Virginia, where he arrived on the third of August, landing on the beach ten miles to the southward of Cape Henry, having been nine days at sea. He went overland to Norfolk, where the boat was sold for his benefit. He was soon after appointed master's-mate in the navy, as a reward for his daring conduct.

Much has been said, and sung, and written about the young English sailor who was found making his escape from a French prison in a tub; and who, being brought before Napoleon, was magnanimously liberated and sent home by that great man, who admired and rewarded the daring bravery of the undertaking. Poetic license has established this event at the expense of fact. The young sailor is represented as attempting to cross the English channel, from Boulogne, in his tub. His endeavour was to drift out with the ebb-tide to the British squadron, then blockading the French coast, and within two or three miles of the shore.

The successful exploit of the American sailor throws this into the shade, as well as the little iron steamboat's trip, and all the other daring adventures in tiny crafts on the ocean, which old reminiscences have brought out since the Robert Stockton's arrival.

CLASSICAL EXAGGERATIONS.

Some of the scenes in the kingdom of Naples, of which Virgil, in his Æneid, makes so much, are thus described, in the language of sobriety and daylight, by a late visitor.—The Lucerne Lake is now a paltry pool, scarcely equal to a mill-pond. Lake Avernus has lost its woods, and is despoiled of the deep gloom and breeding vapours which made it a fit outlook of Virgil's hell. As a matter of course, I visited the cavern by which Æneas is supposed to have passed to the nether world. It is a straight tunnel, ten feet high, cut artificially in the tufa, passing through the narrow ridge two or three furlongs in length, and nearly level. About one hundred yards from the farther end, a very narrow gully leads off to the right; it descends rapidly for two hundred feet, and conducts you to a pool of water. As this ought to be the river Styx, I looked for Charon, and kept my eyes open to catch the growl of Cerberus, and the shrieks of unquiet ghosts. The surly boatman, however, seems to have retired a settee miles, and left the charge of the ferry to three or four of his sons, a race of sturdy, unshaven, bare-legged savages. The Styx, too, has shared the fate of many other subterranean rivers, having grown so shallow that the Charonides or Fitz-charones have laid aside the bark, and carry disembodied spirits across on their shoulders. They pressed me much to make the journey; but not being guarded by spells like Æneas, and having some doubts whether the Fitz-charones were a race "to ride the waters on," I refused. One of our party, however, passed over, and returned in a quarter of an hour. After being inured for about half an hour, we returned to the upper world, with our riches, and found it much less difficult to recover graves than Virgil would have us believe. They have an Acheron here, too, a Mare Mortuum, and Elysian Fields; but it would require moonlight and a strong faith, to see any mystical or subterranean about them. The grotto of Posilippo, a magnificent tunnel, two-thirds of a mile in length, sixty feet high, and broad enough to serve for a highway, is a much more interesting object. It was run by the early inhabitants, before the commencement of Roman history.—Bene is a beautiful spot, but the ground capable of being built upon would not afford room for a dozen of handsome villas.

Among other appropriations of the late English journals, we find the following version of a New-York pun:

A SINGULAR FACT.

If the great Mr. Burford, of famed Leicester-square, Should lose the fine paintings that please us all here, An Orpheus he'd be, and I'll prove it "comme ça." For 'tis plain, that he'd have not a Pa-nor-ma.

Her majesty has been graciously pleased to confer on Mary Bannin, the only living child of John Bannin, the author of "Tales of the O'Hara Family," a pension for all the purposes of her education.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE WORLD'S ENAVERIE

Sette forth in homely verse, by Cornelia May, from "The Seven Stars of Witte," published in 1847.

At me, throughout the world
Dost wickedness abound!
And well I wot on neither hand
Can honestie be found.

The wisest man in Athens
About the circle ran,
V'nt a lantern in the light of daye
To find an honest man:

And when at night he sat him downe
To reckon on his games,
He only found—alack, poore man!
His labour for his pains.

And soe thou now shalt finde
Alle men of fide degree,
Striving as if their only trade
Were that of cheating thee.

Thy friend will bid thee welcome,
His servants at thy call;
The dearest friend he has on earth,
Till hee has won thy all.

He will play with thee at dice
Till thy golde is in his hande,
He will meet thee at the tennis court
Till hee winne all thy lande.

The brother of thy youth,
When ye shared bookes and bedde,
Would eat himselfe the sugar-plums,
And leave thee barley-bread.

But growing up to manhood,
His heart is colder grown;
Aske in thy neede for barley bread,
And he'll give thee a stone.

The wife whom thou dost blesse,
Alack, she is thy curse—
A bachelor's an evil state,
But a married man's is worse.

The lawyer at thy deske,
Good lawe will promise thee,
Until thy very last groat
Is given for his fee.

Thy baker and thy brewer
Doe wrong thee night and morn;
And thy miller hee doth grinde thee
In grinding of thy corn.

Thy goldsmith and thy jeweller
Are leagued in knavish sort,
And the elwande of thy tailor
It is an inch too shorte.

Thy cooke hath made thy dish
From the offals on the shelve,
While fish and fowle and savoury herbes
Are served unto himselfe.

The valet thou dost trust,
Smooth-tongued and placid-faced,
Doe weare thy belliantes in his cypre,
And thou weart'st his of paste.

Alack! thou canst not finde
Of high or lowe degree,
In court, or courtie, or cabinet,
A man of honestie.

There is not in the world,
North, south, east, or west,
Who would maintain a righteous cause
Against his interest.

Ah, me! it grieves me sore,
And I sorrow night and daye,
To see how man's crafty enemie
Doth lead his soule astraye.

PHILOSOPHY

Philosophy can add to our happiness in no other manner but by diminishing our misery; it should not pretend to increase our present stock, but make us economists of what we are possessed of. The great source of calamity lies in regret or anticipation; he, therefore, is most wise, who thinks of the present alone, regardless of the past or the future. 'Tis impossible to a man of pleasure; it is difficult to the man of business; and is, in some degree, attainable by the philosopher. Happy were we all born philosophers, aborn with a talent of thus dissipating our own cares by not finding them only our mark!

ADVANTAGES OF CONVERSATION.

Conversation calls out into light what has been lodged in all the recesses and secret chambers of the soul. By occasional hints and incidents it brings old useful notions into remembrance; it unfolds and displays the hidden treasure of knowledge, with which reading, observation, and study, had before furnished the mind. By mutual discourse the soul is awakened and stirred to bring forth its hoards of knowledge, and it learns how to render them most useful to mankind. A man of vast reading, without conversation, is like a miser who lives only to himself.

PERSONS NOT LIKELY TO SERVE YOU

There are six sorts of persons, at whose hands you need not expect kindness.—The scornful and narrow-minded, think of nobody but their noble selves; the busy have not time to think of you; the overgrown rich man, is above minding any one who needs his assistance; the poor and unhappy, has neither spirit nor ability; the good-natured fool, however willing, is not capable of serving you.

THE following ingenious parody upon Southey's "Falls of Lodore," published in the last number of the Mirror, is from the pen of one of our most esteemed literary correspondents.

SUFFICIENT REASONS FOR BANISHING THE POULTRY FROM LINLITHGOW.

Why banish the poultry away from the door?
Because they come scratching,
And cackling and snatching,
And strutting and fighting,
In such things delighting,
They hasten along, conflicting and strong;
Now squalling and raging,
As if a war waging,
The borders and hot-beds among
Flying and creeping,
Dodging and peeping,
Swelling and darning,
Closing and parting,
Springing and spurring,
Winging and whirling,
Wounding and wrestling,
Pipping and kipping,
And feathering and gathering, all over the ground.
Now swelling and cresting,
And each other breasting,
And shattering and deafening the ear with the sound.
Some quiet, some riot,
Some eager and teagrio,
And fattening and baitening,
And worming and squirming,
And growing and crouching,
And choking and soaking,
And warming and warming,
And nestling and wrestling,
And robbing and bobbing,
And stooping and grouping,
And tripping and dipping,
And ducking and clucking,
And wandering and gundering,
And nesting and breasting,
And watching and hatching,
And picking and chicking,
And bracing and racing,
And spying and lying,
And wooing and cooing,
And scrambling and rambling,
And jolting and moulting,
And musing and hissing,
And quacking and clacking,
And shivering and quivering,
And mating and hating,
And ruffling and scuffling,
And shaking and raking and quaking,
And hopping and slopping and stopping,
And quailing and ailing and failing,
And addling and straddling and waddling,
And fluttering and sputtering and guttering,
And running and stumping and summing,
And laming and maiming and gaming,
And laying and playing and staying,
And winking and blinking and drinking,
And spying and eyeing and flying,
And braving and craving and laving,
And carrying and harrowing and carrying,
And hurrying and skurrying and worrying,
And laming and maiming and gaming,
And troubling and gobbling and squabbling,
And wrangling and strangling and mangling and banging,
And filling and spilling and billing and killing,
And waking and aching and taking and breaking,
And peering and fearing and rearing and rearing,
And warning and spurring and marring and jarring,
And dripping and nipping and strapping and whipping,
And dabbling and rabbling and scrabbling and gabbling,
And gaping and flapping and clapping and napping,
And slipping and sipping and clipping and skipping,
And falling and sprawling and crawling and bawling,
And so never ending,
But riving and rending,
Sounds and motions for ever and ever are blending,
All at once and all o'er,
With a screaming uproar,
And so they were banished away from the door.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

THEATRES AND THEATRICALS.

Theatres.—Precocious performances.—Madam Vestris—Braham—Power—Quadrupeds—Covent Garden—Decline of theatres—Opera.

THERE is nothing so appalling in London at present as a "Dead wall." The reason why? It is covered with play-bills!

"Horror on horror's head accumulate!"

appears at present to be the motto of the play-wrights. And these horrors are effected by simply sanguinary means—sheer ferocity. No supernatural agency is at present invoked. Devils, demons, and red flame are at a discount, and sylphs, nymphs, and furies, are looked upon as mere matters of moonshine. The titles of the pieces run after this fashion:—"The Deserted Mill!"—"The Executioner of Madrid!"—"The Birrigh Course!" But this is the mildest type in the present bloodthirsty stage of dramatic literature. What think you of "The Bear-hunters, or the Fatal Ravine!" (The piece always deepens in atrocity when there is an "or"—a second title.) "The Doomed House! or, Parricide's Return!" and the "Man of Blood! or, the Spirit of Revenge!!!" These are literal copies from the walls. Now here is a precious fund of amusement for the nervous and hypochondriacal; delightful pieces for those who live in lonely places, out of the reach of the police and gaslights

The consequences of such a diabolical state of things is what might naturally have been expected. All the pot-boys cry out—"Ah! by heavens!" and many of the actors at the minor theatres, where these horrors are perpetrated, ill-use their wives shamefully.

As a slight set-off against those slaughterous, ruffianly, and red-paint affairs, we have Madam Vestris's pleasant performances at the Olympic, where the company is always good, the management dexterous, and the pieces slight, showy, and superficial.

By the way, it appears you did not relish Madam Vestris. Nor is this much to be wondered at—you expected too much. Madam Vestris, though not without many points of attraction still, is admired here a good deal now, because she has been admired a good deal formerly. Admiration has become, as it were, a sort of habit, and her claims upon the public are as much grounded upon pleasant reminiscences of the past, as upon present exertions. The case was different with you. From year to year you had heard of Madam Vestris, and still from year to year "your wonder grew," and your expectations increased. In the meanwhile time was stealing on. Madam Vestris grew not younger, nor more arch or vivacious. In her wane she paid you a visit. It was a hazardous and ill-advised experiment; but she, the petted favourite of a London audience, would not dream, I suppose, of being coldly received by any other. But then, appearing before the playgoers of New-York was not like appearing before the audience of an English provincial town. For years you have been familiarized with good acting, and used to the best efforts of the best that this country could send in every department, opera and comedy excepted. You never had Braham; and what is more than a dozen Brahams, you never had Liston! But to return to Vestris—you expected to have seen a Hebe, a Psyche, or some other goddess swim on to the stage, and on walked a still good-looking, but middle-aged woman!

"Oh, what a falling off was there!"

And as a reaction of this kind always disposes people to under-praise as much as they were before inclined to overpraise, you, perhaps, did rather undervalue Madam. This I take to be the rationale of this momentous affair.

Perhaps there is not an actor or actress on the boards that has not a particular aversion to some particular town or other. Some dislike Ireland in the lump, and some abhor Scotland, and vice versa. The reason of these violent likes and dislikes could easily be rendered sufficiently obvious (were it worth the while) by a slight inquiry as to how "they were received" at such and such places, for this is the master-key to their likings and antipathies. Now doubtless Vestris and her husband will have a thorough "aversion" towards America, for which they will be prepared to render any reason but the true one; but, you are a great nation—meet the blow with fortitude!

Pray do not let poor Madam's spleen disturb the peace of the Union! Let not the wagging of her woman's tongue make many editors "drunk with choler," so that they must needs write paragraphs in "King Canbyes' vein." Make not a national quarrel of it!

You may also see it occasionally stated in the London papers that Braham is yet in his prime; that, notwithstanding his advanced years, his voice has lost none of its power, and his style none of its vigour. Believe it not. It may truly be said of Braham, "The veteran lags superfluous on the stage."

Some of his efforts are almost pitiable. This ought not to be—it is discredit to himself, and hurtful to the feelings of his real friends and former admirers. But alas! how few actors and actresses know when to make their bow or curtsy and retire. This is excusable in many cases, where a stern necessity compels them to remain in spite of their better judgment; but this excuse Braham cannot plead, as he has the reputation of being immensely rich. Perhaps he may even yet think proper to pay you a visit. If so, I prophesy the disappointment will be much more intense than with regard to Madam Vestris.

I suppose Mr. Vestris—if the lady will not take his name, why not he take the lady's, if it is considered the better of the two—is writing a book about you! Doubtless you will never be able to hold up your heads after it.

That enemy to the blue devils, Tyrone Power, is enlivening the visitors at the Haymarket with his genuine drollery and irrepressible comic Irish sketches. It is quite certain that he is here at present, though if we take up a paper a week or two after, we will, probably, read that he is performing to overflowing houses in Cincinnati! This steam is literally annihilating time and space, and making a lakelot of the Atlantic. We could scarcely keep a decent performer before, now they will all be off, "Over the waters, westward ho!"

But what do we want with decent performers—have we not plenty of animals. The quadrupeds have fairly supplanted the bipeds on the London boards. But even in the four-legged Thespian there has been a regular declension. The noble horse and the sagacious elephant had their day; but their performances were too intellectual to suit the taste of the times, and we took a carnivorous turn. Lions, tigers, leopards and Van Amburg reigned paramount, but they, too, have passed away, and now we have an assortment of dancing dogs and monkeys! We will not apostrophize the shades of Shakespeare, Garrick, and so on, because that sort of work is stale, but, really, this is very exquisite! In the St. James's Theatre—one of the most elegant theatres, by the way, in London, and built at the fashionable part of the town, in order, it is supposed, to lure the aristocracy back to the once popular and now despised drama, we have nightly performances of dancing dogs and monkeys!—"Goats and monkeys!" as Othello says. After this, doubtless, the next stage will be the "astonishing pig" and the "wonderful calf!"

These are sad doings, but they are most true. I "nothing extenuate, nor ought set down in malice." Covent Garden, under Macready's management, is the only oasis in the dramatic desert. This house has been truly worthy of the name of a theatre—a place where you might quaff pure draughts of intellectual pleasure without any base alloy. Ribaldry, frivolity, quackery, pretension and other goodly ingredients of the modern stage have found no refuge or encouragement here. Never before was Shakespeare presented to the public in a way worthy of his immortal fame. Not only has every aid of scenery and costume which the most inventive fancy and correct taste could imagine or dictate, and the most unwearied assiduity and liberal expenditure realize, been called in to give effect to the bard's immortal fictions, but his mangled scenes have been restored, and the presumptuous interpolations of his improvers rigorously expunged. After a lapse of three centuries, a series of purely Shakespearean dramas have been brought forward, and the result has proved irrefragably that, even as far as stage effect was concerned, Shakespeare was a much better judge than the officious and self-satisfied busy-bodies who mangled his noble works, and introduced base admixtures in order to 'suit their own narrow and most commonplace notions. The way in which Hamlet, King Lear, Coriolanus, The Tempest, Macbeth, and Othello have been got up, will ever form an era in the history of the British stage.

But, alas! Covent Garden is the only solitary bright star twinkling in the dense gloom of the theatrical horizon, and after the close of the present season Macready retires from its management. The probability is, that next year there will not be a decent place of intellectual recreation in the metropolis, and actors of talent will have to go elsewhere, and leave the boards in possession of two and four-legged performers of about equal ability.

Do you ask the cause of all this. It is to be found in the altered condition of society in nearly all its grades. The time has passed away when a new play would bring together all the beaux and belles and wits, and would-be wits, and fashionables of the town to criticize its merits; and when to have been absent and unable to give an opinion was a mark of extreme vandalism. Now, half the younger branches of the aristocracy have never seen the standard plays performed, and perhaps scarcely know their names. The curtain now rises before fashionable people sit down to dinner; and Richard has lost his life and crown, and Othello's great agonies are over, ere the desert is removed. The rich merchant has his suburban villa, and is off into the country, leaving smoke and Shakespeare behind as soon as the business of the day is over; and the grave citizen no longer relaxes over the drolleries of the farce, but hastens to his club to settle the affairs of the nation. Added to this, there are immense quantities of musical taverns who have concerts, where the mechanic sits and smokes his pipe, drinks his ale, and has as much contentment at a cheap rate as he cares about. Besides, formerly theatres were almost the only places of recreation, now every species of amusement that the ingenuity of man can invent is held out to attract attention and divide patronage.

These combined causes, aided by incessant political fermentations, have brought the theatres to the state in which they are at present. Still, in such an immense place as London, with all the drawbacks above alluded to, one or two good houses could be supported, if properly managed. The young students of law and medicine, and the strangers visiting the metropolis, would be almost sufficient to do this. Macready, it is understood, has no reason to complain of lack of patronage, but it is supposed the enacting of the principal characters and the duties of management are too much for him.

Pauline Garcia, sister of the lamented Malibran, made her debut at the Opera some time since. She was enthusiastically welcomed at first on her sister's account, and a good deal applauded before the close on her own. She was very nervous and embarrassed, and could not, of course, give full scope to her powers, but she promises well. The company at the Opera House is at present tolerably strong, comprising the well-known names of Tamburini, Rubini, Ivanhoff, Tati, Lablache, Giulia Grisi, and Persiani.

This expensive establishment is another formidable opponent of the theatres; because fashionable people, though one half of them may have an ear like Hotspur's, must needs de away in rapures at the Opera. How should they show their taste else! C

QUITE A PRETTY PROPERTY.

BY HENRY STANHOPE LEE.

(Concluded from our last.)

CHAPTER VIII.

Which shows that, though women are sometimes unreasonable, men are not always unwise. Fashion not a petrifactor—nor women a weathercock.

SCENES are disagreeable. Love scenes are particularly disagreeable to all but the parties immediately interested. I dropped the curtain on the last tableau, therefore, with all possible despatch. Yet it was a remarkable scene; the more so that it was of actual occurrence. No less so is the scene that follows.

Mrs. Million did not interrupt the tit-a-tit. It was most judicious, in her opinion, to leave the whole matter to the good sense of her daughter. Harry is gone, therefore, when mamma comes sweeping in, with all the dowager stateliness of flesh and fifty. Mary prepares for an explosion.

"Well, my child, I suppose that you have brought this silly affair to an end. You know that I never approved your engagement with Mr. Singleton, and his recent imprudence has placed the possibility of his connexion with our family quite out of the question."

Now, in ordinary cases, where an interview is commenced by mamma in this very decided and peremptory manner, I would bet two to one on the old lady.

Mary was sitting upon the same ottoman where we introduced her to our readers, and where she had first listened to the maternal eulogy on the young man with a "very pretty property." Her heart throbbed a little, and her cheek flushed, as she thought of the coming conflict with an authority which she had always revered; but her purpose never faltered for a moment.

"You must remember, Mary, that I have always objected to Mr. Singleton's attentions, chiefly because he differs from us in religion. He is an Unitarian; you and your family have always been educated in the Episcopalian worship."

If he had been a heathen, thought Mary, mamma would never have very obstinately objected to him on that account; but she said nothing, and hung down her head.

"Besides, Mary, he is, to the last degree, thoughtless and imprudent. Can I trust the happiness of my daughter in the hands of a gambler and spendthrift?"

The imputation touched Mary to the quick. "Imprudent he may have been, mother, and guilty therefore, if imprudence be a crime. Gambler he is not, unless the daily hazard of the mercantile world be gambling. The dupe of knaves I believe he has been; but even a censorious world has never coupled his name with dishonour. Prove to me that in any—the most trivial instance—he has stained his reputation, and, though it cost me my life, I would cast him from my heart."

"Fine speeches, truly, Miss Minx; and do you think that I will ever consent that any of the family of the Millions should unite herself with a beggar?"

Mary started to her feet. Most unflattering was the aspect of that curled lip, and the glance of that flashing eye! An angry girl is certainly a very lovely object. Not a spoiled, pettish girl—not a juvenile termagant, whom years will mature into an indomitable scold—not a noisy, raging, Vesuvian girl, who blows up with unexpected and unaccountable passion; all these are sufficiently odious. But a gentle and serene woman, self-respectful, sweet-tempered, and not easily roused, in a sudden burst of proud and indignant anger is the most beautiful thing in creation. A sea-fight, of a ship in a tempest, is nothing to it.

"Beggar!" repeated the astonished girl; when, terrified by her own sudden passion, and awed by the spirit of habitual obedience to an arrogant and self-willed mother, she sunk, half-fainting, at her feet.

"No theatricals, here, Miss Minx. All this will do very well in stage-plays, and such nonsense, but it is not to be tolerated among people of sense. I'll soon rid you of such humours. Why, a moment ago, you struck up like a tragedy-queen—a perfect Lady Macbeth; and now you are going into hysterics. Perhaps you could do not better than to make an engagement with Mr. Barry, to play the dumb-girl in Massaniello."

Mary rose, and condescended no reply. She was nerved to her task by an impulse and a purpose not to be shaken by the idle ravings even of a mother. "Yes, Miss Million," resumed the mother, "I ask you again, for the last time, if you have discarded, for ever, that profligate and beggar."

"If to be stripped of fortune, mother, is to be profligate, and to be thrown utterly upon his own talents and acquirements for subsistence is to be a beggar—then is Harry Singleton both a beggar and a profligate; but, such as he is, he is my affianced husband and your son."

"No son of mine, Miss Million; and unless you will break your mother's heart, and destroy the peace and prospects of the family, no husband of yours."

"Hear me, mother, and once for all. You received Harry Singleton into your family when he was accounted a young man of fortune, and when ambitious girls and mothers were competing for his hand."

Mamma took the remark as personal, but bit her lips and said nothing.

"You encouraged his addresses to your daughter. You did not frown when those addresses were accepted. You consented to entrust to his keeping that daughter's happiness. Wherein is he less worthy now, than when I accepted his hand?"

"The old story, I suppose; love in a cottage—and all that! Mary Million, Mary Million, I thought you were a woman of more sense. This is all very well in a romance, and you flatter yourself, no doubt, with the idea of figuring like one of your novel ladies, who jump out of a three-story window to throw themselves into the arms of a beggar, and run the risk of breaking their necks to keep from breaking their hearts. Stuff, Miss Million, the whole of it. No well-behaved and well-educated young woman ever indulged in such tantrums as these."

"Mother, mother!" muttered Mary.

"Don't interrupt me, if you please. Here is a matter touching the peace of your mother and family, and you would not suffer me to get a word in edgeways. Haven't you seen enough of your acquaintances ruined by marrying beggars? Do you really suppose that young ladies have nothing to do but consult their own fancy in a husband? Do you imagine that civilized people marry for love, Miss Million? Did I marry your dear father for love, you ungrateful girl? And will you pretend to know better how young ladies should marry than your mother? No, Miss Million—but I will not hear a word in reply. I will never consent to your forming this beggarly connexion. Reflect, coolly, miss, on the good advice

I have given you. Follow it, and you will have no reason to repent; but disobey my commands, and I discard you for ever."

Did you ever see my old favourite, Mrs. Barnes, make an exit in a rage? Mrs. Million's was a fac simile.

CHAPTER IX.

A conclusion, not a catastrophe.

What's to be done? In France the lovers would have ordered charcoal, or thrown themselves into the Seine. In England they would have set mamma at defiance, and called a postchaise for Grosvenor Green. But in this country suicide is ungentle, and the best writers on the domestic relations agree that an elopement is among the last of the improprieties.

Be that as it may. Three years have elapsed. 'Shift the scene again. Give another turn to the kaleidoscope. What have we here!

A pretty cottage this; with everything neat and green about it, and other signs of domesticity besides that little draped cherub, which is as much prettier than either of Greenough's as flesh is prettier than marble. Curly locks and blue eyes—pray does it more resemble papa or mamma? It would be difficult to say. The creature has a track of either of them. And here, then, they have brought up at last!

"Mary, my dear, do you remember that evening at Mrs. Peacock's?"

"What evening?"

"That evening, to be sure, of all others, when I waded through the streets in a second deluge, to revenge myself for your abominable coquetry! Three years since, little did I then expect to be filling wits and planting potatoes at my own Florence, with a little girl of my own that could call papa as plain as the parrot."

"Well, Harry, and what think you of the change?"

"A change, truly! The dollars swept, and a few acres of thousands left! But to tell you the truth, Moll, with this quiet little tenement and the hope of a better—a profession that already yields an humble competence, and promises distinction; with a wife of my own, and a girl, I really begin to believe that for the first time in my life I am entitled to the reputation of a young man with quite a pretty property."

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

INSTINCT IN ANIMALS.

Instinct is defined by Johnson to be "the power which determines the will of brutes. A desire or aversion in the mind not determined by reason or deliberation."

"Instinct is the term by which we designate the intelligence of animals. They are supposed to be guided solely by this imperious, unate power, a power coeval with their existence. It is, of course, presumed to be independent of education and external influences, leaving no choice of action."

I take leave to differ from this generally-acknowledged opinion, for close observation convinces me that they have the power of choice, and, consequently, that they are influenced by external causes. They possess, beyond a doubt, certain attributes of mind, such as discrimination, decision, judgment, reflection, memory, hope, fear, love, hatred, revenge, shame, forbearance, and many other impulses springing from causes entirely beyond the control or influence of what is called instinct.

A dog will measure distances with his eye, he chooses the shortest mode of ascent and descent, if he cannot ford a river at the usual place, on account of the tide, he will take to the bridge, and at low tide return again to the fording-place.

Judge Hopkinson of Philadelphia has two dogs, both of them possessing uncommon intelligence. Oscar carries letters and newspapers from his master's house to a friend who lives several squares distant. He barks when he reaches the house, is admitted, allows the parcel to be untied from his neck, waits patiently for an answer, returns home, gives notice of his arrival by barking, and is ready to go again on similar errands. Spring, the other dog, is a short-legged half-terrier; he possesses memory and the reflective powers in a great degree. A lady about half a mile distant from his master's house, being very fond of animals, always paid great attention to Spring when he was on a visit with his master or mistress. Finding this very agreeable, he took it in his head to pay his visits alone.

Without any tuition, he raised himself on his hind legs and attempted to ring the bell, but all his efforts could only produce a jarring of the wires. Being an unusual sound, the servant within sight of the bell below, went to the street-door to ascertain the cause, and Spring rushed in. After that, as his visits were generally at the same hour, the rattling of the bell-wire was the signal for the dog's admittance. He paid these visits for several years, and was always received with great kindness. About two years ago, on entering the house, he found the family caring a beautiful little Italian greyhound, and although they paid Spring the same attention as formerly, he showed his displeasure at the intrusion of the new favourite, by growling and keeping at a distance. He would neither take the cake nor sugar that was offered him, but went away sulkily, and never returned by himself.

If this is called instinct, then all the actions of human beings are impelled by instinct. What I have said of dogs is applicable to many other animals, for education does as much for a pig, a lion, a canary bird, an elephant, a monkey, as it does for a dog, and as it does for a man whose intellects are of a limited order, which inferiority embraces more than half of the human family. Some intellects are so obtuse that they can scarcely receive any complex impression. There is an Irish girl in our family who has no reflective powers. She looked at the movements of a small group of automotons on a square board of a foot diameter, without any wonder, conceiving that they were all alive. She had always been an out-door labourer in Ireland, and therefore one object was as much a novelty as another; she expected to find everything in America different from what she had been accustomed to see, and was therefore prepared for variety, yet she is not an idiot.

In short, instinct is an innate power, which only determines the will of brutes in such matters as relate to self-preservation; for, physiologically considered, they are endowed with the faculty of constructiveness, combativeness, acquisitiveness, and philoprogenitiveness—all of which are subservient to the purposes of being—self-preservation. We have all these in common with brutes; but, relatively considered, they are our superiors in agility, strength, and in powers of endurance. Their organs of sense, are likewise of a much higher order than ours—vision, smell, taste, hearing, and touch, are, beyond comparison, more acute.

Philosophers have long puzzled themselves for an exact definition of the brute creation, and he was thought to succeed the best who defined a brute to be "an animal that never made bargains"—which means that they never bartered one thing for the sake of some present or future advantage. No dog, for instance, was known to exchange his bone with another dog.

Now this is as far from being the true definition as any other offered, for they do bargain when they are taught to do so; and I should like to know which of us would ever have made an exchange of articles in his possession, for those in the hands of others, unless he had been taught. I know a dog who would barter a piece of money for meat at the stalls, and he had the consciousness that he could not get the meat without it, for he would steal the money when it was not given to him. Mr. Dickinson, the miniature painter, could send his dog to the bakers for biscuits; the dog would lay down the money on the counter of the baker's shop, and wait patiently until the biscuits were put in a bag around his neck—similar instances are common. In this respect, therefore, an animal can make bargains for himself and others, equal to a man. Their faculties, to be sure, are limited, but they differ only in degree; the aptness to learn is the same when the object to be attained is not too complex.

Fear overcomes all their instinctive faculties. A horse will tremble with agony when he encounters sounds and objects which are of an unusual nature. There is scarcely one who can see a locomotive engine pass without shrinking with terror, and it is a well-known, melancholy fact, that he will perish in the flames of a burning stable without having the power of saving himself, although the passage is clear. Nay, it is with the greatest difficulty that they can be dragged out; so that fear, which is considered to belong to the instinctive, or innate faculties, tends to self-destruction rather than to self-preservation. A horse loses the presence of mind, as it is called, when uncommon danger is before him.

I was led into this train of thought by the remarks of a friend, yesterday, who took the popular side of the question; referring the actions of animals to mere instinct. He observed, judiciously, that the dormitories of boarding-schools should never be too high, nor above the refectories, for that young children had not, in the event of fire, the common instincts of animals. He referred to the case of twenty-three young children who perished in the flames when the orphan asylum of Philadelphia was burned, many of whom, he thought, might have saved themselves had their reasoning faculties been more fully developed.

Extreme terror is the great antagonist of instinct; the brute creation, from the elephant to the moth, are frequently martyrs to this overwhelming passion. We know that the horse is completely paralyzed when the flame of fire approaches him, but we attribute the destruction of an insect in the flame of a candle, to a case wholly foreign to the true one.

Animals, generally speaking, seek repose at night, and the whole of the insect tribe shelter themselves under stones and leaves, or in hollows, to avoid the light of the sun. Light is not congenial to their nature or necessary to their wants, and they, therefore, take uncommon pains to protect themselves from its influence. When all is darkness around them, and they fly about to seek the society of their kind, the nucleus of light from a candle strikes them with terror. Unlike the light of the sun, which illuminates all things within the angle of vision, the flame of a candle is merely a bright mass with a limited radiation. The twilight in which an insect moves is not influenced by this ball of light, and therefore it is as much an object of terror as an unusual shadow is to a timid man.

Men of courage have often been found incapable of moving when a shadow at night assumed the appearance of an apparition, so it is when we go lower in the scale of intellect; the flame of a candle strikes the moth or fly with terror, and their fears drive them to frenzy. They do not fly around the candle because, as is generally supposed, they are delighted with the blaze, but because they run a muck, as it were, until they fall in the flame. House flies, who are accustomed to the glare of candles, remain quiet on the walls and take their repose; but field flies, who have lived all their brief life out of doors, when by accident they are attracted to the house, fall victims, like other insects, to the terrific light of a candle.

The inference of all this, to my mind, is that animals of the brute species not only have instinctive faculties, but reasoning ones likewise, and that they are subject to the same passions and feelings as we are, which passions and feelings are entirely independent of what are called the animal propensities. Has no one ever seen a dog sitting at a door looking out with a curious eye at what was passing? Has no one ever seen the change of eye, the peculiar animation of countenance, when a barrel-organ is playing? Has no one ever seen a dog look at a lady?

THE SCREECHING LADY.

A MARBLEHEAD LEGEND.
BY CHARLES SHERRY.

MANY years since a youth and his bride
Built there a cot by the water side;
High on a heaving cliff it stood,
Girt by a rocky solitude:

She was a witch, and a wizard he,
And they spent their days right merrily!

Oh, they ride on the waters dark,
And shatter the mariner's fragile bark;
Or sail the air when the sky is blue,
In a rapid car of the sky's own hue,
Or dive to the caves of the ocean deep,
And visit the cells where the mermaids sleep,
Or sily lurk in the meadow flowers,
Which madens pluck in the wildwood bowers.

Bearing bliss or scattering woe,
By land or sea, wherever they go

And they lead a gay and happy life,
Considering they are man and wife;—
The gentleman asks a friend to dine,
And smokes his cigar and drinks his wine;
The lady scoldes scolds or frets,
And her plimmony pays her gambling debts,
So years of mutual bliss roll by
In the spirit-cot, 'way up in the sky!

But the brightest flowers are born to fade,
And clouds the sunniest skies will shade
And so it chanced, one brilliant night,
He mounted his gig with a brother spirit,
And stayed from home till the morning light.
He had been off with a merry crew,
Singing and quaffing mountain dew;
And his wife was wroth, as she well might be,
At the thought of her solitary tea!

The lady frowned—when the husband came,
Riding home to his watchful dame;
The lady darkened and bit her lips,
And looked like the moon in a half-eclipse
The lady opened her mouth, and spoke;
And volleys of wrath from her quick tongue broke.
"A pretty kettle of fish!" quoth he,
And cast a glance at the raging sea!

His brow grows black, and his eye grows red,
As he stands on the cliffs of Marblehead,
And he looks on his bride with a vacant stare,
And wreaths his hand in her ravest hair;
A terrible scream, as he lifts her high,
And she spins like a top between earth and sky!

That scream for many a league is heard,
By the startled beast, and the scared sea-bird;
The old cliffs shake, as in an earthquake wake,
And the troubled waves on the broad shore break;
And far over meadow and valley and stream,
The casing air is a general scream!

And since, at times, by day or night,
In the glare of noon, or the soft moon-light;
When storms are abroad, or the skies are fair,
That voice is heard in the troubled air
The maiden sleeps, and her virgin dream
Is often broken by that fearful scream
The old crone sits by her chimney side,
And the mariner floats on the restless tide,
And it chills the blood in their veins to hear
That terrible voice come shrill and clear.
And the curse, they say, will never more
Pass from the cliffs of that fated shore!

INDIAN TALES AND LEGENDS.

THE ENCHANTED MOCCASINS.

BY HENRY R. SCHOOLCRAFT.

THERE once lived a little boy with his sister, entirely alone, in an uninhabited country. He was called the Boy that carries the Ball on his Back, from an idea of his having supernatural powers. This boy was constantly in the habit of meditating, and asking within himself whether there were any important beings to remember on the earth. When he grew up to manhood, he asked his sister if she knew of any human beings besides themselves. She replied that she did; and that there was, at a great distance, a large village. As soon as he heard this, he said to his sister, "I am now a young man, and very much in want of a partner;" and he asked his sister to make him several pairs of moccasins. She complied with his request; and, as soon as he received the moccasins, he took up his war-club and set out in quest of the distant village. He travelled on, till at length he came to a small village, and, on looking into it, discovered a very old woman sitting alone by the fire. As soon as she saw the stranger, she invited him in, and thus addressed him: "My poor grandchild, I suppose you are one of those who seek for the distant village, from which no person has ever yet returned. Unless your guardian is more powerful than the guardian of your predecessors, you too will share a similar fate to theirs. Be careful to provide yourself with the Ozhebaguhnum—the bones they use in the medicine dance, without which you cannot succeed." After she had thus spoken, she gave him the following directions for his journey: "When you come near to the village which you seek, you will see in the centre a large lodge, in which the chief of the village, who has two daughters, resides. Before the door you will see a great tree, which is smooth and destitute of bark. On this tree, about the height of a man from the ground, a small lodge is suspended, in which these two daughters dwell. It is here so many have been destroyed. Be wise, my grandchild, and abide strictly by my directions." The old woman then gave him the Ozhebaguhnum,* which would cause the success. Placing them in his bosom, he continued his journey, till at length he arrived at the sought-for village; and, as he was gazing around him, he saw both the tree and the lodge which the old woman had mentioned. Immediately he bent his steps for the tree, and, approaching, he endeavored to reach the suspended lodge. But all his efforts were vain; for, as often as he attempted to reach it, the tree began to tremble, and soon shot up, so that the lodge could hardly be perceived. Filled as he was in all his attempts, he thought of his guardian, and changed himself into a small squirrel, that he might more easily accomplish his design. He then mounted the tree in quest of the lodge. After climbing for some time, he became fatigued, and paused for breath; but, remembering the instructions which the old woman had given him, he took from his bosom one of the bones, and thrust it into the trunk of the tree, on which he sat. In this way he quickly found relief; and, as often as he became fatigued, he repeated this; but whenever he came near the lodge and attempted to touch it, the tree would shoot up as before, and place the lodge beyond his reach. When he thus dis- covered that, by addressing the tree on his left hand, the tree would descend, he continued to do so until it had resumed its former position; then, seizing his war-club, he thus addressed the tree: "You, who have caused the death of so many of my brothers, I will now put an end to, and thus have revenge for the numbers you have destroyed." As he said this, he seized the club and laid them dead at his feet. He then descended, and learning that these sisters had a brother living with their father, who would pursue him for the deed he had done, he set off at random, not knowing whether he went. Soon after, the father and mother of the young woman visited their residence, and found their remains. They immediately told their son, and he said to his sisters, "The Boy that carries the Ball on his Back. I will pursue him, and have revenge for the blood of my sisters." "It is well, my son," replied the father. "The spirit of your life grant you success. I counsel you to be wary in the pursuit. It is a strong spirit who has done this injury to us, and he will try to deceive you in every way. Above all, avoid tasting food till you succeed; for if you break your fast before you see his blood, your power will be destroyed." So saying, they parted.

His son instantly set out in search of the murderer, who, finding he was closely pursued by the brother of the slain, climbed up into one of the tallest trees, and shot forth his magic arrows. Finding that his pursuer was not turned back by his arrows, he renewed his flight; and when he found himself hard pressed, and his enemy close behind him, he transformed himself into the skeleton of a mouse that had been killed, whose flesh had come off from his bones. His sister remembered the moccasins which his sister had given him, which were enchanted. Taking a pair of them, he placed them near the skeleton. "Go," said he to them, "to the end of the earth."

The moccasins then left him, and their tracks remained. Mudj kewis at length came to the skeleton of the mouse, when he perceived that the track he had long been pursuing did not end there, so he continued to follow it up. At length he came to the end of the earth, where he found only a pair of moccasins. Mordred then he had been outwitted by following a pair of moccasins instead of the object of his revenge, he bitterly complained, resolving not to give up the pursuit, and to be more wary and wise in scrutinizing signs. He then called to mind the skeleton he met with on his way, and concluded that it must be the murderer. He retraced his steps towards the skeleton, but found, to his surprise, that it had disappeared, and that the tracks of Omooe Bahmondung, or he who carries the Ball, were in another direction. He now became faint with hunger, and resolved to give up the pursuit; but when he remembered the blood of his sisters, he determined again to pursue.

The other, finding he was closely pursued, now changed himself into a very old man, with two daughters, who lived in a large lodge in the centre of a beautiful garden, which was filled with everything that could delight the eye, or was pleasant to the taste. He made himself appear so very old as to be unable to leave his lodge, and had no difficulty in bringing him food and what on him. The garden also had the appearance of an ancient occupancy, and was highly cultivated.

His pursuer continued on till he was nearly starved, and ready to sink. He exclaimed, "Oh! I will forget the blood of my sisters, for I am starving." But again he thought of the blood of his sisters, and again he resolved to pursue, and he was satisfied with nothing but the attainment of his right to revenge.

He went on till he came to the beautiful garden. He approached the lodge. As soon as the daughters of the owner perceived him, they ran and told their father that a stranger approached the lodge. Their father replied, "Invite him in, my children, invite him in." They quickly did so; and by the command of their father, they had boiled some corn, and prepared other savory food. Mordred had no suspicion of the deception. He was faint and weary with travel, and felt that he could endure fasting no longer. Without hesitancy, he partook heartily of the meal, and in so doing was overcome. All at once he seemed to forget the blood of his sisters, and even the village of his journey. He ate so heartily as to produce sickness, and soon fell into a profound sleep. Omooe Bahmondung watched his opportunity, and, as soon as he found his slumbers sound, resumed his youthful form. He then drew the magic ball from his back; which turned out to be a heavy war-club, with one blow of which he put an end to his pursuer, and thus vindicated his title as the Wearer of the Ball.

* The idea attached to the use of these bones in the medicine dance is, that, by their magic influence, the actor can penetrate and go through any substance.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

THE FOUR WISHERS.—The following lines are said to have been found written in pencil on the "fly leaf" of a Sunday School book, called "Early Impressions." They refer to events related in that entertaining narrative, and are supposed to be original.

Augusta's wish.

I would shine in diamonds, in coloured gems be dressed,
The rainbow for my mantle, the stars upon my breast;
Feathers, fringes, flowers and wealth, all rich and gay attire,
Should make the humble knave my throne, and all the world admire;
And I would lead the dog, by wealth's commanding power,
Thus joy should fill my golden cup, till life's last lingering hour.

Helen's wish.

I would be a beauty, and flash my brilliant eye;
My cheeks as sun-dappled roses glow, my lips a vermeil dye;
My alabaster brow and neck should dazzle all who gazed,
My dimple smile should win all hearts, whenever my beauty blazed;
Thus would I earn the world by my bewitching power,
And thus fill up my cup of bliss, till life's last lingering hour.

Emily's wish.

Give me not wealth nor beauty; I ask a spirit keen;
A wit that sparkles while it burns; that cuts as soon as seen.
Like a brilliant comet, I would trace a bright portentous path,
And all should worship at my shrine, or tremble at my wrath.
Thus I would sweep the world, by my wizard's magic power,
And fill my joyous crystal cup, till life's last lingering hour.

Flore's wish.

These tempting gifts I dare not ask, they light the soul when given;
Ah! rather grant me a pure heart, that guides us safe to heaven.
A gentle spirit from above to lead in wisdom's ways,
To make me humble in my youth, and useful all my days;
That if I always rule my life by virtue's holy power,
My cup of bliss will overflow beyond my latest hour.

GRIMALDI and his wife—A CASE OF POISONING.—I cannot refrain from telling a story, which I know to be true, of the old Grimaldi, the first of this race. Grimaldi and his wife were occasionally in the habit of quarrelling. At length their feuds assumed a very serious aspect; and after commencing together upon their most miserable state of "incompatibility of temper," they resolved to destroy themselves, as the only means of relieving themselves from their most miserable condition. In accordance with this most extraordinary resolution, Mr. Grimaldi proceeded to an apothecary's shop in the neighbourhood, and asked for an ounce of arsenic "to poison de rats." The "culter of simples" obsequiously bowed, and delivered to the devoted Grimaldi the dose that he trusted would emancipate him from all worldly ills. Firm to their purpose, the illustrious Punch and Judy swallowed in tumblers of water each a morsel of the deadly "drink," and the other to a sofa in the sitting-room—both rooms communicating—the door between them being left open. The pair of suicides lay down, their faces filling their eyes; a long and solemn pause ensued—no sound of groans, no sign of anguish was heard—all was still as night. At last, wearied out with expectancy, Grimaldi raised his head from the pillow, and in the deepest possible tone of voice cried out, "Mrs Grimaldi, are you dead, my love?" Upon which Mrs. Grimaldi, in the highest possible squeak, replied, "No, Mr. Grimaldi." The rejoinder sounded something like "Dom," what it meant, the imagination of the delicate reader may supply. At the end of another half hour, it became Mrs. Grimaldi's turn to be anxious as to the success of the potion, and she, hearing nothing in the next room, raised herself in the bed, and said in her squeak, "Mr. Grimaldi, my dear, are you dead?" To which the gruff reply was, "No, Mrs. Grimaldi." And for two hours these questions and answers went on periodically, till at last the lady's turn coming again, she repeated the inquiry with some what more energy, and exclaimed in a loud and screamed out, "Mr. Grimaldi, my love, are you not dead?" "No, my dear," said Grimaldi, "I am not, nor do I mean I can die to-night, unless I be so situated. Mrs. Grimaldi; get up out of bed and see for some supper, for I am very hungry." So ended this fatal performance; the apothecary, who had heard of their perpetual bickering of Punch and Judy in their ménage, having prudently given him a small parcel of arsenic, which the unhappy pair had divided between them.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF BOZ.—In person he is a little above the standard height, though not tall. His figure is slight, without being meagre, and is well proportioned. The face, that first object of physical interest, is peculiar, though not remarkable. A prominent forehead is displayed under a quantity of light hair, worn in a mass on one side rather jauntily, and this is the only semblance of dandyism in his appearance. His brow is marked, and his eye, though not large, bright and expressive. The most regular feature is the nose, which may be called handsome: an epithet not applicable to his lips, which are too large. Taken altogether, the countenance, which is pale without sickness, is, in repose, extremely agreeable in manner and conversation, except perhaps in the perfect abandon among his familiars, have no exhibition of particular wit, much less of humour. He is mild in the tones of his voice and quiescent: evincing habitual attention to etiquette and the conventionalities of polished circles. His society is much sought after, and, possibly, to avoid the invitations pressed upon him, he does not reside in London, but, with a lovely wife and two charming children, has a retreat in the vicarage. He is about twenty-six years of age, but does not look more than twenty-three or four. Mr. Dickens is entirely self-made, and rose from an humble station by virtue of his genius, and persevering industry.

ENGRAVING ON MARBLE.—Mr. Raynor, of Derby, has made a discovery in art—a new method of engraving on marble. Some of his pictorial efforts have elicited great admiration. Her majesty is in possession of a variety of specimens, and the nobility in England and France have introduced them into their drawing-rooms, to which they may be said to be at present almost confined. His Holyrood chapel by moonlight, though not considered his best, is a masterly performance.

IMPORTANT TO AUTHORS.—The French chambers have ultimately agreed that the right of publication to authors, shall continue for their families until thirty years after their decease.

ASQUATLANDO IN NOCTURNE.—is Latin, out west, for running away in the night.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"A DIRT IN AMERICA, with Remarks on its Institutions." By Captain Murray. C. B. Author of Peter Simple, Jacco Fataful, etc. Philadelphia Carey and Lea, 1839.

The reading world has not yet been satiated with the journals of travellers in America. Basil Hall, Hamilton, Fiddler and Trollope, have had their day, and have passed away from the stage. They amused John Bull, and roused the indignation of Brother Jonathan. In spite of them, the republic still keeps its head above water. It has outlived their tadpoles and years. Miss Martineau followed in their footsteps. Notwithstanding her acknowledged prominence, she has not succeeded in abolishing slavery, or building up any very permanent reputation for her partisans. The honourable Mr Murray and Captain Marryat are the latest labourers in this unenviable Murray's work we have not yet seen. We have dipped here and there into Marryat's, and find it very much as we expected; a superficial, quizzical, amusing farago, very incorrect in its statements of fact, and very much caricatured in its description of manners. We have no doubt the gallant captain is chuckling in spirit, at this very moment, in the idea of the dust that he has raised by his jeu d'esprit. We hope that the public will be sufficiently considerate to keep cool, and if they cannot laugh with him, that they will content themselves with laughing at him. The work is evidently got up, like Pindar's rhapsody—to sell. It is written to supply a demand: it is wares for the market. As for the story of swooping bonnets in the stage-coach, it is merely the putting of an extreme case to illustrate what the captain considers a national trait; and one that has been so regarded long enough to have become fixed upon us.

"The Philosophy of Courtship and Marriage." William Crosby and Co. Boston.

This little dogmatic discourse, certainly, on high themes; matters of universal interest and moment. It will be worth its cost, if it turn but a single bachelor from the grievous error of his ways. Some of the author's observations are a little libellous upon the sex, but they are always well-meant. Now and then we have a witty remark, not badly put. For instance, the writer suggests that "Cerberus and Cupid could ever be fellow-travellers; and, by trusting to Gall, you may rescue much vermin." Certainly the pun will not be pronounced otherwise than very clever, even by the anti-phonologist. On the whole, there is so much judicious advice, so much suggestive philosophy, in the volume, that we cannot omit to recommend it to the especial attention of that numerous class of ladies and gentlemen who have not ceased to be candidates for the pleasures and penalties of matrimony.

"The Bride of Port Edward." Founded on an incident of the Revolution. New-York: S. C. Nash.

This is a demi-prose, demi-verse dramatic sketch; a sort of literary nondescript. The author indicates no inconsiderable talent; but has been very unsuccessful in the composition of his work. It is quite too late to attempt an improvement in the established forms of literature. In this commingling of verse and prose, the poetry is apt to become too prosaic, and the prose too poetical. The verse is not to limp, and the prose to walk on stilts. If the author had developed his story in the common form of a novel, we think that he would have been much more successful.

"Sejanus and other Roman Tales." New-York: Jared W. Bell.

This volume is from the pen of young Matrin, son of the celebrated author of "Beitram," and the "Abneresque." It is dedicated, by permission, to Washington Irving. The period of Roman history selected for illustration is that of the empire's decline. The tales indicate a familiar acquaintance with the times and men they delineate. They are spirited and interesting; and we take great pleasure in commending them to the lovers of light literature, as a most agreeable substitute for the "crumble his cockle" of the modern fashionable novel. Mr. Matrin is evidently a man of scholarship and talent, and this, his first work, proves that he will do honour to the name he bears.

"Tracts for the Times." New-York: Louis Sherman, 142 Fulton street.

These extraordinary papers, which have made such a movement in England, are now in the course of publication by Louis Sherman, in this city. They are even better adapted to this country than to England, and have already awakened uncommon interest. Two numbers have appeared. They are under the superintendence of Mr. Rufus Dawes, a scholar and a man of genius.

"Pictures of the French, drawn by themselves." S. Orr and Co. London.

This is the first part of one of those neat, illustrated octaves, that are becoming so popular in London. It contains four pictures, the Parisian Lady, the Grocer, the Grisette, and the Law Student. To these are added lively prose sketches, translated from some of the most popular Parisian novelists. The design is capital.

"The Boy's Reading Book, in verse and poetry, for schools." By Mrs. L. H. Sigourney. New-York: J. O. Taylor, pp. 367.

The contents of this volume appear to be exclusively from the pen of Mrs. Sigourney. They are designed to instruct, at the same time that they excite attention, of the young. We commend the work to the inspection of parents and teachers, as well worthy of their approval.

"The Pictorial Spelling Book." By Benson and Bentley. New-York: Robinson, Rait and Co. 1839, pp. 128.

An extremely well-arranged elementary work, for schools. The wood-cuts are cleverly executed, and the lessons are of a character successfully adapted to the purposes of education.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received a number of communications both from foreign and domestic correspondents in relation to the melancholy fate of Lady Flora Hastings. That the culprits leveled at the lady were groundless and unjust, we do not entertain a doubt—but we must respectfully decline the discussion, inasmuch as our correspondence would involve us.—"C. V." who takes exception at the sketch of the broker in Mr. Lee's amusing tale of "Quite a Pretty Property," may rest easy. Nothing personal was intended. The shot was a random one. If it hit, so much the worse for the victim.—Several books in our table shall receive a notice in our next.—The charges against Captain Hosken and the conductors of the Great Western, appear to us quite unworthy of notice.—The new drama to be produced at the Park, is said to be by Mr. Wheatley. From the specimens that we have seen published, we should think it a creditable performance.—We must decline the favors of "Thio," "R. T.," "Volney," "B. R.," "Pulsades" and "Mentor."—"Portia" is thanked for the copy of the beautiful Italian song that will be found on the last page of to-day's Mirror.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 10, 1839

American sculpture.—It is truly surprising, when we consider how inadequately the fine arts, more especially that of sculpture, are encouraged in this country, that so many young aspirants in this peculiar and difficult department should be pressing forward to renown and success. We will not speak of Greenough, whose fame, as one of the finest sculptors of the age, is established, but merely mention some of those who have more recently come forward in the profession. Mr. Powers, who is now in Florence, is unquestionably an artist of rare genius. From a letter from Italy, published in a western paper, we learn that he can obtain a higher price for his busts than any other sculptor in Florence, and that he is rapidly winning an enviable distinction. He is now engaged upon his first statue. The subject, if we remember right, is that of Eve contemplating a dead dove, and the artist has selected the moment when the first idea or realization of such an agency as death has dived upon her mind. The very selection of a subject so eminently original and poetical, by Mr. Powers, is an earnest of his success, and we cannot doubt that he will do it full justice. Mr. Dexter, whose studio is in Boston, is chiefly known for an admirable bust of Miss Ellen Tree, a copy of which may be seen at the Apollo. He is at present engaged upon a marble figure of a sleeping infant, designed to adorn the cemetery at Mount Auburn. The model we have seen, and it is truly a beautiful conception. Mr. Dexter is a self-taught artist, and he has not yet had the advantages of foreign travel; but his devotion to his profession is constant, and we expect to hear great things of him before many years. Another artist, who is also at present in Boston, has excited much attention among the virtuous of the place. We allude to Clevenger. Two or three years since we saw him at work in Cincinnati, under a stonemason's shed, with a brown paper cap on his head, and a leather apron about his waist. We were then shown a few specimens of his mouldings in clay, and took occasion to predict, in the newspapers of the day, his subsequent eminence as a sculptor. Our anticipations have not been disappointed. Young Clevenger has already won both profit and fame by his productions. His spirited busts of Mr. Philip Hone and others in this city bear honourable testimony to his talents. In Boston, his busts of Daniel Webster, Harrison Gray Otis, Judge Davis and Jeremiah Mason, have been very generally admired, and numerous copies demanded. We cannot doubt his continued improvement in the art. Mr. Statt, of this city, in his statue of Victoria, now unfortunately destroyed, assumed, without much previous preparation, a proud rank among the artists of his country. We sincerely trust that he will not be disheartened by the accident, which has befallen the first production of his chisel, but immediately set about some American subject, that may eclipse his early effort. We have not mentioned all who have displayed extraordinary talents for sculpture in the United States, but from the list we have presented, it will be seen that if the art be neglected among us, it will not be for the want of worthy votaries.

A busy day.—The first of the current month was quite a busy day in this city. In the first place, money was, as the brokers say, considerably tight—it was a quarterly rent-day—and there was not a little "shunning and shying" in Wall-street. The two noble steam-packets, the Great Western and the British Queen, also sailed upon that day. The quays on the East river, and the Battery, were crowded with spectators, and numerous smaller boats accompanied the two great Atlantic steamers nearly to the Hook. The occasion was one of thrilling interest. The spectacle was not inappropriate to the spirit of the age, and the progressive triumph of art and knowledge. It was to the nineteenth century what the gladiatorial exhibitions were to ancient Rome, the Olympic games to Greece, and the tournaments to the knights of the middle ages; but a more expanded emotion than could have been experienced by the spectators of the struggles of the dying gladiator, or of the emulous chariot-races of the Grecian youth, or of the pageantry of the lists, was produced in the minds of those who witnessed the magnificent spectacle of the departure of the two finest steamships in the world, going upon no hostile mission, but to quicken the communications of peace and friendly intercourse between nations and hemispheres.

My Dempster.—One of the most popular vocalists in this country, Mr. Dempster, is soon, we learn, to give a concert in this city. As a ballad singer, he has few superiors. We have also met with several specimens of his musical composition, which evince cultivated powers and a fine taste in the art.

The American Lounger.—This popular work, from the pen of Professor Ingraham, is announced as forthcoming from the English press.

Mr. Webster in London.—A letter before us, from an English friend, says:—"Were you to ask me who was the greatest lion now in London, I should say, unhesitatingly, Daniel Webster. He is fetid and dined without intermission. Artists are beseeching him to sit for his picture, and philologists are crowding to get a sight of his wonderful cerebral developments. Webster is one of those men who carry the stamp of greatness, unequivocally, upon their brows. No one can see him, and doubt his intellectual pre-eminence. I have perceived that in the manner of most of the Americans whom I have encountered in society here, there was an obvious constraint of manner, an assumption of dignity, and a constant apprehension—lest, by some solecism, they should do discredit to their country, or betray their ignorance. How different the demeanor of Webster! With what an unconstrained consciousness of equality, and what manly simplicity and ease, does he mingle among the first titled dignitaries of our land! Talk of the aristocracy of birth and the graces of hereditary gentility—how paltry and ungrounded do they seem by the side of such aristocracy as Webster's—the aristocracy of talent and the graces of conscious power! We are all expecting, with interest, to hear a specimen of Mr. Webster's oratory, and an opportunity will soon be presented, in the public dinner to be given him by your countrymen, in London, for his display. We have no man in this country who is his superior in conversational powers."

The Maverick House, at East Boston.—We commend those who may be in search of good air, good company, good accommodations, good living, and all the goods that can contribute to one's temporal comfort, to the spacious house at East Boston. It is but a five minutes walk from State-street to the ferry-boat, which, in a couple of minutes more, lands you within a few rods of the hotel. Should you prefer to ride, you can take the omnibus, which runs two or three times an hour. Mr. Barton, the host of the Maverick House, would make the fortune of any similar establishment in the country. His thorough superintendence of every department of the management, his solicitous attention to the comfort and wishes of his guests, his superior intelligence, and his unaffected amenity of manner and disposition, eminently qualify him for a post, which it requires no ordinary degree of industry and tact to fill satisfactorily. We have encountered many good judges, who maintain that the Maverick House, taking into view its location, its economy, and its internal management, is one of the best kept and most agreeable houses in the country. We advise all, who would gain the opinion, to go and judge for themselves.

Theatricals.—The next will, no doubt, be a brilliant season. The managers of the five theatres, namely, the Park, National, Bowery, Chatham and Franklin, are making preparations for a brilliant campaign. Forrest will open the National, on the nineteenth instant, with poor Stone's drama of Metamora. He will play twelve nights, and then be followed by Wallack, Vanderhoff and daughter, and young Keary, who are now on their way to this country. These performers, with Miss Shireff, Mrs. Bailey, Miss Turpin, Wilson and Seguin, will be the principal stars at the National; for which an excellent company, embracing many old favourites, has been engaged. "We hold it to be a thing impossible," as Povey says, that all these theatrical speculations can succeed. Some must fail, and involve the managers in ruin. Which, time will determine.

The Star says:—"Power is to be the great card at the Park, and he is a great card, for a short engagement. In opera, Templeton and Miss Romer are spoken of, and also Madame Albertazzi, a singer of great merit. Miss Inverarity, it is said, will come out in tragedy or comedy, we have heard of nothing positive; and in ballet, the *Taglioni*s and auxiliaries, may fill up. If there be, in reality, any budget to open for the Park, we should be glad to get it in time, as the National has already given the public an outline of the campaign at that house; and it is those two houses which will divide the town—the Bowery proceeding in its safe and peculiarly quiet way, without interfering with either."

Hunt's Merchant Magazine.—The August number of this valuable periodical, which was promptly published on the first instant, has established a reputation for the work which places its success beyond all question. To the general reader, the Merchant's Magazine must be highly entertaining and instructive; and to the merchant, invaluable. The number before us contains a variety of remarkably able articles, from the pens of some of the first writers in the country. We are truly happy to hear that this work meets with a support commensurate with its merits.

Literary rustication. It is stated in the newspapers—and who will question their veracity!—that Dr. Bird, the well-known author of the "Gladiator," "Nick of the Woods," "Calavar," and other works deservedly popular, has purchased a farm in Maryland, and retired to the enjoyment of country life. As he is one of those birds that can sing, we trust that the woods and fields will not be less congenial than the atmosphere of Philadelphia to the exercise of his talents. There can hardly be named three writers in the country so gifted and so popular.

New stores.—Among the new establishments recently opened in Broadway, we know of none more attractive than that of Davis and Houn, where may be seen some of the most beautiful engravings, new and popular music, etc. They are also the agents for the "New-York Pianoforte Manufacturing Company," whose instruments, for touch and tone, cannot be exceeded perhaps in the world.

Sidney Clifton.—This new novel has been dramatised for the Bowery theatre, and will soon be produced under the direction of Mr. Barry.

Rollston's.—This is now the only ladies riding-school in the city.

BUONA NOTTE.

A FAVOURITE ITALIAN SONG—ARRANGED FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

ALLEGRO CON AMORE.

Buona not-te, oh! cara Ni-na, Buona notte, buona notte va ador-mir, Buona not-te, oh! ca-ra Ni-na; Buona not-te, buona notte va a-dormir; Deh! non rammen-ti le mie pe-ne, Che tu non en-ti, I miei so-spi-ri; Buona not-te, oh! cara Ni-na, Buona notte, buona notte va a-dormir.

SECOND VERSE.

Buona notte, &c.
Sol ti prego a rammentarti,
Del tuo caro e fido a amante,
Che sincero ognor costante,
Sapra viver e morir.

THIRD VERSE.

Buona notte, &c.
Dunque ti lascio, oh! cara Nina,
Te sol vo darti un altro addio,
Buona notte, addio mio,
Buona notte va a dormire.

MISCELLANY.

LOVE IS A TRIFLER.

Little Love is a trifter, I own,
And mischievous, artful, and sly,
He will ne'er let the ladies alone,
But I'm sure I can't tell you why;
He smiles to delude, and he lures to betray,
Yet so artful he is we can't chase him away.

Little love is an impudent elf,
Into every heart he'll intrude;
I've scolded him often myself,
But still he's presuming and rude;
When I frown he replies with so winning a smile,
That I freely forgive all his mischievous guile!

But Love is now growing in years,
And is truly a family man;
If he dies we will wail him with tears,
But keep him alive while we can;
Though he is so artful, so false, and so sly,
We all try to lure him—I cannot tell why!

AN INCIDENT.—We were walking down Wall-street a few evenings since, about nine of the clock. There, stretched upon the stone steps of one of Mammon's temples, lay a little girl, about ten years of age, reading by the light of one of the street-lamps. She was quite busied in the volume, and, though we interrupted the light in passing, she did not raise her eyes. Another illustration, we thought, of the universal diffusion of letters! How many of our three hundred thousand citizens may have been, at that moment, so happily employed as the little bareheaded, barefooted student of Wall-street!

UNSOCIAL TEMPER.—Unsocial tempers are contracted in solitude, which will, in the end, not fail of corrupting the understanding as well as the manners, and of utterly disqualifying a man for the satisfactions and duties of life. Men must be taken as they are, and we neither make them nor ourselves better, by flying from or quarrelling with them.

FIXING COLOURS ON STONE.—Ciceri, the celebrated decorative painter, in France, has discovered a means of fixing colours in stone; he can imitate marble, or paint subjects on the natural stone. The colours become so engrained into the pores of the stone, that it may be ground or polished without injuring them.

WHAT'S IN A NAME.—The New-Hampshire Whig says it once heard of a facetious person whose name was "New," who named his first child "Something," as it was "Something New." His second was christened "Nothing," it being "Nothing New."

DEFINITION OF A LOVER.—A lover has been publicly described as a man who, in his anxiety to obtain possession of another, has lost possession of himself.

THE DISMISSED PAGE.—The London Court Journal chronicles the following important affair:—"It happened on a certain day, that one of her majesty's pages, Lord K——, went off duty, to his heart's delight. Being a very elegant young gentleman, and having received lessons from a celebrated professor of signs, he, like other wise people, was chary of his words, and telegraphed his contentment to his fellows then on duty by very significantly putting his finger to his nose, at the same time muttering an exclamation which sounded somewhat like, 'Oh! crkey, crkey!' Now, the pages thus telegraphed were then in the actual performance of their very arduous duties, and the most noble the Marchioness of N—— observing the said signals, shocked at such a breach of decorum, and fearing for the continuance of the rabble faculties of the young gentleman in waiting, told her majesty thereof. Her majesty was graciously pleased to communicate the circumstance to Lord Melbourne immediately, who summoned a cabinet council thereupon, and, after many hours serious deliberation, it was resolved that the young Lord K—— should be dismissed from the office of page; and so his young lordship, poor little fellow, has lost his gratuitous commission in the guards.

THE PLAINS OF ABRAHAM.—How shifting are the lights and shadows in which we view human nature! The plains of Abraham have made two men notorious in different ways, as set forth, if we remember aright, in the following couplet:

"Some toil for fame and some for pearly groats, Here Wolf reaped glory and Dalhousie oats."

OPERATIONS.—When Sheridan was on his death-bed he was told that he must undergo an operation, to which he replied that he had undergone two in the course of his life, and they were enough for any man. Being asked what they were, he answered, sitting for his portrait, and having his hair cut.

INPROMITU.

"Come kiss me," said Robin. I gently said, "No."
"For my mother forbade me to play with men so."
Ashamed by my answer, he glided away.
Though my looks pretty plainly advised him to stay—
Silly swain, not at all recollecting—not he,
That his mother ne'er said, that "he must not kiss me."

SUFFICIENT REASONS.—"Masses wants to know if you can't settle the small bill to-day, kase he wants de money bad," said a dorky yesterday to a gentleman. "No, I can't." This is the third time you have come for that money to-day. Your master sn't afraid, I am going to run away, is he?" "Not 'zackly; but look heea," said the dorky, sily and mysteriously, "he's a gwoning to run away herself, and darfore wants to make a big raise."

LITHOGRAPHY.—A theoretical and practical work on lithography, by Engelman, of Mulhausen, is in the press. It is the fruit of more than twenty years' experience, and will appear in five parts, comprising the history and progress of the art.

A FASHIONABLE NAME.—A woman down east has named her son Morus Multicaulus.

THE TRANSIT.—Louis XI. of France once took it into his head to visit the kitchen, and see what was going forward. He there found a little fellow about fourteen years of age, busily engaged in turning the spit, with roast meat. The youth was handsomely formed and of so engaging an appearance, that the king thought him entitled to some better office than the humble one which he then filled. Accosting him, Louis asked whence he came, who he was, and what he earned by his occupation. The turnspit did not know the king, and replied to his interrogatory without the least embarrassment, "I am from Berny, my name is Stephen, and I earn as much as the king." "What then does the king earn?" rejoined Louis. "His expenses," replied Stephen, "and I mine." By this bold and impudent answer he won the good graces of the monarch, who afterwards promoted him to the situation of groom of the chamber.

COURT DRESSES.—We copy from the Court Journal the following description of some of the most distinguished dresses worn at a late drawing-room of her majesty, Queen Victoria.

Her Majesty.—A dress of rich white satin, trimmed with a deep blonde flounce, the body and sleeves splendidly ornamented with diamonds and blonde; train of beautiful white satin, and elegantly trimmed with a wreath of Arbutus. Head-dress, a magnificent diamond diadem, feathers, and lappets.

Mrs. Stevenson, (the American Minister's lady).—Costume de Cour, composed of a rich pink satin train, lined through with white gros de Naples, elegantly ornamented with crepe lisse, blonde, and flowers; blonde berthe and sabots; French tulle dress, over rich white satin; petticoat trimmed en tablier with blonde and ribband. Head-dress, blonde lappets and feathers; perure of diamonds.

H. R. H. the Duchess of Cambridge.—A blonde net dress, over white satin, trimmed with blonde and flowers; rich white satin train, embroidered with gold; body and sleeves trimmed with blonde, and magnificently ornamented with sapphires and diamonds. Head-dress, plume of feathers, diadem of sapphires and diamonds; necklace and earrings to correspond.

Marchioness of Douro.—Train of rich white satin, trimmed with Brussels point, festooned with roses; Brussels point berthe and ruffles; Brussels lace petticoat, over satin; ornaments, a magnificent coronet of diamonds, with necklace, earrings, and stomacher en suite. Head-dress, feathers and point lace lappets.

Duchess of Montrose.—A superb Brussels lace dress over a pale blue gros de Naples slip, trimmed on tablier with bouquets of blue flowers and silver wheat; manteau of pale-blue crepe over gros de Naples, trimmed round with Brussels lace. Head-dress, ostrich feathers, Brussels lace lappets, and diamonds.

CHARMING ROSELLE.

CHARMING Roselle! lovely Roselle,
Come to the fountain you love so well!
Oh, no! she hath gone
To the shelly shore,
Where her gay lover rests
On his idle oar:—
There's a blush on her cheek
Which a tale doth tell,—
To-morrow he weds
Our young Roselle!

Charming Roselle, lovely Roselle!
She hath left the fountain she loved so well:
In the giddy world,
Ah! she smiles no more,
For her gay lord is changed,
And his love, it is o'er!
There's a shade on her brow
Which a tale doth tell,—
Deserted she pines,
Our poor Roselle!

Charming Roselle, lovely Roselle!
Sne sits by the fountain she loves so well:
For the roses that decked
Her raven hair,
Why are rushes and straws
Twisted wildly there?
There's a glare in the eye
Which a tale doth tell:—
Oh! a maniac roves
Our poor Roselle!

ORIGINAL MEMOIR.

DANIEL SCHLESINGER, THE PIANIST.

NUMBER TWO.

THE ORDEAL.

"He either fears his fate too much,
Or his desert is small;
Who would not put it to the touch
To win or lose it all?" Scott.

We left our young artist in the first blush of pleasure and thrill of surprise. The words of Ries sounded in his ear like voices of the past; for the great composer inherited from Beethoven the musical traditions of a by-gone and original age—the heroic age of music. Prance from the lips of the only one whom the great Viennese had deigned, nay, elected, to instruct! was it not a patent of nobility, a blessing on the knight's sword from the very lips of his patron saint. With such a spell Daniel Schlesinger felt empowered to call around him and subdue the spirits of harmony, and he advanced into the land of many voices, with the energy of one in whom the recollection of wasted hours quickened every nerve.

A young artist who was once addressed as follows, by one of those "door and window critics" whose reputation is made up of the errors they detect: "You have too large a portal to your house. Its entrance is disproportionate to the modest dimensions of the edifice." "The space allotted me," replied the former, "was small, too small to contain a palace, be indulgent to my door; for, if you begin by condemning that, how will you praise the hall into which opens but one finished room—a dwelling-chamber; hardly was this completed before the lord of the mansion died. Had he lived, you would have so admired the splendour of the remaining apartments, as not to condemn the portal." Is not the life one re-constructs out of the relics of an existence, as an edifice reared for builders to take copy by—spacious and perfect according to the nature and length of years of him who planned, constructed, and dwelt in it, grand and beautiful in proportion as his soul was elevated and his spirit lovely!—a palace or a cottage, of many chambers or of few, naked or adorned, here finished, there incomplete, a very projection of his being rescued from ruin, from oblivion, because its proportions are a type of symmetry, or because an inscription records a virtue, or a work of art claims immortality for its author! But while some live to complete the structure of life, and the finished chambers that record their days and deeds are thrown open to kindred hearts, others die in their prime having finished the portal, crossed the threshold and entered the first court where a grave is dug for them by Destiny. These decrees are among the mysterious dispensations, and many a true pilgrim pauses to muse before the gateway, the run in after days of a hope, a glorious promise, a palace reflected into some fervent eye by the mirage of the future; the future which seems so bright and glowing before us, and when, painting, we have toiled on towards its groves and fountains, its domes and minarets, he who dares look back perceives he has but made further desert-way! [This for such as may have fancied we dwelt too long upon our artist's early days. The portal, the inner court, and the dwelling-chamber, are all he endured to complete of his life-dwelling. But, as the victories of youth passing into manhood are examples for those entering upon the race, and the triumphs of maturity are lessons of encouragement for repentant procrastination, so may the tokens of early talent in children of genius guide the eye which is watching the budding of its offspring—the hopes of its affections.

On the morrow of that memorable evening, Daniel Schlesinger wrote to acquaint his mother and brothers with his decision; and still he awaited their sanction or disapproval. In presence of a painful and pleasant alternative, the hours of uncertainty are among the most trying ones of our existence. The young artist had discernment enough to know how much he hazarded in sacrificing prospects of inevitable commercial preferment and his sound business education, to the chances of a profession so dependent upon public favour for its emoluments. Without means of subsistence, until he could render his vocation profitable, he must trust to his family for aid; and his position become one of galling dependence should they condemn his project. Friends had he, it is true; but by friends we are avoided if we ask for more than kindness. The world is so full of people!

It is at this period of his life that we have most to regret the absence of any of his letters. He wrote seldom and was an indolent correspondent, although when he did prevail upon himself to take up the pen, his style, as we shall hereafter see by one or two letters, copies of which have been preserved, was as lively and expressive as his mind was clear and his heart prone to effusion. I have been forced, therefore, to search for biographical material in the many letters he received from his friends and family during a period of twenty years, and which, while they evince throughout the sincere friendship he excited in all who knew him well, afford at the same time some clue to the events of his life.

So soon as they came to learn his serious intention of following the bent of his genius, letters from the various members of his family brought him every encouragement to embrace his new vocation resolutely. Where prudence would still have counselled him a life of business, for fortune's sake, and worldly wisdom might have censured this change as inconsistent with his first purpose, affection identified itself with his hopes and wishes, and friendship heartily applauded his resolution. It is pleasant to find such sympathy simultaneously animating bosoms so widely distant, to cheer a younger brother in his ordeal time. All seemed to concentrate upon him their tenderness and their affectionate interest. Sentiments like these generate their own reward, besides being creditable to him who justified the confidence they exhibit.

In paying this well-merited tribute to the family of the artist we are deploring, I cannot pass by their subsequent letters without testifying to the zeal of the affection they continue to manifest, from the beginning to the close of Daniel's career. The entire correspondence of twenty-eight years is, in fact, a chain of brotherly love, of many confidence and honourable bearing, replete with generous and noble lessons. The tie seems to have increased in intensity with the distance that divided those who acknowledged its influence, and I have been penetrated with esteem for these cherishing of the branch, whose flowers smiled affectionately upon the parent trunk it adorned.

The first letter in point of date which comments upon his new career, is of the seventh of May, 1821, from a brother at Leeds.

"Yours of the third gave me pleasure. It informs me of your intention to view this matter seriously, and I am persuaded you cannot fail of success if you are not wanting in patience and perseverance. But of these qualities seek to provide yourself with an ample store for your new enterprise. I had intended this letter should bring you some rules of conduct, etc., but second thoughts convinced me that, for an attentive and thinking man, nothing is preferable to practice. How many are there who have got by heart Kuigel's rules of intercourse,* or some such book, and are incapable of acting upon the slightest emergency. I am glad on his account that Ries should have been kind to you. What say you to becoming his pupil? Would the advantages balance the cost of such lessons? If you need aid apply freely to me. Continue to avoid useless outlays, but preserve that genteel appearance which is indispensable in your profession."[†]

Under the guidance of Ries his rapid progress gave constant proofs of Daniel's remarkable talents. His master was more than satisfied; he was proud of his pupil. Perhaps this induction of a congenial spirit into the inner mysteries of the art recalled to mind his own earlier days, and the impressive intercourse with Beethoven.

* The German Chesterfield.

† This caution was superfluous. Mr. Schlesinger was an innate gentleman—in appearance as well as in heart and refinement. His many American friends will not easily forget how perfectly comely il faut were his costume and presence.

whose patience in giving him instruction formed so striking a contrast with his cavalier treatment of all the world beside. Only meager capacities are susceptible of jealousy; genius gravitates towards genius; a noble heart loves the spirit which is drawn towards the soul that fires it; and the true artist reverences that devotion which may lead the acolyte to advance the art he worships.

About this time (1821) one of his brothers, in announcing to our artist the death of Andreas Romberg, his old friend and master, in the greatest poverty, regrets that such should too often be the unhappy lot of men of genius in his profession. While this suggests the melancholy reflection that Mr. Schlesinger had not, at his death, succeeded in securing against want those whom he left to deplore him—it is due to his memory to state that, but for his early summons, they would have been, doubtless, provided for. To great prudence he united a methodical care of money, for which his professional brethren are seldom remarkable; and the hopes blighted by his death were of the most promising nature.

From the renewal of their cheering tone, we are led to conclude, by his brother's letters, for the year 1823, that Daniel did not, as yet, meet with the encouragement he both wished for and deserved. But he was persuaded, by their solicitations, to continue in London, notwithstanding Moscheles's advice that he should seek his fortune in Vienna. At this period the young artist's ordeal became doubly trying. He had passed through the preparatory stages of study—had acquired certainty, as well as dexterity of touch—and he now discovered that these triumphs were but the introduction to labours much more difficult of accomplishment. He could afford others pleasure, but remained himself dissatisfied. The abstruser mysteries of musical science rose up to defy him. The restless character of genius began now to manifest itself within him. He perceived that, "to subject one's self to its incomprehensible laws, and by them guide one's own spirit, is the isolating principle of Art," and that, as a child of art, he was bound to obey it. His fancy, disrobed of its illusions, longed to assume a thousand shapes, which attend the bidding of Power only; and the flight of the illusions, its first tenants, had shown him that the imagination was but the consciousness of an ideal world—not the spell that could summon its spirits around him. In a letter to his brother Hermann, the plaint escapes him, "that he had commenced in his twenty-second year the career he should have entered upon in his sixteenth." In reply, the former assures him that "if he will but continue as he has begun, his future attainment will be as sure as his past progress." Although the letters we have examined contain no farther allusion to this subject, it is certain that the recollection of those six years sacrificed to business and lost to art, haunted him throughout his life. In having manfully overcome difficulties which it is generally deemed useless for persons who have crossed their twentieth year to attempt encountering, he adds another to the illustrious catalogue of indefatigable spirits by whom obstacles have been converted into the weapons of success. But, in the period of existence immediately preceding this, our powers of acquisition are still extensive, and the mind's receptivity ample; and, if we have neglected to turn it to account, all subsequent labours to supply the deficiency become disproportionately intense. To the pianist and the composer these years are of especial utility: they are employed by the one in pursuing the numerous productions which constitute the literature of music, and by the other in scheming and essaying many a musical project. Without such practice, the most finished performer will find himself, where the composition is intricate, an embarrassed "sight-reader," and the richest fancy is lamely seconded by fingers that are unused to musical chirography. We shall hereafter see how, by the force of his will and the breadth of his intellectual powers, Mr. Schlesinger succeeded in remedying an evil which, at first sight, seemed irreparable—how he tutored his memory to retain all that he learned, and compelled his mind to carry its unformed images until, at their mature development, each thought was produced in Horatian perfection.

Among the letters that allude to his prospects in the early part of his career, we find occasional references to the state of music, at a time when new principles were fermenting in the minds of its votaries. Musical sounds flew from place to place on the wings of a more rapid and frequent intercommunication of nations; and the long concealed works of buried composers, now brought to light and diffused, were exerting upon European society an influence akin to revolution. In the days of Frederick the Great, Sebastian Bach had made two ineffectual journeys to Halle, to hear Handel play on the organ; and to the great author of the Messiah, the works and genius of his immortal contemporary remained for ever unknown. Who can doubt that, in the present century, the orgasm of Weimar would have been tempted and enabled to reveal to the civilized world those divine powers whose trace, in many a prayer and prelude, are the wonder and admiration of the modern artist; and would have been sought and loved by the composer who shared with him the musical empire of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

A friend writes him from Germany, on the nineteenth of January, 1823:—"We have here, at this moment, several new operas, which obtain great success, especially those of Maria Weber. Their fame has, no doubt, already reached you. Der Freyschutz stands first upon the list, and contains, I think, music as remarkable for its beauty as for its originality. If you would like a selection from it, allow me the pleasure of making it for you." And the overture of this very opera was destined, sixteen years afterwards, to constitute the brightest ornament of a tribute to the memory and genius of Mr. Schlesinger, alike honourable to his fame and to the generous sentiments of his brother artists, who made his death an occasion for displaying the magnificence of the art he cherished.

We have mentioned the name of Moscheles, who was much attached to Daniel, and also gave him lessons, although we are unable to ascertain at what epoch the latter became his pupil. There early existed between the two distinguished artists a cordial sympathy, which, with one or two interruptions, lasted until Mr. Schlesinger's departure for America. His circle of friends expanded in measure as his merits became known, and John Craner no sooner made his acquaintance than he gave him his friendship and esteem. In such intercourse his activity was constantly renewed, and his taste refined; so that, in 1825, when Ferdinand Ries returned to Germany, he was proud, at his farewell concert, to introduce his favourite disciplo to the public, by playing with him, upon the pianoforte, a concerto à quatre mains, composed expressly for the occasion. By the departure of his successful master, Mr. Schlesinger, thus recommended, inherited several of his numerous scholars, and soon rose in public estimation. His first work, the Allegro di Bravura, made him known as a composer, shortly after. It was dedicated to Ries, whose opinion of its merits shall be cited hereafter, together with those of other competent connoisseurs.

About this time he received, from three of his brothers, a letter so replete with interesting and appropriate suggestions that we translate it verbatim. It is opened by Hermann, and continued by Arnold and Philip. The first begins with some comments upon a concert given by Moscheles, in aid of the victims of a sudden inundation.

"My attention," says he, "was at times diverted from the performance, by the fond dream that I might, perhaps, one day hear you thus applauded in our native town. What a gratification this would be for all of us. The Hamburgers appear to me more disposed to reward merit already acknowledged elsewhere, than the talent which unfolds itself beneath their eyes. I would, therefore, only counsel you to come here when your renown has preceded you, and when, from London, Paris, Vienna, Berlin, Munich, and other notable cities, it shall have reached us that Daniel Schlesinger is a great artist. We rejoice to learn that your maiden work is about to appear. Do not fail or delay to send it to us."

Continuing this letter, Arnold encourages his brother never to lose sight of his noble vocation.

"Be not deficient in application, and you will, undoubtedly, become perfect. How great a pleasure will it be for yourself, for our mother, and for all of us, if, by your productions and your execution, you succeed in having your name beside those of great artists. While upon this topic I venture to express to you my views respecting composition. Nearly all the new music I hear, and especially what is written for the piano, seems to have been composed with a view to torment the performer, and confuse his hearers. When, after listening to such music, I hear one of Mozart's sonatas, it seems like leaving a well-planned garden, adorned with many beauties, and filled with a moving crowd, to wander in some wild and sequestered solitude. Instantly returning to our senses, we willingly renounce the splendour and elegance of the garden and its visitors, to revel in the contemplation of the truly beautiful. Supposing, as I do, that all who, like me, judge music by sentiment, and not by rules, prefer Mozart's to the modern music, it appears to me an inexplicable enigma that so many great composers should produce music which affords no pleasure. Had I the genius and science of composition, I fancy I should indulge in two classes of productions, viz.: pieces suited to concert-givers, and generally to all persons who would shine by difficulties, and pieces which should delight the auditory. In these latter I would never introduce difficulties, save where they were necessary to the harmony and melody. Do not smile, dear Daniel, that I, who have never learned a note of music, should allow myself to lecture a composer on composition. My excuse must be Mohère's habit of reading all his pieces to his old housekeeper, an uneducated, uninitiated woman, and of only publishing those which she approved. Besides this, one may take liberties with a brother which he would refrain from with a stranger."

Philip adds: "In the small space left at my disposal, I must today content myself, dear Daniel, with felicitating you upon the more agreeable prospect that opens before you. It is a new proof to me that success, in every case, depends upon perseverance. I will lay the lesson to heart, and, I trust, profit by it; for, in six weeks, I embark for New-York, whither I go to establish myself."

The Allegro di Bravura, published by Craner towards the close of 1825, and dedicated, as we have already stated, to our artist's old master, at once stamped its author with the seals of science and of originality. It is a remarkable first effort, full of thought and of fine sentiment, and gives evidence that he must have earnestly continued in his manhood, the study of counterpoint already commenced in his earlier years. High and judicious commendations of it simultaneously appeared in the London and continental journals, and a critique from the pen of an unknown admirer in the Leipsic Musical Gazette of the twenty-eighth July, 1826, besides stimulating the young composer to fresh exertions, lent his labours that charm which words of sympathy, sounding like echoes of our hopes mingled with the promise of their fulfilment, can alone bestow. A favourable notice of his first and second productions appeared shortly after in Ackerman's Harmoonicon, and he had already received from Ries, who was enjoying, in the village of Godesberg, the repose earned by a well-filled and active life, a letter of approbation—dated twenty-seventh November, 1825—which, from its minute criticisms, is interesting to the artist chiefly. After thanking his pupil for the Allegro, and remarking that the Rondo contains much that is agreeable and beautiful, he proceeds to various technical observations, and thus concludes—

"Such are the criticisms I have to offer. The entire composition is fine. Continue with more and still more ardour. One may allow one's-self anything. Thus in lieu of being timid and self-diffident, I would, in your place, become active and courageous. I should find it hard to give you advice in thorough-bass, nor do I see why you should not devote yourself to greater undertakings. The waltzes you send me are beautiful, but rather difficult."

Here endeth the "ordeal" of Daniel Schlesinger. "His circumstances grew apace," and his reputation as a composer served to temper and strengthen his increasing popularity as an artist. And thus has this narrative, which promised to be brief and scanty, swollen to a memoir, but one half of which is now furnished the reader. If we have tarried long among the touching and simple relics of these years of trial, we shall soon enter upon scenes of greater activity and more varied incident. Meanwhile the working-up of these interesting materials has enabled us to realize, with the eloquent biographer of Sebastian Bach, that "the lives of such men are like the rosewood which perfumes with agreeable fragrance the workshop of the turner."

With this also concludes the romantic portion of our artist's existence. From the sunniest and the darkest: "dreameries" of the master spirits of his art he now turns to mingle in the crowd where, amidst the turmoil of life, we shall from time to time see his head uplifted above the multitude to sing again among the thousands who press around him. He has henceforth, in sympathy with that throng, a common object—to live and prosper in a worldly guise. At this point in men's lives, a law of necessity equalizes the condition of all who labour after fortune. The assault, the jurist, the poet, the philosopher, the painter and the artist, leaving the closet, the study, the grove, the porch, the land of visions and the land of 'sound and motion,' descend from the elevation they occupy above mankind, to unite with their fellow mortals in the fulfilment of Adam's destiny.

We need offer no apology for expanding the notices referred to above. They are interesting as specimens of German and English music, and, as authentic corroborations of the talent and reputation we have claimed for the artist we are lamenting.

*The editor was not a little surprised by this production. He knew a music-seller, but not a composer, of the author's name, and it is impossible that he should be one and the same person—especially when the production of the composer is not even numerous. Because, probably, he has some to number, and his first acquaintance is accompanied by so excellent a composition. For such it is, beyond a doubt, rich in invention as it is, and far from destitute of originality, but rather still, in facility of execution and mechanical address, and in the fullness of first and second thoughts. As this piece which flows through thirteen pages, neither complicate nor hereditary path occurs: a just symmetry between the parts, and the happy employment of the piano as a bravura instrument prevail throughout. What more can we desire? With these qualities it may be ranked beside the best music of the present time, and it is the critic's duty to make such a debut merit the greatest attention, and it is the critic's duty to extend this as generally as possible. We do not under a conviction that he will require no other notice, and we do not under a conviction that he will, we therefore, felicitate the author upon his first appearance, and shall, we trust, avail his subsequent efforts; for he who restrains himself until he is able to produce a work of this kind, will not be deficient in public and private, not to put forth anything inferior and thus to deceive the expectations he has raised to so high a pitch.

1 Allegro di Bravura for the pianoforte, composed and dedicated to Ferd. Ries, by his friend and pupil, D. Schlesinger. Op. 1.—(D. B. Craner and Co.) Introduction and Rondo brilliant for the pianoforte, composed, and dedicated to Alisa Bode, by D. Schlesinger. Op. 2. (Craner and Co.)

These, then, are first offerings—attempte we must call them—of an artist and connoisseur of Mr. Ries, who, in leaving us, seems to have left his mantle to be worn by a favourite pupil amongst us. The coat is gay, Mr. Schlesinger throws it on, as if it were made for him, with peculiar grace, with a fashion which at once proclaims the artist formed by nature for his calling. These works breathe the genuine musical taste as it is, feeling, which—as far at least as regards instrumental compositions—seems so entirely to have their home in Germany, that the musical writers of other countries excel only in proportion to their approach to the mode of that country, from which it seems to be as hazardous for them to deviate, as it is presumptuous in the architect to swerve from the forms and proportions of Greek architecture. It would afford matter of curious speculation to inquire into the probable cause of this pre-eminence of the Germans in instrumental music; but our bias on the subject, which has before now engaged our attention, would lead far beyond the limits of a notice of this kind. It is, however, a fact, these contracted limits, too, which compel us to speak in general terms only of Mr. Schlesinger's labours. Both his publications before us will, we are sure, be ranked among the higher order of musical compositions. Op. 1. is a country, not Germany excepted; indeed his first opéra they have exerted our admiration. They not only announce a pure cultivated musical taste, but their select and often profound communications evince the solidity, depth, and great extent of the author's science. There are things in the Allegro di Bravura which will command the attention of the most refined and accomplished, and when they will not be able to leave better.

And when we prefer the Allegro di Bravura to Op. 2, the latter alone would have been enough calculated to impress the public mind with the opinion of Mr. S.'s talent; it is a mastery in many points. But, whilst our admiration is elaborate in a high degree, and proportionally difficult. In its respect we may, perhaps, be permitted to suggest the author to be more sparing in his alliteration in future works (masters like Mr. S. are not expected to write puns and spelling lessons)—but to study ease and simplicity as much as possible. On the extensive display of science in the cases before us, we deem it unnecessary to offer any suggestion. It is so natural, and, indeed, quite proper, to put on the best as a first interview: upon more familiar acquaintance, we of ourselves become less particular and stricter, and on the other hand, more familiar, communicative, affable, and engaging.

*Our readers are, doubtless, aware of the habit musical composers are in of numbering their works—Op. 1, 2, 3, etc. Thus Beethoven's last number beyond 115, and Haydn's exceeds 110. Besides indicating an author's fertility, this serves to classify his productions.

This interesting document, stained and time-worn, though preserved with care, bears marks of having been existing in the hands of the artist, in a fine hand, interspersed with musical passages cited from the Allegro di Bravura, with running commentaries.

THE DRAMA.

THE COMMONPLACE-BOOK OF AN AMATEUR.

NATHANIEL LEE.

This dramatist, the contemporary of Otway, was constitutionally subject to insanity. But it was not until his thirty-fourth year that his disease appeared in its full vigour. Previous to this time he had written some dozen or more tragedies, which, though they bore strong marks of his excited mind, evidently proved him a man of great genius, and much poetic ability.

The following description of madness, from his Cesar Borgia, produced in 1830, must, while it excites our admiration for its truth to nature, also call up our deepest sympathy for its author; who, during two years of his later life, suffered what he portrays, in its most terrible form:

"Like a poor lunatic, that makes his moan,
And for awhile begins his undertone,
He reasons well, his eyes their witness lose;
He vows the keepers his wrong'd sense abuse.
But if you bid the cause that nurt' his woe,
Then his teeth gnash, he foams, he shakes his chain;
His eyeballs roll, and he is mad again."

It was during his confinement at Bedlam, in the winter of 1648, while suffering under his infirmity, that he was visited by a puny scribbler; who, remarking upon the wildness of his tragedies, observed, that "it was easy to write like a madman." "No," replied Lee, "it is not an easy thing to write like a madman, but it is very easy to write like a fool."

Lee possessed every requisite for a fine actor. A dignified person, sweet voice, and expressive countenance. He was, moreover, one of the best readers of his day; and it is recorded, on the authority of Cibber, that, while reading at a rehearsal to the celebrated Mohan, the latter threw down his part, in the warmth of admiration, exclaiming, "unless I were able to play the part as well as you read it, to what purpose should I undertake the task." Though gifted with these rich qualities, Lee remained on the stage but little more than a year, when he abandoned it, in despair of ever acquiring celebrity. Like Otway, he thought the profession required but little or no study or practice; and, like him, he reaped the bitter reward of this absurd idea.

Would that some actors of our day might draw wisdom from their experience; and, by beginning with a good foundation, gradually rise to the top of their profession. Then might we be spared the misery of beholding a host of stars suddenly rise—shine dimly for awhile—then set for ever.

Of this dramatist's plays, but one, his "Alexander the Great," yet keeps possession of the stage.

MRS. CENTIVRE.

We are somewhat surprised, considering the circumstances attending her youth, that this lady should so soon have attained a rank among dramatic writers. She seems to be an exception to that maxim of Mr. Johnson,

"NOW TIMES WORTH, BY POVERTY OPRESS'D."

Thrown upon the world, an orphan, at a tender age, she was kindly taken into the family of an acquaintance. Here she remained but a short time. Ill treatment drove her to the determination to seek her fortune in London. She proceeded on her journey; but soon, overcome with fatigue, she sat down by the road-side, and gave way to her melancholy grief for her prospects in a flood of burning tears. Fortune here a second time introduced her to some charitable, kind-hearted people. We hear of her again, cultivating her mind, and making rapid progress in French literature. Soon, she attempted writing a tragedy, but meets with little success. Nothing daunted, she turned her attention to comedy, and, after a few trials, became an universal favourite with the audience.

Of the fifteen pieces she produced, but three continue to be performed. Yet these three evince her great and diversified talents, and lead us to respect their author, because of her slighted education. Ever brilliant in wit and humour, Mrs. Centivre drew her characters true to nature, and threw into their dialogue life and spirit—a decided mark of dramatic talent. Her greatest excellence lies in the simple arrangement of her plots; and the clear development of quick and stirring incidents. Though her style is slightly, and many of her expressions, extremely licentious, this fault must be referred back to the age in which she flourished, when coarse ribaldry and vulgar satire were popular, and listened to with eager attention. Her "Busy Body," "Wonder," and "A bold stroke for a Wife" continue to find favour with the most refined and intelligent of English or American audiences.

It is a singular circumstance, but no less true, that actors, whom of all others we should suppose best qualified to decide upon the merits and probable success of a piece, but seldom form a correct opinion. A striking instance of this is displayed in the case of the "Busy Body." The play having been finished, it was long before a manager could be found to hazard its trial. And when, at last, it was put in rehearsal, a new difficulty was presented. Mr. W. Wilks, who had been cast in the character of Sir George Airy, conceived a great dislike to the part. With the manuscript in his hand, he paced up and down the stage, until, brought into a violent rage, he threw the paper into the pit, declaring that "nobody would listen to such stuff." Mrs. Centivre, who was present, is said to have entreated Wilks, with tears in her eyes, to give her piece a fair trial before the public. He was prevailed upon to proceed, and the first performance met with unexampled success. The piece ran for thirteen successive nights.

INDIAN TALES AND LEGENDS.

THE FORSAKEN BOY.

BY HENRY R. SCHOOLCRAFT.

A solitary lodge stood on the banks of a remote lake. It was near the hour of sunset. Silence reigned within and without. Not a sound was heard but the low breathing of the dying embers, and head of this poor family. His wife and three children surrounded his bed. Two of the latter were almost grown up; the other was a mere child. All their simple skill in medicine had been exhausted to no effect. They moved about the lodge in whispers, and were waiting the departure of the spirit. As one of the last acts of kindness, the skin dog of the lodge had been thrown back to admit the fresh air. The poor man felt a momentary return of strength, and, raising himself a little, addressed his family.

"I leave you in a world of care, in which it has required all my strength and skill to supply you food, and protect you from the storms and cold of a severe climate. For you, my partner in life, I have less sorrow in parting, because I am persuaded you will not remain long behind me, and will, therefore, find the period of your sufferings shortened. But you, my children! my poor and forsaken children, who have just commenced the career of life, who will protect you from its evils? Listen to my words! Unkindness, ingratitude, and every wickedness is in the scene before you. It is for this cause that, vents ago, I withdrew from my kindred and my tribe, to spend my days in this lonely spot. I have contented myself with the company of your mother and yourselves during seasons of very frequent scarcity and want, while your kindred, feasting in a scene where food is plenty, have caused the forests to echo with the shouts of successful war. I gave up these things for the enjoyment of peace. I wished to shield you from the bad examples you would inevitably have followed. I have seen you, thus far, grow up in innocence. If we have sometimes suffered bodily want, we have escaped pain of mind. We have been kept from scenes of roving and bloodshed.

"My career is now at its close. I will shut my eyes in peace, if you, my children, will promise not to cherish each other. Let no one of your number suffer during the few days that are left to live; and I charge you, on no account, to forsake your youngest brother. He has I give you both my dying charge to take a tender care." He sank exhausted on his pallet. The family waited a moment, as if expecting to hear something farther; but, when they came to his side, the spirit had taken its flight.

The mother and daughter gave vent to their feelings in lamentations. The elder son witnessed the scene in silence. He soon exerted himself to supply, with the bow and net, his father's place. Time, however, wore away heavily. Five moons had filled and waned, and the sixth was near its full, when the mother also died. In her last moments she pressed the forehead of her youngest son to her father, which the children rarely renewed, because they were yet free from selfish motives.

The winter passed; and the spring, with its enlivening effects in a northern hemisphere, cheered the drooping spirits of the bereft little family. The girl, being the eldest, dictated to her brothers, and seemed to feel a tender and exclusive affection for the youngest, who was rather sickly and delicate. The other boy soon showed symptoms of restlessness and ambition, and addressed the sister as follows: "My sister, are we always to live as if there were no other human beings in the world? Must I deprive myself of the pleasures of association with my own kind? I have determined this question for myself. I shall seek the villages of men, and you cannot prevent me."

The sister replied: "I do not say no, my brother, to what you desire. We are not prohibited the society of our fellow-mortals; but we are told to cherish each other, and to do nothing independent of each other. Neither pleasure nor pain ought, therefore, to separate us, especially from our youngest brother, who, being but a child, and weakly minded, is entitled to a double share of our affection. If we follow our separate gratifications, it will surely make us neglect him, whom we are bound by vows, both to our father and mother, to support." The young man received this address in silence. He appeared ready to grow more restless and moody, and one day, taking his bow and arrows, left the lodge, and never returned.

Affection nerved the sister's arm. She was not so ignorant of the forest arts as to let her brother want. For a long time she administered to his necessities, and supplied a mother's cares. At length, however, she began to be weary of solitude and of her charge. No one came to be a witness of her exertions, or to let fall a single word in her native language. Years, which added to her strength and capability of directing the affairs of the household, brought with them the irrepressible desire of society, and made solitude irksome. At this point, selfishness gained the ascendancy of her heart; for, in meditating a change in her mode of life, she lost sight of her younger brother, and left him to be provided for by contingencies.

One day, after collecting all the provisions she had been able to save for emergencies, after bringing a quantity of wood to the door, she said to her little brother: "My brother, you must not stray from the lodge. I am going to seek our elder brother. I shall be back soon." Then, taking a bundle, she set off in search of his brothers. She soon found them, and was so much taken up with the pleasures and amusements of social life, that the thought of her brother was almost entirely obliterated. She accepted proposals of marriage; and, after that, thought still less of her hapless and abandoned relative.

Meantime her elder brother had also married, and lived on the shores of the same lake whose ample circuit contained the abandoned lodge of his father and his forsaken brother. The latter was soon brought to the pinching turn of his fate. As soon as he had eaten all the food left by his sister, he was obliged to pick berries and dig up roots. These were finally covered by the snow. Winter came on with all its rigours. He was obliged to quit the lodge in search of other food. Sometimes he passed the nights in the clefts of old trees or caverns, and ate the refuse meals of the wolves. The latter, at last, became his only resource; and he became so fearless of these animals that he would sit close by them while they devoured their prey. The wolves, on the other hand, became so familiar with his face and form, that they were undisturbed by his approach; and, appearing to sympathize with him in his outcast condition, would always leave something for his repast. In this way he lived till spring. As soon as the lake was free from ice, he followed his new-found friends to the shore. It happened, the same day, that his elder brother was fishing in his canoe, a considerable distance out in the lake, when he thought he heard the cries of a child on the shore, and wondered how any could exist on so blank and barren a part of the coast. He listened again attentively, and distinctly heard the cry repeated. He made for shore as quick as possible, and, as he approached land, discovered and recognized his little brother, and heard him singing, in a plaintive voice,

Listen, brother—elder brother!

Now my fate is near its close;

Soon my state shall be another,

Soon shall cease my day of woes.

Left by friends I loved the dearest,

All who knew and loved me most;

Woe the darkest and severest,

Bide me on this barren coast.

Pity! ah, that manly feeling,

Fled from hearts where once it grew,

Now in wolfish forms revealing,

Gloves warm warmly than in you

Stony hearts! that saw me languish,

Deaf to all a father said,

All a brother's feelings fled,

Ab, ye wolves, in all your raging,

I have found you kind and true;

More than man—and now I'm changing,

And will soon be one of you.

At the termination of his song, which was drawn out with a peculiar cadence, he howled like a wolf. The elder brother was still more astonished, when, getting near shore, he perceived his poor brother partly transformed into that animal. He immediately leaped on shore, and strove to catch him in his arms, soothingly saying, "My brother, my brother, come to me." But the boy eluded his grasp, crying as he fled, "Nesiea, nesiea," etc., and howling in the intervals.

The elder brother, conscience-stricken, and feeling his brotherly affection strongly return, with redoubled force exclaimed, in great anguish, "My brother! my brother! my brother!"

But, the nearer he approached, the more rapidly the transformation went on; the boy alternately singing and howling, and calling out the name, first of his brother, and then of his sister, till the change was completely accomplished, when he exclaimed, "I am a wolf!" and bounded out of sight.

[The moral of this tale may be said to rebuke a species of cruelty, which is not peculiar to the tribe from whose traditions it has been obtained. The truth it indicates is impressed upon the minds of the young, to warn them against the perpetration of similar barbarities—barbarities which claim pity even from wild animals.]

But, while we know of no recorded instance of abandonment of children of either sex, by any North American tribes, it is attested, by travellers that the very aged and helplessly superannuated, among some of the more northerly tribes, have been thus left. This remark was made at an early day, and has been repeated in modern times, as practiced among bands on the borders of the Arctic Ocean. Certainly no practice of this kind has been found to prevail among the Ojibwas, Ottawas, and other more well-known existing branches of the Algonic stock.]

SCRAPS FROM LICHTENBERG.

Translated from the New-York Mirror.

We Protestants think that we live in an age of great light in religious matters. But suppose a new Luther should arise? Our era may yet be known in history as the dark ages. For it would be easier to confine the wind, than to set limits to the progress of the mind.

I have often thought what it could be that makes the difference between great minds and common men, and fancy I have at last discovered it to be—doubt. Common men are always of the same opinions as their neighbours, and never stop to think—ought this to be so? The only question with them is, do other people think, do, or say this or that?

What is the reason why unpleasant ideas trouble us much more early in the morning, when we first get up, for instance, than they do afterwards, when we feel wide awake, and that all around us is awake too?

The hourglass reminds us not only of the swift flight of time, but also of the dust to which we must return.

The way to prolong life is to do whatever we have to do without delay. The time between the resolution to do a thing, and the doing it is lost for enjoyment. We are too full of the task left before us to think of anything else to much purpose.

It is a grave question whether it is advisable to take too much pains with the education of children. We cannot fairly appreciate the influence of chance in forming a character. From what school do we get all our most valuable and practically useful qualities and attainments? They are the fruit of circumstances and experience. In large public schools, where children are left more to themselves, there are many ruined, we must admit, but each school turns out men of most character.

There is no science which has been so little indebted to chance for the advances made in it, as astronomy; none in which man's reason appears so great, and man himself so little.

As a general rule, if a man ought to do a thing at five o'clock, he puts it off till six at least, so that you may be sure of going ahead of all competitors, by only doing everything at once.

Never trust a man who lays his hand on his heart.

Do people ever blush in the dark? I believe that fear makes them, pale in darkness, but not the former, for we grow pale from our own feelings, red from regard to others.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

GOING TO SCHOOL.

"All the mother, from the top to the toe."—Shakspeare.

The following extract of a letter from a lady, written after sending an only son to school, is so natural and unaffected—so redolent of the best feelings of our nature—and so beautifully expressed, that we cannot deny ourselves the gratification of giving it a place in the Mirror. It touches a chord in the breast of every mother:

"Mr. — called here on Monday, and, among other things, asked how we were pleased with Harry's tuition. Although he did not express himself fully, he seemed to think it would be better for Harry to be entirely under his control; that he would become more interested in the school and his teacher, to be a member of his family; sleeping there and coming home only once a day to see me. Mr. — seemed apprehensive that perhaps Harry would not conform as strictly to the rules of the school as it is necessary, and that he should be obliged to enforce his authority. There was some reserve in his discourse. I do not know why Harry cannot conform to the established regulations of the school as well as any other boy; he is a sensible and a reasonable child, and it is my belief, at this moment, that he is one of the best boys there, or anywhere else—with, perhaps, not so much dissimulation as some of the older scholars, who have the advantage of a longer residence, and perhaps from that fact a stronger hold upon the principal's consideration. Mr. — seems to be somewhat prejudiced against Harry. I do not think he understands his fearless but noble spirit, which wants to be guided, not crushed. Kindness will win his affection and make him continue a good boy; but severity would degrade him—lower him in his own estimation, and destroy all ambition of excelling. I know this to be Harry's disposition and mind, and perhaps, when Mr. — has an opportunity of judging of him more fully, he will discover this also. As far as I can judge of Mr. —, he has my respect, and without a just and strict authority he could not manage a family of boys. I should like to feel a perfect reliance upon the guardianship to which dear Harry is committed; and, so far, I see no reason to doubt the justice and leniency of it.

"Harry has taken his trunk, and is there now altogether; he comes to me once a day. It is like a sudden submergence, to see him—or like the fresh air of heaven to a prisoner; or a draught of cold water to a feverish palate; a strain of sweet music—the passing fragrance of the new-mown grass; the proud consciousness of having performed well a painful duty; the morning star of one's memory; the sound of the pleasant waterfall; the tone of affection to a bruised spirit; or anything that is delightful to the heart, is the sight of his dear, dear face approaching me. You cannot think how I missed him, the first night he slept away from me. I could not sleep myself; I sat by the window, alternately watching the moon, and his little bed the covering smooth and the pillow deserted; he was not there for me to kiss him while he slept. I sat there till fancy grew too busy with picturing what might be his future destination; and, wherever his onward path in life, it could no longer run parallel with mine, with every little footstep close upon my own; for he will be a man, and must mingle with men. May God bless him! You do not know how hard it was to consent to Harry's removing, trunk, clothes and everything, entirely away!"

TRUTH.

Adhere always rigidly and undeviatingly to truth; but while you express what is true, express it in a pleasing manner. Truth is the picture, the manner is the frame that displays it to advantage. If a man blends his angry passions with his search after truth, become his superior by suppressing yours, and attend only to the justness and force of his reasoning. Truth, conveyed in austere and acrimonious language, seldom has a salutary effect, since we reject the truth, because we are prejudiced against the mode of communication. The heart must be won before the intellect can be informed. A man may betray the cause of truth by his unreasonable zeal, as he destroys its salutary effects by the acrimony of his manner. Whoever would be a successful instructor must first become a mild and affectionate friend.

MYSTERIES OF NATURE.

Among the mysteries of nature are the links that bear up the chain of existence, which in many instances are so minute as to be imperceptible to human sight; and yet we know it is ordained that one is called into existence at the expense of another, and that everything is adapted to the climate that gave it birth. Some are brought into life with the sun, and die at its decline; others live perhaps for a few days or weeks only, and yet they must all obey the laws of nature, which bids all to eat and be eaten in their turn; each fulfils its destined office of check excess in the progress of life, and maintain the balance of creation.

GOOD ENSE.

It will preserve us from consciousness; it will lead us to distinguish circumstances; keep us from looking after visionary perfection, and make us see things in their proper light. It will lead us to study dispositions, peculiarities, accommodations; to weigh consequences; to determine what to observe, and what to pass by; when to be immovable, and when to yield. It will produce good manners, keep us from taking freedoms, and handling things roughly; will never agitate claims of superiority, but teach us to subdue ourselves one to another. Good sense will lead persons to regard their own duties, rather than to recommend those of others.

MEN.

Men are Stoics in their early years, Epicureans in their latter social in youth, selfish in old age. In early life they believe all men honest, till they know them to be knaves; in late life they believe all to be knaves, till they know them to be honest. They know how or other, men pass from one of those extremes to the other.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

The Fine Arts—Royal Academy's Exhibition—Leslie—Maciste—Landseer—Portraits.

THE exhibition of the Royal Academy is this season accounted one of the finest that the public has been favoured with for many years. The works of art in this collection are thirteen hundred and ninety in number! a very fair twelvemonth's crop. Thus, at all events, says something for the industry, if not for the ability of British artists; and, as the supply is generally regulated by the demand, it may fairly be concluded that those who have devoted their time and talents to the fine arts have no reason, at present at least, to complain of coldness or neglect on the part of the public. It must, however, be borne in mind, that a great number of merely miniatures and architectural designs materially assist to swell the catalogue to its present extent.

The rooms have been crowded every day. A more than an ordinary proportion of ladies have honoured the exhibition with their presence, and not a few of them disputed the palm of beauty with the unmodified visions of the artists. And why not? Nature never grows old. There is no "falling off" in her productions. Perhaps stays, tight lacing, and other modern enormities of costume not to be mentioned, rather injured the fair proportions of the figures of her handwork, but there were here and there faces of which the Venuses, Dianas, and other good-looking goddesses on the walls need not have been ashamed.

Of course I will not attempt to bore you with even the names of one hundredth part of the pictures; though I may mention one or two likely to be of interest to your artists and fellow-citizens. Your countryman, Leslie, has four this year. You are sure never to be disappointed in Leslie's productions. You may not be astonished or dazzled, but you may count upon being pleased, delighted, and perfectly satisfied. There is always evidence of mind in whatever he does, and there is a neatness of execution about his pictures—a chasteness of colouring, and a carefulness of finish, which leaves nothing to be desired. He is not too self-sufficient to neglect minutiae. His subjects, too, are always pleasing. He has not anything Shakspearian this year, but he has two from his favourite, Don Quixote, namely, the immortal Sancho Panza, and the goddess of the Don's idolatry, Dulcinea del Toboso. The other two are evidently intended for a pair, and a very charming pair they are. The name of the first in the catalogue is—"Who can this be!" A severe, truculent-looking old gentleman, dressed in the costume of a couple of centuries ago, is seen walking along a shaded avenue with a fair lady (it is to be presumed his wife) hanging on his arm. Approaching them is a gay and gallant cavalier, who bows with an air of most profound devotion. The truculent, middle-aged gentleman looks sulky and puzzled, as much as to say—"Who can this be?" while the lovely mischief by his side turns her head half round, and is most busily employed in calling a pet dog to her side, doubtless quite unconscious of the lowly obsequies of the gallant cavalier. The companion to this is entitled—"Who can this be from?" The same lady is seen seated at her toilet, and a portrait of the old gentleman hangs above her head for contemplation when he himself is absent. She is, however, at present otherwise employed. Her maid is lying before her a billet-doux, and the pretty innocent is supposed to be exclaiming—"Who can this be from?" though there is a conscious expression in her face which sufficiently indicates she can more than guess. The spectator can easily surmise that she would not like the truculent gentleman to resolve her query.

Spanish subjects appear to be in request this year. That rising artist, Maciste, has selected the second adventure of Gil Blas, where the knowing gentleman he meets with flatters him out of his supper, and a charming picture he has made of it. It is a playful and spirited moral lecture on the potency, danger and ridiculousness of flattery. The modest, downcast, and gratified look of the tickled and deluded Gil Blas, the roguish and triumphant leer of the parasite, and the ill-suppressed mirth of the hostess, cannot be misunderstood. This gentleman has also a noble picture, the subject taken from the glorious romance of "Ivanhoe," where Robin Hood entertains Richard of the Lion heart in Sherwood Forest. It carries you back at once five hundred years to "merry Sherwood." Robin is represented according to the old ballads,

"Told in scarlet and redde,
His men in Lyncolne greens."

He is drinking a "Health unto the kyng," who is yet unknown to him.

"The kyng himself drank to the kyng,
And round about it went."

The whole scene is most animated. Little John, who was seven feet high, is approaching with a fallow buck upon his back; the burly firer Tuck is reclining on the ground, with a venison pasty on his knee and a flagon in his hand; while Allan-a-dale, George-a-Green, Will Scarlet, and other prominent characters are grouped round. Robin, the prince of good fellows, occupies, as is most proper, the foreground, about to quaff a bumper to the king's health; and Maid Marian, a piece of nature's workmanship well worthy the bold forester's wooing, sits in her bower hard by. King Richard, in the dress of a Knight of the Cross, appears enjoying the scene mightily, as well he may, for it is one of rampant jollity, very different from the frigid formality of regular courts; and his two eastern attendants appear to have more of African jocularity than of Eastern or Sarcenic gravity in their composition. The back-ground is occupied by groups practising archery and contending at quarter-staff. It is an illustration worthy of Scott.

There are two subjects selected from Washington Irving's "Pride of the Village," but the artists with their pencils have not equalled the artist with his pen. These pictures will scarcely make that beautiful and pathetic sketch better known than it is.

There is also a picture by Landseer of "Van Amburgh and his Animals." Any one might have painted Van Amburgh, but no one but Edwin Landseer could have painted his animals. In this department he has attained absolute perfection. His animals are worth an artist's while crossing the Atlantic to look at. The canine race are particularly his debtors. There is a mild, thoughtful beauty in the eye of his dogs, which ennobles the brute creation.

Of course there are portraits out of number of rich and titled and rich and untitled nobodies—of lords and ladies, and mayors and mayoresses, and aldermen and "young gentlemen," who can afford to pay an artist well for mispending his time in copying their commonplace lineaments; but there were not any of much public interest. There was one of the authoress of "The City of the Sultan," Miss Pardoe, in Turkish costume, and another of Captain Marryat. Also, a marble bust of "Boz," looking very dignified and classical!

German Tales of the Supernatural.

THE ENCHANTED MOUNTAIN.*

TRANSLATED FROM A. F. E. LANGBEIN.

"WHAT, still daubing away!" cried Louis, as he entered his brother William's room; "you will sit there till you get as wooden as your easel. Get up and stir about!"

"You are out of humour to-day, dear brother," was William's mild answer, "or you would not blame me for following an art which gives me at once pleasure and support. The canvass, you know, is my farm, and the pencil my plough."

"So much the worse! You will never rise in the world, but always be a poor, unnoticed, hungry artist. My views are different. I mean to make something of myself—and of you too, for that matter. When I am a rich man, I will have a splendid gallery of paintings, and I will give you liberal orders; for, to say the truth, you deserve encouragement: that landscape you are working at, is very soft and natural."

"I am glad you think so well of it."

"But I cannot say so much for the female figure that is sitting in the foreground, with a book. Her every-day, commonplace countenance spoils the whole picture. I would swear she was reading a cookery book."

"That is a kind of reading she is not fond of."

"Who?"

"The lady seated there in front."

"So, then, she is no creation of the fancy, but a real woman!"

"Perhaps the artist's sweetheart!"

"I keep no secrets from you."

"I wish you had. I should be glad if you had sense enough to be ashamed of such a weakness. You can have no chance of getting on in the world if you marry a poor, unknown girl."

"My Caroline is poor, it is true; but rich in all the gifts of nature."

"Stuff and nonsense! I have no patience with such enthusiasms."

A man who finds comfort at home, in the bosom of his family, never comes to anything. I mean to marry, not with any such foolish ideas, but with a careful eye to my own interest. If you were rich yourself, there might be some excuse for you; but our good old father was so simple as to leave his sons nothing but his good name, as he called it. If he had made one or two clever bankruptcies, we might have held up our heads, and spent our money like other people. However, I intend to make up for his want of common sense. I am a handsome fellow; so says my glass, and so say all the women. Many a prince would give half his dominions for my figure. Shall I throw all these advantages away on the first girl that takes my eye! No such thing! I mean to bring them to market, and to the best market I can. I advise you to do the same."

"I live only for Caroline."

"Incorrigible enthusiast! Go on and vegetate in your humble sphere, if you will: my aim is a rich wife and a title. When I have got them you cannot expect me to continue any longer on the same terms with you; and, as to your vulgar true love, let her never come near me."

With these lofty orders, he flung himself out of the room.

The characters of the two brothers are, we trust, sufficiently plain, from the above conversation. In a word, Louis, the elder, lived only for himself and his own aggrandizement; while these were the very last things his brother William ever thought of. We will only add, that they lived on the borders of the Hartz forest, in the year 16—. Near their house was a mountain, where the heathen Saxons used to meet to worship the goddess Lora, the Venus of northern mythology. To this mountain, yet sacred in the traditions of the people, William would often repair, fancying it always the most favourable spot for a lover's meditations. One day it seemed to him as though the mountain was moving. He rubbed his eyes, and looked again, and it actually did move. It rolled from side to side, and finally opened, and brought forth, not a mouse, but a dwarf, of wondrous beauty, who advanced to the young artist, and addressed him in the sweetest of voices—

"Youthful mortal, pure from sin,
Enter free and fearless in!"

* Our readers need not be reminded of Prior's poem of Sir Topas, nor be told that these tales are the common property of all nations.

William was less astonished at the strange apparition, than at the coolness and fearlessness with which he regarded it. He felt none of that terror which is usual at the sight of visitors from another world. "No harm," thought he, "can follow so friendly an invitation," and he suffered the dwarf, who took him by the hand, with child-like confidence, to lead him into the cavern.

A soft, hazy, rosy light, the source of which the admiring adventurer could not discover, lighted the narrow path on which they travelled, and the voices of unseen spirits sung around them, with heavenly sweetness, the goodness and the former glory of the goddess of the mountain. Soon they came to a door of polished ebony, which the dwarf opened with a golden key. William started back in surprise, for he saw before him a garden, diminutive indeed, but surpassing in splendour all the productions of earth. Spring, summer and autumn seemed to reign in it with divided empire. The ground was studded with knots of brilliant flowers, while the trees bent down to earth their branches, overloaded with golden apples, oranges and pomegranates. This was the chosen retreat of the dethroned goddess, and here she sat, in a bower of roses, with a purple flower in her hand, which she extended towards William, saying, "This is the magic flower of Love; guard it faithfully. So long as you and your Caroline are loving and true, it will continue to bloom, and your house be the abode of peace and happiness."

The young mortal received the precious gift with a low reverence, and the goddess gave him to understand, by a slight inclination of her head, that the audience was over. At the garden-door stood the dwarf, with a basket full of fruit, which he emptied into William's pockets, as a present for Caroline, and then led him back to the mountain-side. Here he left him, and crept back into the mountain, like a rat.

William would gladly have done to see his Caroline, but the load in his pockets, which seemed to grow heavier every minute, forced him to be content with a regular three-miles-an-hour step. Borne down by the weight, and fairly out of breath, he reached Caroline's house at last, and told her of his strange adventure. He piled up Lora's presents on the table, and Caroline seized one of the fruits in eagerness to taste these supernatural productions; but her teeth made no impression, and William discovered that the fruits were so many lumps of solid gold, and far fitter for the mint than for the table.

To the mint, accordingly, he soon took them. He was now a rich man, so he bought a farm, and lived a life of happiness, surrounded by his wife and children, and by all the beauties of nature. The wondrous flower kept in full bloom, and worked even more wonders than the goddess had promised.

Meantime Louis had not been idle. He had been on a voyage of discovery through Germany, in search of a rich wife. Such a prize was not hard to find. But he discovered that the wealth was, in this case, as we read in old fables it used to be, guarded by a most frightful, ugly monster; so that to obtain it was too serious an undertaking for every one to venture on. An honest man would have worked at day-labour or starved to death, if necessary, sooner than have united himself with the widow Petronilla. She was lean and haggard as Death on the pale horse, and the only colour she could boast of was the brilliant spot that adorned her nose. Her temper corresponded to her physiognomy, and, moreover, she possessed the gift of fluency to a degree that even Cicero might have envied. Day and night her tongue was in motion, an incessant water-fall, a perpetual grist-mill. We have it, in fact, from the best authority, that no servant ever lived with her more than a fortnight. But her lover was not a man to be easily frightened. If he felt some qualms of repentance when he looked at his intended, the thought of her bags of broad pieces and acres of broad lands reassured him again. He presented himself boldly as a wooer, and, as may be judged, was soon accepted. The wedding-day was fixed, lawyers were making pious and preparing to draw the contract, when Louis heard, for the first time, that his brother had suddenly become wealthy, and was the owner of a beautiful villa. This seemed incredible, but he determined to ascertain the truth for himself before his marriage.

William received him most cordially, and made no secret of the fairy favours that had laid the foundation of his good-fortune. Louis said little, though he was bursting with envy, but asked, in a careless way, which road led to Lora's dwelling. As soon as he heard it he left his brother, and began to curse the stars that had thrown such wealth in the way of his indolent brother, while he had to marry a monster, or to starve. In a word, he determined to try the adventure for himself, nothing doubting but that the elves would be doubly liberal to so good-looking a fellow. So he got together all the bags and sacks he could, intending to bring away some bushels of the golden fruit, till he was as round as an onion. He walked round the mountain a dozen of times, but no dwarf made his appearance. "Why don't the monkey come!" said he to himself, and began to fling stones against the hill to hasten his movements. This produced a visitor, in the shape, not of a beautiful little cupid, as before, but of a hideous dwarf, who just thrust out of the hill-side a head as big as a pumpkin, and asked in a surly voice what he meant by making such a disturbance. "I am come to visit the goddess Lora," was the answer. "I advise thee to depart in peace," said the dwarf, "but if thou art bent on an adventure which will end to thy shame and confusion, come with me." Louis entered the mountain, but the path was dark as Egypt; instead of the rosy light his brother had described, the road was so uneven, that he stumbled at every step. His dwarfish conductor did not regard his sufferings, but hurried him along at such a rate, that he left half his clothes, some flesh, and not a little blood behind him. When he came to the garden he found the goddess surrounded by a body-guard of apes, broad-shouldered, sturdy little fellows, who seized him at once, and began to play foot-ball with him, to their great satisfaction. At a sign from the goddess the tumult ceased, and she asked with stern gravity, "Who is the mortal that dares to approach our presence with selfishness and impudence on his brow?" Louis was too much abashed and terrified to answer. "It is well for thee," resumed the goddess, "that thou hast thus much grace to be silent; but thou meritest, and must receive punishment for daring to come into the presence of the Goddess of Love, whose power thou despisest. Away with him, elves, and put a mark on him, so that he may remember his visit." At the word, a thousand horrid shapes seized on him. Some hung on his back, others pulled his legs to make him tumble, but, by the dint of fast running, he managed to shake off all but one imp who clung round his neck, and whose occupation consisted in pulling his nose with great vigour and pertinacity. This persecution lasted till he was fairly out of the mountain. When restored to the free air, his first thought was, that the spirits might, perhaps, have secretly filled his pockets with gold, to make up for their persecutions, and sure enough he found all his bags well stuffed with—straw. "One consolation I have yet," said he; "my marriage with the widow will make me rich in spite of these mischievous imps." He pulled out his pocket mirror to have a look at the handsome features which were all his fortune, when—horror of horrors! he found that the little nose-pulling gnome had been all the while lengthening that useful appendage, till it stood out a foot from his face. He was a ruined man! The widow shrunk with horror from marrying a man as ugly as herself, and the ambitious Louis was fain to seek shelter in the house of his despised brother William did all he could to cheer and comfort him, but in vain. He shunned the society of his fellows and the light of day, and survived his beauty only half a year.

SKETCHES OF AMERICAN SCENERY.

THE VALLEY OF THE MERRIMAC.

BY CALER CUSHING.

NUMBER ONE.

BEAUTIFUL river! Thy clear waters, gently rippled by the mild western breeze, and sparkling under the rays of this vivid July sun, with the deep blue of this lovely sky, and the light masses of summer clouds flitting across it, reflected on thy bosom as thou flowest to sea! Fit associate of the green banks and diversified hill-sides and delightful dales, amid which thou glidest along, giving and receiving the mutual smiles of the fair love which best becomes such sweet companionship! Who can behold thee as thou now glitterest beneath my eye in all the charms of this exquisite scene before me, and not admire the wonder-working hand of ever-mysterious nature? I have traced thee, from thy remote sources, thy majestic birth-place far up in the elevated mountain-meadows of the White Hills—I have seen thee take to thyself new beauty and strength among the islets which spangle over the expanse of Lake Winnepesaukee, fertilizing valley after valley, and leaping on from waterfall to waterfall, as thou proceedest onward many a league, until thy accumulated tide goes to pour its perpetual renderings into the lap of the broad Atlantic. Often, as I have trod thy verdant banks and gathered, like Antæus, additional strength for the wrestlings of life, by the renovating touch of that mother-earth; often, as I drank in the loveliness of the scenes around me, have I felt that here, indeed, here, where boon nature has lavished her bounties, in such scenes as these should the soul seek for the inspiration of high thoughts and good deeds, the inspiration which whispers to it in the voice of the light wind, and beams in upon it in the bright images of sky and wood and river, as though it were still the old Paradise-time, when man yet stood in the visible and audible presence of Deity. How shall I depict the charm of thy lovely valley! But there is no need that I seek for words to do this; for thy children, they who have grown amid thy beauties, have done justice to thy grateful influences. Thy children! Not the statesmen and jurists only, like Parsons and Lovell and Rufus King, among the dead, or Jackson and Daniel Webster among the living, names of honour to their native land, but also they who, by "the pleasing sound of their numerous writings," as John Milton phrases it, by their poetry, whose every line speaks of their bright valley of the Merrimac, have yielded to the home of their youth its best tribute, the spontaneous and unconscious homage of the heart!

Where shall I begin! For I wander like Sindbad in the vale of Diamonds, with every footfall treading on a gem. Take the following fragment from Whittier's Moll Pitcher: what vigour is in the language, what affluence of imagery, but, above all, how it gushes over with the cherished love of the fair scenes of the author's youth!

Land of the forest and the rock—
Of dark blue lake and mighty river,—
Of mountains reared aloft to mock
The storm's career—the lightning's shock—
My own green land, for ever!
Land of the beautiful and brave—
The freeman's home—the martyr's grave—
The nursery of giant men
Whose deeds have linked with every glen,
And every hill and every stream,
The romance of some warrior-dream!
Oh—never may a son of thine,
Where'er his wandering steps incline,
Forget the sky which bent above
His childhood like a dream of love—
The stream beneath the green hill flowing—
The broad-armed trees above it growing—
The clear breeze through the foliage blowing;

Or, hear unmoved, the taunt of scorn
Breathed o'er the brave New-England born;—
Or mark the stranger's jaguar hand
Disturb the ashes of thy dead—
The buried glory of a land
Whose soil with noble blood is red,
And sanctified in every part,
Nor feel resentment, like a brand,
Unsheathing from his fiery heart!

Oh—greener hills may catch the sun
Beneath the glorious heaven of France;
And streams, rejoicing as they run
Like life beneath the day-beam's glance,
May wander where the orange bough
With golden fruit is bending low,—
And there may bend a brighter sky
O'er green and classic Italy—
And pillared fane and ancient grave
Bear record of another time,
And over shaft and architrave
The green luxuriant ivy climb;—
And far towards the rising sun
The palm may shake its leaves on high,
Where fountains are opening, one by one,
Like stars upon the twilight sky,
And breezes soft as sighs of love,
Above the broad banana stray
And through the Brahmin's sacred grove
A thousand bright-hued pinions play!
Yet, unto thee, New-England, still
Thy wandering sons shall stretch their arms,
And thy rude chart of rock and bill
Seem dearer than the land of palms!
Thy massy oak and mountain pine
More welcome than the banyan's shade,
And every free, blue stream of thine
Seem richer than the golden bed
Of Oriental waves, which glow
And sparkle with the wealth below!

Here is another by Hannah Gould, which is in like manner imbued with the very genius loci. How pure, how just in thought, how natural in sentiment, is the following:

THE DREAM.

I dreamed, and 'twas a lovely, blessed dream,
That I again my native hills had found,
The mossy rocks, the valley, and the stream
That used to hold me captive to its sound.

I was a child again—I roamed anew
About my early haunts, and saw the whole
That fades, with waking memory, from the view
Of this mysterious thing we call the soul!

A very child, again beside the brook,
I made my puny hand a cup to dip
Among the sparkling waters, where I took
Its hollow full and brought it to my lip.

And, oh! that cooling draught I still can taste,
And feel it in the spirit and the flesh;
'Tis like a fount, that in the desert waste
Leaps out, the weary pilgrim to refresh.

The space of other days was borne along,
From shrub and forest, on the balmy breeze;
I heard my warbling wild-bird's tender song
Come sweet and thrilling through the rustling trees.

All was restored, as in the sunny day
When I believed my life rural ground
The centre of the world, whose limits lay
Just where the bright horizon hemmed it round!

And here is another from the same pen, marked by the same truth to nature, and quiet pathos of sentiment:

NATIVE ATTACHMENT.

Though year after year has rolled on to the deep,
Where their sorrows and joys in oblivion sleep,
Since my eye fondly lingered to look an adieu,
As the home of my childhood was fading from view,
Not a flower nor a vine round my loved native cot,
Through time's ceaseless changes, has e'er been forgot.

The song of the robin, that sang on the bough
Of the neighbouring pine, is as dear to me now;
The brook looks as fresh to my memory's eye,
And the verdure as clear on the banks it played by;
The lamb bounds as joyous and light o'er the glade,
As when 'mid those scenes I in infancy strayed.

And oft my dark hours of their cares are beguiled,
As fancy's bright wand turns me back to the child
That followed the flight of the butterfly's wing,
And plucked the red berries that grew by the spring;
Or reached for the fair purple cluster, that hung
Where round the bowed alder the wild tendrils clung.

The splendour of cities, the polish of art,
May seek my devotion, and sue for my heart;
But no fount of delight on life's landscape will gush
Like that which leapt down by the violet and rush;
No notes come so sweet as the song of the bird,
Which the ear of the child from the coppice first heard.

I find not a gem in my pathway so bright
As the fire-fly, pursued by my young feet at night
Earth offers no flowers like the wild ones I wretched:
No breeze comes from heaven like the air I first breathed.
No spot seems so pure in the wide vault on high,
As that which sent down the first light to my eye!

And listen to this from the pen of George Lunt:

SPRING FLOWERS.

These frail expiring flowers,
Dying before their life had well begun,
Their birth was blessed by heaven's dearest showers,

And nurtured since by its most golden sun.
Soft is the breath of gentle May;
The skies of early June are kind and warm;
And underneath them, every summer's day,
Each light dower lifted up its fragile form;
Yet were they sheltered from the fiercer ray,
Nor felt the rude bleak touches of the storm.
The brown hill's bosom was their home;
Close by some overhanging rocks,
That kept away the tempest's ruder shocks;
And there they might even yet abide,
(Had not I come
And plucked them from their parent side.)
There, where nothing their beauty could espy
Save the day's burning eye,
And the sweet bird that sung upon the lea,
And the choir'd stars, that on their airy side,
Look'd with the moon, from midway heaven to see.
How did they spring at first to greet
The tripping of May's merry feet!
How gladly would they ripen now,
Under young June's ardent brow!
And yet, perchance, 'twere better to be so;
Since brightest things, they say,
(The brightest are the soonest go)
Even like ourselves must fade away,
Than sadly perish day by day alone,
Upon the wild hills' breast unseen, unknown.

Is not each of these exquisite morsels of poetry an apt illustration of the influence of local or native associations on the mind of the poet? They are, indeed, such expressions. But the same general fact is observable in occasional imagery and expression, where the subject is not peculiar to the scenes in question. As in the following, by Miss Gould, to "the winds:"

We come! we come! and ye feel our might,
As we're hastening on in our boundless flight,
And over the mountains, and over the deep,
Our broad, invisible pinions sweep,
Like the spirit of liberty, wild and free!
And ye look on our works, and own 'tis we;
Ye call us the Winds; but can ye tell
Whither we go, or where we dwell?

Ye mark, as we vary our forms of power,
And fell the forests, or fan the flower,
When the hare-bell moves, and the rush is bent,
When the tower's o'erthrown, and the oak is rent,
As we wait the bark o'er the slumbering wave,
Or hurry its crew to a watery grave;
And ye say it is we! but can ye trace
The wandering winds to their secret place!

And in this by Lunt:

The tints that deck the glowing west,
The gorgeous light of summer skies,
The barren sea's tumultuous breast,
The purpled earth's unnumber'd dyes;
The songs of birds, that come to drink
And bear the lay of quiet streams.
Those haunted rivers, on whose brink
Dwell visions sweet and summer dreams.

And in this by the same:

Broad on the bay the sunbeams quiver,
The good ship floats, the wind is free;
The tide is rolling down the river,
And merry leaps the laughing sea;
And cheerily sounds along the shore,
Unmurmured, my lads, unmurmured!
The airs are mild, as if some bed
Of wooing flowers delayed their rushing,
The lyric birds are overhead,
And, hark, the forest leaves are gushing
With flute-like melodies, which say,
Stay, gentle lady, stay, oh, stay!

And in this by Whittier:

She sings by her wheel, at that low cottage-door,
Which the long evening shadow is stretching before,
With a music as sweet as the music which seems
Breathed softly and faint in the ear of our dreams!
How brilliant and mirthful the light of her eye,
Like a star glancing out from the blue of the sky!
And lightly and freely her dark tresses play
O'er a brow and a bosom as lovely as they!

And how the very soul of Whittier kindles along the page, with the free spirit of his native valley to animate him, and its well-remembered scenes to lend images to his thought, as he dwells on the great cause of liberty! As thus:

Old Massachusetts yet
Retains her earliest fires;
Still on her hills are set
The altars of her sires;
Her "fiere Democracy"
Has yet its strength unshorn—

The scenery amid which we are born and bred sinks as it were into the spirit of a man; and twines itself intimately with every thought, and becomes a part of his being. He can never cast it off, any more than he can cast off the body in which his spirit acts. Almost every chain of his after-thoughts is linked at some point to the magical circle which bounds his youth's ideas; and even when latent, and in no degree known, it is still present, affecting every feeling and every fancy, and giving a bent of its own to all our words and our deeds. Every man's heart will tell him how true and just are these reflections.

Thus far, I have given poetical passages, appertaining to the scenery of the valley of the Merrimac, of a general character: but I propose, in another article, to collect together others equally beautiful, but adapted to specific scenes and localities.

STORIES OF REAL LIFE.

A DOMESTIC SCENE.

NINE o'clock had just struck at the imperial palace at Fontainebleau. Napoleon, seated by the fireside with Marie Louise, was enjoying that freedom of conversation and familiarity he was so fond of. Never had his noble and antique features assumed so joyous and so natural an expression. He laughed, he chatted, he joked; and a stranger entering by chance, would have had much difficulty in recognising the emperor in this little stout man, lolling with so much amusement in an arm-chair.

He poked the fire with the tip of his boot, rubbed his hands with glee, and with playful and tender sallies provoked Marie Louise to venture upon some French phrases, as yet strange to her, which she disfigured with a German frankness so irresistibly droll, that Napoleon burst into fits of laughter.

The empress, half angry, half smiling, came and sat upon the knee of her husband. At the same moment the door opening, the soldier-like face of Duroc presented itself.

"Sire," said he, "the Italian artist is arrived."

"Conduct him here immediately," replied the emperor, at the same time pushing back his arm-chair, he left a space for the newcomer between the empress and himself.

The visitor on entering, made a profound bow to the two illustrious personages into whose presence he was admitted; and, at the desire of Napoleon, took a seat near the fire.

"Welcome to France, my dear Canova," said the emperor, in one of his kindest accents. "But how pale you are! you have become since I last saw you. You must certainly leave Rome and come to reside in Paris. The air of the capital will restore you to health and vigour. See how well we are," said he, taking in his hand the fresh and rosy chin of Marie Louise.

"Sire, you must attribute my ill health to the fatigue of my occupations, not to the air of my country. To leave home altogether would be impossible for me; indeed it would be fatal to me."

"Paris is the capital of the arts. You must stay here, I desire it," said the husband of the pretty German, in a commanding tone, on a sudden assuming the emperor's air.

"Your majesty may dispose of my life; but if you wish it to be devoted to your service, sire, grant me permission to return to Italy, as soon as I have finished the bust of her majesty, the empress, which I am about to undertake."

"Devil's in the man," exclaimed the emperor, "he refuses to remain with me! You see, Louise, he has no other ambition than to be the greatest sculptor in the world. He longs to leave us to return to Rome to resume his labours, and to present to the world another such work as his 'Terpsichore,' 'Paris,' 'Les Danseuses,' 'Venus,' or the 'Magdalen.'"

"The conversation then became more general: they talked of the 'Excavation' continued by the Borghese family of Italian artists, of the 'Colonne Vendôme,' and a thousand other topics. Nothing was new to Napoleon, who conversed with a perfect knowledge of every subject, and a wonderful clearness of perception.

Canova could not retain his surprise and admiration.

"How is it possible for your majesty to divide your attention between so many different matters?" exclaimed he.

"I have six millions of subjects," replied Napoleon, with a smile; "eight or nine hundred thousand soldiers, a hundred thousand horses. The Romans themselves had not so many; I have commanded at forty battles. At Wagram I fired a hundred thousand cannon balls, and this lady, who was then arch-duchess of Austria, desired my death." At this he pulled the ear of Marie Louise, who answered with a droll imitation of her German accent, "I dröbte him erst."

"I think," said the artist, "things now wear a different aspect."

"Oh! Cela est bien vrai," said Marie Louise; this time in the best French possible, kissing the emperor's hand tenderly, who, taking the young creature by the waist, made her sit upon his lap, but as she blushing resisted, "Bah! bah!" said Napoleon; "Canova is a friend, and we don't make ceremonies with friends; besides, he is himself of a tender and susceptible nature, and will be delighted to witness the happiness of an affectionate couple."

"Listen to me, Louise, and I will relate to you a romantic story, the hero of which you may easily guess; you will then judge if those who love each other ought to feel restraint before Canova."

He kissed Marie Louise and keeping her still upon his knee, began: "In the province of Treviso there is a little village called Possagno. In this place was born and reared the son of an architect, whose father died at the early age of twenty-seven, and whose mother married a second time, 'Satoni di Crepano.'"

"At four years old, the child, by name Antonio, was entrusted to the care of his grandfather, who treated it with much severity. By him it was sent to pass an autumn at Padrazi, two or three leagues from Possagno, at the house of an Italian senator, a friend of his, whose name was Faliero. The latter observing the intelligence of the little peasant, and pleased with the ability he evinced in carving stone and shaping clay, placed him as a pupil with a clever sculptor called 'Toretto.'"

"What! your majesty knows all these minute details of my private life!" exclaimed Canova in surprise.

"I know many more," replied Napoleon, and he continued: "Toretto was a man of strict morals, but, however narrowly he may have watched his favourite pupil, Antonio found means to escape from the Atelier now and then to go and dance at the village fetes. He was then only sixteen. Amongst the gay throng of peasants assembled together during the vintage to dance the tarantella, there was one whose charms captivated his heart, Bettina Biasi; she was just fourteen. Her large black eyes sparkled with animation; her waist was so tapering two hands could span it; her hair, the loveliest that ever adorned a maiden."

A sigh escaped from the bosom of Canova.

The emperor pressed the hand of Marie Louise, that she might remark that sigh, and without interrupting his recital continued: "Antonio was enthusiastic, and in love. As for the grandfather, he was much less moved by the fascinations than by the marriage portion of Bettina, which was considerable, particularly for the poor apprentice to a sculptor."

"The parents of both formed projects of uniting them; arrangements for their marriage were drawing to a close, when Toretto and the senator chanced to hear of it."

"They reflected that this union would destroy the prospects of their protégé, and determined to prevent it."

"One evening they entered the chamber of Antonio, commanded him to follow them; and notwithstanding his tears, his resistance, and despair, carried him to Venice, where they confined him during a whole year."

"A endeavour to escape proved fruitless. The enamoured youth finding his return to Padrazi impossible, was compelled to seek consolation in the study of his favourite pursuit—sculpture."

"The talent and reputation of the young man soon spread abroad, his celebrity was established—he became rich—his society was courted by all, and the memory of Bettina Biasi was gradually erased from his mind."

"At the same time the arts and blandishments of another little coquette, Dominica, took the place in his affections. She was the daughter of the sculptor, Volpato."

"Proposals of marriage were made; but as Dominica was yet young, a postponement was agreed upon till the following year, 'Alas!' before that time, Dominica bestowed her hand on Raphael Morghen."

"The poor deserted lover was in despair at this new piece of treachery."

"At this part of the recital, Canova fell into a deep fit of musing and melancholy, unconscious of what was passing around him."

"His health gave way. His physicians and friends recommended him to return and breathe the air of his native village."

"(Were Corvisart here, he would say this was a remedy the faculty do not believe in, but nevertheless it always succeeds.)"

"Antonio set off on his journey."

"On his approach to his native place, the thought of Bettina Biasi, that charming, that lovely girl, so disinterested in her love for him, rushed upon his imagination more fresh and more engaging than ever."

"O!" cried he, "how ungrateful have I been to neglect and forget her!"

"Dismissing from his mind all remembrance of Dominica, he dreamed only of Bettina Biasi. He pictured to himself the delight he should experience in again gazing and talking to his bosom."

"His heart beat with hope and joy, and whilst he was resolving within himself, to proceed the next day without fail to Padrazi, he perceived the village spire of Possagno before him."

"Too much agitated to remain in the slow 'vetturino,' he alighted and continued his journey on foot by a short road, until he arrived at the gate of the little town."

"At this moment a crowd of young men who were awaiting his arrival, and perceiving him approach, fill the air with shouts of welcome, surrounded and embraced him."

"He stands without the power of speech, his heart throbs within him, his eyes are filled with tears."

"The road is strewn with floral branches and evergreens, all the inhabitants of Possagno, women, children, and old men in holiday costume, line the road, and salute the celebrated youth."

"The venerable Toretto, the old master of Canova, folds him in his arms, weeping over him. At a distance approach the mother of Canova, his step-father, and behind them a female bathed in tears."

"Bettina! my Bettina!" cried Canova.

"She stretches out her hand to him, he is about to speak, when the bells of the village sound a merry peal, salutes of merriment rend the air, and the curate at the head of his clergy, singing the 'Te Deum,' advances in his clerical robes, kneels down, and returns thanks to Providence for having granted to Possagno a child so renowned as Canova. The aged priest then passes his arm through that of Canova, his mother leans on the altar, and the procession conducts the hero in triumph to his grandfather, whose infirmities confine him to his house."

"Ah! sire, sire! let me entreat you not to continue a recital which awakens such cruel and such sweet recollections," interrupted Canova, sobbing.

But Napoleon was too much pleased with the impression he had made on his listeners to think of stopping. Marie Louise had several times wiped the tears from her eyes.

"Listen to the rest," resumed he, addressing the empress, "we are coming to the dénouement, which is well worthy of the rest of the story."

"The day following, as Canova was entering the garden of his grandfather, he saw Bettina Biasi approaching him."

"Five years had diminished none of her beauty, except that she was pale, and resembled one of his own white marble statues."

"O Bettina! Bettina!" cried he, "will you pardon me my ingratitude, and confer on me the happiness I scarcely deserve! I had not yet seen you, when all the fervent and tender affection I once bore you returned upon me with increased strength."

"Listen!" said Bettina, whose voice trembled with emotion, "listen! Antonio Mio—I suffered much when I learnt that you were to be married to Dominica, but I felt, even then, dearest friend, that the humble son of the apprentice Antonio, could never be the wife of the celebrated Canova. Nevertheless, I refused several offers of marriage, and for five years I lived upon the recollection of him I loved. But when I heard that you were about to return to Possagno—when I concluded, from my own feelings, that you were not able to see me again without emotion—when I reflected that we might be both weak enough to renew intimacies rendered unreasonable by your present position, I was anxious to save us both not only the possibility of yielding, but also the agitation and struggles we would have to undergo—I married."

"Married—you married!"

"About eight days ago, to a deserving young man, who has sought my hand for four years."

"Oh! that was a noble and worthy creature!" cried Marie Louise.

Canova had left his seat, and had gone to lean his head against the window, to conceal his grief.

A knock came to the door, and the minister of police, the Duc d'Ortante, put in his plain but expressive head.

"Really, M. le Duc, you could not have arrived at a more opportune moment. See the effect I have produced, thanks to the information you have procured me from Italy, within the last few days."

"Adieu, Canova," continued he, gently patting the shoulder of the artist. "Empire yourself! in making the bust of my wife, and when you have finished it, if you still persist in returning to Italy, I suppose we must let you go."

"Good night! I have business with M. le Duc d'Ortante. Ah! it is a hard life that of an emperor," said he, "it is not often I have an evening to myself and friend, near the fire."

"Now come, M. le Duc. And he went out with the minister. We must not omit to add, that this was the evening of the eleventh October, 1810, and that the Emperor, Marie Louise, and Canova, were in the same room, and near the same fire-place where Napoleon signed his abdication, eleventh of April, 1814."

GAETIES AND GRAVITIES.

"THE DIFFICULTY OF CHOOSING."—"We know," says Madame Emile de Girardin, who writes in La Presse under the name of the Viscount de Launay, "a lady of very irascible character, who, unable to select a dress among a hundred chef d'œuvre laid before her, to resign such a pattern or colour, for such other pattern or colour, after many a hesitation, suddenly made up her mind for fifteen yards of gros de Naples gris de Lin. The sacrifice of everything was to her less painful than the enduring any longer the excruciating torture of choosing. This resolution is ridiculous enough; but it is better than what I know an Englishwoman did, who was one evening bargaining for diamonds, at Fossini's. Her object was, a wedding-present, destined to a niece; the jeweller was exhibiting to her all his parures, and successively pointing out their beauty in detail. My English friend examined the diamonds with silent admiration, when suddenly she said, 'Ah! I know not what I wish to give her.' 'This necklace, madam!' 'No.' 'This bracelet!' 'No.' 'This glass and chain!' 'No, I will buy her a carriage in London.'"

"SILENT REVENGE."—There is now at Marseilles a man who, for reasons unknown, has condemned himself to perpetual silence. The papers of that city, after stating that neither his relatives nor the pope were able to extract one word from him, observe that the singular resolution of playing the dummy was adopted in the last century by a young lady of Provence, of the De Julhau family, who, being married to a marquis, never expressed herself otherwise than by signs, from the day on which her ungallant lord interrupted her in the middle of a conversation, and before a large assembly, with, 'Madame, laissez-vous; nous ne sommes pas nous dices.' To the hour of her death she never uttered one word, though her husband daily implored her to talk, from morning to night, rather than persevere in a silence which perpetually reminded him of his brutal interruption. The second husband of Madame de Stael displayed good humour when, as is said, being at a large dinner-party, he was visited by his lady with the very ungracious apostrophe, 'Monsieur, laissez-vous et ne parlez pas.'"

"LITTLE BELL, THE JOCKEY."—As Mr. Forth was one day walking down Oxford-street, he perceived a child riding, and managing, with great dexterity, a very frisky horse. Forth, being in want of a lad in his training stables, made an offer to the boy, which he most eagerly accepted. The boy rode at Ascot, and made his running so well, and with such judgment, that he won his race. Lord Evers afterwards presented the little lad to her majesty, who very kindly addressed him, "Well, my boy, and what do you weigh?" Upon which the little boy Bell, in a most unsophisticated, but knowing way, answered, "Please, ma'am, master said I wasn't to tell."

"HYDRANGEA."—It may not be known to many of our readers that this flower, which is usually of a pink colour, may be made to come out a beautiful rich blue, by the simple means of salt. The pot or box, with the swamp or bog earth. Common garden-loam produces the pink. The discovery of producing the blue was accidentally made by a friend of ours, by whom it was, sometime since, communicated to us. We have repeated the experiment this season with good success, and now name the fact, that the lovers of variety may take advantage of it. The plant should be shifted very early in the spring.

"RISING GENIUS."—A boy, who displayed a long dangling watch-chain, was asked, "What's the time of day, Josiah?" He drew out his watch very ceremoniously, and, after examining it awhile, referred to another, and asked, "Is this the figure nine or the figure seven?" He was told that it was the "figure" seven. "Well then, Joseph, it lacks just about half an inch of eight."

"CHARLES IV."—This monarch, when he abdicated a throne, and retired to the monastery of Joste, amused himself with the mechanical arts, and particularly with that of a watchmaker: he one day exclaimed, "What an egregious fool must I have been, to have squandered so much blood and treasure in an absurd attempt to make all men think alike, when I cannot even make a few watches alike!"

"THE FIRST AMERICAN ROAD."—The first road made in America was opened in Hispaniola, in 1494. As it was principally the work of the young Spanish gentlemen of rank who accompanied Columbus in his second voyage, it was called El Puente de los Hidalgos, that is, The Gentlemen's Path.

"NEW DEFINITION OF A GENTLEMAN."—A sailor under examination the other day, at the Thames police-office, charged a youth, whom he described as a gentleman, with robbing him. "Why do you call him a gentleman?" asked the magistrate. "Because he wears a long-tailed coat," replied the sailor.

"BURYING AN ATTORNEY."—An Irish attorney, who died poor, was buried by a shilling subscription. Some one asked Curran for his shilling. "For what?" he exclaimed. "To bury an attorney." "Hush, take this pound note, and bury twenty of them at a shilling a head."

"SLEEPING IN CHURCH."—"I didn't like our minister's sermon last Sunday," said a deacon who had slept all sermon-time, to a brother deacon. "Didn't like it, brother A. why, I saw you nodding assent to every proposition of the parson."

"A MISTAKE."—A gentleman meeting one of his friends who was insolvent, expressed great concern for his embarrassment. "You are mistaken, my dear sir," was the reply—"it's not I, 'tis my creditors who are embarrassed."

"RESPIRATION OF VEGETABLES."—A French philosopher is said to be now very busily engaged in a series of experiments upon the respiration of vegetables! His observations, so far as relates to seeds, goes to show that they breathe. What next?

"A MARTYR."—"What are you down there for?" said a gentleman in one of the Mississippi towns to a loafer who was lying in the gutter. "Me! oh, I've only fallen a martyr to the gallan law, that's all!"

"TAKING SMUT."—A person observed to his friend, who was laughing to take snuff, that it was wrong to teach one's nose a bad habit, as a man generally followed his nose.

"CHINESE NOTIONS."—The Chinese are said to have conceived a horror and antipathy for the steamboat, which nothing can conquer: they contend that it is a most "indecent and disgusting" invention.

"THE GRAY MARE THE BETTER HORSE."—"Are you the man of the house?" quipped a stranger of a denizen of this city, the other day. "No, my wife is," was the subdued response.

"WOMAN'S TONGUE."—The tongue of a woman is her sword, and she never suffers it to grow rusty.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Continuation of the Diary illustrative of the times of George IV., interspersed with original letters from the late Queen Charlotte, the Princess Charlotte, and from various other distinguished persons. Edited by John Galt. In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

This publication of the preceding portion of this Diary called forth a storm of abuse against Lady Charlotte Berry, from the press of England. It was said to contain breaches of confidence and developments of private affairs, wholly outrageous and unjustifiable. We must confess we have been very little edified, amused or scandalized by the work; and we cannot conceive how there could be sufficient demand for such mere gossip in this country as to call for its republication. Those persons who may be curious to know how Lady P. looked when she met the Baron de S. at Milan, or how Lord P. looked when he met Lady Caroline at Milan, or how Lady P. looked when she met the Duke of S. at Milan, or how Lord P. looked when he met the Duchess of S. at Milan, are recommended to look for the very momentous intelligence in these volumes. The following passage, relating to some of our own countrymen, is but very devoid of interest.

ARTHUR LEE AND FRANKLIN.

I met Sir — when I was out walking, and he joined me, and I had some interesting conversation with him on the subject of America. He was acquainted with Washington, and another American patriot, Arthur Lee, of whom he spoke in high terms. "He was," said he, "of a respectable family in Virginia; a man of uncommon activity of body and mind; very honest, and truly attached to the interests and happiness of America in general, as well as of his native province. Arthur Lee told me an anecdote of Benjamin Franklin, which is very characteristic of the man. When he was to be presented to the French King, by Vergennes, the count sent a purveyor to the American, for the purpose of fitting him with a wig fashioned for the day. The purveyor was brought to Franklin an hour before the time fixed for his presentation. The philosopher attempted to put it on. Alas! it would not go on his head. 'Sir,' said Franklin, 'your purveyor is, unfortunately, too small for my head.' 'Pardonance too, Monsieur,' replied the purveyor, 'your head, sir, is really too large, and quite beyond the fashion of the court.' Franklin appeared, therefore, at court with his bald pate and shaggy gray hairs. It might truly be said that there was not another such head at Versailles. Franklin continued Sir —, 'though generous, was a great economist. He never indulged himself in any trifling expenses, nor had unnecessary establishments in his family. Books and scientific instruments were his only superfluities. By these means, with clean hands, and without any covetousness or sordid ambition, he bequeathed a handsome fortune to his heirs, and some laudable legacies to his country. Franklin, Washington and Rittenhouse are, perhaps, as fine a constellation as any that has appeared at one time in any country.'

Fanny, with other poems. Pp. 130. New-York: Harper and Brothers.

We wonder that Mr. Halleck has not before listened to the repeated demands of the public for a new edition of this popular poem. "Better late than never," however. "Fanny" agrees as well as a more becoming dress than that in which she now is to be seen. She has lost none of her charms, and is likely to prove as much of a belle as she was at her first "coming-out." To drop the language of hyperbole, we will simply inform our readers that an engraved view of Weehawken adorns the volume, which is enriched with a variety of the uncollected poems of Halleck. Among these are the "Rhyme of the Ancient Coaster," lines to "Walter Bowne," and other pieces, originally published in the New-York Mirror.

Nicholas Nickleby. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

We have received, from Messrs. Lea and Blanchard, numbers fifteen and sixteen of this popular work. There is a manifest falling off in these numbers, especially the last. The introduction of the crazy gentleman from the chimney, and the somewhat improbable mistake of Mrs. Nickleby, is a mere repetition of the former episode, and shows that the mine of fun in that quarter was long since exhausted. There is an evident wire-drawing of incidents to eke out the promised twenty numbers. But Boz, like Homer, is, after all, but mortal; and will any one love him the less because he may, at times, be found nodding?

A Water in the West Indies and Florida, containing a particular description of St. Cruz, Trinidad, and Cuba, Havana, Key West, and St. Augustine, as places fit resort for milder climates. By an Invalid. Pp. 300. New-York: Wiley and Putnam.

The titlepage amply explains the purport and character of this work. It is written with intelligence and evident sincerity, and, to invalids in search of a more benignant climate, the advice will, no doubt, prove valuable. The volume will also be found to embrace much information interesting to the general reader.

Historical Sketches of Statesmen who flourished in the time of George III. Second series. By Henry Lord Brougham. In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

The second series of this able and highly interesting work is even superior to the first. It contains notices of Sir Philip Francis, Horne Tooke, Lord Castlereagh, Lord Nelson, Necker, Mirabeau, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, Napoleon and Washington, with other eminent statesmen. Brougham has evidently brought the best powers of his intellect to the task of illustrating these great characters. He displays his wonted acumen and mastery of language. His style is lucid and strong, and his sentiments are those of a profound original thinker.

The Stenographer, or Self-Instructor in the art of Short-hand. By Charles O. Conant. New-York: Roe Lockwood.

This little manual will be found of considerable service to reporters, and all those desirous of learning the art of short-hand. The pamphlet is accompanied with illustrative plates of stenographic characters.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

A correspondent, who dates from Saratoga, is assured that his letter should have a place in our columns, were it not a little too personal.—The verses to Mrs. K.— are certainly clever. The gossip about Messrs. Clay and Van Buren is a little too trivial.—We refer "Apicius," who requests us to inform him as to the preparation of "scholar soup," to Mr. Deane's chief de cuisine. We do not know the article.—"E. B." is informed that the verses he is pleased to engrave were not written to Miss Tree, but originally published some six years since—the newspapers to the contrary notwithstanding.—We must decline the dramatic sketches by "F.," also "Bubbles from the Hudson," "Brilliant in search of a subject," "Criticism on Pike's Hymns to the Gods," and the communications of "B. C.," "Regatta," "X. L.," "Florida," "F.," and "P. Y. M."

We have received several communications lamenting the dilapidation of old Trinity Church. It is too late to brand its overthrow. The steeple has fallen, and the work of destruction is going on as fast as our most violent innovators could desire.

It gives us pleasure to acknowledge the kind congratulations of many friends and subscribers, in relation to the Mirror, and its course. Notwithstanding the hard times, and the rise and fall of competitors, the great mass of our supporters are steadfast in their adherence, and a daily accession of new subscribers is swelling our list to a cheering extent. Our readers may rest assured that our motto shall still be, "equanimity."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 17, 1839

Greenwood Cemetery.—This beautiful spot is destined before many years to become more celebrated than the "Pere la Chaise" of the old world, or the Mount Auburn of the new. Its local advantages and beauties are undoubtedly immeasurably superior. It is situated on the heights of Gowanus, about two miles from the Brooklyn South Ferry, and about a pleasant fifteen minutes ride from Wall-street. The whole locality is celebrated in revolutionary history. The land set apart for the purposes of the cemetery embraces more than two hundred acres, presenting every variety of woodland, tangled forest-glade, hill, valley, slope, precipice, glen and smooth unwooded lawn. A beautiful sheet of water, more than an acre in extent, and reflecting in its glassy surface every tint of the high and profound forest by which it is margined to its closest edge, is also a memorable feature in the landscape. A carriage-road through these grounds has already been constructed, and improvements are rapidly going on. Following this road, we find ourselves at one moment beneath the arched verdure of gigantic trees, where not a ray of sunshine can penetrate to the thin herbage at our feet, and where the air is moist and cool during the sultriest noontide—another moment we emerge into a more open spot, and through the parting foliage catch glimpses of our beautiful bay sparkling in the sunshine and bearing many a white-winged vessel upon its shining bosom—farther on, and we have upon one side an open lawn, swelling into miniature hills, or subsiding into the greenest vales—and upon the other, a thick wood, dark with perpetual shadows. Following the road to its highest point, we come to a bare, rocky acclivity, said to be the highest ground in the country. From this point the view is truly magnificent. At our feet, our huge metropolis, with Brooklyn and the adjacent country, lies outstretched like a map. Following the course of the East River, the eye takes in the shot-tower, Blackwell's Island, and the principal buildings as far as Hart Gate and Ravenswood. The prospect in this direction is indescribably rich. Turning gradually to the left, the eye falls upon Neversink, the Palisades, and the glorious Hudson, till it encounters Staten Island, with its beautiful villas and fields—and then resting a moment upon Flushing, directly beneath us, with its level fields and highly cultivated gardens, it passes to Coney Island, with its barren rocks, until the view terminates in the gleam of the broad and blue Atlantic, far away in the distance. A panorama unequalled in its combination of great and beautiful objects, in art and nature! On this acclivity, commanding a view so grand and extensive, it is intended to erect a monument to Washington.

Captain Marryat.—Decidedly the funniest romance that Marryat has yet written is his late work upon the United States. For a grown man gravely to put forth such a farrago of old jokes and pointless witticisms, under the pretence of instituting a philosophical inquiry into the operation of our republican institutions, is an absurdity too gross to excite even our indignation. The gallant captain is a perfect hyena in the graveyard of defunct jests and exploded Joe Millerisms. He is the great literary body-snatcher of the nineteenth century, and he enters upon his task with the cold-blooded audacity of a Burke or a Thurtell. The columns of the Picayune will bear testimony to the captain's light-fingered skill in appropriating as his own the good things of others. His book is little better than a "smug harbour" for decayed puns, resuscitated jokes, threadbare anecdotes, "ancient and fish-like" repartees, and a whole ragged regiment of worn-out Wellerisms, extravagancies, mistakes of absence of mind, etc., with which our papers have been filled usque ad nauseam, for the last ten years.

Instruction for boys.—One of the best boarding-schools in the country is Mr. Weld's, at Jamaica Plains, near Boston. The location is remarkably healthy and agreeable, and the worthy superintendent gives invariably satisfaction both to pupils and parents in his management. The secret of his success is explained in two words: He is a scholar and a gentleman. We wish we could say as much for all who pursue his vocation.

Hot and cold.—The editor of the Madisonian, writing from Hot Springs in Virginia, states that a few rods above the hotel, the thumb and finger of the same hand may be placed in two streams of water, one of which is hot and the other cold. A quarter of a mile distant is a cavern, which may be traced several hundred yards in the mountain, if the adventurer chooses.

Absent friends.—The following is in Major Noah's happiest vein. It being quite as applicable to our "absent friends," as our worthy neighbours, we give it a place in the Mirror.—"In order to save the expense of postage, and a multitude of anxious inquiries, to relieve your minds, and allow you to enjoy a balmy night's repose, we have the pleasure of assuring you that we are all well in the city—that your houses are all safe, your chambermaids all quiet, and the cooks moving over their coal fireplaces—that the thermometer, at noon, is eighty-five, and at night, seventy-six to eighty—that corn, blackberries and unripe fruits are in abundance; and so are summer complaints—that the milkman waters his milk as usual at Knapp's spring—that the charcoal-men and sweeps are in good voices—that assaults and batteries are on the increase; and so are new journals—that Niblo has many more thousands of nightly spectators than the little theatre can accommodate—that Confort and Weller and Thompson, with all the other ice-cream saloons, are crowded at night, and the city abundantly filled with strangers. So you who are enjoying the cool sea-breezes at Nahant, Rockaway, Shrewsbury, Long Branch, New-Brighton, and Coney Island, remain where you are, in cool contemplation of the glories of the rising and setting sun, the dash of the billows on the sandy beach, and the cool night's repose, under a comfortable quilt. You who are perched on the summit of the White Mountains, the Catskill Mountains, and Schooley's Mountains, listening at night to the wind as it whistles through the nodding pines and tall larch, stay where you are if you are wise; and you, who are enjoying a soft plank at Saratoga, and sleeping three in a bed and five beds in a room, dancing quadrilles at the Pavilion and swallowing tumblers of nectar at the Congress Spring, hold on, if you have any money left in your purse. Why should we poor devils—compelled to melt under the rays of a fierce sun, and toil like galley-slaves, because it is our fate—why should we reduce you to the level of the same miserable existence! Copy yourselves in the country, do so rationally—return thanks daily for all your enjoyments, pay your newspaper bills and go to bed early—we are watching your premises, guarding your property, and doing everything to comfort and console you in your absence, excepting paying your notes, and that we cannot do, for certain confidential reasons."

Theatrical.—The coming season promises to be a most memorable one in the history of New-York theatricals. The struggle between the rival theatres will be one for existence, and the "tug of war" will, doubtless, be such as the importance of the stake will call forth. The Park is already marshalling its forces, and has shown its best cards with becoming frankness. The official bill of fare promises us the following succession of novelties—Power, Miss Inverarity, Miss Pool, Mr. Gublee, a bass singer, Madame Gublee, a first-rate danseuse, Mrs. Fitzwilliam, "the best general actress on the English stage," Mr. Manvers, first tenor singer, Mr. Eliason, a distinguished violinist, Mr. Thomas, leader of the orchestra, Mr. and Mrs. Crestfield, Mr. Martin, as second bass singer, and lastly, Mr. Shaw, to "play the heavy business, such as tyrants," etc. In opposition to this formidable array, the National opens on the nineteenth, with Forrest, backed by a reserve corps, composed of Miss Shirreff, Wilson and the Seguinis, Charles Keen, Vandenhoff and his daughter, and others whose names have not yet been divulged. The Bazaar, the meanwhile, will, of course, be on the alert, and will produce in rapid succession the most brilliant and attractive melodramas of the day. The new Eagle Theatre will undoubtedly prove an active competitor, and if Niblo opens his new saloon, his well-known enterprise will not permit him to lag behind in the chase for public patronage. Well may the theatre-going people exclaim, "What a season we shall have of it!"

Interesting to ornithologists.—The managers of the public garden in Boston (we wish, by the way, that this nation of a public garden would be adopted by New-York) have purchased a pair of crowned cranes, which were recently brought from the river Gambra. These birds are extremely rare, and as beautiful as rare. They are of a bluish slate-colour on the neck and the principal part of the body, with rose-coloured down upon the sides of the head, which is surmounted by a remarkable crest, sometimes four or five inches in length. The bird attains the height of four feet. It is a native of Western Africa as far to the north as Cape Verde. Of its habits in a wild state nothing is known. In captivity it is easily domesticated, and becomes very tame, quiet, and readily familiarized with man, and is even known to solicit his company.

American journals in England.—The Liverpool correspondent of the Star says:—"It is contemplated, I understand, by a London publisher, to bring out a weekly publication, on the plan of the Albion, with the exception of being wholly devoted to literature and science, in which will be given the best articles in prose and verse that appear in the American periodicals and newspapers. The field is a wide one, and may be attended with advantage and profit. At present the Sunbeam contains about one half of its contents from the New-York Mirror, and so does Bentley's Magazine, and other London periodicals. This, too, is done without acknowledgment. A few months ago, the Metropolitan announced, that having established an exchange with the Knickerbocker, it would republish its best contents. Is not this cool?"

New-Brighton.—The Pavilion is well-filled with agreeable residents. It is a fine, commodious mansion, with every resource for comfort that heart can desire. For those whose business interferes with a longer absence from Wall-street, we should recommend the evening boat to Staten Island, and a night at the Pavilion.

Inevitable.—An editor complains of having had his pockets picked of five hundred dollars at Saratoga. Did he not miss a "seat ring of his grandfather's," at the same time?

I CANNOT DANCE TO-NIGHT.

A BALLAD—THE POETRY WRITTEN BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY MRS. T. HAYNES BAYLY.

Published by Hewitt and Jaques, No. 239 Broadway.

MODERATELY SLOW.

Oh! when brought They won- at my delight, would I were at again, I they me hither, der'd wild But I were home cannot to-night! How can all look full! The dance strangely to me; The music so mournful— can the reason be? Oh! when brought hither, They dance they cheer- seems dull What they me won- at my delight, would I were at again—I cannot to-night!

der'd wild But home

2.—Hark! hark!—at length he's coming,
I am not weary let me stay
I hear his laugh distinctly now—
'Twill chase the gloom away!
Oh! would that I were near him!
He sees me not amid the crowd!
He hears me not—ah! would I dared
To breathe his name aloud:
Oh! when they, &c.

3.—He leaves that group of triflers,
And with the smile I love to see,
He seems to seek for some one—
Oh! is it not for me?
No, no! 'tis for that dark-eyed girl;
I see her now return his glance!
He passes me—he takes her hand—
He leads her to the dance!
Oh! when they, &c.

EXCERPTS.

From the Philosophy of Courtship and Marriage.

THE ALTERNATIVE.—Marriage is either the greatest blessing or the deadliest curse of life. One of our old English writers, of the reign of Charles I., quaintly remarks:—"Of all the paths which diversify the map of this our earthly pilgrimage, the most important is that which leadeth unto the matrimonial altar—for of a very man who once taketh that journey, will not return therein in the same condition as when he set forth. His cup of life will either be sweetened by the honey of pleasure, or embittered by the gall and wormwood of abiding disappointment and regret—the more intolerable because unavailing."

CHARGES OF MATRIMONY.—When people talk of the expenses of a married establishment, they seem to forget the fact, that there is no housekeeper equal to a wife. She is a man's best and most faithful steward; and unless she have expensive tastes, or habits of extravagance, will make a pound go farther than five could do with a bachelor. I lately saw a case in point. A gentleman who, from mistaken motives of prudence, declines to change his condition, made lately, at my request, an abstract of his household expenditure for a year, and it exceeded considerably the outlay, for the same period, of another friend who is married, and who, in like manner, furnished me with the data I required. I may add, that both parties move in the same rank of life, and live in a manner becoming their condition. Men are proverbially bad managers—and even admitting that their domestics are faithful, still the moine for economy is wanting, and without a motive nothing effectual can be accomplished in this or in any other matter.

MYSTERIES OF THE KITCHEN.—I know that I run no small risk of being accused of Spartan barbarism when I assert that a knowledge of the ars culinaria should form a part of every young lady's education. Half a century hath hardly elapsed since the cook-shop was as regularly visited, even by the daughters of the higher class of gentry, as the music academy—and I am free to assert that the march of refinement in this instance hath been rather retrogradist and crab-like. No female can be injured, and many may be essentially benefited by the study. An officer's wife, for instance, who hath accompanied her husband to the scene of war, may greatly add to their mutual comfort in the absence of domestics. In a mercantile community, how many a man by a reverse of fortune is compelled, as an emigrant, to seek his fortune in some new and unpeopled country, and who will assert that his wife would be the worse of being able to dress the wild fowl or venison which her husband's rifle had supplied? In the back-woods of Canada, a sauce-pan is worth a dozen pianos and a whole legion of guitars.

RELIGION.—The only other requisite in a wife, which I shall touch upon in this place, is religion. It is solely on account of its vital importance that I have postponed it till now, in order, that being last read, it may be the better remembered and dwelt upon.

I am aware that in making this avowal, I lay myself open both to ridicule and censure. Many people laugh at the very name of religion, and others while they are ready enough to admit generally, that it is a good thing, yet profess themselves hostile to its being brought prominently forward in connexion with the affairs of life. But convinced as I am that there is no system of sound morals which is not based on the rock of Revelation, I must e'en take my chance, both of the scorn of avowed, and the rebuke of practical, infidelity. Yes! distasteful as it may sound to the ears of some, the man who admitting the evidences of our faith to be complete, yet dares to take that faith as his guide and counsellor, is nothing better than a practical infidel. He is as absurdly inconsistent as the mariner, who having satisfied himself of the use of the compass, yet too proud to be indebted to its assistance, locked it up in his chest so soon as he found himself in the open and shoreless sea. Religion gives us new natures. It controls the passions—directs inclinations, and confines desires into proper and reasonable limits. It makes us conscious of our own errors and shortcomings, and so enables us to bear with our neighbour's weaknesses and failings. It is the parent of every kind and graceful feeling—it restores us to the image of him whose great characteristics are perfection and love. I therefore lay it down as an incontrovertible maxim, that no union can be permanently happy where religion does not intervene. To deny this were to deny the scriptures, which affirm that "every good and perfect gift cometh down from God."

MODE OF PROPOSAL.—A difference of opinion exists, as to whether an offer of marriage should be made through the medium of a third party—in writing—or directly, and in person, to the lady herself. If my advice were craved, I should at once recommend the latter of these courses, and for the reason, videri debet, that it will afford you an opportunity most effectually of judging of the true state of your sweetheart's affections. Supposing her views to be mercenary, it is the easiest thing imaginable for her to indite an answer, glowing with all the enthusiasm of a Heloise—but it is a much more difficult task, to enact or assume passion when face to face. In a personal interview, there are a thousand indescribable little landmarks which may guide you to a knowledge of the true state of matters. The eye then speaks with more verity than the tongue—you may read volumes in a single glance—and there is a free-masonry in the returned pressure of the hand, which is more pregnant with meaning than a whole portfolio of letters.

LITERARY TASTE.—If you wish to know the best of your lady's mind, so far as literature is concerned, let her accompany you to my friend Symington's Emporium, and request her to select from his store of tomes, a volume which may be an appropriate present to your sister. This is a test which will be more effectual, because altogether unsuspected. In acted conversation she might do you Hannah More, but depend upon it she will select her namesake Tom, if she really prefer the one to the other. Probatum est.

THE WIFE A COMPANION.—Make a companion of her in the fullest acceptance of the term, and do not consider it beneath your dignity to mix your conversation to her tastes and intellect. The Price-Current may contain matter vastly pleasing to you, but it is very probable that your young wife would as lief hear you discourse of other matters than the price of cotton or the texture of broadcloth. Study diligently the art of pleasing. Cultivate those thousand and one little nameless attentions, which are so much prized by the female sex, and learn to take an interest in whatever occupies her attention. Do not affect an air of listless tolerating condescension, when she is pointing out the progress of her embroidery, and shun the treason of a yawn as she dwells upon the little details of her domestic government. These hints may seem trifling, but the non-observance of them may be attended with the most perilous results. If we could anatomize the human mind, how frequently would we discover, that the seed from which the upas tree of estrangement hath sprung, is of a scarcely perceptible minuteness. Be as much at home as possible. A pregnant source of discomfort in the nuptial state is unsettled habits of the husband in this respect. Nothing can be more galling, or disheartening to a young wife, after the first few honey-moons have passed, than the frequent absence of her spouse in the evenings. A suspicion is immediately excited in her mind, that the flame of affection begins to burn low, and that she hath lost the power of pleasing, and whenever this feeling occurs, the risk is great, that the visita to please will soon cease to exist. There is no rule without an exception, but, in general, I would hold that a young husband should have few engagements of an evening, where his wife did not accompany him. It is most important to cultivate the habit of domestic sociality, and the fireside will never have any charms if they do not exist at the commencement of a union.

THE SUITOR HUSBAND.—If your union would be permanently happy, endeavor, so far as in you lies, to deport yourself as if still a suitor. Love was the magnet which first drew you to the mistress, let love be the connecting chain which binds you to the wife. I do not mean that a husband should be continually enacting the lover, for this would justly lay you open to the charge of ultra-uxoriousness, and would even lower you in the eyes of your spouse, if a sensible woman, but I would have you ever bear in mind, that affection is the most delicate flower in the moral garden, and is apt to be blighted by the slightest contact with the frost of indifference. "A woman's heart," saith Ludovicus Dolce, "may be kicked unto a tablet of wax—heat softeneth, cold hardeneth it."

DANIEL SCHLESINGER, THE PIANIST.

NUMBER THREE.

MUSICAL YEARS.

"The most important part of any man's performance is the life he has accomplished."—Carlyle.

We have seen how the boy grew and was formed a man; how the child's soul, bred on towards art by the magical voice of the beautiful, with gliding years swelled to the arduous and dignity of a purpose; and how, thus passing through infancy and youth to manhood, Daniel Schlesinger became an artist. He now numbered twenty-seven years of the century with which he entered existence, and was received into spiritual relationship with the great musical family, the descendants of Weber, Beethoven, Mozart, Sebastian Bach, and the kindred spirits who proudly trace their genealogy back to Orpheus, Amphion and Linus. His relation to the world is now changed, and with it the aspect under which he appears before us. The child we watched with tender solicitude, and followed the youth's path with an eye of friendly sympathy. The artist neither needs our partiality nor claims our indulgence. Justice must assign to him his rank among men, and should the verdict prove favourable, their approbation is still requisite to confirm it.

The enthusiastic are apt to prolong the period until which they are entitled to forerunners, and to postpone the season when responsibility begins. They also find in the first hour of emergency that they have been long alone; and in place of friends, cold and inimical voices respond to their call for aid. But the strong-minded, conscious of the burden man has sooner or later to bear, habituate themselves to it early and are strengthened by it, even as the muscles of the pedestrian are braced by the knapsack his shoulders carry up the mountain. Thus the patience he had so often tasked, and the fortitude he had so long worn as an armour, rendered our artist good service in the arena of life—the struggle in which he now found himself engaged single-handed against the competition and the passions of the throng; and where he, who in his preparation time has dreamed of emulation only, finds that the race is a conflict likewise.

During the two years subsequent to the period at which our last number left him, Mr. Schlesinger seems to have given many lessons and to have employed his leisure hours in alternately perfecting himself as an instrumentalist and as a composer. He obtained a more masterly insight into the depths of harmony, and, with breadth of scope, his fancy, acquiring ease and grace, was enabled to clothe itself in those lighter forms, which seem mere sportive ebullitions, and yet are the daughters of Force. His fifth production, a charming rondo, entitled "la Gaieté," was reprinted at Hamburg in 1837, where it became highly popular; and its author had won fresh favour with the London public by his first performance at a concert of the Philharmonic Society—that British Conservatoire, whose inspired orchestra has in turn obeyed the sway of Ries, and of Mendelssohn and where a triumph is matter of European renown. Respecting this, the following extract from a letter of his mother's, dated May, 1837, tells a story equally creditable to Daniel's modesty and talent.

"From a report I have heard, it would seem you have played in public anew with great success. I am indebted for the intelligence to Arnold, whose eye lit upon it in an English newspaper. Already, at your first appearance in public, the tidings of an event destined to cause me so much pleasure, were communicated by Warburg, and some time elapsed ere they received your confirmation. Under similar circumstances it is doubtless more praiseworthy to be modest and silent than to boast, but my good Daniel, we, who all know you, are aware that whatever you may tell us of such things is not for display's sake, but in order to give us pleasure; we must, therefore, rather condemn than praise your silence. . . . Your rondo brilliant is much prized by the musical world here."

A letter from Ries, written at Frankfort in the month of July following, and addressed to Mr. Daniel Schlesinger, composer, likewise alludes to this subject. "I have long expected a line from you," writes he, "and now begin to fear I may have escaped your memory. This should not be. It gives me sincere joy to learn that you are prosperous, are much engaged, and have obtained a well-deserved triumph at the Philharmonic concert. I am little concerned that my refusal to recommend any one save you should have occasioned displeasure, but I do desire you should not forget me. Three years have elapsed since I left England. I have now abandoned my peaceful residence at Godesburg, where I should inevitably have soared. . . . For three months past I have made Frankfort my abode. Its fine theatre and orchestra are great attractions to me; more especially as I am now composing an opera which will produce me both honour and profit, if the public are one half as well pleased with it as my friends are."

After a few remarks respecting his other works, he observes in conclusion, "If I succeed with my opera, I shall henceforth write but little for the piano, because the former is by far the most genial species of composition."

Another letter from the same interesting source, dated thirty-first August, of the same year, throws some light upon Mr. Schlesinger's plans at that period.

After expressing his regret at learning that his pupil was less prosperous than he had imagined, Ries continues, "Your project of leaving England I can nowise applaud. There would be barely a possibility of earning your livelihood here by giving lessons especially during a brief stay. Concert-giving is an unprofitable business, productive of fame and not of money. Our people require, moreover, that in concerts, one should extemporize (fantasieren) and thus perform difficulties. I continue of opinion that you should remain in England. How many are there who have made themselves a respectable name and condition in the metropolis; and who, receiving a guinea, deserve, perhaps, half a crown? Composers have the English none even of respectable mediocrity, and it is not your line to make a business of composition. To successfully achieve great things, you should have tramped at an earlier age through the musical mire.† We have no instance of a man who began so late and yet made notable progress in great works. And even were you to succeed with such compositions, you would not be recompensed in England where they are unavailable. Still less would they produce here, where money is rare and pirating unrestrained, and many a poor devil only writes for the consolation of seeing his name engraved and the remote hope of picking up a chance copper. . . . If, on the contrary, you go on composing lighter pieces, you may earn enough in England to one day withdraw: whilst here, with the greatest trouble, you will lay up nothing. There, at least, with the price of a lesson, you may dine twice or thrice; here you must give three lessons to dine once. I both appreciate and applaud your ambition to advance still further in art, but, as a friend, cannot recommend it to you as a profession. If resolved to quit England, you would do well to choose North or South America, or, as a bachelor, the East Indies. But first reflect upon it long and well. . . . Once more, dear Schlesinger, be of good cheer and proceed undiscouraged. I was whirled about in many a direction from my fourteenth to my twenty-fifth year, before I caught hold of a green branch."

We have been at some pains to reproduce these epistles, because few revelations are as instructive as such sections of a master-spirit's path through life. They afford glimpses of the mortal part, even as the works of such men are illustrations of the diviner portion of their nature. The foregoing letter adds us, moreover, to measure the growth and diffusion of musical taste in European society, as well as the subsequent progress in art of him to whom it was addressed. Thus concert-giving is nowadays become so profitable a business, that Liszt made a triumphal journey through Italy some three years since, delighting with his piano alone the inhabitants of the land of song; and Thalberg, after a season of forty successful concerts in London, went recently to Russia, where we learn he has been gathering laurels and gold. And we shall hereafter find Mr. Schlesinger, as if in exception to the rule his old master lays down, producing works which evince a maturity of genius and a fertility of resources, well calculated, had he lived, to have succeeded in any great musical undertaking.

From the complexion of this epistle, we are led to believe that the discouragement it would seem to argue against on Daniel's part partook far less of disappointment at any lack of employment, than of a growing dissatisfaction with the uneven life of a musical pedagogue in the Great Metropolis. Ambitious of developing the creative power he felt within him, our artist naturally longed for the attention of kindred minds, and for the mutual influences of his native land. The fashionable season, during which a favourite master has seldom an unoccupied hour, had given place to the duller months of the London year, and, instead of the tedious but profitable round of lessons—the weary office of drilling the obstinate fingers, to obey the dull eye and wandering thoughts of the unwilling learner—and of the hurried tramp between distant points of the mighty city, the young composer had leisure to practice, and repose to meditate over the works of the great masters he longed to join on the scroll of fame. These epochs in life are critical. They are periods at which a feather in the balance may cause caprice to preponderate over prudence. They are, also, points from which those who have slackened their pace, often start forward afresh inspired by the impulse of an irrevocable decision—armed with a firmness which has acquired new energy from its triumph over a vacillating purpose.

* This passage will remind the many friends and admirers of the deceased, of his wondrous power in improvisation. He would, indeed, seem to have followed up the suggestion of Ries, for it were impossible to combine more of beauty and of novelty than his impromptu performances displayed. Who of us can forget how he added the strongest attractions of the instrument, attaching every key and measure, becoming fervid with each new effort and pouring forth a thousand irrevocable traits and charms, full of eloquence and of grace?

† This alludes to the six years Mr. Schlesinger lost in the counting-house, and which, Ries seems to think he might have better spent in scoring music paper.

This seems to have been the good fortune of Mr. Schlesinger. Whether he owed it to his old master's counsels, or to a returning sense of the advantages of his position, he pursued his path, during the seven years ensuing, without a deviation or a murmur. Experience had taught him that happiness is but approximate, and lies in the degree of each man's self-adaptation to his calling. It also forbade regret; and we have heard him allude to this busy cycle of his life with the pleasure that all feel in the retrospect of those portions of the past wherewith no sorrow is coupled. "The memorials before us are deficient in information respecting the details of these years of his existence, but it is a beautiful feature in earnest characters like Mr. Schlesinger's, that with imperfect data we may assign to them their position at almost any period of their orbit. His after-productions warrant the belief that, from his reception of the preceding letter until the year 1832, our artist's career was characterized by "the assiduity and study so indispensable," says Dr. Schilling, "to develop and purify genius, to raise it to its highest power and thus render the artist possessed of it truly great."*

A letter from Ries, dated Frankfort, second of May, 1829, confirms this supposition:

"At last," writes he, "I have had the extreme pleasure of receiving some lines from you, and should have made an earlier reply to them but for an indisposition that kept me in bed more than a fortnight. This was succeeded by an inaptitude for work, in spite of which I was compelled to labour at the completion of my new oratorio, which is to be executed at Pentecost, at the Rheinish festival, by four hundred amateur musicians. It is now finished, and satisfies my highest hopes; I leave this in a week to superintend its rehearsal. I rejoice, dearest friend, that you are contented and have a still happier perspective before you. My sincere thanks for the interest you take in my opera. Miserable cabals unfortunately still retard its representation, although many persons found no seats at either of the three first performances. . . . I think of shortly commencing another; it interests me more than piano music. Continue to compose with assiduity. When the happy moments come, beware of allowing them to escape you without profiting by them."

A letter from the same at Aix la Chapelle in the month of July following, is addressed to our artist at Elberfeld—where, from an endorsement on the back, he appears to have received it. Of this visit to the continent, which was probably made to his mother and to his old master, we have discovered no other record. It must, however, have been a brief one, as we find him in London in the autumn.

It has occurred to us that the autobiographies of Gibbon and Alfieri, of Goldoni and Benvenuto Cellini, and the various lives of great men from Cardinal de Retz down to Scott, derive much of that charm which their admirers find in them so superior to romances, from the character of the existences they record. What person of taste would not gladly lead such a life? So rare an exception to the great humanitarian law of incomplete earthly bliss! There are enviable passages in the lives of most men, and such traits have not been wanting in our artist's. But of the seven years we now describe what more shall be said? They were devoted to labour. "You who earn your bread by the sweat of your brow, and who find in social intercourse and in the cultivation of the affections, the consolation of leisure hours, or in intellectual pursuits their recreation, are living now as he then lived."

Enjoying the highest consideration among his professional brethren, and meeting with admiration and respect from a choice circle of friends, Mr. Schlesinger moved on a keen observer of the phases in public taste, and of the progressive tendencies of musical art. At the theatre, the concert, the festival, the artistic reunion and the houses of the great, the talent which brought him there made him known to the musical "illustrations" of his day—to the prima donna, the solo player and the composer—to Malibran and Pasta, to Paganini and to Rossini. He also enjoyed the friendship of poor Weber, to whose funeral, in one of the three carriages that escorted the ill-fated maestro to his grave, the writer remembers hearing him say he accompanied Kreisler, the violinist, who a few weeks after followed his illustrious compatriot to the tomb.

During this interval he appears to have become a still more efficient member of the Philharmonic Society, at another of whose concerts, a letter of a brother pianist, Louis Wotter, to one of his friends, mentions the loud and deserved applause that greeted Mr. Schlesinger's performance of Hummel's splendid concerto in B minor.

* Versuch einer Philosophie des Schönen in der Musik.

This took place in 1829, and we believe that no more graphic description of his skill can be furnished to the artist than the testimony of all who heard him play it, to the lightness of touch and the infinite grace and expression with which he executed the Legato passages in the Rondo of that magnificent production. Indeed he was a born interpreter of Hummel's music, and, though adequate to the unembarrassed performance of the most appalling combinations of Henselt and Thalberg, he seemed to commune with the spirit of the Weimar Pianist more gladly than with any masters, excepting Beethoven, and, perhaps, Sebastian Bach.

At the expiration of these seven years of labour, our artist resolved to make, with the fruit of his economies, the calm and earnest pilgrimage to the continent, he had been constrained to postpone so long. He accordingly left London for Hamburg, on the twenty-second of June, 1832, and revisited the scenes of his childhood, with mingled pleasure and pride. His friends received him with a warmth of affection far from being diminished by the long separation which now enhanced the charm of his presence; and he appeared before his townsmen with a title to their regard, which his brother Arnold's letter, already cited, authorizes us to believe they were willing to acknowledge. "It had reached them, from London, that Daniel Schlesinger was a great artist;" nor did this require the confirmation of Paris, of Vienna, or of the other capitals alluded to in that document. Was he not there in person to give evidence of his prowess? Contrary, however, to the usual custom of the distinguished members of his profession, Mr. Schlesinger travelled as an amateur, without giving concerts by the way-side; though, had such been his pleasure, the examples of great artists were his precedents, and, in every town and village of his native land the inhabitants assemble at the summons of each new apostle of art, and lend an attentive ear to his revelation. But, in his modesty, our artist journeyed to receive, and not to impart. Treading the soil hallowed by the memories of Bach and Handel, of Mozart, Weber and Beethoven, he shrank from disturbing the echoes their names and works still arouse, and was, perhaps, also silent because he aspired one day to claim something of the deference he felt for their genius. His, therefore, was no hasty tour, but a gentle communion with bings and thoughts he had longed to see and know. After a sojourn of two months in his native town, we find him at Berlin towards the end of August. He there met his old friend Mendelssohn Bartholdy, several of whose letters, now before us, breathe a sincere affection and unfeigned respect for the brother artist, now no more. The Prussian capital was then the musical focus of the north. Spontini directed its opera, which still glories in the vocal powers of Madame Seidler; and Zelter had not yet followed Goethe to the tomb.

In omitting to mention an additional diploma that Mr. Schlesinger carried with him to his native land, we should be inexcusably forgetful. This was the Quatuor in C major—his fourteenth work. He had been a diligent composer since the appearance of the Allegro di Bravoura—and, to various successful productions, remarks was not numbered—and, to various successful productions for the pianoforte, he now added this admirable effort, and judiciously designed it for the land which was both his own, and the one best qualified to estimate its merits. It was offered to Messrs. Breitkopf and Hartel, of Leipzig, where the author arrived toward the close of September. The numerous master-pieces of this class, among the works of Mozart, Beethoven, and all the great instrumental composers, render the publication of a new quatuor hazardous for the modern author, as in order of composition is not so far removed from the Symphony—or Musical Piece—as might be imagined. But our artist had not overrated his performance, which met with remarkable success, and proved a great accession to his fame. His resolution to waive the privilege of his profession did not deter him from affording great pleasures to the amateurs of Leipzig, where, though he gave no concert, his chamber performances gained him much consideration; and his new production was eagerly purchased, and instantly put in hand by the well-known publisher of so many of Haydn's works. The proof-sheets were forwarded to him at Vienna, where he reached toward the close of the year, after having passed a happy month in Dresden, and tarried a few weeks at Prague, then the rival of the sister capital, and now her superior in musical culture, since the death of Keyser Franz.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

THE FROZEN PROPHET OF SEVILLAN.

MR. MORIER, in his volume of travels entitled "A Second Journey through Persia," etc., mentions, although somewhat skeptically, a circumstance which has since been authenticated as a fact by a British officer. The distinguished plenipotentiary says:—"The mountain of Sevilan is held in high veneration by the Persians, who relate that in one of the snowy chasms at its summit is to be seen the dead body of a man always frozen, but in the highest state of preservation, (with the exception of one tooth and a part of the beard,) and which they believed to have belonged to a prophet, or prophet, whose name the mountain retains to this day. Although this story is in every one's mouth, and confirmed with assurances that many have seen the body, yet we never met with any one person who had himself seen it. We rather lowered what in their estimation is a miracle, by informing them that bodies of any description will preserve entire as long as they remain frozen, and that they had only to seek the frozen market at Petersburg to convince themselves of the fact." The statement of animal bodies being preserved from decay if enshrined in ice, is a well-ascertained truth. The body of a mammoth or fossil elephant was found entire in an iceberg in Siberia about the beginning of this century. As the animal belongs to a race now long extinct, it had certainly remained there many thousand years, how many it would be vain to conjecture. No better proof, therefore, can be afforded of the antiseptic properties of ice; and so far we were prepared to credit the truth of what the Persians asserted regarding their deceased prophet. But all doubt upon the subject has been removed by Captain Shee, of the Madras infantry, who, in a letter to Colonel Monteith, thus describes his visit to the tomb:

"After a ride of fifteen miles, we reached a camp of Illiats, and had not long been seated before we perceived a party descending, which proved to be the Mulla Bashi of Tehran and Ali Khan, who had been sent by order of the king. They told us it was not worth our while to ascend, as there was nothing to see, and the difficulties were very great. From their fresh appearance we much doubted their having reached the summit, and determined on the following day at least to endeavour to accomplish our object. Two hours before daylight we mounted our horses, with two guides, and rode for six miles, when we were obliged to leave them, and proceeded on foot. The mountain did not appear very difficult, but we soon found our mistake. After surmounting four distinct ranges, every one of which led us on, in hopes of being the last, we reached the summit by the east-south-east side at eleven, a. m., having been walking five hours; our guide, an old man of seventy years of age, being the first. On the top of the mountain we found a tomb, consisting of stones, neatly put together, and covered, except at one end, where a few stones had been removed to look at the body. In it we found the skeleton of a man lying with his head and body inclining to the right side, (turning towards Mecca,) the front half of the skull, the left collar-bone, the left arm, from the shoulder to the elbow, with four ribs on the left side, were alone visible: some dried flesh and pieces of the winding-sheet were still adhering to the skeleton. The remainder of the body was buried in ice and earth. The skull was perfect, except some of the front teeth, which were lying about the tomb; twenty teeth are still in their places, perfectly even, and beautifully white. There appears no doubt that before the stones were removed, the body was perfect, and that the remainder, which is buried in the ice, is still so. Having satisfied our curiosity, we proceeded to see an extraordinary stone, out of which (the Persians say) oil is distilled, and at a hole in the top a diamond is seen. After crossing about a mile of snow and ice on the summit of the mountain, we came to an amphitheatre of about six hundred yards in circumference, containing a pond of the purest water; the sides were covered with snow, and long pendant icicles gave the whole a beautiful appearance. To the right of the pool, a little higher up, was a cleared spot with a wall about three feet high, enclosing a space of three feet in height by four in length, over which a quantity of oil appeared to have been poured; in its centre was a hole, which had the appearance of being used as a lamp, and in it a piece of lead to hold a wick, which the Persians had called a diamond. Numbers of offerings were placed round it. Near it was another stone, with some rude letters cut on it. From the appearance of the place, I concluded that at some period of the year the Illiats frequent this spot, and perform some religious ceremonies, making the stone the lamp. It took us three hours and a half to reach the place where we left our horses. We returned to the camp we had before left, perfectly persuaded that the Mulla Bashi had never ascended the mountain. Water boiled at one hundred and eighty-eight degrees Fahrenheit; the temperature in the tomb was exactly the freezing point."

We have quoted the passage entire, both because it is interesting in itself, and because it proves that the mountain of Sevilan is, or has been, a scene consecrated to religious rites. The temperature at which water boils indicates an altitude of nearly thirteen thousand feet above the level of the ocean. It is situated in about latitude thirty-eight degrees twelve minutes, rather more than a degree east from the shores of the Caspian sea, in the province of Azerbaijan. It is much higher than any other elevation in this territory, with the exception of the celebrated Mount Ararat. Sevilan appears to have been a volcano, there being many indications of the fact, although the remains of any crater are no longer visible. There are four distinct peaks or summits which closely resemble each other, and may, at a distance, be mistaken one for another. All round its base are warm springs, but none of them with a heat above one hundred and four degrees, which is far below the temperature of many other thermal fountains. With regard to the individual whose remains have been deposited in this singular cemetery, our travellers are silent. He was no doubt, one of those impostors, so numerous in countries where the Mohammedan religion prevails, who lay claim to the divine afflatus, and who seldom fail in securing a creditable body of supporters. Whether it was a desire of his own to be so interred, or whether it was an afterthought of his followers, we are not informed. The Illiats here mentioned are wandering races of Persia, constituting, it is supposed, about one fourth of the whole population of the country. They form almost a distinct class by the nature of their habits, which are migratory, and by their modes of gaining their livelihood. They are distributed into a number of distinct tribes, who keep entirely separate from one another, like the Highland clans of old.

THE ALDERMAN'S FUNERAL.

BY ROBERT SOUTHEY.

Stranger. Whom are they ushering from the world, with all this pageantry and long parade of death?

Townsmen. A long parade, indeed, sir; and yet here you see but half; round yonder bend it reaches

A farther farther, carriage behind carriage.

Stranger. It is but a mournful sight, and yet the pomp

Tempts me to stand a gazer.

Townsmen. Yonder schoolboy,

Who plays the traunt, says, the proclamation Of peace was nothing to the show; and even

The chairing of the members at election Would not have been a finer sight than this,

Only that red and green are prettier colours Than all this mourning. Thee, sir, you behold

One of the red-gown'd worthies of the city, The envy and the boast of our exchange,

Ay, who was worth, last week, a good half million, Screw'd down in yonder hearse.

Stranger. Then he was born Under a lucky planet, I may say—

Put mourning on for his inheritance

Townsmen. When first I heard his death, that very wish Leap'd to my lips; but now the closing scenes

Of the comedy hath wak'd wiser thoughts: And I bless God, that when I go to the grave, There will not be the weight of wealth like this To sink me down.

Stranger. The camel and the needle— Is that, then, in your mind?

Townsmen. Even so. The text Is gospel wisdom. I would ride the camel— Yea, leap him flying, through the needle's eye. As easily as such a pumper'd soul Could pass the narrow gate.

Stranger. Your pardon, sir, But sure this lack of Christian charity Looks not like Christian truth.

Townsmen. Your pardon, too, sir, If with this text before, I should feel In the preaching mood! But for these barren fig-trees, With all their flourish and their leafiness, We have been told their destiny and use, When the axe is laid unto the root, and they Cumber the earth no longer.

Stranger. Was his wealth Stored fraudfully, the spoil of orphans wronged, And widows who had none to plead their right?

Townsmen. All honest, open, honourable gains, Fair legal interest, bonds and mortgages, Ships to the east and west.

Stranger. Why judge you, then, So hardly of the dead?

Townsmen. For what he left Undone—for sins not one of which is mention'd In the ten commandments. He, I warrant him, Believed no other gods than those of the creed.

Bowed to no idols—but his money-bags: Swore no false oaths, except at the custom-house:

Kept the sabbath idle: built a monument To honour his dead father: did no murder:

Never pick'd pockets: never bore false witness; And never with dishonestly-acquired wealth, Coveted his neighbour's house, nor ox, nor ass.

Stranger. You know him, then, it seems.

Townsmen. As all men know The virtues of your hundred-thousanders; They never hide their lights beneath a bushel.

Stranger. Nay, nay, uncharitable sir! far often Doth bounty like a streamlet flow unseen, Fresh'ning and giving life along its source.

Townsmen. We track the streamlet by the brighter green And livelier growth it gives; but as for this— The rains of heaven engender'd nothing in it But slime and foul corruption.

Stranger. Yet even these Are reservoirs, whence public charity Still keeps her channels full.

Townsmen. Now, sir, you touch Upon the point. This man of half a million Had all these good things which you praise;

But the poor man rung never at his door; And the old beggar at the public gate, Who, all the summer long, stands hat in hand,

He knew how vain it was to lift an eye To that hard face. Yet he was always found Among your ten, and twenty pound subscribers,

His benefactors in the newspapers. His alms were money put to interest

In the other world, donations to keep open A running-charity account with heaven:

Retaining fees against the last assizes, Writs, for the trusted talents, strict account

Shall be required from all, and the old arch lawyer Plead his own cause as plaintiff.

Stranger. I must needs Believe you, sir; these are your witnesses, These mourners here, who from their carriages

Gape at the gaping crowd. A good March wind Were to be prayed for now, to lend their eyes

Some decent rhum. The very hireling mute Bears not a face blanker of all emotion

Than the old servant of the family! How can this man have lived, that thus his death Cost not the soiling of one white handkerchief!

Townsmen. Who should lament for him, sir, in whose heart Love had no place, nor natural charity!

The parlour spaniel, when she heard his step, Stole slowly from the hearth, and stole aside

With creeping pace; she never raised her eyes To woo kind words from him, nor had her head

Upraised upon his knee, with fondling whine. How could it be but thus? Arithmetic

Was the sole science he was ever taught. The multiplication-table was his creed,

His paternoster and his decalogue. When yet he was a boy, and should have breathed

The open air and sunshine of the fields, To give his blood its natural spring and play,

He in a close and dusty counting-house, Smoke-dried, and sear'd, and shrivell'd up his heart,

So, from the way in which he was train'd up, His feet departed not; he toil'd and toil'd,

Poor muckworm! through his threescore years and ten, And when the earth shall now be shovell'd on him,

If that which sear'd him for a soul were still Within its husk, 'twould still be dirt to dirt.

Stranger. Yet your next newspapers will blazon him For industry and honourable wealth;

A bright example. Townsmen. Even half a million Gets him no other praise. But come this way

Some twelvemonths hence, and you will find his virtues Truly set forth in lapidary lines. Faith with her torch beside, and little Cupids

Dropping upon his urn their marble tears.

INDIAN TALES AND LEGENDS.

THE RED LOVER.

BY H. R. SCHOOLCRAFT.

MANY years ago there lived a warrior on the banks of Lake Superior, whose name was Wawanosh. He was the chief of an ancient family of his tribe, who had preserved the line of chieftainship unbroken from a remote time, and he consequently cherished a pride of ancestry. To the reputation of birth he added the advantages of a tall and commanding person, and the dazzling qualities of personal strength, courage, and activity. His bow was noted for its size, and the feats he had performed with it. His counsel was sought as much as his strength was feared, so that he came to be equally regarded as a hunter, a warrior, and a counselor. He had now passed the meridian of his days, and the term AKKEE-WAIZEE, i. e., one who has been long on the earth, was applied to him.

Such was Wawanosh, to whom the united voice of the nation awarded the first place in their esteem, and the highest authority in council. But distinction, it seems, is apt to engender haughtiness in the hunter state as well as civilized life. Pride was his ruling passion, and he clung with tenacity to the distinctions which he regarded as an inheritance.

Wawanosh had an only daughter, who had now lived to witness the budding of the leaves of the eighteenth spring. Her father was not more celebrated for his deeds of strength than she for her gentle virtues, her slender form, her full beaming hazel eyes, and her dark flowing hair.

"And through her cheek
The blush would make its way, and all but speak,
The sunken blood suffused her neck, and threw
O'er her clear brow a lurid hue,
Like coral reddening through the darter's wave,
Which draws the diver to the crimson cave."

Her hand was sought by a young man of humble parentage, who had no other merits to recommend him but such as might arise from a tall and commanding person, a manly step, and an eye beaming with the tropical fires of youth and love. These were sufficient to attract the favorable notice of the daughter, but were by no means satisfactory to the father, who sought an alliance more suitable to the rank and the high pretensions of his family.

"Listen to me, young man," he replied to the trembling hunter, who had sought the interview, "and be attentive to my words. You ask me to bestow upon you my daughter, the chief solace of my age, and my choicest gift from the Master of Life. Others have asked of me this boon, who were as young, as active, and as ardent as yourself. Some of these persons have had better claims to become my son-in-law. Have you reflected upon the deeds which have raised me in authority, and made my name known to the enemies of my nation? Where is there a chief who is not proud to be considered the friend of Wawanosh? Where, in all the land, is there a hunter who has excelled Wawanosh? Where is there a warrior who can boast the taking of an equal number of scalps? Besides, have you not heard that my fathers came from the East, bearing the marks of chieftaincy?"

"And what, young man, have you to boast? Have you ever met your enemies in the field of battle? Have you ever brought home a trophy of victory? Have you ever proved your fortune by suffering protracted pain, enduring continued hunger, or sustaining great fatigue? Is your name known beyond the humble limits of your native village? Go, then, young man, and earn a name for yourself. It is none but the brave that can ever hope to claim an alliance with the house of Wawanosh."

The intimidated lover departed, but he resolved to do a deed that should render him worthy of the daughter of Wawanosh, or die in the attempt. He called together several of his young companions and equals in years, and imparted to them his design of conducting an expedition against the enemy, and requested their assistance. Several embraced the proposal immediately; others were soon brought to acquiesce; and, before ten suns set, he saw himself at the head of a formidable party of young warriors, all eager, like himself, to distinguish themselves in battle. Each warrior was armed, according to the custom of the period, with a bow and a quiver of arrows, tipped with flint or Jasper. He carried a sack or wallet, provided with small quantities of parched and pounded corn, mixed with pemican or maple sugar. He was furnished with a Pugganung, or war-club of hard wood, fastened to a gristle of deer-skin, and a stone or copper knife. In addition to this, some carried the ancient shemagun, or lance, a smooth pole about a fathom in length, with a javelin of flint, firmly tied on with deer's skin sinews. Thus equipped, and each warrior painted in a manner to suit his fancy, and ornamented with appropriate feathers, they repaired to the spot appointed for the war-dance.

A level, grassy plain extended for nearly a mile from the lodge of Wawanosh, along the lake-shore. Lodges of bark were promiscuously interspersed over this green, and here and there a cluster of trees, or a solitary tall pine. A belt of yellow sand skirted the lake-shore in front, and a tall, thick forest formed the background. In the centre of this plain stood a high shattared pine, with a clear space about, renowned as the scene of the war-dance time out of mind. Here the youths assembled, with their tall and graceful leader, distinguished by the feathers of the bald eagle, which he wore on his head. A bright fire of pine wood blazed upon the green. He led the men several times around this fire, with a measured and solemn chant. Then suddenly halting, the war-whistle was raised, and the dance immediately began. An old man, sitting at the head of the ring, beat time upon the drum, while several of the older warriors shook their rattles, and "ever and anon" made the woods re-echo the war-note. Each warrior chanted alternately the verse of a song, all the rest joining in chorus.

FIRST VOICE.

The eagles scream on high,
They whist their feathered wings;
Rattle—the battle cry,
The flame our leaders seek.

SECOND.

'Tis fate, my soul desires,
By deeds of martial strife;
O'er-comes me warlike fires,
Or take—at last my life.

THIRD VOICE.

The deer a while may roam
Unhunted o'er the heath,
For now I seek a nobler foe,
And prize a nobler death.

FOURTH VOICE.

Lance and quiver, club and bow
Now alone attract my sight;
I will go where warriors go,
I will fight where warriors fight.

Thus they continued the dance, with short intermissions, for two successive days and nights. Sometimes the village seer, who led the ceremony, would embrace the occasion of a pause to address them with words of encouragement.

In the dreamy hours of night
I beamed the bloody fight,
As reclined upon my bed,
Holy visions crowned my head;
High our guardian spirit bright
Stood above the dreadful fight;
Beaming eye and dazzling brand
Gazed upon my chosen band,
While a blizz and awful shade
Over the faithless women spread.
Soon they warred, sunk, and fled,
Leaving wounded, dying, dead.
While my gallant warriors high
Waved their trophies in the sky.

At every recurrence of this kind, new energy was infused into the dance, and the warriors renewed their gesticulations, and stamped upon the ground, as if they were trampling their enemies under their feet.

FIFTH VOICE.

Now my heart with valor burns,
I my lance in fury shake;
He who falls, he who turns,
Give him face, fire, and state.

SIXTH VOICE.

See my visage scarred and red—
See my brows with trophies bright—
Such the bows that warriors dread,
Such the trophies of the fight.

At length the prophet uttered his final prediction of success; and the warriors dropping off, one by one, from the fire, each sought his way to the place appointed for the rendezvous, on the confines of the enemy's country. Their leader was not among the last to depart, but he did not leave the village without seeking an interview with the daughter of Wawanosh. He disclosed to her his firm determination never to return, unless he could establish his name as a warrior. He told her of the pangs he had felt at the bitter reproaches of her father, and declared that his soul spurned the imputation of effeminacy and cowardice implied by his language. He avowed that he never could be happy, either with or without her, until he had proved to the whole tribe the strength of his heart, which is the Indian term for courage. He said that his dreams had not been prophetic, but he should not cease to invoke the power of the Great Spirit. He repeated his protestations of inviolable attachment, which she returned, and, pledging vows of mutual fidelity, they parted.

All she ever heard from her lover after this interview was brought by one of his successful warriors, who said that he had distinguished himself by the most heroic bravery, but, at the close of the fight, he had received an arrow in his breast. The enemy fled, leaving many of their warriors dead on the field. On examining the wound, it was perceived to be entirely beyond their power to cure. They carried him towards home a day's journey, but he languished and expired in the arms of his friends. From the moment the report was received, no smile was ever seen in the once happy lodge of Wawanosh. His daughter pined away by day and by night. Tears and sighs, sorrow and lamentation, were heard continually. Nothing could restore her lost serenity of mind. Persuasions and reproofs were alternately employed, but employed in vain. She would seek a sequestered spot, where she would sit under a shady tree, and sing her mournful laments for hours together.

It was not long before a small bird, of beautiful plumage, flew upon the tree under which she usually sat, and, with its sweet and artless notes, seemed to respond to her voice. It was a bird of strange character, such as had not before been observed. It came every day and sang, remaining until dark. Her fond imagination soon led her to suppose it was the spirit of her lover, and her visits were repeated with greater frequency. She passed her time in fasting, and singing her plaintive songs. Thus she pined away, until that death she so fervently desired came to her relief. After her decease, the bird was never more seen, and it became a popular opinion that this mysterious bird had flown away with her spirit.

But bitter tears of regret fell in the lodge of Wawanosh. Too late he regretted his false pride and his harsh treatment of the noble youth.

LADY JANE GREY.—The library of Zurich boasts the possession of three letters of this lady to Heinrich Bultinger, one written in Latin in a very fine Italian hand; the others in German, and all signed with her name. The accounts handed down to us of the beauty, grace, talents, and extraordinary acquirements of this lovely and unfortunate being, never made so deep an impression upon me, as while looking at her beautiful penmanship. I seemed to see her, as her preceptor Roger Ascham found and described her, (when he paid her an unexpected visit,) reading Plato, while the rest of the family were occupied with the chase in the park. Her gentle voice seemed to sound in my ear, uttering those words in answer to his inquiry, of why she also was not engaged in the sports:

"The sports they are enjoying, are but as a shadow, compared to the pleasure which I derive from the sublime author I am perusing." The rare union of such remarkable personal beauty, piety, modesty and profound erudition, at a period when learning was a sealed well to her sex, would always have rendered Lady Jane Grey the most interesting female character of her day. But her tragical death, and the fortitude with which she met it, stamp her as a heroine in the most and most exalted sense of the word. It was remarked by one of our party, that had Lady Jane Grey been less young, her accomplishments and misfortunes would have excited a less warm degree of sympathy in our minds. I am afraid there was more truth in the observation than reason is willing to acknowledge. But we are all, more or less, the slaves to externals; youth and beauty must have their influence; and works that, by their freshness, prove how recently they have been created by the All-powerful hand that creates all, must have more attractions than those which have been so long fashioned, as to have lost the traces of their divine origin. Had Mary Stuart bowed her head to the block some ten or fifteen years sooner, ere yet its silken honours had been blanched by the ruthless hand of time, how much more sympathy would her faith have called forth! Alas! for old beauties! they must abdicate in time.—Editor of Italy.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

FIRST GRIEF.

They tell me, first and early love
Outlives all after-dreams;
But the memory of a first great grief
To me more lasting seems;
The grief that marks our dawning youth
To memory ever clings,
And o'er the path of future years
A lengthen'd shadow flings.

Oh, oft my mind recalls the hour,
When to my father's home
Death came—an uninvited guest—
From his dwelling in the tomb!
I had not seen his face before—
I shudder'd at the sight
And I shudder still to think upon
The anguish of that night!

A youthful brow and ruddy cheek
Became all cold and wan—
An eye grew dim in which the light
Of radiant fancy shone.
Cold was the cheek, and cold the brow.
The eye was fix'd and dim;
And one there mourn'd a brother dead,
Who would have died for him!

I know not if 'twas summer then,
I know not if 'twas spring,
But if the birds sang on the trees,
I did not hear them sing.
If flowers came forth to deck the earth,
Their bloom I did not see—
I looked upon one wither'd flower,
And none else bloom'd for me!

A sad and silent time it was Within that house of woe,
All eyes were dull and overcast,
And every voice was low!
And from each cheek at intervals
The blood appeared to start,
As if recall'd in sudden haste,
To aid the sinking heart!

Softly we trode, as if afraid
To mar the sleeper's sleep,
And stole last looks of his pale face,
For memory to keep
With him the agony was o'er,
And now the world was drear,
As thoughts of his sweet childhood rose
Like odour from dead flowers!

And when at last he was borne afar
From the world's weary strife,
How oft in thought did we again
Live o'er his little life!
His every look—his every word—
His very voice's tone—
Came back to us like things whose worth
Is only prized when gone!

The grief has pass'd with years away,
And joy has been my lot;
But the one is oft remember'd,
And the other soon forgot.
The gayest hours trip lightest by,
And leave the faintest trace;
But the deep, deep track that sorrow wears,
No time can ever efface!

VISIT TO JERUSALEM.

Leaving the "Garden of Gethsemane," we traversed a steep path which ascended from the bed of the brook Cedron to the summit of the Mount of Olives. Numerous olive-trees were scattered along the sides of the declivity, and around a mosque and convent, which crown the lofty eminence. We hurried impatiently to the highest point, and then, turning to the westward, a magnificent panoramic view of the whole of Jerusalem and of the surrounding country suddenly burst upon our sight.

The present city, with its churches, mosques, houses, gardens, and fortifications, lay extended immediately below, and the eye took in, at a bird's-eye view, every house and street, and almost every yard of ground. The scene was certainly very imposing, and the appearance of the city, with its domes and cupolas and the minarets of the mosques, as from this point of view quite magnificent. The first objects which strike the eye are the two magnificent mosques occupying the site of Solomon's temple. The one on the north is the celebrated mosque of Omar; that on the south is the Mosque El Aksa. They are close to that portion of the city walls which immediately borders on the Mount of Olives, and with the courts, porticos, and gardens attached to them, they occupy a fourth part of the whole place, and present a most imposing appearance. The town rises gradually above these, and the most prominent object beyond is the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, with its two domes of striking aspect; the one being white, and the other almost black. Here and there a lofty tower or a tapering minaret rises above the gloomy stone houses of the natives. Of these the lofty tower or minaret, said to be built on the site of the house of Pilate, with its galleries and Sarsenic decorations, appears most prominently to the eye, and the minarets of Ben Israel, of the Seraglio, and the one said to be placed on the site of Herod's palace. Most of the private dwellings were covered with low domes, and my intelligent cicerone pointed out to me the different churches and convents, and a long range of stone buildings surmounted by small cupolas, which he said was a college of dervishes.

Altogether the city, as seen from the summit of the Mount of Olives, may be ranked as one of the finest of Oriental cities in its external aspect. A long line of battlemented walls, with their towers and gates, extends the whole way round the town, and a few cypresses and other trees throw up their leafy branches amid the porticos and gates of the mosques.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

THE DRAMA.

Theatricals—Revival of Henry the Fifth—Madam Vestris—New plays—Power—Tagliani.

In my last letter on theatricals, I took rather a doleful view of the state of affairs and of the rapid declension of the stage; and there has not anything occurred since to alter any opinion there expressed. True, Macready seems determined that his managerial career shall close in a blaze of glory—but it will soon close, and then the darkness will be but the more dense. He has brought out Henry the Fifth, as the last of his series of Shakespearian revivals, in a way which renders any attempt to convey an idea of it by description hopeless. It would repay a trip across the Atlantic to look at it. Leaving poetry and Shakspeare out of the question, as a sight it is better worth seeing than the Coronation, and is altogether without a parallel in the history of the stage. Expense seems no more to have been thought of than in the providing of a supper for an Hellogabalus. The result is, a succession of grand, glowing, gorgeous, and truthful effects, regulated and chastened by the most refined and correct taste, such as has never before been exhibited in a British, or, perhaps, any other theatre, and such as it is not likely will be either surpassed or equalled in our day or generation. Nothing appears to have been too high for the manager's aim, or too low for his notice, in his anxiety to produce a perfect whole. The attention to minutiae is surprising. Even the supernumeraries are instinct with life, and seem to have an idea what they are about. Can praise go higher? The name of the man who drilled them ought to be given to posterity. He must indeed be a "modern Prometheus."

The principal novelty was five dioramic views by Stanfield, as an accompaniment or illustration of the "Chorus" in the character of "Time." These views were splendid. True, the physical impossibility was the same as ever of making

"A cockpit hold
The vasty fables of France," or of cramming within a

"Wooden O, the very casques
That did affront the air at Agincourt."

Yet, nevertheless, such help was afforded by the artist's aid, as rendered the calls upon the imagination of the audience to "piece out" the theatre's "imperfections with their thoughts," much less onerous than formerly, when half-a-dozen ragamuffins on either side of the stage represented the greatness of France and the puissance of England.

Yet amid the storm of applause which has attended this revival, one or two spiculate critics from, it is to be supposed, a desire for singularity, or even less creditable motives, have affected to think that because after all is done demands upon the fancy are still required to a certain extent, it would have been as well to have let things go on in their old course, and to have remained content with the squabbling of the aforesaid half-dozen ragamuffins on either side, and the beating of a drum, as a notification of the sign of Harfleur or the battle of Agincourt. This is sheer folly. Because we cannot, from the nature of things, have all, are we to recede with equal complacency the reddest sketch and the nearest approach to perfection? Why, then, not at once go back to Theophrastus and his cart! Why not go to the other extreme of the proposition, and have two ragged little boys come on as the army of "great France" or even one little urchin labelled "England." How deeply Shakspeare himself deplored the absence of the accessories of his art, is to be found scattered here and there throughout his works, and nowhere in those works is the want of those accessories more forcibly lamented than in the "Chorus" of which we are speaking. As a prelude to the fourth act, he exclaims—

"And so our scene must to the battle fly,
Where (O for pity!) we shall much disgrace
With four or five most vile and ragged foils,
Right ill-disposed, in brags, rebuffs,
The name of Agincourt; yet, sit still and see;
Minding true things by what their mockeries do."

And in the beginning of the chorus to Act III., how earnestly does he appeal to the audience to picture to themselves the picture which has been so splendidly realized on the present occasion.

"Suppose that you have seen
The well-appointed king at Hampton pier
Emark his royalty; and his brave fleet
With silken streamers the young Phobus fanning,
Play with your fancy; and in them behold,
Upon the hump-backed ship-boy's cumbering,
Hear the shrill whistle, which do order give
To scenes confused: behold the threaten sails,
Borne with the invisible and creping wind,
Draw the huge bottoms through the furrow'd sea,
Breasting the lofty surge. O, do but think,
You stand upon the rivars, and behold
A city on the inconstant billows dancing;
For so appears this fleet magical,
Holding due course to Harfleur. Follow, follow!
Groping your minds to strange of this navy,
And leave your England."

The execution of this picture displays first-rate talent throughout; but the conception of it is close, where the invading fleet approaches the devoted land of France and the effect of an ominous red sunset, almost approaches genius.

The house has been crowded in every nook and cranny, night after night, to witness this rare performance, and the respective audiences have left the theatre in a perfect delirium of enthusiasm. I have alluded to it at greater length than may, perchance, be acceptable to your readers, as the scenery, machinery, and "getting up" of the whole cannot easily be transported across the Atlantic. Criticisms upon, or notices of, actors and actresses are a different matter, because, though here to-day, the next steambath may transport them to New-York; but my excuse, in the present instance, must be that the revival of Henry the Fifth stands alone in the history of the stage.

It is said that Madam Vestris, who succeeds Macready in the management of Covent Garden, (Mr. Mathews appears to be a man of straw in the affair,) has to do for comely what her predecessor has effected for tragedy. We doubt this much. Indeed, it may be pretty safely predicated that Shakspeare and the "raglar" drama stands but a poor chance for some time to come. Madam herself is no great Shakspearian. She has acquired the principal portion of her fame in burlettas, operas, and extravaganzas, and it would be expecting too much from human nature to suppose that the lady (a spoiled pet of the public, and with a consequently morbid craving for applause) should throw those matters on the shelf, and bring forth sterling plays for the glorification of rival actresses. Doubtless a few attempts will be made to give a character to the management, and to preserve the appearance of impartiality in not monopolizing all the leading characters, but, upon the whole, it may be presumed, that it will be—exit Shakspeare, and enter Messrs. Peake, Moncrieff, Dance, Buckstone, etc. etc. It is scarcely fair, however, to condemn Madam untried; but should my surmises prove incorrect, I will lose no time in acknowledging the same.

Among the on duty it is said that Macready, after resigning the managerial sceptre, and resting a while from his labours, will commence an engagement at the Haymarket Theatre, where he will appear in a new play by Serle, the actor, which has been for some time in preparation, entitled the "Spanish Maiden." The title has rather a guerilla sound, and doubtless the incidents will be startling and the scenery mountainous.

Bulwer too, who seems to have fairly forsaken the novel for the drama, (there is no resisting the pleasurable intoxication consequent upon being a successful dramatist,) has, it is said, another drama in preparation. If it be received with the same degree of favour which has been bestowed upon the "Lady of Lyons," and "Richelieu," Sir Edward will, doubtless, witness its representation with a marvellous deal of self-satisfaction. And why not?

Charles Kean and Power are about to migrate westward. The latter gentleman has purchased about one thousand dollars worth of pictures this season at the "Society of British Artists." This deserves to be recorded. Mr. Power has been very and deservedly successful, and he appears to make a liberally judicious use of the "goods the gods provide him."

The "poetry of motion," alias Tagliani, is at present floating in the atmosphere of the Italian Opera House. A London paper, with reference to her, indulges in the following somewhat nonsensical strain of eulogium:—"A feather from the wing of a bird of Paradise—a rose-leaf floating on the wind—a butterfly upon a carnation (query—why carnation?)—a swallow skimming over the surface of a lake—are all emblems of lightness and beauty—but Tagliani is lightness and beauty itself!" But mark the pendant to those light and ethereal fancies—"She is improved in appearance, and, as we fancy, a little stouter!" The enthusiastic writer then goes on to remark, that "whether the fact (of the stoutness) be or be not so, (a fact that is or is not so!) all seems for the best, and better can be imagined!"

This is incomparably fine, if it could only be understood

When, however, you see Tagliani—as you are likely enough to do, one of those days—you will find her, without hyperbole, an immitable dancer, or rather (one should always avoid that horrid, vulgar English) dansuse.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE BISHOP'S BREECHES.

BY A. F. LANGBEIN.

BISHOP BONIFACE looked at the clock, jumped up hastily, and cried to his servant, "Here, Joseph, come and help me dress! it is high time I was ready."

Joseph hurried off to the wardrobe, and brought out the good bishop's pontificals, and articles of dress, among which was a pair of black silk breeches. We earnestly request our readers not to shake their heads at the name of this essential article of dress. They play an important part in this tale of ours, but with all proper delicacy we will only remark, that it seems to us very suspicious, that the name of this innocent piece of clothing is, now-a-days, never mentioned in polite society—to the pure all things are pure.

As the bishop was putting them on, he noticed that they were torn, or, more properly, ripped open. "Give me another pair," said he, "and take these to Agath, and leave word to have them mended, neatly."

Agath was the right reverend prolate's tailor. But Joseph had just come from the country, so that he did not know the respectable artist, and had never even heard his name. He knew, however, that, not far from the bishop's palace, was a convent, known by the name of the Sisterhood of St. Agath. This, it occurred to him, must be the meaning of Agath, and, being a simple-minded soul, he easily made up his mind that the bishop must be in the habit of having all the needful repairs of his garments done by his spiritual daughters. So he wrapped the breeches up in a napkin, went to the cloister, and asked for the abbess.

The venerable dame, as soon as she learned that one of the bishop's serving-men was waiting with a message to her, supposed that some important communication was to be made respecting the affairs of the convent; so she hurried to the parlour, and ordered the messenger to be sent for. He entered the room, made a clumsy bow, and began, "The Lord Bishop greets you well, and sends you here a patient he wants you to cure!" so saying, he opened his bundle, laid the breeches in the hands of the abbess, which she had just raised to heaven, in astonishment, and hurried off. In horror and disgust, she threw the pantaloons (to use the genteel word we can) on a chair, and said to herself, "What shameful, unheard-of audacity! Our bishop must be mad, or else he must be like St. Augustine, who says, in chapter thirty-one of his Confessions, that though drunkenness is far from me, yet has intoxication sometimes overtaken my servant." Then she began to reflect what was to be done in this critical emergency. In her first despair she was almost tempted to seize on the offending article with the tongs, and let it be consumed by fire; but she moderated her fury, and finally decided to call a grand council of the virgin sisterhood.

The great bell of the convent brought together all its inmates. They formed a curious anxious circle round the abbess, who had covered over the corpus delicti with a cloak. "Bishop Boniface, my dear sisters," so she began, "has offered us a gross insult, in sending to us, with a request to repair certain injuries it is alleged to have suffered, a piece of clothing, the very name of which a modest nun will not allow to pass her lips, much less take the article itself in her hand." With these awful words, she removed the cloak that covered the monster. The nuns uttered a shriek of horror, and fled.

The abbess, however, called them back, assuring them—to allay their fears—that the objectionable black silks had been again covered up. They returned dutifully, but held their fingers before their eyes the whole time. The question was submitted to the female conventicles, what was to be done in this ticklish business. The opinion of a large majority was decided, that though it would never do to make an enemy of the bishop, still nothing should tempt them to take hold of the unmentionable monster. After a long discussion, the abbess conceived the idea of giving the job to a novice named Antonia, whose year of probation was not half out, and, consequently, being less sacred than her sisters, might be, perhaps, induced to perform so wordily an office.

Antonia was the daughter of a rich farmer, a tenant of the bishop's, who had sent her to the convent because she was bent on marrying the son of a poor neighbour. The young lady had not yet lost her love for the world, and sighed sorely to get back to it. When the abbess brought her down, and stated the work she was wanted to do, she conceived a faint hope that it might be of some advantage to her; so she unhesitatingly agreed to do it. The nuns laughed, and whispered each other, as Antonia, as coolly as possible, took the breeches under her arm, and retired to her cell. The repairs, which had produced such a commotion in the convent, were very slight, and might have been done in five minutes. But Antonia was thinking of other things than sewing. As soon as she had finished, she pulled out a concealed inkstand, and began to write a letter to her Frederick, the presence of the breeches acting like that of a familiar spirit, to keep away all intruders. Just as she was at the end of her epistle, the heavy tread of the old abbess was heard along the corridor, coming nearer and nearer. If she should be caught writing a love-letter! Antonia hardly knew, in her confusion, what to do with her bullet-douz, so she slipped it into one of the pockets of the breeches, took them on her lap again, and began to sew, zealously.

The abbess asked, as she came in, "Are you ready, child?" "Not quite yet, gracious lady," was the answer. "How, you lazy one!" said the lady abbess, and clapped her huge spectacles on her nose to examine the work. "The torn place is repaired, is not that all?" "There—there are some buttons loose besides, madam." "We have no call to fasten them on. Nothing is gained by excessive zeal." So saying, she snatched the breeches away from the damsel's lap, and hid them under her cloak. Antonia, anxious to recover her letter, insisted on carrying them for the abbess, and was so zealous in her politeness as almost to use force; but it was in vain, the abbess prevailed.

The next day happened to be the bishop's birthday, on which he gave a grand entertainment, to which all the prelates and nobles round about were invited. The cups went round fast and full, for his reverence loved to see his guests merry, and merry enough they were, when our old acquaintance, Joseph, the shrewd servant, came in, bringing a neat little basket of flowers, which he said had been left with the porter, as a birthday present, by some person or persons unknown.

The bishop smiled as he looked at the delicate texture of the basket, and said, "I wish I was sure of a cardinal's hat as I am that this is a convent present. You see, gentlemen, I am in the good graces of the venerable sisters. There is some pretty present below the flowers, I'll engage." He turned out the flowers, and soon came to a solid body, pinned up in silver paper. He showed it round the table in triumph, and challenged his guests to guess its contents. Each one prophesied something prettier than his neighbour, till the bishop opened the paper, and out came—his old breeches! The roars of laughter with which his prize was welcomed, confused him so much that he could not, at first, find or seek an explanation. But, a few questions to Joseph made all clear, and a second chorus of laughter arose, in which the right reverend joined as heartily as any one.

The bishop dressed himself early next day, meaning to go to the convent and explain the unlucky mistake which his servant's stupidity had occasioned. He determined to put on the eventful pair of breeches in question, by way of compliment to the ladies who had repaired them. As he was putting his purse into one of the pockets, he felt a folded paper. "O the wicked sisters!" thought he at first—they have been sending me in a tailor's bill. When he opened the letter, however, he read as follows:

DEAR FRED.—Rejoice, rejoice! I have found out a way to do a service to the bishop: in a small way enough, indeed. What do you think? I have turned tailress to his holiness, and begun my duties by mending a pair of black silk breeches yesterday. See him if you can, and tell him how much he is indebted to me, without knowing it. Tell him the only pay his tailress will take is her discharge from this——

Here the manuscript ended abruptly. The good bishop laughed once again, at the merry boldness of his tailress, and resolved to pay her for her labour in the way she desired. After making his excuses to the abbot, he sent for Antonia, who confessed, at once, the authorship of the letter, and, moreover, the small-vocation she felt for a monastic life. The bishop, we have said, was a kind man, as well as a merry: he used his influence with Antonia's parents so successfully, that, in a little time, she had left the convent, and married Frederick; and, to this day, she maintains that the best day's work she ever did in her life was mending the bishop's breeches.

SKETCHES OF AMERICAN SCENERY.

THE VALLEY OF THE MERRIMAC.

BY CALSB CUSHING.

NUMBER TWO.

From its distant source among the snow-topped mountains of New-Hampshire, the Merrimac flows on, through scenes of peaceful cultivation, downward to the ocean. No overgrown seat of commerce stands upon its banks; but a perpetual succession of smiling villages, and of large, but not excessive, communities, from Concord, the fair capital of New-Hampshire, to Nashua, Lowell, Haverhill, Amesbury, and Newburyport, at the very mouth of the river. In every intermediate space testifying to the fruitful industry of the inhabitants, and one variety of natural beauty after another, combined with the results of the presence of civilization and human skill, give to it the most attractive form of loveliness. It is the abode of liberty, intelligence, education, religion, and peace. Such it has long been; and such it is likely to continue. It has no military posts, to be the object of contention to a foreign enemy: it has no great accumulation of wealth, in a single spot, to invite assault; in the face of a numerous and hardy and free-spirited population; and, as the experience of the wars of 1776 and 1812 have shown, it is out of the range of the operations and march of armies. Happy the lot of its inhabitants! But it was not always thus; for the skulking Indian—cowardly even in his ferocity—the assassin of women and children, by choice, and of men only when forced to prove—proving around the solitary hamlet by midnight, to massacre, in their sleep, the defenceless inhabitants—the North American Indian, elevated by misplaced sympathy, or pure imagination, from a savage into a hero, and honoured for deeds which better become a wolf than a man—the Indian has left the marks of his presence here, amid those now tranquil scenes of peace and repose. One of the incidents of savage warfare was an attack by the Indians, in 1708, on the then frontier village of Haverhill, called by them Pentucket, which is described in the following beautiful lines, by John G. Whittier.

PENTUCKET.

How sweetly on the wood-girt town
The mellow light of sunset shone!
Each small bright lake, whose waters still
Mirror the forest and the hill,
Reflected from its waveless breast
The beauty of a cloudless west.
Glorious as if a glimpse were given
Within the western gates of heaven,
Left, by the spirit of the star
Of sunset's holy hour, ajar!

Beside the river's tranquil flow
The dark and low-walled dwellings stood,
Where many a roof of open land
Stretch'd up and down on either hand,
With corn-leaves waving freshly green
The thick and blacken'd stumps between;
Behind, unbroken, deep and dread,
The wild, untrodden forest spread,
Back to those mountains, white and cold,
Of which the Indian trapper told,
Upon whose summits never yet
Was mortal foot in safety set.

Quiet and calm, without a fear
Of danger darkly lurking near,
The weary labourer left his plough—
The milk-maid carol'd by her cow—
From cottage door and household hearth
Rose songs of praise, or tones of mirth
At length the murmur died away,
And silence on that village lay—
So slept Pompeii, tower and hall,
Ere the quick earthquake swallow'd all,
Undreaming of the fiery fate
Which made its dwellings desolate!

Hours pass'd away. By moonlight sped
The Merrimac along his bed,
Bathed in the pallid lustre, stood
Dark cottage-wall and rock and wood,
Silent, beneath that tranquil beam,
As the hush'd grouping of a dream.
Yet on the still air crept a sound—
No bark of fox—no rabbit's bound—

No stir of wings—nor waters flowing—
Nor leaves in midnight breezes blowing.

Was that the tread of many feet,
Which downward from the hill-side beat?
What forms were those which darkly stood
Just on the margin of the wood?
Chard'd tree-stumps in the moonlight dim,
Or paling rade, or leafless limb?
No—through the trees fierce eye-balls glow'd,
Dark human forms in moonshine show'd,
Wild from their native wilderness,
With painted limbs and battle-dress.

A yell, the dead might wake to hear,
Swell'd on the night air, far and clear—
Then smote the Indian tomahawk
On crashing door and shattering lock—
Then rang the rifle-shot—and then
The shrill death-scream of stricken men—
Sunk the red axe in woman's brain,
And childhood's cry arose in vain—
Bursting through roof and window came,
Red, fast and fierce, the kindled flame;
And blended fire and moonlight glared
Over dead corse and weapons bared.

The morning sun look'd brightly through
The river willows, wet with dew.
No sound of combat fill'd the air—
No shout was heard,—nor gun-shot there:
Yet still the thick and sullen smoke
From smouldering ruins slowly broke;
And on the green sward many a stain,
And, here and there, the mangled slain,
Told how that midnight bolt had sped,
Pentucket, on thy fated head!

Even now, the villager can tell
Where Rolfe besaw his hearth-stone fell,
Still show the door of wasting oak
Through which the fatal death-shot broke,
And point the curious stranger where
De Rouville's corse lay grim and bare—
Whose hideous head, in death still fear'd,
Bore not a trace of hair or beard—
And still, within the churchyard ground,
Heaves darkly up the ancient mound,
Whose grass-grown surface overlies
The victims of that sacrifice.

But other and less melancholy memorials of the Indians remain, in the names left by them to designate the streams, and hills, and waterfalls which they loved to frequent in the old time, before the English came to cultivate and adorn the land, which, so long as its aboriginal masters held it, was, and would continue to be, a mere wilderness. The falls of Pawtucket, where the city of Lowell, unrivalled on the continent for the richness and variety of its manufacturing industry, has sprung up as if by enchantment—and those of Amesbury, where the same scene of industry is beginning to grow up—the Nashua and the Shawsheen, streamlets whose very names are music, as themselves are beauty itself—Powow hill, a beacon to the home-bound mariner, and its river now the productive instrument of the manufacturing enterprise of Amesbury and Salisbury, but once a favourite haunt for the wild rites of pagan superstition—the Merrimac itself deriving its appellation from the aborigines—and many another spot upon its banks, yet speak to the past presence of a race which has disappeared, extinguished by its own inherent vices, or gone to linger awhile by the prairies and forests of the west. How strange, if the Indian of the old time could return to earth, and revisit his ancient resorts, would be the spectacle exhibited to his eyes! Near to the confluence of the Powow and the Merrimac is a fountain of clear water gushing out from the roots of a majestic and venerable oak, the scene of some beautiful lines by Whittier, in which this idea is developed:

Where the birch canoe had glided
Down the swift Powow,
Dark and gloomy bridges strided
Those clear waters now.

But that race yielded to a nobler and a better, who came hither, animated with a lofty enthusiasm of purpose, to plant the seeds of liberty and civilization in this new world. You may see the spot where the first colonists on the Merrimac assembled under the broad canopy of heaven, in a temple not made with hands, to worship God, their guide and guardian in the wilderness. The tale of their sufferings and their hopes is told in the rapid touches of the true lyric spirit, by one of their own descendants, written for the occasion of a commemorative celebration of the settlement of Newbury. The following, we need not add, is from the pen of George Lunt:

PILGRIM SONG.

Over the mountain wave
See where they came:
Storm-closed and wintry wind
Welcome them home:
Yet where the sounding gale
Howls to the sea,
There their song—peals along,
Deep-toned and free:
Pilgrims and wanderers,
Hither we come;
Where the free dare to be,—
This is our home!

England bath sunny dale,
Dearly they bloom:—
Scotia hath heather-hills,
Sweet their perfume:
Yet through the wilderness
Cheerful we stray,

Native land—native land,
Home far away!
Pilgrims and wanderers,
Hither we come;
Where the free dare to be,
This is our home!

Dim grew the forest path,—
Onward they trod;
Firm beat their noble hearts,
Trusting in God!
Gray men and blooming maids,
High rose their song,
Hear it sweep—clear and deep,
Ever along:—
Pilgrims and wanderers,
Hither we come;
Where the free dare to be,
This is our home!

Not theirs the glory-wreath
Turn by the blast:—
Heavenward their holy steps,
Heavenward they pass,
Green be their mossy graves!
Ours be their fame,
While their song—peals along,
Ever the same:
Pilgrims and wanderers,
Hither we come;—
Where the free dare to be,
This is our home!

And if, when the Indian had ceased to be an object of dread or danger to them—when their own fair homes had become the abode of long-enduring peace—if still their country called them to fight in other scenes the battles of her independence and honour, their young men flocked to the banner of liberty, as many a war-worn veteran yet lives to attest, and with what emotions, let the same pen describe—

"SEVENTY FIVE."

It broke on the hush of morn,—
It started the dull midnight,
Like the stirring peal of a battle-born,
It summoned them forth to fight:
It rose o'er the swelling hill,
By the meadows green it was heard,
Calling out for the strength of the freeman's will.
And the might of a freeman's sword!
The rivers heard the noise,—
The valleys rung it out;
And every heart leaped high at the voice
Of that thrilling battle-shout!
They sprang from the bridal bed,
From the pallet of labour's rest;
And they hurried away to the field of the dead,
Like a tardy marriage-guest.
They left the plough in the corn,—
They left the steer in the yoke;
And away from mother and child, that morn.
And the maiden's first kiss they broke!
In the showers of the deadly shot,
In the lurid van of the war,
Sternly they stood, but they answered not
To the hieing's wild-hurrah.
But still as the brooding storm,
Ere it lashes ocean to foam,
The strength of the free was in every arm,
And every heart on its home
Or their pleasant homes they thought,—
They prayed to their father's God—
And forward they went till their dear blood bought
The broad free land they trod!

And again, from the same pen—

THE LYRE AND SWORD.

The freeman's glittering sword be blest,—
For ever blest the freeman's lyre,—
That rings upon the tyrant's crest,
That stirs the heart like living fire:
Well can he wield the shining brand,
Who battles for his native land:
But when his fingers sweep the chords,
That summon heroes to the fray,
They gather at the feast of swords,
Like mountain eagles to their prey!
And 'mid the vales and swelling hills,
That sweetly bloom on Freedom's land,
A living spirit breathes and fills:
The freeman's heart and nerves his hand:
For the bright soil that gave him birth,
The home of all he loves on earth,—
For this, when Freedom's trumpet calls,
He waves on high his sword of fire,—
For this, amidst his country's halls
For ever strikes the freeman's lyre!

His burning heart he may not lend
To serve a doting despot's sway,—
A suppliant knee he will not bend,
Before these things of "brass and clay."
When wrong and ruin call to war,
He knows the summons from afar;
On high his glittering sword he waves,
And myriads feel the freeman's fire,
While he, around their fathers' graves,
Strikes to old strains the freeman's lyre!

If the readers of the Mirror do not weary of these desultory sketches, and would see more of the gems of poetry which I select in preference to any words of description of my own, I shall return and continue the subject in another article.

GAETIES AND GRAVITIES.

The following fragments are translated from an account of the life of Madame Malibran, some of the most interesting in the world lately published by the Countess Merlin, entitled Leisure d'une femme du monde.

MADAME MALIBRAN.

The success of Maria daily increased. The presence of Mlle. Sontag at the Theatre Italien, was also a new stimulus to her talent, and aided to perfect it. "Whenever this lady was successful," Maria would weep and say, "Heaven, why does she sing so well!" Then from these tears burst forth those sublime beauties of harmony, for which the public took the advantage.

The amateurs, especially, desired to hear these two charming singers together; but they feared each other, and for some time they could not be brought together. A plot was laid, however, without their knowledge, and about the middle of a concert, it was proposed they should sing the duet from Tancredi. For a few moments there was fear and hesitation, but finally they yielded, and approached the piano, amid the loud applause of the audience.

Both appeared agitated and uneasy, they watched each other, but soon the close of the symphony fixed their attention, and the duet began. The rapture which they excited was so great and equally divided, that at the close of the duet, amidst the applause, charmed, amazed, and astonished at having nothing to fear, they looked at each other, and by a spontaneous movement, an involuntary attraction, their hands were locked, their lips met, and a kiss of peace was given and received with all the vivacity and sincerity of youth. The scene was truly beautiful, and has not been forgotten by those who witnessed it.

Amidst this brilliant existence, Maria preserved all her liveliness of character, and her simplicity. She was entirely ignorant of the details of domestic life; absorbed by her studies, she was above the circle of reality; nevertheless, she had no taste for luxury, and never indulged in superfluous expense; if, however, an unfortunate artiste applied to her, she took him under her wing, went to his house, relieved his most pressing wants, and then gave a concert for his benefit; disposed of his tickets, quarrelled with the managers if they refused her permission to sing, and, finally, did sing without it. She always accompanied these acts of charity with some delicate and unexpected attention; thus at the close of a theatrical season, a young woman of the characters being engaged at the King's Theatre, London, was prevented from leaving Paris, for want of money. Maria promised to sing at a concert which some of her friends were about to give for her benefit. As well may be supposed, the name of Madame Malibran upon the bill attracted a crowd. The hour for the performance came, the hall was filled, and Maria had not arrived. They waited, grew impatient, and, at last, the concert began without her; about the middle of the performance, she came in, and, going up to the young woman, said in a low voice: "I am a little late, my dear, but the audience shall lose nothing, for I shall sing all the pieces announced. Besides, as I have promised you all my profits of the evening, I will keep my word. I have been singing at the palace of the Duke of Orleans, and have received three hundred francs. There, take them!"

Her soul, filled with love of her art, seemed to desire nothing beyond it; her morals had been pure and severe; but at this period, the sentiment which in a nature like hers must have an effect on her whole life, developed itself in her heart for a young artiste. Maria's choice accorded with her situation, and displayed the pure and elevated tendency of her inclinations, even amidst the allurement to which she was exposed.

One day, they joked her about one of her admirers. "Yes," said she, with an air of truth and simplicity, "I think he loves me; but what can I do! I do not love him. I do not wish to appear a heroine of virtue. I know, that young and independent as I am by my profession, married to a man old enough to be my grandfather, and who is two thousand leagues away, surrounded by dangers, I shall finish by falling in love; but then I will not play the coquette; I shall candidly tell the man who pleases me, and it shall be an affair for his life. She herself, who was born in Belgium, and a distinguished artiste, passed the winter in Paris. Maria met him often at concerts where their united talents called them. Although she was little acquainted with him, she took an interest in him, partly on account of his talents, which she admired, and partly because she knew that his affections were misdirected. Denot was much in love with Mlle. Sontag, who, interested in him who afterwards became her husband, did not return his affection.

Misfortune has often a powerful influence upon the heart of a young and susceptible woman. Thus Maria, in pining for Denot, loved him unconsciously. They separated at the end of the spring, and she met him again at Bruxelles. One evening they were at the Chateau de Chimay, Denot presented one of his own compositions; amid the applause, Maria, pale, with eyes suffused with tears, approached him, and taking his hands in her own, said, with an expression not to be described, "I am very happy at your success." "Thank you, thank you," said Denot, attending also to others who were at the same time congratulating him. "I am especially flattered by your admiration." "No, no, that is not it; mon Dieu, do you not perceive that I love you? Agitated and charmed at a sentiment so sincerely and artlessly expressed, Denot knew not whether he dreamed, or whether Maria, carried away by the enthusiasm of the moment, had uttered these words without reflection. From this time the affections of these two artistes were intimately united.

Maria gave some of her time to the pleasures of the world; notwithstanding the fatigues which she underwent in her profession, she sought them with all the vehemence of her feelings. She was extravagantly fond of dancing, riding on horseback, and also of singing. Instead of these live cares which singers generally give to their health, she led a most agitated life. She never took into calculation the extent of her powers. Always ready to bestow her voice, her time or care, in order to oblige others or amuse herself, she never hesitated sacrificing her own interests to the idea of doing what pleased her. Once having promised to sing at the house of Madame Merlin, the managers of the theatre suddenly determined that a benefit should be given that same evening. Maria, after trying in vain to have the performance postponed, at last, much vexed, said to Mr. Robert. "Very well, I shall sing at the theatre because it is my duty, but afterwards I will sing for Madame Merlin, because it is my will." Poor Mr. Robert besought and got on-reged; but it was all in vain. At one o'clock in the morning,

Maria, after having played Semiramide, went to Madame Merlin's, sang till two or three in the morning, then supped, waltzed, and did not leave till daybreak.

Her health suffered from her irregularities; but even then, she performed wonders. Having spent the night at a ball, on the night before the day she was to perform, she rose at noon, mounted her horse, sat out without breaking fast, and did not return until six in the evening. She had hardly time to dine when she was obliged to go to the theatre. She dressed hastily to perform the part of Arsaces; but agitated and fatigued, after a hasty dinner, the poor Arsaces, with the helmet on her head, and her fine hair curled, at the moment of appearance fainted and fell. They carried her to her room, and all tried to assist her. The unfortunate manager did not know what to do; twenty smelling-bottles were offered to restore her to animation. Unfortunately, one of the actors found a cup filled with a mixture of oil and alkali, which Maria was accustomed to rub on her neck, whenever she had a sore throat; an impudent meddler applied this to her lips. In a moment large blisters were raised upon her beautiful mouth! What was to be done? It was impossible for her to go on the stage in such a situation. It was too late to change the play; what could be done? "Stop," said Maria, who had quite revived, "stop, let me manage it," and taking a pair of scissors which she found near her, she stood before the glass, and without hesitation cut the blisters from her lips. It is impossible to describe her appearance; but she performed her part of Arsaces admirably, in company with Mlle. Sontag, who performed Semiramide.

If, after one of these excessive fatigues, Maria was obliged to sing at the theatre, she then had recourse to strong tonic. This circumstance gave rise to the report that she used strong drinks immediately. The truth is, that if she used them sometimes, it was from necessity, and not from any love of them; and, if, sinking under trouble and fatigue, she was compelled to support her frail and nervous nature with a glass of Madeira, she would as soon have swallowed a cup of gin and vinegar, if she knew it would give her new strength to fulfil her engagements; even as she cut the delicate skin from her lips, and as even more recently, when dying, she sang for the last time the duet from Andronicus, at the Manchester theatre to please the public. If she lavished her powers to satisfy her love of independence, and her indomitable passions, she was full of courage and self-denial to accomplish the conditions of her situation.

One day she was at Castellamere; and there, with a number of her friends, on a cavalcade of donkeys, she climbed over the woody mountains in the delicious environs of this place. At a certain point on the road, they came to a post upon which the prince of Capua had placed a notice that no one should dare to ride through the mysterious palaces of the Villa Castina, should be punished, paying no attention to the prohibition, the party continued to ride on, when in the midst of their mad frolic a band of abru, or guards, with large brigand hats, armed to the teeth, rushed upon our happy party, and summoned them to dismount.

In vain they all tried their powers of persuasion to obtain pardon, stating that they were strangers and ignorant of the language, which had prevented their understanding the caution written upon the post; nothing could bend these inexorable guards, who began to use constraint upon the inoffensive cavalcade; when Maria, armed with her parasol, the only defensive weapon of the party, and sitting upon her donkey, as on a glittering throne, burst forth with an air so full, and so touching, that the crimes and the hate, struck as if by magic, fell at her feet. It seemed as if the hundred-headed Hydra were bending in respect, to render homage to the lyre of Orpheus.

Maria had finished her engagement at the Fenice; but before leaving Venice, she heard that Mr. Gallo, manager of a second-rate theatre, and father of a family, was about to become bankrupt. Immediately she determined to assist him by means of an extraordinary performance for his benefit, and she began to arrange it; but the actors and orchestra were pitiful. Nevertheless, Maria was not to be discouraged; she passed part of the day in rehearsing, directed the orchestra herself, arranged the scenes, taught one his part, showed the rest the position to occupy, and finished with writing the theatre in a state of fever and impatience impossible to describe. The day for the performance was fixed; the Venetian public not expecting to see la donna cavalcante again, heard with mad joy that she was to play La Sonnambula. From the morning, the people flocked in crowds to the theatre.

The curtain rose, but scarcely had the tenor, who was to perform the part of Elvino, come before Maria, to sing the duet "Son cello del Zebra errante," when he was seized with trembling, and he completely forgot his part; murmurs and jokes began to be heard in the pit, when Maria, without being at all disconnected, said in a low voice, to the tenor, "do not be agitated, I will assist you," and taking his part, she so identified it with her own, singing the passages from each alternately, that the duet became a sort of air very properly arranged, and the tenor having had time to become composed, took up his part, when they should sing together.

The public, astonished and charmed at so much talent and grace, applauded Maria with transport. Her act, the infection of her voice, the purpose, all were seized and understood. There was a rolling fire of applause and cries; they wept, they screamed with joy. When Maria sang the last air, all the pit stood on the seats, and waving their handkerchiefs on the end of their canes, formed about her a kind of triumphal halo of glory. One would have said that constituting themselves sovereigns by their own power, they proclaimed her queen of the art.

Immediately bouquets and crowns were thrown at the feet of Maria; a shower of leaves, of gold and silver, like phosphoric sparks, covered her on all sides; verses and roses came in their turn, and when, moved and palpitating, her eyes brilliant with tears of pleasure, she raised her head to thank the audience, two white doves were lowered down upon her, and, flying round her forehead, seemed to give her the diploma of queen.

A crowd of people, with lighted torches, awaited Malibran at the door of the theatre, to accompany her home; but, fatigued and frightened, she dared not go out, and waited. The cries and noise increased, and with it her fears. She was at last obliged to leave, and decided to go in another gondola, her own being known by its colour, and the crowd having collected around it.

During the tumult which rose on this side, Maria sailed calmly and alone along the canal; but scarcely had the gondola which carried her, passed under the bridge of the Rialto, than the people, perceiving the trick, followed her, forming along the two banks a brilliant crowd of torches and lanterns, whose wavering light was reflected in the water. When she landed, she found herself surrounded with the people; she was carried rather than escorted to her house, and her shawl and handkerchief were cut in a thousand pieces, and distributed among the populace who followed her.

A moment after her arrival, having scarcely had time to compose herself, a deputation of watermen, in gala dresses, with white vests, straw-lids, and scarlet sashes, came in. The most intelligent of them spoke, and supplicated her, in a simple and natural manner, to apply to her lips a gilded cup, which he presented to her; Maria granted his request, and then going upon the balcony, with her friends, beheld below her a band of watermen arranged along the whole length of the quay. Their manly and decided features, lighted by the red glare of the torches which they carried, shone forth in the obscurity of the night, and the warm and lively colouring which covered them, contrasted with the soft light of the moon, which shone on the opposite marble walls of the Barbican palace. The deputation soon arrived near their comrades, and their leader, with a solemn air, passed the cup among them. Each one touched it with his lips—and we are assured that after the last draught there was wine still in the cup.

Fourteen thousand francs were requisite to extricate Mr. Gallo from his embarrassments. The profits of the performance were ten thousand five hundred francs; Maria added the remainder, and saved him from ruin. Since then, the theatre of Mr. Gallo has been called the Theatre Malibran.

REMARKABLE ESCAPE.—The following has been going the rounds of the newspaper press for some months past. It beats all the stories of the most remarkable escapes which we remember ever to have seen. Those who have read it before, will be good enough to pass over to the next article. We print it in order that it may be preserved. It was first published in the "St. Joseph's Times."—"On the passage of the ship Anaxander, from New-Orleans to New-York, a young lad, about fourteen years of age, from a naturally feeble and somewhat mischievous disposition, became so troublesome in his pranks, that he was threatened by the captain, if he continued, that he would confine him in a water-cask. Our youngster took no heed, however, and, at his next offence, was put in the cask, which was headed up, leaving a large bung-hole for the admission of air. That night the ship encountered a violent storm, and, in a sudden lurch, the cask containing the boy rolled over into the sea. The circumstance was not noticed by those on board. Fortunately the cask struck upon a log, and floated about thirty hours, when it was thrown upon the beach at St. Blas. Here the boy made desperate efforts to extricate himself from his prison, without success, and, in despair, gave up to die. Some cows, however, strolling on the beach, were attracted to the cask, and, in walking around it, one of them, it being fly-time, switched her tail into the bung-hole, which the lad grasped with a desperate resolution. The cow bellowed and set off for life, and after running some two hundred yards with the cask, struck it against a log on the beach, and knocked it, as we say, into a COCKED HAT. The boy, thus providentially released, was discovered by some fishermen on the Point and taken into Appalachicola, where a small collection being made for him, he was enabled to proceed north by the way of Columbus.

VITUALS AND DRINK.—During the time of the sanguinary war between the Genoese and the Catalans, a galley belonging to the former was intercepted by the fleet of the latter. The admiral, who was a man of ferocious disposition, ordered the whole crew to be thrown overboard, in retaliation of some cruelty inflicted on his countrymen by the Genoese, and, adding insult to barbarity, he made each man kneel down on the deck, and eat half a biscuit, saying, as soon as he had finished it, "Now let him go and drink," upon which he was thrown into the sea. One of these poor fellows, whose spirits were not subdued by the sight of twenty or thirty of his comrades meeting a watery grave before his eyes, on receiving his dose, observed to the admiral, "Your honour gives us a deal more to drink than to eat, I perceive." This unexpected piece of wit had such an effect upon the admiral, that he ordered the man's life to be spared, and put him on shore, with the remainder of the crew.

ONE PEOPLE.—The passion for practical jokes upon a great scale has long been extremely popular and predominant. A noble art, and one in which the desire to do mischief to two or three chosen friends, "at another's expense," uses sometimes to invent, to dine with him some six men, each minus an arm or a leg; another day, half a dozen worthy personages, who were stone deaf; on another, half a dozen others, whose obliquity of vision happened to be exceedingly remarkable. One day, six bald men were asked; on another, three men, six feet four high, with three men scarcely four feet six, on a third occasion, a neat half dozen of sutters; and, on a fourth, an equal batch of sufferers under some nervous affection, which induced them to keep twinkling their eyes and twitching their noses to each other during the whole time of the repast, perfectly conscious themselves of the oddity of the proceeding.

SLEEPY WORK.—The aborigines of Havti believed that men were a long time destitute of women, but, happening to wander near a small lake, they saw certain animals among the branches of the trees, which proved to be women. They attempted to catch them, but found it impossible to get any hold of them, as they were as slippery as eels. At last, they employed a number of men whose hands had been rendered rough by a kind of leprosy, and who succeeded in catching four of them, from whom the world was rescued. There seems to be an idea, as well among savage as civilized men, that woman is rather a slippery animal.

A GOOD HINT.—A clergyman preaching in a small town, which he had visited in the course of his travels, having received no invitation to dine with any of the inhabitants, after exhorting his hearers in the strongest manner against being seduced by the prevailing vices of the age, said, "I have preached against every vice but luxurious living, having had no opportunity of judging to what extent it is carried on in this town."

THEATRICAL CRITICISM.—Captain Marryat, in his "Diary," gives the following as a specimen of American criticism; it is at least expressive:—"Well, Abel, what d'ye think of our native genius, Mister Forrest?" "Well, I don't go much to theatricals, that's a fact; but I do think he piled the agony up a little too high in the last scene."

CHANGING ONE'S MIND.—"Mint I see you hum from me, me, Enice!" said a Yankee to a girl whom he "kinder, sorter" had a feeling for. "No, you shan't do no such thing. I'm otherwise engaged." "Well, I guess you've missed it one't—I've got my pockets chuck full of gingerbread and ammons." "You may take my arm, Reuben."

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Hyperion, a Romance; in two vols. By the author of Outre-Mer." New-York: Samuel Colman.

This new work, from the pen of Henry W. Longfellow, has been well described as a brilliant prose-poem. Those who expect to find in it a highly-wrought plot and thrilling incident will be disappointed; but all who can appreciate beautiful thoughts clothed in the most exquisite drapery of language, will be delighted with "Hyperion." Some of the sketches of German scenery are inimitably graphic, and all the translations preserve unimpaired the music and spirit of the originals. The following, sung by a wandering German student, to the hero at a moment when there were strong suspicions that he was about falling in love, is not only a capital song, but conveys some wholesome advice:

I know a maiden fair to see,
Take care!
She can both false and friendly be,
Beware! Beware!
Trust her not,
She is fooling thee!
She has two eyes, so soft and brown,
Take care!
She gives a side-glance and looks down,
Beware! Beware!
Trust her not,
She is fooling thee!
And she has hair of golden hue,
Take care!
And what she says, it is not true,
Beware! Beware!
Trust her not,
She is fooling thee!
She has a bosom as white as snow,
Take care!
She knows how much it is best to show,
Beware! Beware!
Trust her not,
She is fooling thee!
She gives thee a garland woven fair,
Take care!
It is a fool's cap for thee to wear,
Beware! Beware!
Trust her not,
She is fooling thee!

"A Treatise on Roads, their History, Character and Utility." By S. De Witt Hoogood. Albany: Oliver Steel. Pp. 228.

An apparently dry subject is here invested with a remarkable degree of interest. Much information not generally accessible is embraced in the treatise, which is written in a style admirably clear and attractive. To engineers and all engaged in the construction of roads, the hints will prove suggestive and valuable. We extract the following sketch of a man eminent in his vocation:

"This extraordinary man is an example of the triumph of genius over the usual difficulties of life. It was somewhat singular, that the most eminent practical engineers have been those who were destitute of what is termed a classical education. Like Bredley, who was destitute of collegiate honours. The son of a humble mechanic of Dumfries in Scotland, he commenced his career in the workshop of a stone mason, and during the leisure he could snatch from the hours of repose, he might have been seen sitting in the kitchen of a humble cottage, reading his favourite books by the glimmering light of a turf fire. At this time his skill as a workman, and his taste for poetry were remarked by his acquaintances, and as soon as his apprenticeship expired, he repaired to Edinburgh, to prosecute with unremitting diligence, the science of architecture. In 1789, at which time he was twenty-five years of age, he went to London under the patronage of Sir William Pulteney, a native of his own parish, and a personage whose name is well known in this state."

"From this time his fame was established. He was consulted by engineers of other nations, and astonished his own countrymen by the vastness of his designs, and the perfect accuracy of their execution. His most admired works are the road from London to Holyhead, and its celebrated bridge over the straits of Menai, connecting the island of Anglesea with the Welsh coast. It was erected on the principle of suspension, and exceeded in magnitude any similar work in the known world. Under it passed without inconvenience the 'masts of the tallest frigates.' When we consider the immense weight of iron, more than two thousand tons, which had to be suspended in order to sustain the roadway, the frightful elevation at which the work was executed, we may well believe that the projector often declared, that it had cost him more intense thought than any other he had ever undertaken."

"American Tarf Register." A monthly magazine. New-York: William T. Porter.

The last number of the American Tarf Register and Sporting Magazine, conducted by our next-door neighbor, the editor of the Spirit of the Times, is embellished with two engravings on steel by Dick, the first from an amusing sketch by Landseer, called "Ringing the thing into the ground," and the other a portrait of Janette, a famous mare owned by Mr. Stevens. The letterpress portion of this magazine is creditable to the taste and talent of William T. Porter, Esq., who has now, as ever, our best wishes for his success.

"Southern Literary Messenger." Richmond, Va. T. W. White, editor and proprietor.

We are glad to perceive that this journal continues to be sustained with ability and vigour. The tale, entitled "Judith Ben-ezdi," in the June number, is one of the best contributions to the polite literature of the country that we have seen for many a day. The Messenger has a corps of excellent contributors, and the editor seems disposed to enlist the best talent of the country under his banners.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We can assure our correspondent "Y," that the Greenwood Cemetery Company is not a speculative concern, but that all the profits from the sale of lots are devoted to the improvement of the grounds, the construction of bridges, &c. The design is an excellent one, and will undoubtedly succeed beyond the anticipations of the originators. We cannot enter into the controversy relative to the late accident on board the Narragansett steamer. At the same time we do not approve of putting passengers on berths, where there is the least liability of their being soiled.—Our theatrical correspondent, "Garrick," who dates from Boston, must be a little prejudiced. Mr. Jones is unquestionably competent to conduct the Tremont on a reputable manner, and we wish him all manner of success.—The author of a "Week at Saratoga," will find his manuscript by calling at our office of publication. We do not approve of his personalities.—"K," "Rockaway," "Selden," and "P. D.," are undesirable.—The account of the ball at New-Brighton shall be published if the writer will assure us there is no "levelled malice" in his hits at character and personal appearance.—In reply to the complimentary remarks of several editorial friends, respecting the typographical appearance of the Mirror, it is an act of justice to say that the type was cast at the foundry of Messrs. Hager and Lottin, of this city.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 24, 1839.

Reading a new tragedy.—Were you ever present at the first reading of a new manuscript play? It was our lot the other evening to be one of a secret tribunal convened in one of Mr. Cozzens's snugest apartments at the American, to hear and decide upon a five-act tragedy. The audience was miscellaneous but select, and all the professions, literary, scientific, military, musical and mercantile, were worthily represented. With deference be it said, that an assemblage more competent to judge of the effect of a dramatic performance, could not easily be collected, "at short notice." The individual, who had brought together this coterie of critics, was one, whom to know either in his private or his editorial capacity, is to esteem and respect. With characteristic generosity he had taken the trouble of introducing to his friends, and through them to the public, the production of an anonymous writer, simply because he thought it a good thing, written by an American. As the Major drew forth from his ample pocket the five separate manuscripts that composed the tragedy, a few of his audience groaned inadvertently, while some looked toward their hats and then at the door. The two physicians, who were present, sighed as if they had been doomed to swallow their own prescriptions. A couple of generals, whose valor had oozed out at their fingers' ends, seemed disposed to cut and run. As for the musical gentlemen, one of them submissively murmured, "Since then I'm doomed," etc., while the other, apparently disposed to suit the action to the word, found himself humming, "Away, away! to the mountain's brow." A person present, who had himself perpetrated a tragedy, appeared to be meditating a catastrophe and dying speech. The merchant looked as if he had suddenly occurred to him that his note in the bank would be protested, and the lawyer was wishing that he might prove ex alibi. But at this moment a waiter appeared with glasses and champagne. The wine, it was remarked as a felicitous coincidence, was of the Star brand. Good humor was at once restored. (Nothing makes one feel so philanthropic as champagne.) The audience became resigned, and the Major commenced reading. The two first acts went off delightfully. Half as well delivered on the stage, they might be performed with admirable effect. We never heard a recitation more apt, impressive and beautiful. A general burst of applause broke from the little circle of auditors, and success to the play was drunk in liberal bumpers. "Who will read the third act, for I am fatigued," said the Mecenas of the occasion. "General, read it." "Excuse me, I took cold at the last parade, and am hoarse. Besides, I could not think of attempting it after you." "Give me the third act; I will read it," said the rival dramatist, with a malicious emphasis on the word read. It was given to him; but whether it was owing to his peculiar style of delivery, and a habit of suspending his voice at some of the more ineffective and indifferent passages of the play, and muttering "Humph"—or whether the act was really inferior to those that had preceded it, certain it is that it fell tamely upon the ears of his audience. His own satisfaction, however, was quite apparent. The fourth act was read by one of the medical gentlemen in attendance, and much to the chagrin of the last reader, it did not prove a "dose," but was received with enthusiastic approbation. The fifth and closing act was read "with good emphasis and discretion," by the reader of the two first, and at the "imaginary fall of the imaginary curtain," the applause was, as the newspapers say, "unbounded and enthusiastic." Loud calls were made for the author. "Gentlemen," said the Major, "I am as ignorant as you are of the author's name. The manuscript was transmitted to me some months since—I read it, approved of it, and sent a copy to Macready. He wrote me a reply that he liked it much, and would, if practicable, bring it out during his engagement at the Haymarket. It will, I hope, be produced at one of our principal theatres, probably the National, during the present season. I will give you as a toast: 'Success to the Miser of Padua.'"

School for boys.—One of the very best schools in the country for boys less than twelve years of age, is that under the superintendence of Mr. Chester, at Morris-town, New-Jersey. Every attention is paid to the mental and physical improvement of the lads, and the location of the academy is unrivalled for health. We speak from personal knowledge, and take pleasure in recommending this well-conducted establishment to the attention of parents.

A lazy club.—They have a lazy club at the west. A member was expelled the other day for running down hill, and another for talking with a person in the street without leaning against a post.

Literary remuneration.—The London papers state that Knowles is to receive five hundred pounds for his new play, in addition to a benefit and the profits of publication. This is but a fair compensation. The receipts of literary men are, by the way, generally much undervalued by other professions. Because many eminent literary characters have been impecunious in their habits, and consequently often reduced to penury, the impression has often gone abroad, that their means of subsistence were limited and precarious. Writers of talent have little cause to complain either of their publishers or of the public. Bulwer has received over a hundred thousand dollars for his novels. Scott received a million from his various works. The income of the author of "Nicholas Nickleby" is over five thousand pounds from his writings—and Southey, James, Thomas Moore, Irving, D'Israeli, Theodore Hooke, and hundreds of other popular authors, have all made ample fortunes by their pens.

Returning to the city.—The warm season appears to be fast drawing to a close. Since the gale of the sixteenth, the weather has been quite cool. The absentees are rapidly on the wing back to the city. From New-Brighton, West Point, Saratoga and Niagara, they are returning in quite respectable numbers. It is no longer "imprudent" to be seen in Broadway at noon; and acquaintances no longer cut each other when they meet upon the Battery. Indeed it is whispered that a few parties have already taken place, at which a large representation of city beauty was present. We do not vouch for the truth of this report, although we had from excellent authority; but to those of our fair denizens, who still withhold from us the light of their countenances, we would explain, in the language of an old correspondent:

"Summer is gone;—why do ye still delay?
Return! return!—once more illumine Broadway!"

Poets and poetry.—Some silly fellow has started the following paragraph, which we see extensively copied:—"There are five thousand and twenty-three poets in the United States. Of these, ninety-four are in the state prison, five hundred and eleven in the lunatic asylums, and two hundred and eighty in the debtor's prisons." To which of these classifications the originator of this stuff belongs, we cannot say; probably to the first. With as much propriety might you apply the epithet "millionaire" to every small trader in the country, or call our bricklayers and whitewashers "artists," or our six hundred thousand pettifoggers Burkes and Websters, as apply the sacred name of "poet" to every scribbler who, like Joanna Southcott, mistakes the gestation of his contemptible abortions for the divine afflatus. Away with such senseless and profane ribaldry! America has not yet produced half a dozen writers worthy to be called poets.

Business is business.—A correspondent of the Boston Atlas mentions a trifling circumstance which occurred to him in Broadway, illustrative of the "go ahead, keep moving" character of our population. Wishing to find his way to the Snyvesian Institute, he stopped several persons, who were darting along on their way to their business, and made the inquiry. They passed on without reply, looking as if the attempt to deprive them of five minutes of their time was as felonious an offence as the picking of their pockets. Finally, seeing an old gentleman walking at a slow, gouty pace, the stranger ventured to renew his interrogatory. "Can you tell me the way to the Snyvesian Institute?"—"Excuse me," was the reply; "I haven't a moment to spare."

An eye to business.—One of the best anecdotes that we have ever seen, illustrative of the Yankee character, is that told of the two men, who were recently drafted upon the little island near the head of Niagara Falls, where they were apparently cut off from all possibility of safely reaching the main shore. At a moment when their friends had given them up as lost, and their families were bewailing their deplorable lot, the two individuals were actively employed in cutting sticks for canes, which they subsequently disposed of at a high price. This is, indeed, having "an eye to business."

Theatrical.—Mr. Forrest has commenced an engagement at the National, with his usual brilliant success. His Virginius is a noble piece of acting, and always proves attractive. At the Bowery the new spectacle of "Giaraf al Biarnek" has been produced in a very expensive style, and drawn overflowing houses. We shall watch, with interest, the race of the rival establishments.

A public deficiency.—When shall we have in New-York a good public library conducted on a liberal system, and affording to readers agreeable accommodations? Both Boston and Philadelphia are before us in this respect. The plan adopted at some of our libraries of requiring subscribers to call upon the librarian for every book they wish to take down is very annoying, inconvenient and unnecessary.

American Historical Literature.—The Royal Academy of Madrid have testified their approbation of Prescott's history of "Ferdinand and Isabella" by making him a member of their body, and furnishing him with a mass of hitherto unpublished manuscripts for the prosecution of his proposed history of the conquest of Mexico and Peru.

Competition.—It is probable there will be no fewer than eight theatres open in New-York during the coming season: the Park, National, Bowery, Eagle, Franklin, Olympic, Niblo's Opera-house and the Bowery Amphitheatre—nearly as many as there are in London, with ten times the population.

Memoir of Schlesinger.—We have never published an original paper in the Mirror that has given more universal satisfaction than the memoir of poor Schlesinger. Is it not beautifully written!

Commendrum.—When is a man part of a steanboat? When he is a-board of her.

LONG, LONG AGO.

A FAVOURITE BALLAD—BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY.

WITH FEELING.

Tell me the tales that to me were so dear, Long, a-go, long, long ago: Sing me the songs I de-lighted to hear, Long, long a-go, long a-go. Now you are come all my grief is re-moved, Let me forget that so long you have roved, Let me be-lieve that you love as you loved, Long, long a-go, long a-go.

SECOND VERSE.

Do you remember the path where we met,
Long, long ago—long, long ago I
Ah, yet you told me you ne'er would forget,
Long, long ago, long ago.
Then to all others my smile you prefer'd—
Love, when you spoke, gave a charm to each word,
Still my heart treasures the praises I heard,
Long, long ago, long ago.

THIRD VERSE.

Though by your kindness my fond hopes were raised,
Long, long ago—long, long ago.
You by more eloquent lips have been praised;
Long, long ago, long ago.
But, by long absence, your truth has been tried,
Still to your accents I listen with pride,
Happily as I was when I sat by your side,
Long, long ago, long ago.

MISCELLANY.

ON THE DEATH OF A LADY.—BY ISAAC C. PRAY.

WITHIN a dell, one spring, my boyhood knew
A silver rill, which played through clustering ranks
Of white-leaved flowers that thickly fringed its banks;
And near I often strayed, entranced, to view
And watch the lovely plants, whose blossoms grew
To fullness, as the day, with genial power,
Diffused its sun-light o'er each modest flower.
I left that home—returned, and once more flew,
While autumn reigned, back to the cherished place;
The rill was not—nor flower nor plant was there,
But earth instead, veiled by a gloomy air;
I mourned the changes on sweet Nature's face—
So lost thou vanish'd, loved one, and alone,
I weep that thou, with all thy gifts, are gone.

SINGULAR PUNISHMENT.—A pedagogue at one of the Boston public schools, has adopted a plan for the punishment of truants, singular enough, but which is said to work to a charm. When a case of truancy occurs, he enters into a compact with the culprit's parents, that they shall keep him at home for a week, dressed in girl's clothes. Rarely does a boy repeat the offence; but, if he does, a second edition of this curious punishment effectually cures him of his vagrant propensities. The parents of the Irish children heartily concur with the master in his plans, and a correspondent relates one instance in which an Irish boy, a most incorrigible truant, who cared nothing for floggings, was reformed by a week's wearing of the gown and petticoat. In our juvenile days the masters were in the habit of putting naughty boys on the "girl's side," and some of them, the sly rogues, managed to spend most of their school hours in that agreeable place.

A DEFINITION.—We went quarrel with the following definition:—"Gentility is neither in birth, manner, or fashion; but in mind. A high sense of honour, a determination never to take a mean advantage of another—an adherence to truth, delicacy and politeness towards those with whom you have dealings, are the essential and distinguished characteristics of a gentleman."

VALOR OF FRIENDSHIP.—Dr. Johnson, at a late period of his life, observed to Sir Joshua Reynolds:—"If a man does not make new acquaintances as he passes through life, he will soon find himself alone. A man, sir, should keep his friendship in constant repair."

RESIGNATION.—A head properly constituted can accommodate itself upon whatever pillow the vicissitudes of fortune may place under it.

HALCYON DAYS.—The ancients fabled that the halcyon, during the period of incubation, exercised a power over the ocean, compelling the boisterous element to remain tranquil. The nest was said to be a floating one, and the halcyon sat only for a few days, and during the depth of winter. During this period of time, the sea was supposed to remain untroubled, and the mariner might sail upon it without fear. Theophrastus says, that of all sea birds, the halcyons are "most loved and honoured by the Nereide train." Of course, all the inhabitants of the sea must have enjoyed themselves during the seven days that the bird sat "brooding on her watery nest," and felt grateful accordingly. The words halcyon days have thus become expressive of any brief and bright period of happiness.

THE SEPTEN PLACIDS DIES OF HUMAN LIFE. Alas! where are they? BRAVARY.—Lopez d'Acuna, a gallant Spaniard, who lived in 1578, recorded in the Apophthegms of Juan Ruffo, seems to have had the affections of his mind under rare command. He was called out from his tent by a sudden alarm. His servants armed him in great haste, and although he told them that his helmet pained him exceedingly, they insisted that it could not be better fitted. The brave Lopez had not leisure to contest the point: he rushed to the combat, fought with success, and at his return, unlacing his casque, and throwing it down on the ground together with his bloody car, "There," said he mildly to his awkward valets, "was I not right when I told you how you hurt me in putting on my helmet?"

A GOOD CARICATURE.—One of the cleverest caricatures issued in Paris, during Napoleon's reign, was levelled at the Prince Borghese, the husband of the emperor's sister Pauline. The prince was a good-natured, thick-headed sort of a personage, possessed of an immense fortune, and greatly devoted to the pleasures of the table. The caricaturist placed him in the centre of a group of jacksasses, making him exclaim—"Where can one be happier than in the bosom of his own family?"

BEAUTY OF AMERICAN LADIES.—However much Marryatt may have slandered us in his new book, he has made his peace with the ladies, as the following quotation from his account of an examination of the pupils at the Albany Female Academy, will show. He says:—"As young ladies are assembled here from every State of the Union, it was a fair criterion of American beauty, and it must be acknowledged that the American women are the prettiest in the whole world."

ARABIAN COURTESY.—An Arabian having brought a blush to a maiden's cheek, by the earnestness of his gaze, said to her, "My looks have planted roses in your cheeks; why forbid me to gather them?—The law permits him who sows to reap a harvest."

FEVER AND AGUE.—The Cleveland Herald says, the business season has commenced in the Mamme Valley! The shaking is said to be unusually spirited!

ANECDOTE OF CURRAN.—Mr. Curran was once asked, what an Irish gentleman, just arrived in England, could mean by perpetually putting out his tongue. "I suppose," replied the wit, "he's trying to catch the English accent."

A TRUE EPIGRAM.—Fuller, the well-known author of "British Worthies," wrote his own epitaph, as it appears in Westminster Abbey. It consists only of four words, but it speaks volumes. Namely:—"Here lies Fuller's curb."

A RARE COUPLE.—A couple at Arcis-sur-ay have celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage, the product of which has been twenty-five children—the youngest, who is a curate, performing the service.

LOVE, says Sir John Suckling, is of the nature of a burning-glass, which, kept still in one place, fireth; changed often, it doth nothing. Sir Philip Sidney says, in his "Arcadia," that it is better than a pair of spectacles, to make everything seem greater which is seen.

REPUTATION.—A good reputation is better than a fine coat, in almost any kind of business—except wooing a fashionable lady.

WELL-REMARKS

That Dutchman's apprentice had a dreadful hard time of it—he never got up early enough for breakfast—always got flogged for dinner—and then what was left of dinner was warmed up for his supper.

"I had a call, but I didn't see fit to settle," as the parson said when his creditor came to dun him.

"It's hard, but it's fare," as the coachman said when he charged passengers double price.

"You be darned," as the Yankee said ven he saw a great hole in his stocking.

"Take care of the paint," as the city gals say ven a fellow goes to kiss 'em.

"Time is money," as the man said ven he stole the patent-lever watch.

SECRET LOVE.

The fountains smoke, and yet no fumes they shew;
Starrs shine all night though undiscerned by day.

And trees do spring, yet are not seen to grow;
And shadows move, although they seeme to stay;

In Winter's wo is buried Summer's bliss,
And Love loves most, when Love most secret is.

THE ANDANTE CON VARIAZIONE.

The unseen spirit of the wind-harp breathes
Upon our early days. The infant's note
Flows into melody with motion.
Years swell that song of life with harmonies,
Affection's voice, youth's hopes and manhood's cares,
Into an anthem, pealing forth our glory,
Then sinking to a requiem:—Such is Life.

VIENNA is the Mecca of the musical pilgrim. In it are the tombs of three prophets of art—Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. Once the scene of the alternate triumphs of the Lyre and the Voice, it is still haunted by the memories of Metastasio and Schieri, behind whom, in the gloom of the past, a tall shade reminds us that Lorenzo Da Ponte there composed, to Mozart's music, the libretti of Don Juan and Il Nozze. Undisturbed by the political excitements in which the Parisian consumes life, the Viennese enjoys it, and glides his hours of ease with pleasure. "He seems music in every direction, and the very air around him is charged with chords."²

In this second Chindara our artist resolved to pass the winter. He had journeyed intently, and was now glad to pause. He needed repose: to repose to reflect on what he had seen, and to collect strength for impending trials. We are disabled, by the want of materials, from illustrating, in the details of this pilgrimage, the charm already claimed for biography in our preceding number; viz.: where it records such passages as we should all be glad to enumerate among the occurrences of our past lives.

This is the more to be regretted since, of all travellers, the artist, if his path lie through a land of art, is the happiest, because the most susceptible. The painter, approaching the recorded visions of the Immortals, the sculptor the Grecian's congealed ideal, the architect monuments, and the neighbouring ruin that foretells their decay—all enter a new world—a world of visions realized—when, from the calmer north, they have traversed the heart of Germany, and cross the Italian frontier. But the virtuoso lingers on his way. Its touching melodies and sonorous harmonies render Germany a very Paradise of the ear. From lattice to cathedral, in the street's songs and its murmurs, in the peasant's hymn and in his gay dances, the voice of many a buried compeer, responding to the invocation of the living, rushes down from the Past to animate the Present. Passing through its cities, the artist hears Mozart accepting the defiance of Rossini, Beethoven sternly rebuking the scrupulous rhythm of Strauss; and the spirits of the departed, thus obeying the summons that called them from the "silent land," present themselves before him as illustrations of genius, and of its gueridon—immortality.

Mr. Schlesinger found Vienna the musical capital still. The old Emperor had not yet joined his fathers, nor were Mozart and Beethoven—Il Flauto Magico and Fidelio—banished from the imperial presence—now honours the buffoon and the jester. Hardly were the tears dried which fell on Beethoven's tomb, and in the dying echoes of that "funeral march on the death of a hero," which "sang him to rest," five years before, mingled here and there a spent note, coming from afar; which proclaimed, in the Imperial city, the triumph of Robert le Diable, at Paris. Thalberg had not yet risen to dispute the supremacy of Liszt; Hummel still sparkled at Weimar; and hundreds of voices on the Rhine leaped forth like swords, at the bidding of Ferdinand Ries.

Our artist took up his abode in the Austrian metropolis with delight. He had been amply furnished with recommendations by his Hamburg and Leipzig friends; and, to the virtuosos, the patrons of art, in fine, the whole musical world: he was the bearer of still more valuable ones from Bach and Beethoven—the ministers of a higher power. Imbued, as he was, with the spirit of classical music, he could not remain long a stranger in a city where its altars are so numerous. He addressed the Viennese in the language of the old master of the Carinthian Gate; and was inspired by "his writings, who lived by a destiny which seemed to compel him, in his deafness, to pursue the art which ever brought to his mind that ineffaceable regret." In other words, Beethoven's sonata had been his favourite studies; and the highest title to the favour of his new friends was his wondrous skill in interpreting the mystic sayings of that Oracle of harmony—whose works are a succession of alternate revelations and predictions.

tury, which has no other minstrel. In the dark ages the troubadour's voice bore, from castle to castle, the lay of War or of Love, and the note to which its measure was attuned. The sounds, without the verse, had fallen inexpressive upon ears accustomed to the clarion and horn, while those words endued that melody, even as its holy import sanctified the monk's rude chant; and when the minstrel's corner was voiceless, some half-remembered cadence of his lay would sweep across the chords of memory, as the wind-blust, howling through the chaste hall, resounded in the ear of its lonely mistress. In these days a life of action demands stronger emotions in its repose. The bard's numbers are despatched by the "winged press" to every civilized abode, whose inmates depend no longer on "the wanderer" for the love-dream or the battle-song. Another wanderer has replaced him; it is the artist. When our restless minds would be soothed, or our languid spirits roused, we ask for music, which hath this two-fold power, over Hope and Memory, that it recalls the Past, and brightens up the Future—steeping the Present in Oblivion.

Had his skill in imprinting the music of Bach, of Beethoven, and of Hummel, upon the souls of others, been his only title to a courteous reception, Mr. Schlesinger had surely met with it at the hands of his new friends. But he came before them as a composer, likewise; and the touching Andante con Variazione, a portion of which will be found in our to-day's paper, met with so enthusiastic a reception as to take precedence of many a more considerable performance. This exquisite little poem,³ his eighth work, was inscribed to John Cramer, who was proud of the dedication; and we have chosen to prefix its title to this chapter of our author's life, of which it is no unfit emblem. A slow and gentle Theme, with variations: Is it not an image of man's existence? Is not every life, like such music, a Theme inscribed in the Book of Life, by its Great Author? Nay, are we not all Themes varied from infancy downwards, in pleasant or in mournful modes, at His Will? And this nature—our individuality—is it not given us that we may brighten our sadness or temper our joy, and to moderate the transitions, that harmony shall reconcile discordant tones and clothe the melodious note with grandeur; and this without changing the primitive air, so that our dirge shall be our cradle-song rocked to repose?

Besides being characteristic of its author's inspiration, the Andante con Variazione illustrates his mode of turning this to the advancement of his art; as a step in the progress of which, it ranks among the best efforts of that day. It is in this light that it merits especial consideration; for the history of musical art, like that of philosophy, is inseparable from its æsthetic theory.† Our digression will, therefore, require no apology, if, in order to signalize its excellencies, we attempt, with diffidence, a brief outline of the progress of music up to this performance.‡ Aristotle, treating of the progress of poetry, divides it into, nature without art, art begun, and art completed. This would, likewise, apply to the growth of music—in its theoretical part. Invention has still much to do for the mechanical perfection of instruments, but the poetic lyre, with age, seems to diminish in inspiration—to sing its past glories rather than its future triumphs.

While the respective attainments of the ancients and moderns, in many a branch of knowledge and ingenuity, continues a varied theme of inexhaustible fertility, and we may add, irreconcilable contradictions, certain arts and sciences have undergone the progressive influences of the great march. Astronomy, natural science, and mechanical invention, for example, have outstripped the limits of ancient learning, which, in poetry and philosophy, was enabled to inscribe upon the mind's white page the virgin and the richest inventions of language. Whilst painting, and particularly sculpture, depending more for their progress upon the eye and hand of genius, than upon any influence of time and public taste, easily attained as high, if not a higher degree of excellence, in an age when the human exterior was more godlike; the planetary laws, the noblest trophy of man's intellect, have been the discovery of centuries; natural science has awaited the statistics of observation, slowly unfolding truth and eradicating error; and the growth

* If a painting may be entitled a poem we hazard little in pronouncing this piece of music one, likewise. Does not music possess over painting the advantage of motion, even as the latter excels the former by its repose? † The Greeks wrote on music, but the notions of Plato, Aristotle, Pythagoras, and Plutarch, who were its chief critics, were proportioned to the musical culture of their day. Those boldest of philosophers, the Germans, have eloquently established the æsthetics of all the fine arts, save music. In vain would you search the pages of Fichte, Schelling, or Hegel, for an account of the origin and nature of musical emotions. And thus is rescued the metaphysics of perhaps the only medium, except vision, whereby man receives a mixed sensation and spiritual impression: sensation when sound impinges, abstract when the mind dwells upon its effects. We cannot so divide the mind, in its interior abstractions, that, while one part is engaged in thought, another, as active as the first, shall amaze us with operations. But we may express what strikes and pleases us in a picture—and this is criticism—and empirically examine the emotions awakened in us by musical harmonies—unless they overpower us.

‡ For an historical sketch of the pianoforte, of the music composed for it, and of the great masters to whom it owes its present flourishing condition, we would refer our readers to an article in the London and Westminster Review, No. sixty-three, which bears the trace of a master hand.

of music, in its two-fold nature of a science, the fruit of time and of an art ancillary to mechanical invention, has been as gradual as an operation of patient nature, until it is become a sentiment and a science, requiring natural inspiration and knowledge, long study and profound meditation.

In the nineteenth century, its age par excellence, the principle of the division of labour could not long escape the pianist. Whilst the organ had scarce varied during eleven hundred years, his instrument had received surprising improvements within half a century. If you would measure these, compare one of Nann's or Stadart's, Dubois's or Chickering's pianofortes, with the description* of the old Virginal, the Spinnet or the Harpsichord. First was perfected the theory then the practice of music. The old organists and clavicordists of the seventeenth century prepared the way for Handel and Sebastian Bach, who were the musical progenitors of Beethoven and Hummel. The writings of these masters, and of their contemporaries, will long suffice for the intellectual progress of music of which they may be styled "the classical authors." Meanwhile, the busy thoughts of Germany, ambitious of distinction and dissatisfied with its fractional participation in the orchestral triumph, seek to augment the resources of the instrument of its cultus. And thus have been perfected the human and the inanimate mechanisms; the artist unwearied in subduing his rebel organs, and the mechanic in preparing for them an ampler field of action.

All this is epitomized when a distinguished modern performer reveals to us his powers, and especially where the piano is their field. Yet, in a mixed audience, many will view the talent displayed as a peculiar gift—a knack akin to legerdemain. Their intellects and senses are alternately engaged in analyzing and in enjoying the effect they admire—their attention is alive, but wavering—they know not how to listen. The few connoisseurs are prepared to receive spiritual as well as sensuous delight. They appreciate the beauty of the sounds, the intellectual effort that combined them and the meaning they were designed to convey. Intenser is the gratification of the artist present. His fingers pursue those of the performer, while his spirit follows the composer's fancy in its graceful meanderings, and himself becomes for an instant transfused into the impersonation of art before him.

But to how many does such an exhibition unfold its broader humanitarian lesson of industry and perseverance! and yet the faithful record of a great artist's life must of necessity be a glorious page in the history of human resolution. A story of incessant struggles and rare triumphs, of despair yielding to hope, and of despondency succeeding joy. He who with unskilled hand draws the bow across the strings of Rapetti's violin or presses the keys of Schlesinger's piano; who attempts to urge forth the voice of Kyle's flute; or to extract melody from Boucher's violoncello, needs no other measure of the distance between himself and the artists in whose hands those instruments become enchanted things—oracles of another world. Or let him follow on the music page the notes which a skilful performer is translating at first sight, and see with what celerity he renders not only their abstract signification of time and relation, but their many inflexions and accentuations into the idiom that interprets the master's thoughts to his hearers—and if he be a reflecting being he will recognize that union of learning with inspiration which men call art.

Thus genius, in one age, despairing at the imperfect materials within its reach, strikes out a new path—an intellectual one, and in another—such is its destiny—hopeless of extending the ideal domain of art, it seeks the aggrandizement of its material empire. It was Mr. Schlesinger's aim to do both, though he had too much spontaneity to definitely anticipate the direction of his genius. Beneath the touch of his magical fingers those abstruse combinations so congenial to his spirit—from their statuesque repose in the monumental pages of Bach and Beethoven slowly arose reanimate and moved with grace and majesty. The sleeping chords awoke, as sculptured figures round a tomb at the bidding of an enchanter's wand, to sing now in signs and now in numbers the saga of the spirit at rest within. Has that strange volume of Sebastian Bach's figures and preludes—still so inaccessible to the highest intelligence, never seemed to you a Campo Santo filled with tombs, each one of which enshrines a mighty thought?

The Andante con Variazione is an ode to sadness, an elegy simple as a tear. Our musical readers will find we have only space to-day for the theme and one variation—the seventh—which, though it does not illustrate the peculiarity alluded to in our author's compositions, displays the broadest harmonic design; indeed we have rarely seen so close a chain of modulations, or vaster resources exhibited within so small a frame. We are very sorry our limits will not allow us to produce the whole piece, which contains eight stanzas, in each of which the original sentiment is expressed under a new and beautiful form. The particular one whose novelty attracted the attention of the Viennese, shall be presented in our next, and last, number. We hardly know how to describe its characteristic peculiarities to those who are strangers to the writings and style of the modern and "marvellous" school of pianoforte players—to the fantastic fulminations of Liszt, to the subtle mysteries of Chopin, to the seeming impossibilities of Henselt, or to the plenitude and grandeur of Thalberg, whose piano is an intimate friend, with which he converses eloquently, upon the most exalted themes. His fingers are each a separate slave—and with one hand he produces many effects to which two were formerly not only requisite, but just adequate. Indeed the rich melody that flows, like a vein of silver, through the envolving batteries, trills, arpeggios, and complicated episodes of his compositions, is generally executed by the two thumbs or by the fourth finger. This invests his performance with an unimaginable amplitude, a solemn and thrilling majesty, which it is as impossible to forget as it is difficult to realize, from his writings only.

Without pursuing any further these technical details, which seemed to us indispensable as elements of criticism, we may say of Mr. Schlesinger that he already divined the process by which others have since expanded the resources of music, by their developments in the art of instrumentation. He not only foresaw the path genius was about to strike out, but had marked it for his own. Nay, Thalberg, who was then preparing himself for future triumphs, recognized, in Vienna, our artist's eminent originality; and when, some years after, he became, for scope and mastery over his instrument, the Apollo of London and Paris, one of Mr. Schlesinger's friends visiting him, found the great virtuoso patiently studying the Andante con Variazioni! This occurred a few days previous to our artist's embarkation for America; and we have the authority of a pianist of extraordinary ability for saying that some of Mr. Schlesinger's late, and, we regret to say, unpublished, productions, which he was wont to perform with great ease and expression, are even more embarrassing than any known works of his accomplished rival.

It is not a singular feature in the annals of music, that great artists have composed their own performances! It is as if each musical Garrick had been, and must be, his own Shakespeare. This springs out of what we have already designated as its combined material and spiritual character—its mingled science and art.

Shortly after our artist's admission to the choicest circles of the Austrian capital, a critique in the Musical Gazette of Leipzig bestows the warmest commendations upon his Quatuor, which had just appeared there. It was from the pen of the encyclopaedist of his maiden effort, whom a letter from his brother Arnold, in 1825, shows to have been Doctor Frick—still one of the highest musical authorities of Germany.

In fulfilment of our promise to afford a specimen of our artist's correspondence, we give the following extract from a letter to one of his London publishers, which was drafted upon a slip of music paper, and appears to have been written before he reached Vienna.

"MY DEAR BELIE—Writing to an old friend creates a very pleasant sensation, as it brings back to one's mind many recollections that do to good. As I am a very lazy correspondent, I should but rarely feel that pleasure were I to think of my friends only when writing to them; but such, I can assure you, is not the case, for thoughts will follow their way and travel as well as one's self, but not always in the same direction: mine have been in England many a time since I left it. If I had accompanied them in all their rambles, you and others, and particularly Mr. Cramer, from the frequency of my visits, would certainly have considered me an intruding fellow. . . . I dare say you remember a quartetto of mine, which Mr. Cramer has also heard. As I have sold the copy-right for Germany to Breitkopf and Hærtel, I should like to publish it in London as well."

The winter months glided by as swiftly as happiness, and, at the approach of spring, our artist awoke, for the first time, to the length of his absence from his pupils in the metropolis. He wavered an instant, half tempted to yield to the inducements of his new friends, that he should make their capital his abode, and then listened to retrace his steps. After a rapid journey, he arrived in London on the fifth of March, 1839—prepared to encounter any disappointments, with the serene smile which lit up his countenance when, to the inquiries of his many friends as to "what he had been doing, he replied that "he had enjoyed himself greatly."

Although this sentiment, which was typical of the artist rather than of the man, is not recognized by a sound philosophy, it was, nevertheless, well for Mr. Schlesinger that he had this green spot in his past life, to reflect its consoling brightness upon the gloomier

"For details respecting these artists, and their inventions, we must once more refer the reader to the article in the London and Westminister Review, already cited. We may remark, however, that all their music requires constantly that the hand should span ten, eleven, and even twelve times. Henselt sometimes calls upon the player to strike the octave with the first and fourth fingers, so as to allow the thumb liberty for a further flight of two or three notes, and Chopin exacts of the third and fourth fingers the grasp of a grapple."

"We allude particularly to the variations upon the march in Tancrède—which have so often won for their lamented author the admiration and delight of our readers and concert-goers."

"We refrain from extracting this favourable notice, and cite, instead, a passage from a letter addressed to Mr. S., from Paris, in August, 1838, by a brother artist—M. Lamart. "Since our separation you have not been forgotten, but have become my daily theme of chat or of study with Mlle. Bonlie, who is enchanted with your charming music. Last Saturday we executed your Quatuor before a large company. It was admirably performed by this lady, who was accompanied by Vidal, leader at the Italian Opera. Next day, first violinelle of the grand Opera, and your humble servant, who played the tenor part. It obtained the suffrages of all present, and it was shortly published, by whom I had invited to listen to this masterpiece, which people here compare with those of Beethoven and Hummel."

years which next passed over him. It would certainly have been wise not to prolong enjoyment until it became a sacrifice. But, of all men, the artist confides himself most to his destiny, and thus it is that he oftentimes mistakes for a star, the ignis fatuus which misleads him.

It is not surprising that he should have found his once well-filled circle of pupils dispersed. Eight months had been away, and life is too brief, as well as youth too precious, to lose such a section of time. Some had soon become impatient and taken other masters; others had waited long, and a large school manifested their attachment to Mr. Schlesinger by refusing, during two months, any other instructor. A few of his pupils he recovered, and their number was, in course of time, though not greatly, increased. This gave him confidence; nor could he have desponded, as we find him shortly after united to the fond wife who, through the too brief period of their union, repaid his manly tenderness with true woman's devotion.

If, during these years, his circumstances did not improve, as he had sanguinely hoped, his unoccupied hours were profitably employed in perfecting his skill and in composing. He frequently set the whole day before his piano, and at other times inscribed upon music paper, from day-break until night-fall, those thoughts which will secure his name from oblivion. We are inclined to believe, it was at this time that he composed, or, at least, finished his masterpiece—a manuscript trio in A major; although it is marked Op. 11, and may have been sketched before the Quatuor published at Leipzig, which was numbered Op. 14. This trio, for piano, violin, and violoncello, is truly a magnificent work, which they, who have heard it, do not deem inferior to the best efforts of the great masters. We learn, with pleasure, that it is likely to appear at Paris in the course of the year.

In one of these intervals he also finished an overture for full orchestra, which had been often taken up and laid aside until he summoned energy to complete it. We have seen an extract from the London Times, which mentions its having been received with applause at John Cramer's farewell concert. We have not been able to ascertain whether it was first executed on this occasion, or at a concert of the Philharmonic Society, in the spring of 1835—respecting which the annexed memoranda will not be misplaced here. Mr. Schlesinger, it appears, had offered his overture to the society for performance, and received in reply the following note from its secretary.

March 23, 1835.

DEAR SIR—I am desired by the directors to acquaint you, that they shall have much pleasure in performing your overture at the next Philharmonic Concert, provided you do not object to its concluding the second act, as they regret that they have no other situation to offer you for it. I remain, dear sir, etc., Secretary.

Upon the back of this note we find the following reply drafted.

Friday, March 27, 1835.

DEAR SIR—Much as I appreciate the honour of having a composition of mine produced at the Philharmonic Concert, I cannot, I am sorry to say, agree to the proposal of performing my overture, for the first time, at the conclusion of the concert, for reasons unnecessary to explain, as they are obvious. Indeed the propriety of placing new manuscript overtures in the first act seems, at all times, to have been strongly felt and tacitly acknowledged by the different directors—inasmuch, as I remember only one instance to the contrary, which, at the time, surprised me. I therefore hope that the directors, upon consideration, will propose its performance without the objectionable clause; in which case I should, of course, be happy to have it executed either the next, or any other night.

Believe me, etc.

D. SCHLESINGER.

We feel confident our readers will agree with us, that this letter breathes a spirit of decision, propriety, and manly self-respect, which, though emanating from a poor artist, would not discredit the highest station. It evinces moreover a familiarity with our language which must have excited attention in the letter already cited. They will also, we have no doubt, be pleased to know that our artist carried his point. His overture was performed at the end of the first act, and met with as warm a greeting as it received here on the twenty-fifth of last June.

It was in the year 1836 that Mr. Schlesinger, weary, at his time of life, of awaiting the return of the patronage he had lost, through the contingency already alluded to, and not in consequence of any disavowal with the public, applied to the brother, then, and still established in New-York, to know what would be the probabilities of his success as an artist in this great mercantile community. Despite the prevailing opinion that we are not yet ripe for musical art in such perfection as Mr. Schlesinger combined, his relative counsel, may, urged him to venture higher. He recapitulated to him the episode of the old Garçon opera; and adduced the many tokens manifested by concerts, by operatic attempts, and by private circles, of a public inclination, which only needed occasion and instruction to ripen to a public taste.

These views confirmed those of our artist, who was not long in deciding to embark for America in the packet ship President, Captain Chadwick, bound for New-York, from Portsmouth, on the twenty-seventh of August.

It was a year or more before his departure that he received, one day, from his brother Arnold, some lines commemorative of their mother's approaching seventieth birthday, which he was requested to clothe forthwith in a fitting musical dress. The first post-day ensuing carried back the verses arranged as a quartette, not unworthy of Romeberg, which was sung on the intended occasion. A glance at the harmony and the sentiment the words im-body has hardly been necessary to convince us that they suited the chequered birth-day memories of the aged widow and mother.

The brothers of the great Sebastian Bach, from the various towns of Germany, in which they pursued their family vocation of organists, were accustomed to assemble on a certain day of each year to mingle their voices around their aged parents—invoicing and receiving a blessing. It was a festival for Erfurt, or Eisenach, or Arnstadt, when this numerous race of stalwart Thuringians gathered together there. For, albeit, the harmonious rite was inaccessible to a stranger, a breathless crowd filled the corridors of the inn that sheltered the noble family, and listened beneath its windows, to this touching anthem of filial affection, which no one could hear without emotion.

This was in the seventeenth century, when a few leagues constituted a journey. The length of one has since increased in a ratio with the intervening years. When the dispersing force has once scattered its members, what family may now thus gather together around the parent tree! In this world that widowed mother was destined never more to smile upon him whose melody "blessed her ear" on that happy, now mournful, day, before he went

GAETIES AND GRAVITIES.

MISFORTUNE AND EXILE ENNOBED.

From the French of Madame D'Alembert.

In 1793, M. de Talleyrand was in Boston. One day whilst crossing the Market-place he was compelled to stop by a long row of wagons, all loaded with vegetables. The witty courtier, generally so dead to emotion, could not but look with a kind of pleasure at these wagons, and the little wagoners, who, by-the-by, were young and pretty country-women. Suddenly the vehicles came to a stand, and the eyes of M. de Talleyrand chanced to rest upon one of the young women who appeared more lovely and graceful than the others. An exclamation escaped from his lips—it attracted the attention of the fair one, whose country dress and large hat bespoke daily visits to the market, as she beheld the astonished Talleyrand, whom she recognized immediately, burst out laughing.

"What! is it you?" exclaimed she.
"Yes, indeed, it is I. But you, what are you doing here?"
"I," said the young woman, "I am waiting for my turn to pass on. I am going to sell my greens and vegetables at the market."

At that moment the wagons began to move along, she of the straw hat applied the whip to her horse, told M. de Talleyrand the name of the village where she was living, requesting him earnestly to come and see her, disappeared, and left him as if inverted on the spot by this strange apparition.

Who was this young market-woman? Madame la Comtesse de la Tour-du-Pin (Mademoiselle de Dillon) the most elegant among the ladies of the court of Louis the sixteenth, king of France, and whose moral and intellectual worth had shone with so dazzling a lustre in the society of her numerous friends and admirers. At the time when the French nobility emigrated, she was young, lively, endowed with the most remarkable talents, and like all the ladies who held a rank at the court, had only had time to attend to such duties as belonged to her highly fashionable and courtly life.

Let any one fancy the sufferings and agony of that woman, born in the lap of wealth, and who had breathed nothing but perfumes under the gilded ceilings of the royal palace of Versailles, when all at once she found herself surrounded with blood and massacres, and saw every kind of danger besetting her young and beloved husband, and her infant child.

They succeeded in flying from France. It was their good fortune to escape from the bloody land where Robespierre and his associates were busy at the work of death. Alas! in those times of terror the poor children themselves abandoned with joy the parental roof, for no hiding-place was secure against the vigilant eye of those monsters who thirsted for innocent blood.

The fugitives landed in America, and first went to Boston, where they found a retreat. But what a change for the young, pretty, and fashionable lady, spoiled from infancy by loud and continual praises of her beauty and talents!

Mons. de la Tour-du-Pin was extravagantly fond of his wife. At the court of France he had seen her, with the proud eyes of an husband, the object of general admiration; indeed her conduct had always been virtuous and exemplary; but now in a foreign land, and among unsophisticated republicans, (1793,) what was the use of courtly refinements?

Happy as he was in seeing her escape from all the perils he had dreaded on her own account, still he could not but deplore the future lot of the wife of his bosom. However, with the prudent foresight of a good father and a kind husband, he nerved himself against despair and exerted himself to render their condition less miserable than that of many emigrants who were starving when the little money they had brought over with them had been exhausted. Not a word of English did he know, but his wife spoke it fluently, and admirably well.

They boarded at Mrs. Muller's, a good-natured, notable woman, who, on every occasion, evinced the greatest respect and admiration for her fair boarder; yet M. de la Tour-du-Pin was in constant dread lest the conversation of that good, plain and well-meaning woman might be the cause of great enmity to his lady. What a contrast with the society of such gentlemen as M. de Norbonne, M. de Talleyrand, and the high-minded and polished nobility of France! Whenever he was thinking of this transition (particularly when absent from his wife, and tilling the garden of the cottage which they were going to inhabit) he felt such pangs and heart-throbbings as to make him apprehensive on his return to Mrs. Muller to meet the looks of his beloved wife, whom he expected to see bathed in tears. Meanwhile the good hostess would give him a hearty shake of the hand, and repeat to him, "Happy husband! Happy husband!"

At last came the day when the fugitive family left the boarding-house of Mrs. Muller to go and inhabit their little cottage, when they were to be at last exempt from want, with an only servant, a negro, a kitchen-maid, a Jack-all-trades, viz., gardener, footman and cook. The last function M. de la Tour-du-Pin dreaded most of all to see him undertake.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

BORES IN WRITING AND READING.

NATURAL SCENERY.

THERE are few things more delightful in reality, and very few a greater bore at second-hand than natural scenery. By second-hand, we mean descriptions of earth, air, wood and water, not only in plain, obvious prose, but also prose in the disguise of poetry. To describe natural scenery, so as to render the description readable, requires the poet, no matter in what shape he may put together his materials. He may avail himself of the melody of verse, or he may, like Scott or Irving, send forth to the world ostensible prose, but the description itself must be real, genuine poetry, otherwise it is ordained to be "skipped."

In reading the flimsiest and most insipid dialogues there is always the stimulus of a faint curiosity. If Mr. Jenkins asks Miss Simpkins the foolish question imaginable, we glance at Miss Simpkins's foolish answer; and then we go on to Miss Simpkins's foolish question in return, and Mr. Jenkins's foolish reply. The mind is lazily dragged forward by the help of interrogations and exclamations, and breaks and dashes, with occasionally the potent aid of the mysterious asterisk * * *, and thus it goes uninterestingly over page after page—page after page, without encountering the vestige of a thought or the glimmering of an idea.

If a narrative, too, be ever so repulsive, we still wish to get to the end of it. There is a something of human interest about it; but when the startled eye lights upon a couple of pages of dense, solid description, skims over half a one, and then turns the leaf and finds other two equally dense and solid, filled with "babblings about green fields," smooth lawns, pollard water, majestic oaks, wild crags, mild moonshine, and other novel matters, the mind naturally rebels, and passes on to perhaps equally unadulterated twaddle, but put into not quite so formidably fatiguing a shape. Let prosaic writers beware of natural scenery.

DESCRIPTION OF A HEROINE.

THIS is an inevitable bore—unshunnable. So sure as you take up the novel, so sure are you to be favoured with an inventory of the heroine's perfections, mental and bodily. A good description is certainly a pleasure rather than a bore, but then that is so very rare. In general not anything can be more flat and insipid. You hear plenty of angelic virtues and angelic charms, but no impression is made—nothing painted upon the retina of the mind. All is vague and unsubstantial as a dream. If this were only done in the brief and business fashion of the Lady Oline—"Item, two lips, in different red; item, two gray eyes, with lids to them; item, one neck, one chin, and so forth," it would not so much matter. But the ambitious writer cannot consent to have his far one introduced in this unceremonious manner. Earth, air, and water must be searched for becoming similitudes, and special contributions levied on the feathered tribes and the vegetable creation. Her brow is of the Parian marble, her skin is of the driven snow, or anything else equally white, and equally unlike good wholesome flesh and blood. The rose and the lily have of late, it is true, got rather into disrepute as illustrations of her cheeks, but her voice, of course, resembles "the warble of a bird," or has a "silvery sound." What is meant by those "silvery sounds" or tones we could never exactly make out; but if any gentleman tries the experiment of chucking a dollar, half-dollar, or ten cent piece upon the table, and then says that he would like his wife's or mistress's voice to resemble that, we have only to say that we hold his taste to be decidedly bad. In our ears it has a mighty shrewish sound. It hints of curtain lectures!

Instead of all these tinklings and warblings, how much more unassuming, simple, definite and distinct, is the great master's description:

"Her voice was soft and low:
An excellent thing in women!"

But a heroine is an uncommon sort of creature, common words, it seems, are not available in describing her.

It is amusing, too, to mark how certain matters have settled down to rules. For instance, if there should chance to be a brace of heroines in a novel, and they should happen, as is frequently the case, to be sisters, any reader of common sagacity or ordinary experience can at once sketch their pictures in imagination. In ordinary life there not unfrequently prevails among members of the same family a certain similarity in manner, person, features, or complexion, which goes by the name of a "family likeness." This is never the case in novels. Two sisters are always so specially different as really to create an unpleasant suspicion in the mind of the thinking reader as to whether or not they can have had a common parentage. Caroline is tall and stately—Ellen short and sylph-like. Caroline's eyes are dark and lustrous—Ellen's blue and tender. The hair of the one is black as the wing of the raven, that of the other like waving gold. The one

"Walks in beauty like the night
Of cloudless climes and starry skies,
And all that's good of dark and bright
Meet in her aspect and her eyes;"—

the other is an Aurora—"fair as the opening morn," which, by the by, is generally foul and misty. The one is an Italian, the other a Scandinavian; or, to be classical, the one is a Juno, the other a Psyche. And then comes the puzzle in the mind of the ingenious describer which of the two is the most attractive. Whether the superb and dignified Caroline, or the gentle and sportive Ellen is the most enchanting.

After a page or two of bewildering doubt, this is generally left to the decision of the reader; and two heroines, of very different tastes, are provided for the accommodation of the two heroines.

DESCRIPTION OF A HERO.

But if the description of a heroine be somewhat of a bore, that of a hero is infinitely more so. The ladies can much better put up with details of female loveliness, than the gentlemen with inventories of male perfections.

Besides, there is so much more truth in the one than the other. What a very rare thing is a handsome man. He is an absolute Phoenix—a black swan. When we look round among our friends and acquaintance, or upon the crowds we encounter in our daily walks, what a very small quantity of "fine, classical features" do we meet with. How rare are "high and lofty" foreheads, and "finely-chiselled" nostrils. On the contrary, what numbers of snipe and snub-noses, of high-cheek bones and hollow cheeks, of extensive mouths, sans teeth, of dull and sunken eyes, of cadaverous complexions, encounter us at every turn. How many are short and fat—how many long and lanky; and nearly all how awkward!

In fact a very handsome man ought to be taken hold of and put in a show. It is not fitting that he be allowed to go at large. What is he but a reproach to his fellow-creatures—an odious comparison—a walking insult!

Let him be confined or tattooed.

It may not be new, but it is very true, that most things are valued in proportion to their rarity. Men are vainer of personal beauty than women, and far less skilful in concealing their vanity; consequently, a handsome man is a decided impertinence—a thoroughbred Narcissus. He is of opinion that the business of the world stands still, in order to give the people engaged therein leisure to contemplate him. When he appears, he thinks that all thoughts and emotions in the breast of every one present are suspended or obliterated in order to make room for an intense feeling of admiration. He feels quite certain that every woman who looks upon him loves him, and that her peace of mind is from thenceforth sacrificed; and he has even the egregious folly to suppose that he is admired by those of his own sex! Poor deluded mortal! Little does he dream that men of sense never bestow a thought upon his pretty face, and that those who are not overburdened with that quality, feel a very strong desire, indeed, to kick him.

Why, then, if good looks in reality so greatly interfere with the accumulation of good sense, and so much deteriorate a man for social and companionable purposes, why should we be bored with those pen and ink Adonises?

It is not necessary.

In real life how many handsome women do we find linked to plain, and sometimes odd-looking fishes, whom there is every reason to suppose they are tolerably fond of. Why then in that which professes to be a copy from life, should it be held impossible for the heroines to fall in love with any other than regular pieces of physical perfection? They would much rather have a plain man who admired them than a handsome man who admired himself. And when they have once got over a singularity in outline, or a deficiency in filling-up, they think little more about it, being by no means such slaves to the eye and appearances as sensible, reasonable, self-sufficient men. In all the profound and beautiful sayings of Shakespeare there is not one more profound or beautiful than where the duke tells Viola—

"For, lo, however we do praise ourselves,
Our fancies are more giddy and infirm,
More ungiving, wavering, sooner lost and won,
Than women's are."

If there was no love in the world except what was kindled by the contemplation of handsome features, it would be a remarkably scarce commodity, and the population of the United States would not double itself with anything like the rapidity with which it does at present.

SPINNING.

A novel must be in three volumes. It matters not whether the author's story is long or short—his plot intricate or simple—his incident crowded or scarce—his characters few or many—in all cases his novel must be in three volumes. It is the publisher's fat. If Richardson had lived in those days, he would have had to have cut down Clarissa Harlowe, Pamela, and Sir Charles Grandison to three volumes each, and Goldsmith would have had to have expanded his charming little Vicar of Wakefield to the same dimensions. A tale in one or two volumes is deemed trivial, and in four or upwards cumbersome, and therefore no novel-writer, unless he be an established favourite, dares depart from the beaten track of three octavos or duodecimos. This gives rise to a systematic process of elaboration which is a very great bore. Indeed there is no end to the affectation and flimsiness of which it is productive; and an author is frequently obliged to wire-draw his scenes and thoughts in a way which is very affecting.

The interrogation and exclamation are much in request and special favourites with those who practise the art of spinning. Sometimes there is a good deal of ingenuity manifested in this department, and sometimes there is no ingenuity at all. The design is frequently too apparent—too barefaced; neither wit nor humour is employed to conceal the fraud. A gentleman's inquiries about little or nothing are numerous in the extreme, and his surprise about little or nothing painful and prolonged to a painful extent. For instance—

"Were you at Sanderson's last night, Tom?"
"Yes."
"Crowded?"

"A regular jam! Who do you think your false fair one, little Emily—"
"Stuff!"
"Led off the ball with!"
"Oh! Watkins, of course."
"No."
"No!"
"Not Watkins!"
"No—I'll tell you—not Watkins."
"Harry Selborne, perhaps."
"Wrong again. What think you of Fred. Thompson?"
"Pooh!"
"Fact!"
"Nonsense!"
"Pon honour!"
"Fred. Thompson!"
"Fred. Thompson."
"You don't say so! What will Sophy Tompkins say to that!"
"Swear she never cared a straw about him, to be sure."
"Well!"

Etc. etc. etc. ad libitum.
Now in place of such twaddle as this, to which plenty of parallels are to be found in our modern novels, would it not be equally instructive and answer the great object of filling the page just as well to do it in this fashion—

"—————"
"—————"
"—————"
"—————"
"—————!"

APOLOGISM.

Another bore is the number of apophisms, or what are meant to be passed off as such, with which our latest books of fiction are interlarded. They are intended to look witty or profound, and are either paradoxes or bald truisms disguised in humbly—most commonly the latter. Sometimes they are sheer nonsense. But what of that. How many novel readers stop to analyze.

Any quantity of such things as follow may be weeded out of a great many of our late novels:

To die young is to escape the thousand heartaches and calamities of after years!

Every flower that blows and withers—every blade of grass that springs and fades—every scared leaf and sapless twig proclaim to us manfully, yet distinctly, we are mortal.

Fortune, like the nettle, requires to be boldly grasped; but leave a sting in escaping.

Love, on the surface of the dark world, is like moonlight on the treacherous billows. A moment it dances in radiant brightness, and then is lost for ever in the black vortex of obscurity!

The dawn of life is full of hope and joyous expectation—bright beams the sun and softly blows the wind. How different is the close!

FRENCH LITERATURE.

SPIRIT OF THE PARISIAN JOURNALS.

Translated for the New York Mirror.

ENDURING AFFECTION.

A young and pretty woman made her appearance the other day at the gate of the Pere la Chaise cemetery, attended by a footman, who held under his arm a coffin-shaped box, richly ornamented. The keeper asked what were the contents of the box, to which the lady replied, with tears in her eyes, that it contained the mortal remains of the boug who in his life engrossed all her affections, her beloved Pyramus, an English spaniel, who had breathed his last the day before, and whose corpse she wished to deposit in her family vault. Though Madame de G — was most eloquent in depicting the many good qualities of the deceased, which, as she thought, fully entitled him to a place among her human friends, the keeper was inexorable. The lady wept and insisted, and the interference of the police was necessary to induce her to retire.

MY NEIGHBOUR.

There are some troublesome neighbours who are the plague of a man's life. They borrow your umbrella when you want to go out, come and pay you a visit when you want to work at home, play the French horn when you want to go to sleep, and give a party on the very evening you want to finish a tragedy.

My neighbour has none of these faults, but he contrives to inconvenience me every moment. He pries into everything in my room, destroys my papers, and devours my breakfast. Butter, cheese, poultry, game, almost every thing is acceptable to him; and he never eats bread when he can get cake. He is neither a landowner nor elector, he pays no rent for his apartments, yet lives very comfortably. My neighbour is very gentlemanly in his habits, but never comes home till after midnight, and is fond of serenades and nightly meetings with the objects of his affections. In other respects, his character is good; he is neither a fop nor a bully, and avoids rather than seeks quarrels. He bears no malice towards those who treat him ill, and if you turn him out of one door, he will come back by the other. He goes from house to house, making himself comfortable wherever he goes, and staying till he is tired, without ever waiting for an invitation. Familiar as he is with your provisions, only take the trouble to put the stoppers in your decanters, and he will not meddle with them. He is always well-dressed, his boots never creak on the floor, for their soles are of the finest chamois and the upper leather of India-rubber. My neighbour, though he knows that I must wear a coat out at the elbows, never wears anything but the softest fur. He never lays in fuel, but spends the cold season in my chimney-corner. All this I have to put up with in fact, I think myself lucky, if he does not invite his friends to his nocturnal orgies, but contents himself with abusing my hospitality, rummaging among my furniture, and plundering my larder. My neighbour is one of those personages who must be well-treated. It is well known that whenever he leaves a residence, it is sure to tumble down soon. This troublesome neighbour, dear reader, is—a mouse.

THE LUCKY ACADEMICIAN.

Among all the jokes that have been got up at the masked balls of the opera, we know of none better than one played off on a distinguished academician, who was mystified during the whole evening by his daughter, whom he had left sick in bed at home, and was very far from supposing to be so near him. It may be thought strange that a father should not recognize his child, but, though passing strange, it is true. Beads, the young lady appeared on that night in a character entirely new to her, that of a coquette; no wonder that the parent did not recognize his modest, quiet daughter in the lively flirt who tormented him incessantly. The poor man could not, for the life of him, imagine who the lady could be; so young, apparently, yet so well acquainted with all the incidents of his early life, who had all his writings by heart, who adored his favourite authors, and flattered him so skilfully, not only in his tastes, but in every whim. The academician was in the seventh heaven. He was a young widower, well looked upon by the fair, and he saw nothing extraordinary in his having produced an impression on his unknown charmer, the only thing that surprised him, was the exact conformity of all her tastes, opinions, studies and prejudices to his own. The night flew away fast in conversation. Toward the close of the ball, the gentleman invited his fair unknown to supper. She accepted, stipulating only that she should not remove her mask. Another wonder! she knew exactly what dishes he liked, and what was his favourite wine. At the close of the supper, the gentleman politely offers to escort the lady to her residence. "No, no," says she, "I am determined to remain incognito. But I will wait on you home." The carriage stops in front of his house, he takes leave of his fair unknown, and steps out, alone, as he supposes, and sighing at the necessity of separation, but finds his companion has entered the house with him, and is tripping lightly up stairs. Overcome with surprise, he exclaims, "Ah, madam, is it possible! Such happiness!"—A burst of laughter interrupts his passionate exclamations, and a well-known voice cries from the top of the staircase, "Good night, papa, I am much obliged to you; I have spent a very pleasant evening."

PRIVATE JOURNAL OF LOUIS XVI.

Some five years ago, a mass of papers, neatly written and arranged, were found at a rag-dealer's, which a collector of manuscripts bought on speculation, so to speak. They turned out to be a curious, if not a valuable collection, being a private journal kept by Louis XVI. for four or five years. They contain little of general interest, but are curious, as throwing much light on the habits of the unhappy monarch. He seems to have been minute and accurate to excess in all he did, and has regulated in his journal the employments and incidents of every single day of his life, with the greatest scrupulousness. Thus we find under the date of first of January, 1779,

Paid on hand first January.

48 rousaux of 1200 livres each.....	50 00
10 03 paires.....	5 00
17 pieces of 34 sous.....	5 18
40.....	17 12
91.....	26 14

130.....	10 4

51,45 14 sous.

In September, 1782, he breaks off in one of these additions and notes in the margin:—"There has been for some time back, an error in my accounts that I cannot trace; but on the ninth of this month I found in the bottom of a drawer some money that had been forgotten for several years, therefore I make a new general statement." We have said he was minutely accurate in his accounts. For instance:

July, 1772, spent for a watch-glass, twelve sous.
August, " " to Haslard for postage, six sous.
September, " " L'Epinau, for a bowl, six sous.
January, 1773, for a quire of paper, six sous.
February, " " for cotton, six sous.
May, " " to L'Epinau, for sundries, four sous, three deniers.

There are, however, of course, some larger entries, and of more importance. Thus he writes—"Twenty seventh December, 1776, gave the queen twenty-five thousand livres"—and below, "Part of a sum of three hundred thousand livres which I am to pay Boehmer (the court jeweller) with interest, in six years, for the queen's earrings." Eighteenth February, 1777, paid the queen on account of the one hundred and sixty-two thousand six hundred livres for Boehmer's diamond bracelets, twenty-four thousand livres. First April, 1775, paid M. de Sartine for Beaumarchais, eighteen thousand livres." Louis the XVI. used to add at the end of every month, his winnings or losses at play. Thus we have—"4 October, 1779, lost at play fifty-nine thousand three hundred and ninety-four livres. March, 1770, my partner lost at lansquenet, thirty-six thousand livres. February, 1781, lost at play fifteen livres." He shared in the fondness for lotteries, which was one of the weaknesses of the age. We find entered—"Twenty eighth December, 1777, to M. Necker, for lottery tickets, six thousand livres. January, 1783, second loan in the lottery, nine hundred and ninety livres Thirteenth do. two hundred and twenty-five do." The same minuteness is found in everything. At the end of every year he used to make up a statement of the way in which he had spent every day, thus:

Recapitulation of the year 1775.		Over 157
Stag hunts.....	79	4
Boar hunts.....	14	8
Hare do.....	7
Battues.....	4
Shooting excursions.....	37	13
Other excursions.....	19
Reviews.....	17
	157	23

He went so far as to put down the quantity of game killed every month, and adds figures up at the end of the year. 'Thus we find in December, 1775, he killed fifteen hundred and sixty-four head, and in the whole year, eight thousand four hundred and twenty-four head.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENTS.

MUSINGS IN THE METROPOLIS.

English newspapers—Provincial and Metropolitan—Marriages in high and middle life.

The English have the best and the worst newspaper-press in the world. Their country journals are perhaps, as a body, rather formal and flat, but are, upon the whole, good, sensible, decent news and business vehicles; and being, for the most part, permanent and profitable, the proprietors attach a degree of value to the character of those journals which secures their pages from the admission of offensive matter, with the exception of now and then a little local spleen. This is a great good. A respectable mediocrity in such matters is of no little importance. But it is in London where the perfection and degradation of the press is exhibited in the strongest colours. The talent of a first-rate London journal, though great, may, it is true, be easily enough equalled elsewhere, for there are clever men and able writers in all countries. But it is the combination of talent, unlimited capital, and the perfection of machinery and system, which renders a London journal of the first class unique. On no other sheet of paper is the same quantity of news presented, drawn from all the kingdoms and corners of the earth with almost miraculous despatch—condensed, put in form, and again disseminated in so many varied channels to so many people with equal rapidity. In the United States an important piece of intelligence or document—the President's Message, for instance—is sometimes sent a very great distance in a wonderfully short space of time, but then this is an event, and is chronicled accordingly. Here the confined geographical limits of the land, the density of the population, the innumerable excellent roads which intersect the country in all directions, and the numberless quantity of mails and fast coaches, to say nothing of railroads, render the rapid and regular transmission of news as much a matter of course as eating and drinking. A gentleman residing between one hundred and fifty and two hundred miles from London would think it the strangest thing in the world—"a gap in nature," in fact—if the London journal of the previous evening was not brought in along with his toast and coffee at breakfast the next morning. He would consider himself a singularly ill-used personage, and write to the proprietors forthwith, to know the meaning of the "inaccountable delay!"

Those things will be so in the United States; and in a marvelously short time too, considering the immense extent of country. But still it will require some time; the draining of a few more swamps, the felling of a few more forests, the unmaking of a few "corduroy" roads.

Of another class of the London press, of which the "Satirist" may be regarded as the head, it is scarcely worth while to speak, the said class having displayed an aptitude in sinking into the lowest depths of infamy, which, fortunately, is almost unparalleled. Those papers are compounded, for the greatest part, of the most audacious falsehoods, the most reckless slanders, the grossest lies, and the most outrageous libels. But their character is the antidote to their contents. Highwaymen are a moral, manly, and decent set of individuals compared with the cutters for those journals. The pimps in the old plays, more aptly than anything else, illustrate the moral and mental qualifications of these pen and ink panders.

Amid the minor faults and follies of the more respectable London papers, there are not any of a more fulsome or disagreeable character than the silly and ostentatious details of the particularities of what are termed "Marriages in Fashionable Life." Doubtless those marriages are important enough to the parties immediately concerned, but what has the public to do with the minute frivolities connected with them. What has the public to do with what the bride wore, with who were the bridesmaids, who gave her away, where the "happy pair" went to partake of a "cold collation," when they set off again for the seat of —, in the county of —, and where they finally stopped for the night. Besides, without being very squeamish, there is something not over delicate in thus tracking the new married couple through all the proceedings of the day, almost to their very bedchamber. We are not in a state of innocence now. A decent privacy is required about those matters.

Such details are exceedingly foolish and impertinent. As if two pieces of humanity could not agree to be married in an honest, legal way, without an announcement to that effect being trumpeted throughout the whole length and breadth of the land. There is, something coarse about it, which does not at all accord with the presumed ultra refinement of the parties. Now when Mr. Grubb marries Miss Higgins, there is no such ridiculous fuss; yet Grubb is perhaps a more "personable" man than the marquis; and Miss Higgins, (despite the name she bears and the name she is ordained to bear,) is allowed, even by her female friends, to be "rather good-looking." Yet there is nothing said in the papers about Grubb's new blue coat and bright buttons, or Miss Higgin's smart pelisse and blonde veil; no notice taken whatever of the dinner after they come from church, or of the toasts and proceedings after the dinner. Why this invidious distinction? What makes it more provoking, too, is that there might be something good extracted from an old-fashioned wedding of this sort, which cannot be expected where things are conducted with strict propriety and cold artificiality. Indeed, it may be laid down as an axiom, that there is far more heart, character and amusement in the great doings of the little, than there is in the little doings of the great. It would be pleasant to read how Grubb looked simple and satisfied, and Mrs. Grubb pretty and perturbed. How the bridesmaids, Miss Lamb and Miss Thompson, were like to die of laughing at the facetious sayings and doings of the sprightly groomsman, Mr. Larkins.* How after the cloth was withdrawn, and the regular toasts of the "new married pair," and "the single married and the married happy," had been given by the two old fathers, the lively Larkins, tired of such formal sentiments, looks sly and knowing, and, with reference to what may be produced by the "coming on of time," calls for a bumper in honour of the "first pair of little shoes!" whereupon the father, and mother, and older guests laugh vociferously, and the bride coughs and puts her handkerchief to her face, and Miss Lamb coughs and does the like, and so does Miss Thompson; then Miss Lamb titters, and so does Miss Thompson; and then Miss Lamb, unable longer to restrain herself, goes off in a convulsive fit of laughter, and so does Miss Thompson; and then the bride whispers reproachfully across the table—"Well, well, Miss Lamb, it will be your turn next!" upon which a Miss Jones speaks up and says—"Yes, it is not for nothing that Miss Lamb is so often walking with we have all a guess who!" whereupon Miss Lamb puts in a disclaimer, and assures them that they "are mistaken," but Miss Thompson settles the affair by significantly shaking her head and most positively affirming that "she knows what she knows!"

Now there might be some entertainment in the details of a wedding of this class, but what can be expected where everything is conducted according to the strictest etiquette—where there are no natural outbreaks, and where the parties are regularly trained to the attainment of invincible self-possession? Where is either the fun or edification of learning that—on Monday morning last, the Honourable Augustus Fitz-fiddlestick was united to the Honourable Lady Mary Fiddlestick, third daughter of the most noble the Marquis of Fiddlestick; that the ceremony was performed by the right reverend the Bishop of —; the bride given away by the Duke of —; that the Honourables Miss — and — were the bridesmaids, and all the rest of the rubbish!

Would it not be better to leave it all — together, further than a simple announcement of the fact.

The following passages we select from the letters of a friend in London, received by the last steam-packet.

MEMORANDA IN LONDON.

We left Liverpool at eight o'clock this morning; and at six this evening I find myself snugly domiciled at Long's Hotel, in London.

Have just returned from the Italian opera. At my first entrance I was stopped by the door-keeper because I had on a frock coat and boots—was obliged to go home and dress—robe black, and strolling in, called for box one hundred and twenty-four, which number happened to be on my ticket. I was immediately conducted up three or four flights of stairs by two livery servants in attendance—a door, on which was the name of Lord John Russel, was opened, and supposing that "it was all right and no mistake," I went. An elderly lady and two beautiful young creatures were present, who looked at me rather hard, until the unpleasant suspicion began to dawn upon me, that I was in the wrong box. I bowed. The ladies bowed. I explained the circumstances of my being brought there, apologized, and started to leave the box. But the ladies very graciously invited me to remain, and with so much sincerity of manner, that I quietly took a professed seat, and stayed there during the performances. Heard Gais, in Norma, and was, of course, enchanted. The queen and her suite were present. It was the first time I had seen her majesty. I was instantly reminded of Sully's portrait, which is decidedly the most faithful that has appeared. There is much character and energy about the nostrils, but the eye seemed quiescent and contemplative. The queen was evidently deeply absorbed in the performances. She seemed to attract none of the attention of the audience.

Toward the conclusion of the opera, a gentleman entered the box where I was seated, who, on learning that I was a stranger and an American, was pleased to treat me with marked civility. To him I was indebted for pointing out to me some well-known characters, who were present. Count D'Orsay was among the number. He is tall and finely proportioned—but his face can be merely called a pretty one. There was altogether too much of the puffed, self-satisfied fop in his expression. Lady Blessington, who sat in the same box, reminded me of Miss Ayres, of the National, only she is not half so pretty nor half so young as the actress.

* Terri's beautiful but melancholy bridesmaid in the well-known picture, and indeed all dolorous bridesmaids, are exceptions to the rule. No human being is so pre-disposed towards laughter—he charged with it—so incessantly on the brink of a titter, as a bridesmaid. We speak of them of course in their penial, natural state. When fearfully fashionable or shocking sentimental, it is another matter.

Charles Dickens, (Boz), who sat with his pretty wife, in one of the most secluded parts of the dress circle, seemed to be more of a lion than even the queen herself. He is a handsome fellow, apparently about twenty-six, a little pale and studentlike in his appearance, but with an eye that seems to take in more at a single glance than a dozen pair of ordinary eyes could do in a whole day. Dickens leads quite a retired life, and is rarely seen in public. He is rapidly reaping a harvest both of laurels and of gold. His habits are sedate and domestic. Occasionally he appears at the Garrick Club, but even there his attendance has of late been less frequent. "So young, and so famous! what a pity he is married!" said a young lady. Query: whether he is not in a great measure indebted to the restrictions of a married life, for the leisure and the habits essential to continued and permanent literary success? Would not the temptations of society, where he would be courted and caressed by the wealthy and the beautiful, interfere too much with his literary studies and labours, were he a single man? I merely throw out the suggestion. Its solution must be a matter of considerable interest to authors and artists in general.

Milnes, a young M. P. in the conservative ranks, I believe, was pointed out to me. He is above the middle height, with a fine, earnest, intelligent countenance. He and our countryman, Daniel Webster, appear, by the way, to have taken quite a liking to each other. They are seen often together—though I could not discover that Webster was present at the opera. Milnes is an accomplished poet. There is a review, but not a very friendly one, of some of his productions in the last Quarterly. He has written some beautiful things in Blackwood. The following sonnet is not unworthy of Wordsworth:

TO QUEEN VICTORIA, ON A PUBLIC CELEBRATION.

How art thou calm amidst the storm, young queen!
Amid this wide and joy-distracted throng!
Where has thy range of life-experience been
To keep thy heart thus equable and strong!
Can the secluded cold which may belong
To such high state compose thy noble mien,
Without the duteous posture not to wrong
The truth of some ideal spirit seen!

Purchase the depth of what I boldly asked
None know,—nor I, nor thou.—Yet let us pray
That thou, in this exceeding glory masked,
Be not to loss of thy true self beguiled;
Still able at thy Maker's feet to lay
The living, loving nature of a child!

But there was no one, towards whom, when his name was mentioned, my eyes were directed with more rapidity than towards Thomas Campbell, one of the few names in modern English poetry destined to endure. He is rather below the common height, and there is nothing in his features indicative of intellectual greatness. I confess, I was disappointed; and yet as his face lit up in conversation, I was inclined to retract my judgment. Campbell, not Cammell, is the way in which he likes to hear his name pronounced.

But I have prated till my candle is sinking in the socket. The hallet of "The Gipsy" succeeded Norma: in which Fanny Elster took the principal part. More of her anon. Her sister also danced. I was once more enchanted. Good night.

Have you read the review of Prescott's "History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella," in the Quarterly for June? I have heard the article attributed by some to Southey, and by others to Lockhart. It is by neither, but by a young man named Ford, who has passed some years in Spain. The flippant, ex cathedra style of the critic is quite amusing. There is a parade of historical acumen and research in his comments, but it is made without much regard to congruity or appropriateness. The review is of that haughty, assuming character, marked by that aristocratic fastidiousness and forced contempt for everything republican, that is at once unphilosophical and pitiful. On a large scale this disposition led to the French revolution, and, in all cases, it is the prolific mother of Jacobinism. Mr. Ford, in his notices of Mr. Prescott's book, speaks of Wellington as the greatest captain "the world has ever seen." Whew! Please to ask Mr. Paine, the astronomer, to take the dimensions of that lie, if it will not strain his quadrants and sextants too much.

I have just heard, with regret, of the death of Winstanley Mackworth Præd, a member of parliament, and well known to you, doubtless, by his poetical productions. He was in his thirty-seventh year, and fell a victim to consumption. When an Eton boy, some fifteen or twenty years since, he was one of the editors of that sparkling publication, "The Etonian." His poems in the London Magazine were also much admired. His style was unique and original. You cannot fail to remember his "Palinodia," "Hobbledehoys," "Separation," and other lyrical pieces. He has written the best character in the language, and quite elevated the character of that species of composition. I hope that some of his friends will give us a full collection of his poems.

At the celebration of the English Agricultural Society at Oxford, last week, Mr. Webster was present, and made a speech in reply to a complimentary toast given by the chairman, Earl Spencer. A friend, who happened to be one of the audience, tells me that none of the speakers on the occasion produced a greater impression, or were interrupted by bursts of applause more frequent and enthusiastic. His allusion to his "kith and kin of the old Saxon race" was loudly cheered by the yeomanry present, and when he arrived at that point of his address, where he remarked, that although his ancestors for several generations lay buried beneath the soil of the Western continent, yet that there had been a time when his ancestors and the ancestors of those who heard him had toiled in the same cities and villages, cultivated adjacent fields, and worked together to build up that great structure of civil polity, which had made England what England was—the applause was overwhelming and deafening, a great part of the audience rising and giving three hearty hurrahs. Well may we be proud of such a representative of republican America! I assure you, with sincerity, that there is not a foreigner in the country who commands a greater degree of public attention and respect. Already he is familiarly spoken of as "the great man from America." His speech at the agricultural dinner was just what it ought to have been—brief, pertinent, hearty and unadorned.

INDIAN TALES AND LEGENDS.

THE SUMMER-MAKER.*

BY H. R. SCHOOLCRAFT.

THERE lived a celebrated hunter on the southern shores of Lake Superior, who was considered a Manitó by some, for there was nothing but what he could accomplish. He lived off the path, in a wild, lonesome plain, with a wife whom he loved, and they were blessed with a son, who had attained his thirtieth year. The hunter's name was Ojegg, or the Fisher, which is the name of an expert, sprightly little animal common to the region. He was so successful in the chase, that he seldom returned without bringing his wife and son a plentiful supply of venison, or other dainties of the woods. As hunting formed his constant occupation, his son began early to emulate his father in the same employment, and would take his bow and arrows, and exert his skill in trying to kill birds and squirrels. The greatest impediment he met with, was the coldness and severity of the climate. He often returned home, his little fingers benumbed with cold, and crying with vexation at his disappointment. Days, and months, and years passed away, but still the same perpetual drizzle of snow was seen, covering all the country as with a white cloak.

One day, after a fruitless trial of his forest skill, the little boy was returning homeward with a heavy heart, when he saw a small red squirrel gnawing the top of a pine bur. He had approached within a proper distance to shoot, when the squirrel sat up on his hind legs and thus addressed him:

"My grandchild, put up your arrows, and listen to what I have to tell you." The boy complied rather reluctantly, when the squirrel continued: "My son, I see you pass frequently, with your fingers benumbed with cold, and crying with vexation for not having killed any birds. Now, if you will follow my advice, we will see if you cannot accomplish your wishes. If you will strictly pursue my advice, you will have perpetual summer, and you will then have the pleasure of killing as many birds as you please; and I will also have something to eat, as I am now on the point of starvation."

"Listen to me. As soon as you get home you must commence crying. You must throw away your bow and arrows in discontent. If your mother asks you what is the matter, you must not answer her, but continue crying and sobbing. If she offers you anything to eat, you must push it away with apparent discontent, and continue crying. In the evening, when your father returns from hunting, he will inquire of your mother what is the matter with you. She will answer that you came home crying, and would not so much as mention the cause to her. All this while you must not leave off sobbing. At last your father will say, 'My son, why is this unnecessary grief? Tell me the cause. You know I am a spirit, and that nothing is impossible for me to perform.' You must then answer him, and say that you are sorry to see the snow continually on the ground, and ask him if he could not cause it to melt, so that we might have perpetual summer. Say it in a supplicating way, and tell him this is the cause of your grief. Your father will reply, 'It is very kind of you to accuse your father of being so cruel, and for my love for you, I will use my utmost endeavours.' He will tell you to be still, and cease crying. He will try to bring summer with all its loveliness. You must then be quiet, and eat that which is set before you."

The squirrel ceased, and the boy promised obedience to his advice, and departed. When he reached home, he did as he had been instructed, and all was exactly fulfilled, as it had been predicted by the squirrel.

Ojegg told him that it was a great undertaking. He must first make a feast, and invite some of his friends to accompany him on a journey. Next day he had a bear roasted whole. All who had been invited to the feast came punctually to the appointment. There were the Otter, Beaver, Lynx, Badger, and Wolverine. After the feast, they arranged it among themselves to set out on the contemplated journey in three days. When the time arrived, the Fisher took leave of his wife and son, as he foresaw it was for the last time. He and his companions travelled in company day after day, meeting with nothing but the ordinary incidents. On the twentieth day they arrived at the foot of a high mountain, where they saw the tracks of some person who had recently killed an animal, which they knew by the blood that marked the way. The Fisher told his friends that they ought to follow the track, and see if they could not procure something to eat. They followed it for some time; at last they arrived at a lodge, which had been hidden from their view by a hollow in the mountain. Ojegg told his friends to be very sedate, and not to laugh on any account. The first object that they saw was a man standing at the door of the lodge, but of so deformed a shape that they could not possibly make out who or what sort of a man it could be. His head was enormously large; he had such a queer set of teeth, and no arms. They wondered how he could kill animals. But the secret was soon revealed. He was a great Manitó. He invited them to pass the night, to which they consented.

He boiled his meat in a hollow vessel made of wood, and took it out of this singular kettle in some way unknown to his guests. He carefully gave each their portion to eat, but made so many odd movements that the Otter could not refrain from laughing, for he is the only one who is spoken of as a jester. The Manitó looked at him with a terrible look, and then made a spring at him, and got on him to smother him, for that was his mode of killing animals. But the Otter, when he felt him on his neck, slipped his head back and made for the door, which he passed in safety; but went out with the curse of the Manitó. The others passed the night, and they conversed on different subjects. The Manitó told the Fisher that he would accomplish his object, but that it would probably cost him his life. He gave them his advice, directed them how to act, and described a certain road which they must follow, and they would thereby be led to the place of action.

They set off in the morning, and met their friend, the Otter, shivering with cold; but Ojegg had taken care to bring along some of the meat that had been given him, which he presented to his friend. They pursued their way, and travelled twenty days more before they got to the place which the Manitó had told them of. It was a most lofty mountain. They rested on its highest peak to fill their pipes and refresh themselves. Before smoking, they made the customary ceremony, pointing to the heavens, the four winds, the earth, and the zenith; in the meantime, speaking in a loud voice, addressed the Great Spirit, hoping that their object would be accomplished. They then commenced smoking.

They gazed on the sky in silent admiration and astonishment, for they were on so elevated a point, that it appeared to be only a short distance above their heads. After they had finished smoking, they prepared themselves. Ojegg told the Otter to make the first attempt to try to make a hole in the sky. He consented with a grin. He made a leap, but fell down the hill struck by the force of his fall; and the snow being moist, and falling on his back, he slid with velocity down the side of the mountain. When he found himself at the bottom, he thought to himself, it is the last time I make such another jump, so I will make the best of my way home. Then it was the turn of the Beaver, who made the attempt, but fell down senseless; then of the Lynx and Badger, who had no better success.

"Now," says the Fisher to the Wolverine, "try your skill; your ancestors were celebrated for their activity, hardihood, and perseverance, and I depend on you for success. Now make the attempt." He did so, but also without success. He leaped the second time, but now they could see that the sky was giving way to their repeated attempts. Mustering strength, he made the third leap, and went in. The Fisher nimbly followed him.

They found themselves in a beautiful plain, extending as far as the eye could reach, covered with flowers of a thousand different hues and fragrance. Here and there were clusters of tall, shady trees, separated by innumerable streams of the purest water, which wound around their courses under the cooling shades, and filled the plain with countless beautiful lakes, whose banks and bosom were covered with water-fowl, basking and sporting in the sun. The trees were alive with birds of different plumage, warbling their sweet notes, and delighted with perpetual spring.

The Fisher and his friend beheld very long lodges, and the celestial inhabitants amusing themselves at a distance. Words cannot express the beauty and charms of the place. The lodges were empty for inhabitants, but they saw them lined with cages of different sizes, filled with birds and fowls of different plumage. Ojegg thought of his son, and immediately commenced cutting open the moccasins and letting out the birds, who descended in whole flocks through the opening which they had made. The warm air of those regions also rushed down through the opening, and spread its genial influence over the north.

When the celestial inhabitants saw the birds let loose, and the warm gales descending, they raised a shout like thunder, and ran for their lodgings. But it was too late. Spring, summer, and autumn had gone; even perpetual summer had almost all gone; but they separated it with a blow, and only a part descended; but the ends were so mangled, that, wherever it prevails among the other inhabitants, it is always sickly.

When the Wolverine heard the noise, he made for the opening and safely descended. Not so the fisher. Anxious to fulfil the son's wishes, he continued to break open the moccasins. He was, at last, obliged to run also, but the opening was now closed by the inhabitants. He ran with all his might over the plains of heaven, and it would appear, took a westerly direction. He saw his pursuers so close that he had to climb the first large tree he could come to. They commenced shooting at him with their arrows, but without effect, for all his body was invulnerable except the space of about an inch near the tip of his tail. At last one of the arrows hit the spot, for he had in this chase assumed the shape of the Fisher after whom he was named.

He looked down from the tree, and saw some among his assailants with the totems (family arms, or armorial marks) of his ancestors. He claimed relationship, and told them to desist, which they only did at the approach of night. He then came down to try and find an opening in the celestial plain, by which he might descend to the earth. But he could find none. At last, becoming faint from the loss of blood from the wound on his tail, he laid himself down towards the north of the plain, and, stretching out his limbs, said, "I have fulfilled my promise to my son, though it has cost me my life; but I die satisfied in the idea that I have done so much good, not only for him, but for my fellow-beings. Hereafter I will be a sign to the inhabitants below for ages to come, who will venerate my name for having succeeded in procuring the varying seasons. They will now have from eight to ten moons without snow."

He was found dead next morning, but they left him as they found him, with the arrow sticking in his tail, as can be plainly seen, at this time, in the heavens.

ON A STATUE OF CUPID

Of all the deities that shed
On earth their influence from above,
So much has never yet been said,
Both good and evil, as of Love
Yet, for whatever joy we bless,
Or for whatever pain we frown him,
His is the worst unappiness
Who knows not what to say about him

OLD AGE.

Age is the heaviest burden man can bear,
Compound of disappointment, pain, and care;
For when the mind's experiences comes at length,
It comes to mourn the brain's loss of strength;
Resign'd to ignore all our better days,
Knowledge just ripens when the man decays.
One ray of light the closing eye receives,
And wisdom only takes what folly leaves.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Picturesque Pocket Companion, and Vistier's Guide through Mount Auburn, illustrated with upwards of sixty engravings on wood. Boston: Oils, Broaders and Co. Pp. 224.

It is little more than seven years since Mount Auburn was appropriated to the purpose of a cemetery, and already are the inmates so numerous, that a "Guide" through its monuments has been deemed necessary. A city of the dead has silently risen, soon, alas! to be more populous than the city of the living in its vicinity. We have looked through this neat little volume with much interest. The editor has executed his task with good taste and ability, and the engravings, on wood, are creditable to the artist, Mr. Devereux. We perceive that some irreverent scribbler—who corresponds for a Philadelphia paper—has been scoffing at the plan of this cemetery, as aristocratic and exclusive. Will it be believed that there exists a creature so polluted with the vulgar and venomous jealousies of Jacobinism, as to invade the sanctuary of the dead, and spill the vile slaver of his envy and spleen over the narrow cells of the unconscious sleepers, because, forsooth, the frail memorials which affection may have reared, are of a character to gratify that taste for the beautiful implanted in our natures? Does the wretched malcontent grudge the unconscious dead the pale marble that marks the spot of its repose? The principle which leads us to commemorate and beautify the last resting-place of relatives and friends, is a noble and generous impulse. It appeals to the best feelings of our nature. It is assimilated with a reverence for all that is good and great—with all those thoughts which lift us from the brute's level, and intimate eternity to man. In what contrast with the querulous carplings of a feeble and grovelling spirit, are the beautiful and elevating reflections of Addison, drawn from a similar subject—"When I look upon the tombs of the great, every emotion of envy dies in me; when I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire goes out; when I meet with the grief of parents upon a tomb-stone, my heart melts with compassion; when I see the tombs of the parents themselves, I consider the vanity of grieving for those whom we must quickly follow; when I see kings lying by those who deposed them, when I consider rival well placed side by side, or the holy men that divided the world with their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment on the little competitions, factions, and debates of mankind. When I read the several dates of the tombs, of some that died yesterday, and some six hundred years ago, I consider that great day when we shall all of us be contemporaries, and make our appearance together."

Algie Researches, comprising inquiries respecting the mental characteristics of the North American Indians. First series. Indian Tales and Legends. In two volumes. By Henry Howe Schoolcraft. New-York: Harper and Brothers.

The author of this remarkable work has long been favourably known to the public by his journal of travels to the sources of the Mississippi, and his researches among the more unexplored regions of the west. The novel term Algie Mr. Schoolcraft derives from the words Allegany and Atlantic; and he applies it in a generic sense to all that family of aboriginal tribes, who, about the year 1600, were found spread out, with local exceptions, along the Atlantic, between Pamlico Sound and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, extending north-west to the Mississippi of Hudson's Bay, and west to the Mississippi. The exceptions embrace the Yamassee and Catawbas, on the coast, and the Tuscaroras, Iroquois, Wyandots, and Winnebagoes, and a part of the Sioux, in the interior, all of whom appear to have been intruders within the circle, and three of which, namely, the Tuscaroras, Iroquois, and Wyandots, speak dialects of a generic language, denominated by our author the Ostic, from the Algie ostegion, a head. It will be found, from these legends, that the Indian mythology is quite rich and poetical; and that there is an almost Arabian imaginativeness in their conceptions. We have already presented to the readers of the Mirror several specimens of these entertaining volumes. We trust that Mr. Schoolcraft will be encouraged to pursue his labours in this new and unexplored field.

Earl Rupert, and other Tales and Poems. By James Mack. With a memoir of the author, by P. M. Wetmore. New-York: George Aslar. Pp. 220.

The readers of the Mirror must be too well acquainted with the merits of this volume to require from us any more than an announcement of its publication. Mack is unquestionably a man of genius, and his works form one of the rarest psychological curiosities in the history of literature. Mr. Wetmore, in his prefatory memoir, has fulfilled his delicate duty with fidelity and address, and contributed a rich leaf to the biography of the day. We trust that this extraordinary work will be appreciated by the public.

Solomon Sessaw. By J. P. Robertson, author of Letters on Paraguay. In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

Regarded as a first essay in novel-writing, this work displays a more than ordinary degree of talent and skill. The incidents are a compound of the farcical and the melodramatic—a mixture of fun, love, treachery, and murder. There are thousands of words, by native authors, in manuscript, which are far better deserving of publication.

Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature and Art. Published monthly, by E. Littell, and Co., Philadelphia, and G. & C. Carbutt and Co., New-York.

To those of our readers who may be unacquainted with this work, we would state that it contains the cream of the British magazines and reviews, and that it is issued in a compendious and economical style, affording an immense amount of reading matter at a cheap rate. All the productions of Charles Dickens—the best things of Theodore Hook, Alcock, Marryat, Mrs. Norton, and other popular periodical writers, regularly make their appearance in the Museum.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received from a London correspondent a promise of a full description of the Murphy dinner, and also of the great tournament at Eglinton Castle—From the Mirror, we have received a copy of Murray's Travels in North America. It shall be noticed in our next. Mr. Murray writes like a gentleman, and a person of liberality and good sense—"An Inquiry" is informed that Mr. Spring is the author of the original novel of "Grafar al Barkum." It was dramatised by Mrs. Medina Hamilton—"Ruminations in an Omnibus" are clearly, but marred by their personalities—"The long critique upon 'Murray's Poem' is, we think, a little too unkindly. The elaborate parallel, which the reviewer undertakes to institute between Mark and Shelley appears to us at once unfair and unphilosophical. Both poets have their eccentricities. We consider Mark much the more moral of the two. So far from his being an admirer and imitator of Goethe, we do not believe that he has ever read a line of 'Sartor Resartus'—We have heard nothing of the new paper to which 'S.K.' alludes. Indeed, we are so over-run with ephemeral periodicals, that we do not pretend to keep any account of them. We do not believe a word of 'Ys.' story of a quarrel between Charles Rees and Parrot.—We respectfully decline the communications of 'Jockaway,' 'R.X.," "Texas," and 'X.P.'—Our Havana friend is assured that copies of the Mirror are sent by every vessel. If not received the fault is not here.—We are indebted to the 'Southern Rose' for the interesting translation from the French of Madame D'Aubranne.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 31, 1839.

A word or two about ourselves.—A friend, who writes us from London, remarks, in the course of his letter—"By the way, how flourishes the Mirror? I find it regularly on file here at the Garlick and other principal clubs, and from the thumb-marks and dog's ears with which it is distinguished, I should judge that it was pretty thoroughly read." To our correspondent's friendly inquiry, we may reply, that the Mirror flourishes like a young oak-tree. It is rooted broadly and deeply in the good-will and affections of a vast portion of the intelligent people of the Union, and it must be something of a hurricane that can shake it to its foundations. The increase of our circulation for the last six years has been steady and sure—a slight winnowing in our list being always succeeded by overwhelming additions. Notwithstanding the temporary embarrassments of trade, which always affect, in a greater or less degree, the periodical business, the Mirror has experienced a constant increase of its liberal and extensive circulation. From Maine to Louisiana, our subscribers adhere to us through storm and through sunshine—through good times and bad. The history of periodicals does not often exhibit this marked peculiarity. "They flourish and they fade." Our journal, so far as its success is concerned, (and what better test of merit would you have!) "blossoms in perpetual youth." We need not assure the public, that our efforts shall be unceasing to repay their confidence.

A distinguished writer.—It is stated that Carlyle, author of the "Life of Schiller," "Sartor Resartus," "History of the French Revolution," and other well-known works, is expected in this country in the course of a few months, where he will give a course of lectures upon "matters and things in general." Carlyle is, undoubtedly, a man of genius, and, in his earlier prose writings, showed himself master of a pure English style; but he now seems to employ language for the purpose of concealing his thoughts. His style has all the mysticism and obscurity of the responses of the ancient oracles, and quite as much humbug withal. This charlatanism may be very delightful to a few of his transcendental and imaginative admirers, but it will always be laughed at and despised by the judicious and intelligent. It is, in truth, thoroughly pitiable and contemptible: the more so that it is employed by a man of real talent and extensive acquirements.

Pillars of the Exchange.—These immense columns, eighteen in number, are nearly all completed at the quarries in Quincy. They are the largest ever obtained from them—weighing severally about thirty-three tons. They are fluted and finished in a most perfect manner. Nothing can surpass the beauty of the carved capitals. The work is said to be equal to chiselled marble. The cost of a single pillar was four thousand dollars. The estimated expense of the Exchange is one million and a half. The pillars of the Girard College in Philadelphia, which are of marble, cost each ten thousand dollars. They are about sixty feet high and the diameter of their base about ten feet.

Theatrical.—The National has opened the season with great eclat under the auspices of Forrest. During the recess, the interior of the theatre has undergone many alterations and improvements. The boxes have been newly covered, and the panels beautifully painted, so as to give a light, graceful appearance to the dress circle. Forrest's engagement has been quite a successful one. It is to be immediately succeeded by Charles Kean, who is said to have risen wonderfully in his profession since his last visit to this country. His Hamlet and Sir Edward Mortimer are, we believe, his chef d'œuvre. At the Park, Miss Maywood has been received with decided favour. She is quite beautiful, and her performances in "Fazio," the "Stranger," and the "Hunchback" show a remarkable degree of talent. The season has been doing marvels with this theatre.—The Bowery has been doing marvels with its new show piece, "Grafar al Barkum," which has drawn full houses, night after night. The dramatic part of it is not very impressive, but the music, scenery, costumes and ballet are well arranged, and attractive. A succession of novelties is in active preparation at this establishment. The efficient services of Mr. Barry, the acting manager, have tended much to increase the success of its operations. He has proved invaluable to Mr. Hamblin.

Mr. Price has engaged much talent for the Park. A brief account of a few of the most conspicuous, extracted from the letter of an English correspondent, may be interesting to our theatrical readers.

Mrs. Martyn (late Miss Inverarity) made her first appearance on the stage at Covent Garden Theatre, in the season of 1831 and '32, as Cindarella, with immense success. She succeeded Mrs. Wood, who had made a sensation in the character. She afterwards sang in Spohr's Opera of "Azor and Zemira," the "Maid of Judah," "Gustavus," etc. On her marriage with Mr. Martyn, she quitted London, but re-appeared there last season, when she performed "Ninetta," in La Gazza Ladra. She is a tall, handsome woman, and possesses a soprano voice of great compass—the tone brilliant and full. She received her musical education under an able master, Mr. W. Murray, of Edinburgh.

Mr. Martyn is a profound musician. His compositions are original, striking and various. His voice is a low baritone, and his style more adapted to the buffo school than the sentimental; yet he occasionally attempts the latter. We remember seeing him enact Captain Ankaström, in "Gustavus," with marked success.

Miss Poole.—A host of the most pleasing reminiscences array themselves before us at mention of this young lady's name. We recollect seeing her when she was scarcely three feet high, strutting about in a diminutive dandy suit, and lisping, in song—"Smart, smart, smart young bachelors"—in a Drury Lane pantomime, to a nightly encore. Anon she appeared as the "Four Mowbrays," accompanying herself on the piano-forte, in the then popular ballad of "Meet me by moonlight alone," and a variety of other parts we have not space to enumerate. But we must not forget the high rank she assumed, and retained, as Prince Arthur, and Albert, in William Tell. These characters she enacted with a pathos and thoughtfulness that took the Londoners by storm. At that time she became attached to Covent Garden, and was Mr. Farley's pet here in the pantomime for several years. Latterly she has made the most rapid strides in vocalization, and has attained a popularity almost unequalled in one so young, (being but eighteen.) Her voice is a contralto, of exceeding rich quality and roundness of tone; yet with an extension of compass rarely found combined. Her style of singing is remarkable for its purity of intonation and chasteness of feeling, relying for its effects more on its natural pathos than on a redundancy of ornate embellishments, as all who have listened to her exquisite singing "Weeping old Stairs," can testify. In person she is well formed, about Vestri's height. Her features are full of expression and intelligence, though not strictly beautiful. Her correctness in study is remarkable, and her voice, in speaking, is music itself.

Madame Proche Giubilei is a first-rate dansseuse, petite in figure, with a lively, arch and intellectual face—she charms by a winning and naive manner, perfectly irresistible. Her pantomime action speaks at once the expression of the passion meant to be portrayed. This is conspicuous in her "Fenella" in Massaniello, her "Bayera," "Amina," "Folie Dance," and a host of other parts. She held a high rank at the Italian Opera-House when Mademoiselle Proche. Her style is more of the Elise school than the Tagliioni—discovering a wonderful rapidity in executing her promettes and a distinctness of step, keeping exquisite time to the music; and a perfect knowledge of the true principles of her art form the characteristic features of her excellence, a perfection not undervalued nor overlooked by Signor Giubilei, who, then attached to the Italian Opera, became affianced to Mademoiselle Proche, and some six or seven years ago made her Madame Giubilei; and this leads us to remember under what variety of characters we have been delighted with this gentleman's singing and acting, both on the Italian and English stage. At the former we witnessed his Podesta, in "La Gazza Ladra," immediately after Lullache. His Don Basilio is his best performance. His Baron, in "Cinderella," however, is unapproachable; and in Figaro and Podesta he is excellent; nor are his serious efforts less effective—you will admire his Moss-Mountain; Ghost, in "Don Giovanni"; De Clifford, in "Fair Rosamond," and Pizarro, in "Fidelo." This opera is, as you know, the immortal Beethoven's chef d'œuvre, which, I understand, is to be produced at the Park for the introduction of this talented corps of vocalists to a New-York audience. The cast will be as follows: Mrs. Martyn, as Fidelo, (the heroic wife,) Miss Poole, as Marceline, Mr. Martyn, as Rocco, (the jester,) Mr. Manvers as the imprisoned husband, and Giubilei as Pizarro, (the governor.) This part he has made his own. It is full of difficulties, and requires the powers of a finished artist to sustain, as much of the deep and affecting interest of this powerfully written opera depends upon it; but Giubilei's fine person and expressive face, good action and manly bearing, pre-eminently fit him for this character, whilst his voice, a basso of great compass and power, is flexible withal, and cultivated with an ardour rarely excelled. We need not say that his musical education was finished by Pelligrini, the great original Figaro, and the first instructor of his time. This opera ("Fidelo") was originally sustained in English by Malibran, and well we remember its thrilling and soul-subduing effects in her hands. Mrs. Martyn's voice is particularly well suited to give the high and difficult music of her character with effect. The tenor does not appear until the third act, and then commences upon a task most trying to a novice; an elaborate and profound composition of the highest order. We scarcely know enough of Mr. Manvers, to judge how far he is competent to contend with such music. He is, however, a chaste and pleasing singer, much admired by the London audiences, upon whom he made a deep impression as André Brémier, in the popular opera of "Amilie." We doubt not his extirpation success. You will have a rare combination of operatic talent this season as well as the Park as the National theatres. The principal musical talent of England will soon be transferred to America.

MISCELLANY.

The following amusing parody was written for a recent school celebration in Boston, by William Hayden, of that city, one of the best poets and most brilliant wits of the age:

I REMEMBER

I remember—I remember—

The days when I was young—
And those who tried to teach me then
To speak my mother tongue—
The ancient, smoky, rafted room,
Where gathered girls and boys—
I think our parents sent us there
To rid them of our noise.

I remember the old Mistress,
Who taught me A. B. C.,
And, when I couldn't say it right,
Who took me o'er her knee—
The boys who were my mates at school;
And all our little plays—
And what a length of time it seemed,
Between the holidays.

I remember Sawney Bigelow,
Who tried to make me speak
A little broken Latin—and
A smattering of Greek—
It would have puzzled any one,
In learned lore more rich,
When we recited either tongue,
To tell you which was which.

I remember Master Snelling—
I never can forget;
He made me write and cipher too—
That man is living yet—
I remember the old crowskin well,
Which filled us all with fear—
I never liked the thing—and hope
He has not brought it here.

I remember how impatient
We boys were of the rules—
We longed to grow to man's estate,
And shake off all the schools—
I since have found those wishes vain—
And, oh! 'tis little joy,
To find I know less Latin now,
Than when I was a boy.

GARRICK AND THE DOCTOR.—Dr. Thompson, who was a celebrated physician in his day, was remarkable for two things—viz. the slovenliness of his person, and his dislike to muffins, which he always reprobated as being very unwholesome. On his breakfasting one morning at Lord Melcomb's, when Garrick was present, a plate of muffins being introduced, the doctor grew outrageous, and vehemently exclaimed, "Take away the muffins!" "No, no," said Garrick, seizing the plate, and looking significantly at the doctor, "take away the ragamuffins!"

A HEAVY DEALER.—"Has Mr. Breed got any cedar shingles in his wharf?" inquired a little urchin at the counting-room door. "Yes, he has." "Well, I want to get two cents worth, to make a sled."

JERSEY CITY FERRY-BOT.—The ferry-boat belonging, we presume, to the Philadelphia railroad company, which crosses the Hudson river to Jersey city, is a disgrace to the line.

USELESS ORNAMENTS.—It is a vulgar taste that delights in the display of breast-pins, neck-chains and finger-rings.

SARATOGA SPRINGS.—The hotels at Saratoga Springs will be kept open until the first of October.

FRIENDS OF WEALTH.—The worth which now exists in Amsterdam falls much short to what it was previous to the French revolution, or during the period of Dutch commercial pre-eminence. It is not long since strangers, in visiting Amsterdam, were shown the spacious house of a merchant, who, after having lavished much on furniture and paintings, actually caused the floor of one of his apartments to be laid with Spanish dollars, set on edge. Another gentleman in Holland determined to make a pavement before his residence of large massive plates of silver, and to surround it with an ornamental chain of the same costly material. Before carrying his plan into effect, it behoved him to obtain the sanction of the authorities. These worthies, however, void of sympathy, set their face against a proposition which might have compelled them to increase the strength of the town guard. Enraged at their non-compliance, Moses determined to punish them. He ordered his dwelling, situated in the principal street, immediately to be pulled down, and on its site erected the one now standing. It is literally covered with diabolical figures, amounting, it is said, to three hundred and fifty.

JOHN ANDERSON, MY JO, JOHN.—A London paper has the additional stanzas to "John Anderson, my jo." The exquisite tone of unalterable affection which pervades these lines, and the unconsciousness of time's progress which that purity of love engenders, could never have been more simply or more touchingly expressed.

John Anderson, my jo, John,
They say 'tis forty year
Since I e'd you my jo, John,
Since you e'd me your dear:
I'm sure it cannot be,
Nor near sea long ago,
It's but a honeymoon at maist,
John Anderson, my jo.

CALIFORNIA POLYGRAPH.—These people have their marriages, but they consist of no other ceremony than the consent of the parties, and they are only binding till they disagree or choose to part. They have no other mode of cancelling a marriage than by using the phrase "I throw you away." It is nevertheless true that we found many couples, both young and old, who lived in great unity and peace, esteeming their children, and their children them. Parentage or relationship forms no obstacle to their intermarriages. It is very common for the wife to urge her husband to marry her sisters, and even their mother; and the common custom is, when a man first marries, that he takes the whole of the sisters for wives. These many wives of one husband live without jealousies or disputes, each looking on the whole of the children as if they were their own, and the whole living in one house.

CHINESE LABOUR.—An American traveller through China, in writing of the manners and customs of the country, states, in order to show how small a remuneration these people are willing to accept for their labour, that the washerwomen will wash for the whole ship's company for one dollar each, be their stay one month or six months, and receive what broken victuals the cook chooses to give them. If you give them twenty pieces to wash, and be they ever so dirty, they never complain. When the ship is ready for sea, they make a present to every man they have washed for, of a pair of sweetmeats of some kind, which many have given a dollar for alone.

FLUENCY OF SPEECH.—Dean Swift says the common fluency of speech, in most men and most women, is owing to a scarcity of matter and scarcity of words; for whoever is a master of language and hath a mind full of ideas, will be apt in speaking to hesitate upon the choice of both; whereas common speakers have only one set of ideas, and one set of words to clothe them in, and these are always ready at the mouth; so people come faster out of church when it is almost empty than when a crowd is at the door.

A SURPRISE.—An amusing circumstance occurred lately at the Zoological Gardens. As one of the keepers was amusing a child with a ride on the back of a young elephant, a lady, who was a looker-on, was suddenly taken up by the larger elephant, and lifted in the air; but her screams caused the animal to let her down very gently, with no other injury than the soiling of her dress and a little alarm.

AFFECTIONATE.—A Connecticut Jonathan, in taking a walk with his dearest, came to a toll-bridge, when he honestly said, after paying his toll, (which was one cent)—"Come, Suke, you must pay your own toll, for just as like as not I shan't have you after all."

A CLEVER RUSE.—The following laughable trick was recently played off, at a dinner in London, by a gentleman who could not get any of the waiters to pay attention to what he said to them:—He called one of the principal waiters to him, and asked him if he knew Mr. T. Cooke. He replied in the affirmative. "Go," and tell him that the Duke of Buccleuch will be happy to take wine with him," said the wag. Away ran the waiter to Mr. Cooke, who was up to the joke in an instant, and rose and bowed respectfully to the "noble duke," meantime the waiter informed his master and his fellow-servants that the dinner had been honoured by the presence of the great Scottish nobleman; the consequence was, that most of the waiters, and mine host too, crowded around his grace, (as they thought,) nor would any of them move from his chair if they could avoid it. The joke did not end with the dinner; but when the company took their departure, the moment his grace was seen descending the stairs, half a dozen waiters began to cry out to the porters, "call the Duke of Buccleuch's carriage." Away ran the latter shouting about the streets, until his grace informed them that he would walk home; but in order not to dishonour the title, he gave them a donser, and then rode home in an omnibus for sixpence.

LEGALIZED SUICIDE.—In Marsailles, it seems, there was once a singular custom for the benefit of those who desired to leave the light of the sun behind them. The magistrates kept constantly on hand, and in their own charge, an efficacious poison for the use of those who wished to take their own lives. Such persons were obliged to petition the senate, which consisted of six hundred members, and set forth their grievances. The senate then investigated the ill their flesh was heir to, and if there was any satisfactory cause for quitting life, they decreed permission, and gave out the necessary poison. No one had a right to take his or her own life without this permission. What was the penalty of breaking the law, we are not told.

EDITORIAL TEMERITY.—A western editor lately had the audacity to announce to his subscribers that he would not take in payment for his paper, either woodchucks, dried apples, terrier puppies, tow, bunch brooms, axe handles, wool, or vegetables. But his subscribers, with that sturdy independence which such people generally possess, refused to pay him in anything else, and he now says is ready to take them at the market prices.

FASHIONS RE FOLLY.—Charles I. had his hair cut off on account of a wound in his head, and the whole fashionable world, were without loss of time shorn of their locks. Charles VII. donned a long coat to hide his crooked legs, and long coats became the rage. A monkey had his tail cut off by a trap, but he couldn't come it on the fox, though he told him it was the fashion.

YOUNG LADIES.—Belwer says, "there is nearly always something of nature's own gentility in very young women, except when they get together and fall a giggling."

TO ONE FAR AWAY.—BY JAMES ALDRICH.

Swifter far than swallow's flight,
Homeward o'er the twilight lea,
Swifter than the morning light
Flashing o'er the pathless sea,
Dearest! in the lonely night
Mem'ry flies away to thee!

Stronger far than is desire,
Firm as truth itself can be;
Deeper than earth's central fire,
Boundless as the circling sea;
Yet as mate as broken lyre,
Is my love, dear wife, for thee!

Sweeter far than miser's gain,
Or than note of fame can be,
Unto one who long in vain
Treads the path of chivalry—
Are my dreams, in which again
My fond arms encircle thee!

Archilochi fragm. xxii.

"The bard never dies: the voice of his sweet-toned lyre never ceases with Pluto. Proserpina, too, sheds the hot tear at leaving thee, O my friend, in Hades, and thy honey'd song of many accents, to the Eolian strings of thy lyre, moreover, the breezes of the lower world will impart a mournful melody as they sweep by."

HUMAN life has been happily compared to the ocean, which mirrors heaven in its sleep, distorts the image when its surface is stirred by the breeze, and rejects it when the storm-blast lashes its billows to fury. It has been said to have its tides of good and ill fortune, its adverse—nay, its tempestuous—and its prosperous gales; and we are told that hope floats on the summits and despair in the depths of its buoyant waves.

But there is another aspect under which the sea has appeared to us an emblem of life—as the passage from one world to another. Do not the tall white ships that have crossed it, since the bark of the great Genesee, resemble the phantoms of souls on their way to a distant land? a shadowy procession, led by the fiery Spaniard and the God-inspired pilgrim; an expanding army that swells the train of the bright spirits who, from all the nations of the earth, follow these in the track of light which leads to their destiny—the foundation of a new empire? See them pass with unfurled sails and streamers flying, hope-guided, storm-defying; some gliding gently and others dashed towards the unknown shore—the journey's end which some reach in a serene hour, and others amidst thunder and terror! Such, at least, is the moving vision that appears before us when we strive to picture to ourselves the voyage of our artist emigrant as he followed, o'er the trackless deep, the day-star which had shone upon so many hopes and disappointments—before he launched his all upon that ocean.

The husbandman, the artisan, the trader, the divine, the physician, the jurist, and the countless shapes of being which rush in to fill up the ranks of the people, and become the sinews and fibres of a nation's grand frame, had all preceded him. Laden with no precious merchandise, unprepared to subvert the passions or ambitions any more than to supply the physical wants of men; with arms unused to the axe or spade and a frame unfit for labour, he came to offer the treasures of an art valuable in many eyes, in exchange not only for his own subsistence but for that of the beings who clung to him for protection: the partner of his life and the two golden links which bound his heart to hers.

To one who crosses the Atlantic,

"per mare parvum fugiens,"

its vicissitudes of calm and storm are symbolical of the circumstances he may be thrown amongst in this variable land. Let him observe how he who guides her, works the vessel that is bringing him hither, now eluding now stemming the blast; catching each favourable breeze; here furling, there unbending the snowy canvass—and the study will be a preparation for the tropical alternations of American life. Our artist approached these shores with hope. He felt the importance of his mission, and his faith in the success of his doctrine was measurable with his trust in the great masters; whose voices from time to time saluted him in the storm, or stole to his ear with the breeze over the midnight wave. The superhuman majesty of Beethoven, the tender melody of Mozart, the martial harmonies of Ries, and Hummel's silver tones were to be awakened, by his ministry, in the new world; where to doubt their ultimately finding an echo, would be to suspect human nature of changing in that clime.

The manes of the poet and the philosopher are appeased if, in after centuries, the one's numbers and the other's dream charm or captivate the kindred spirit that seeks, like "old mortality," to reach the inscriptions upon their tomb-stones. But the shade of the musician is propitiated by a golden rite. His glory, depending less on creeds, and more on human nature, less on capricious opinion, and more on immutable passion, when sounded, is proclaimed in his own strains; which thrill an audience or a circle, although they reach not the anchorite's ear.

Our epigraph draws near its end. Who shall describe another's latter days? With its smiling unconsciousness, youth's exuberances have disappeared; or, if not worn away by the tide of Life, they have subsided into harmonious characteristics. Effusion, the voice of feeling and echo of hope, is silent. The child was radiant with innocence, and the colours of gladness played around the boy. In both, as in open pages, events recorded their legible impression. But, when the study were most profitable, lo! the volume is closed. The man concentrates within himself the light of his nature; he collects his strength and advances with compressed lips; and slowly and gravely his features become composed, until they are petrified in Death.

The passages we have hitherto recorded, in Schlesinger's life, lay amidst appropriate and interesting scenes—the ruins and the monuments, the associations and the actualities of the old world. In its cultivated society and picturesque throng he was formed, and first pursued fortune. From its intelligent voices he received his first applause, and the echo sounded in his ear like a prophecy. Therefore have we lingered longer where the example of his life was most instructive; and, as fancy alone is inadequate to the correct presentation of circumstances so different from those which give its shape to American character, we have essayed, here and there, to supply, from memory, a back-ground to the scene—or, with fewer chances of success, to group around our artist the personages who influenced, and above him the tutelar Deities that inspired him. The legend had been incomplete without some tribute to the brilliant merit which claims for his compositions praise at least equal to that due to his artistic skill. Would that many a reader, who will only know those productions through our silent page, might have audible proof of their beauty. It was also just, that the feeble voice, which is to proclaim the artist's death across the waters, should remind his brethren there of his titles to enduring honour, as well as passing regret; and in his native land, where his master pieces lie within their reach, they may, and doubtless will, verify or invalidate our testimony—by the touchstone of experiment.

Are we sanguine in believing that he who has followed him thus far in his pilgrimage, will willingly accompany our artist to the distant land where it was doomed too soon to terminate? Nay, that he will be curious to witness the reception that their awaited one whose character he has not seen developed without interest, and to those accomplishments, we trust, he is not insensible? He will not deny that genius, arduousness, its brightest jewel, are indispensable to the musical artist; that intelligence, in its highest perfection, is not superfluous in his calling; and we have poorly performed our task if he do not feel that the heart which beat in Daniel Schlesinger's bosom was as brave as the head it animated.

The dreary aspect which the memories of the old world assume, when we have left it, is heightened by the realities of the new. In place of the lyre, that welcomes you to the European shore, the ring of the anvil and groan of the forge here warn you of impending labour. You enter a serious land, where a whole generation is busy laying the foundations of a national superstructure, whose tall columns and stately sides are yet to rise at the bidding of the unborn; where all are masons, and the artist's chisel is shaping blocks of granite, while the musician's note is overpowered by the hammer; where all who resort become transformed. The hey-day of youth is over, or its emotions are suppressed. Some are come to lay their bones afar from their father-land—many to secure the means of returning thither to abide. This sternness of purpose and uniformity of aim equalize conditions, and lend to life a mournful monotony—especially in New-York, the out-post. It is a race, not a dance, of death. Men, women, children, all wear its sombre expression; nor is the national character suffered to form, for the keen native is spurred on to competition by the eager stranger; who chooses temporarily to forget, in the cares, the ambitions, the toils of the "gold-chase," that life is slipping from under him at a fearful rate, unenjoyed.

"Wandering about the streets of Milan," says Franz Listz, "on the day of my arrival there, I found myself opposite La Scala, and before the music-store of Ricordi, the first publisher in Italy, and one of the first in Europe; you must know the châtier is the resident-master of the musical republic, the salus infirmorum, the refugium peccatorum, the providence of itinerant musicians like me. In I went, and took my seat at an open piano. I commenced preluding; 'tis my way of presenting letters of credit. Ricordi was there. I neither knew him, nor he me. He listened with enthusiasm—and though he did not address me, I heard him say to his clerk: 'Questo è Listz o il Diavolo!' Finding myself an object of such vehement suspicion, I arose, mentioned my name, and received a cordial welcome."¹⁹ landed on that day, we question if he would have found any one to recognize him in so flattering a manner. He would have found a public exclusively attached to vocal, and comparatively ignorant of instrumental, music; in whom his marvellous powers would have excited but little enthusiasm. In vain would he have striven against Madame Caradori Allan, or competed with Mr. Russell. He might have summoned around him a few choice artists, and have produced Hummel's Concertos, his Septuor, or Weber's magnificent Concert Stück, but his ardour would have been frozen, if not by the indifference of his hearers, by their scanty numbers. Acquainted to the homage of the Parisian élite, he would have been disappointed at finding himself an object of no empressement, and his profession an inferior one in public estimation.

It was on the sixth of October, 1839, that the good ship President brought Daniel Schlesinger to these shores, where, had Listz

Were he to visit us to-day, after the lapse of three years, he would encounter a far different reception; would be courted and admired, and command an abundant audience; with warmth of feeling heightening in proportion as he disclosed to them the great master-pieces; whilst their susceptibility to musical impressions would atone for their want of discernment. We forbear to enhance the picture, and yet cannot but believe he would, moreover, find both character and concert among the members of his profession, and feel that, henceforth, it only depends upon themselves to render it an honourable one in this free land.

Much of this change in the musical condition of our society we are proud to attribute to the influence of the artist we are lamenting. The first man of the old Helvetic Wedge penetrated the enemy's ranks at the cost of his life, and opened the phalanx for his comrades. Mr. Schlesinger seems to have perished by a similar destiny. Can we present a more concise and graphic epitome of the valuable services which a few years enabled him to render the public, as well as his profession?

"His first appearance was at the National Theatre, on a benefit night, when his performance created little sensation amidst the histrionic parade, and, though nothing so beautiful as the variations upon the march in Tancredi had been heard on this side of the Atlantic, they produced no retentissement in our circles. By degrees, however, it became known to a few lovers of music that there was "one Pianist more;" and we must do our amateurs the justice to say that, at various réunions, his talent soon came to elicit their unfeigned admiration.

It was on such an occasion, one evening in the winter of 1836, that our ears were first gladdened, at the abode of a German patriarch, by the sonorous inspirations of Mr. Schlesinger. The impression is ineffaceable. We were entirely unprepared to meet such an artist out of Europe; where, in the course of a long and earnest pilgrimage, we had worshipped at every musical shrine that lay in, or near, our path; which he had never crossed, as our stay in London had been brief and in the unusual season, and the enthusiasm of the British metropolis is periodical. Excited by the brilliancy of his variations from Tancredi we hastened to make the acquaintance of the modest artist; with whom a few minutes conversation convinced us he was no ordinary man. His expressive countenance was marked by character and genius; his forehead, broad and lofty, with significant expansions, rose above brilliant and remarkably prominent eyes which pierced you as you spoke—not with cunning to penetrate your motive, for he was childlike,—but to divine your meaning. His features were muscular, collected in their repose, and singularly playful in their animation. "His soul seemed made up of harmony; and he never spoke but he charmed his hearer, not only with the clearness of his reason, but all his words, and his very tone and cadences were strangely musical." His manner was polished without affectation, and reflected upon you his self-respect; his address gentle and his person gentlemanly. He was of moderate stature, compactly built; black curly hair surmounted his white brow and harmonized with his dark complexion. Owing to great near-sightedness his countenance often took an anxious cast, and it was difficult to say what those broad eyes were gazing at until their smile lit upon you, and warned you like a sunbeam, or they opened still wider to interrogate you. His use of English was easy and faultless, and his humour required earnest conversation. Therefore was he troublesome to the frivolous, suffering no word to pass unnoticed; and was never satisfied as long as an equivocal remark remained unexplained. Was not this an original man?

In the course of the above evening, he was invited by two ladies to extemporize upon the piano. Each furnished a theme, and left him to choose between "Lützow's Wild Hunt," and "The Rhine." He took his seat before the instrument, and, after a majestic prelude, opened the great Rhine chorus; then commenced a series of variations of the highest brilliancy and most finished execution, pursued the air through many a hazardous modulation and intricate measure until the time changed, the tone softened, the chorus seemed winding off in the distance—your questioned your ears! Is that "The Rhine?" No! "Tis the hunt of Lützow the free and the brave." A burst of applause welcomed "the chase," as its swelling tones came nearer and nearer, until they poured upon the ear their jet of notes and martial rhythm, and made the heart leap with joy. On, on he carried us with the hunt, which serpentine through harmonic mazes and leaped from measure to measure until his left hand, gaining fast upon the right, compelled it to slacken its wild pace and sounded—heaven knows how it was accomplished! the Rhine, the Rhine, the Hunt still resounding, and the dissimilar melodies flowed harmoniously in one silver stream—to their journey's end.

* Lectures d'un Bachelier à Moirque, No. IV.

Mr. Schlesinger's performance, and the pleasure it afforded us on that memorable evening, were types of the talent he displayed and the delight he gave on many a subsequent occasion. We had then never witnessed an impromptu so alive with inspiration, so spontaneous, so opulent in harmony, which enhanced instead of stifling the free flow of melody; and its novelty heightened the zest of our gratification. It was musical eloquence, poetry, genius. Nothing embarrassed him. He defied all keys, all measures, and was truly admirable. He never hesitated or paused, but went on as if an angel were holding before him a bright page which he hastened to interpret before it melted away.

These improvisations were deemed, by many, his brightest excellence. They were unlike his compositions and could not be recalled. The night after one of them, you might give him the same theme, and listen in vain for the exquisite variation you longed to hear once more. His mood, and with it his view of the subject, had changed; but they who never heard him cannot realize with how lavish a hand he poured forth the treasures of his art. At times fantastic and capricious, he inspired an air with the baginage of a Scherzo; at others earnest and melancholy, he clothed it in the solemnity of an anthem. To-night he would compose with non plus Andriani a waltz, in which the left hand played the air one beat behind the right, so that on whichever side of the piano you stood, the melody was distinctly audible; next week pour forth a brilliant fantasia upon Don Juan with two and at times even three of the airs of that inimitable opera simultaneously wooing the ear.

One night some artists, who had just arrived from New-Orleans, met him in a small soirée musicale. Among them was M. Boucher, subsequently his warm friend and constant companion. After several concerted performances, Mr. Schlesinger sat down to clothe Yankee Doodle in music, which never before made its appearance in so imposing a garb. The new-comers gathered around him amazed, to see the process by which he constantly seized the air in whatever modulation it sought to elude his grasp. Suddenly looking up from the instrument at the French group behind him, he smiled; and it was amusing to see their bewildered faces as he convinced them that the air they had been mistaking for Yankee Doodle, was their own national air, Gretry's Vive Henri IV! It resembled the process by which a learned philologist derives a familiar word from some unexpected Greek type; and the dexterity of the juggler who performs the volte, with the pack of cards your eye is fixed upon, and whistles, as the queen of hearts becomes the knave of diamonds. Need we add that the exclamations of admiration with which his musical brethren greeted each transition and metamorphosis, served, though they were not wanting, to confirm all present in their estimate of his singular genius, his fertile invention, and his felicity of expression. We recollect his once harmonizing the American with the English national air so that they seemed to appertain to each other; and yet the imagination may be challenged to paint two more opposite melodies than Yankee Doodle and God Save the King.

Let us not omit to mention, how eagerly Mr. Schlesinger sought to collect our native melodies, and how it disappointed him to find the feeble air we have just named, an agreeable one compared to most of its comrades—Hail Columbia, The Starspangled Banner, and that class of tunes called the African melodies, to which our patriotic troops march bravely, on parade days. He studied it, however, very deeply, and enriched it with some remarkable variations which, unfortunately, with his habitual disregard of fame, he never wrote down. Do not dream that there was aught of preparation in these impromptus. He was ever ready to prelude upon any theme proposed, or to vary the same in innumerable shapes. One summer's evening in 1837, two distinguished artists, premiers prix of the Parisian conservatoire, came to hear him play. He asked them for a theme, about which, they hesitating, he chose the chirp of the cricket that was heard through the open window, and played upon it during three hours a series of variations so novel, strange and abundant; so wild and yet so closely embroiled around the subject, as to dismiss them equally astounded at his talent, and perplexed to know why such an artist should bury himself here.

Of his playing we may here remark that his touch was of singular force and ease and his tone of the richest quality.† He played with extended fingers, and it was wonderful to see the self-possession with which they sported among the black and white keys. He had a beautiful hand for the piano, which he never placed on the recently adapted by her husband to a plaintive southern melody. When the last lines—

"She's the star I missed from heaven, Long time ago,"
had left the lips of the sweet vocalist, Mr. S. admiring the beautiful words and music, and delighted to find at last a sweet native melody—hastened to the piano, where he expressed the pleasure they had caused him in eloquent and varied terms—like flattering to the bard, the composer, and the minstrel.

key-board without spanning a tenth. This gave his chords a plente and grandeur that made it seem another instrument.

We have said Mr. Schlesinger landed in our city on the sixth of October, 1836. Need we recapitulate the too familiar events of the last three years, to show how unpromising a prospect of employment he encountered at his arrival. During the winter he numbered but three pupils. Besides the scarcity of money, the price of his instruction* deterred many from employing him, who thought what was customary in London and Paris—exorbitant at New-York. He never abated his terms—and, as we shall shortly see, had but subsequently no reason to be dissatisfied with his share of patronage.

It was pleasant to visit him in his comfortable lodgings during those months of uncertainty, and see how cheerfully he awaited with his wife and children the rising of the tide. You generally found him at the piano studying Bach, Beethoven, or Hummel! He would continue or intermit his playing at your option; and, however much his music delighted you, you were sure to be charmed by the natural and easy flow of his conversation. It was a curious contrast to traverse Broad-street and its hurried throng in the busy hours of the day and find at one extremity that calm, hopeful and happy artist, inhabiting the gardens, palaces and wildernesses of the land of sound, unconscious of the thousand cares and miseries which tortured human existence around him. Music was for him a spell of hope; cast by genius the enchanter.

One night, having been compelled to find rooms in an adjoining house, they were all nearly suffocated by the fumes of some charcoal which had been carelessly left unextinguished in their new abode. It was only in the spring of 1837 that they entered the dwelling in which they lived so happily until within a year of "the end." It was about this time, on the thirteenth of April, that Mr. Schlesinger performed a second time in public, in a concert given by Mr. Russell, where he was warmly applauded.† The entertainment he himself contemplated offering the public soon after, was injudiciously postponed until the sixth of June, when such a programme as had been rarely seen here drew but a moderate audience together. The season was unfavourable; and the chief attraction of the evening, Hummel's Concerto in A Flat, presented little inducement to the passer-by—who knew it not—with its two movements respectively heading the first and second acts. His execution of that magnificent production was enthusiastically received;‡ as well as the variations on an "American national air," which he then played for the first time, and which we have now to regret are lost for ever.

His fourth public appearance was in a concert which he gave at the City-Hotel on the twenty-fourth of November of the same year. The musical world, enthralled by a new vocalist, assembled in small numbers to listen to Hummel's splendid Concerto in A Minor, which, with Thalberg's Pantasia upon the "Capelletti and Montecchi," and a beautiful solo by Boucher, were the evening's chief amusements.‡ His having been the first to introduce here the music of Hummel and Thalberg, were of itself a merit, and deserves a record in the musical annals of a new land—as much as the early representations of the legitimate drama; for, when the musical vandeilles of our day shall have been sacrificed to human caprice, the great instrumental composers, fewer in number and mightier in genius, will survive the mutations of opinion, and in lieu of inspiring the imitated only, will resound in the hearts of the multitude.

A concert he was encouraged to give at the "Savoyard Institute," on the twenty-first of March, 1838, met with better success than any of Mr. Schlesinger's previous efforts to please the public. His Quatuor, two movements of which were played and well received, was first introduced here on this occasion. He little thought its echoes would next mingle with the tones of his requiem. This, with Thalberg's Pantasia upon Don Juan, and Weber's "Invitation to Dance," constituted his share of the programme; but the evening was marked by an unexpected and characteristic trait. On entering the room a mourning-card was placed in our hands. It purported that, "intelligence having been that day received of the death of Ferdinand Ries, his ancient master, Mr. Schlesinger begged permission of his auditors to open the concert with the Marcia Funèbre of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, as a slight tribute to his memory." It was a touching circumstance; the voice of Beethoven summoned to mourn

* Three dollars per lesson.
† A critic, in the New-York American, of the fourteenth of April, speaks thus of our artist's appearance:

"Mr. S. is a virtuoso of the highest musical attainments, who, to infinite grace and wondrous skill in execution, joins an extraordinary knowledge of the intricate processes of harmony. . . . His modulations thread with perfect self-possession its labyrinth, and evince that he holds in his fingers the only clue to such mazes, a perfect knowledge of thorough bass, and of the great masters' works who have enriched this department of music with their discoveries."

‡ He played variations composed by himself upon the March in Tancrède; they were admirable. Not, as is too often the case, the mere conversion of an original theme into hackneyed variations, but its investiture with a thousand varied modulations, and its reproduction under many graceful forms, each linked to the other by the thought of the composer.

† The "New-York American," of the tenth of June, speaks in a high strain of eulogy of his performance of Hummel's Concerto on this occasion. "I have found a notice of this concert in the New-York American of the twenty-fifth of the same month, from which we extract the following: "The Grand Fantasia of Sigismund, Thalberg, the Viennese, upon metzels, by Mr. S. with more than his usual mastery skill, and afforded him a rare opportunity of contrasting the force and precision of his touch with the infinite grace and delicacy of which it is susceptible. His performance led you in wonderment, such a complication of mingled measures and harmonies, such striking ornaments to the original theme—the fingers playing it, à la dérobée, in its note simplicity, on the mid tones of the keyboard, while, as each note left them, they flew off amidst a thousand intricate arpeggios, and returned, ere the interval was elapsed, to the succeeding one—such figures, where each finger seemed independent of its fellow, and ended in a wit and power of its own, you never heard before. His success was most brilliant, and his performance elicited the applause bravo it merited."

‡ If we expect those of Beethoven, Mozart, and some of Rossini's, and Meyerbeer's, the opera of our day are all doomed to perish, with its light comedies and farces, they resemble. Written to display individual attractions they are comparatively valueless, save to the history of public taste, when the lips that pronounced their melodies have ceased to breathe.

his only disciple, by one who has since joined them both in Paradise! Let us not forget to mention that, four members of the Concordia, a musical association of German amateurs, of which the deceased subsequently became leader, lying aside, for a compatriot's sake, a reluctance natural to the occasion, added two very agreeable quartettes to its pleasures. From this period, up to the opening of last winter, the flow of our artist's existence was smooth and uneventful. He had acquired many warm friends; and now counted pupils sufficient to give a tone to his life and hopes. He never failed to inspire those who knew him with a lasting respect, alike for himself, his talent, and the art it illustrated. Over many he exercised a singular control, for no one that saw forgot him. To such as have followed his path thus far, the causes of this influence will be no longer a secret. His was an uncommon union of attributes. A wonderful artist, whose talent was spontaneous; a man whose firmness was only surpassed by his rectitude, and whose modesty equalled his self-respect; cheerful without effort, and winning without familiarity—neither stopping to offer nor to receive adulation—each trait in his character bore testimony to the earnest single-heartedness that had carried him through life. You felt that he was an exalted being; incapable of a sordid act or unworthy thought; whose motives would bear exposing, nor discredit a child's simplicity.

His mind, exercised in thought and never wasted upon trifles, had been disciplined by the severe studies of his profession; and to the simplest as well as the abstruse subjects, you felt that he brought one precious element of knowledge—the experience of himself. Perhaps as you met him picking his way so collectedly in the street his intellect was framing harmonies to some suggestion of his fancy; for he constantly thought in music, although, like Peissello, his happiest inspirations came to him in the morning—before he rose; when he was accustomed to perfect his designs, which he never inscribed on paper until they needed no further change. His head was stored with musical lore; a kind of learning more difficult to retain than what is usually termed erudition. In this economy of the notions he had acquired by labour, he was an example to the student; and from his patient gestation of his own ideas until maturity, any author might derive instruction.

Signor Rapetti, passing last winter in New-York, reaped the benefit of that increased liking for instrumental music, which we may, without injustice to any one, ascribe to Mr. Schlesinger's ardent efforts. Three brilliant concerts were successively given in mid winter, by that exquisite violinist, by our artist, and by Signora Maroncelli, and were attended with enthusiasm. Mr. Schlesinger was conspicuous in each, and gladly co-operated with Mr. Scharfenberg,* a youthful pianist of distinguished abilities, in displaying the rich resources of their common instrument.

Early in the winter he had been judiciously called to direct and instruct the Concordia, whose members required a sound and vigorous impulse from his indomitable energy and patience. At their tri-weekly rehearsals he was the impersonation of musical science. No defect, however trifling, could escape his tutored and sensitive ear. The perseverance with which he sought to teach, and they to learn, was alike creditable to his scholars and himself. Sometimes, after making them sing over their parts severally until they knew them, he would have a chorus repeated six or seven times. This triple conscience of what was due to his pupils, to his art, and to himself, rendered his lessons painful to the idle and careless learner. He admitted of no small defects, and exacted as rigid an observance of trifles as of the most important rules. His lessons were the installation of the precepts of a Cullus, and greatly exhausted him. He undertook to direct a pupil's mind as well as his fingers, to teach expression as well as dexterity; and where the intelligence happens to be small, or badly educated, what task can be more irksome!

He had thus made progress. His hours were filled, with profit to himself, and utility to others. If you found him at home of an evening, when the Concordia were reposing from last night's fatigues, and gathering strength for to-morrow's, he was seated at the piano, with his family around him. He would take pleasure in accompanying his boy, a noble child, three years old, as he sang some popular tune; and seek in vain to puzzle him by modulating the air in different keys, while the little fellow's voice followed him, unconsciously. This child, and his little sister, had to welcome a new brother in the fall of 1838. The young stranger thrived amazingly, and bade fair to surpass the other two in beauty. The father's heart would itself about that child with extraordinary tenderness. The little being seemed of another type than his predecessors. Wherefore he fell ill last Spring. Mr. Schlesinger shared in his every pang, and, as the child faded, he too seemed to pine away. One night in May the little sufferer gave a promised speedy relief from his pain. That same night the Concordia gave a public musical soirée, at which their leader's presence was indispensable. The poor artist tore himself away from his dying infant, in whom a holy hope seemed about to perish; and officiated throughout the entertainment with a serene brow but an anguished heart. It became his duty in the course of the evening to accompany Uhländ's ballad of the "Wirthin Tochterlein," in which occurs the line—

"Mein Tochterlein liegt an der Todtenbank."
My child, she lies upon her bier.

* This gentleman arrived here in the fall of 1838, from Cassel, his native place. His youth, and his remarkable talent, soon recommended him to the notice of various amateurs, some of whom, to his prejudice, strove to exalt him above Mr. Schlesinger; from whom he possesses different qualities which will upon well as his character. He, however, distinguished for his mistaken friends; and, besides recognising in Mr. Schlesinger a superior genius, whose native taste was guided by a powerful intellect, he felt with an artist's instinct, that their strength lay in union not in opposition. These unworthy rumours to his disparagement, naturally reached the ear of Mr. Schlesinger; who, so far from allowing them to affect his feelings of friendship for his youthful rival, when the latter was making his début, insisted upon placing his own pianoforte at his disposal—as well to prepare himself for the concert as to display his powers there.

One bitter pang was reserved for him that night than to hear this knell of his dying child—to see it expire before morning. From this shock, broken-hearted, he never recovered; and if the seeds of disease were already in him, for his strength had been ebbing away insensibly for some months past, this developed them rapidly. A few weeks changed him sadly; his features sank and his walk became slow and painful. Still he persisted in giving lessons, and, maintaining his own cheerfulness, made every effort to reassure his wife. He confessed "that the child's death had affected him terribly," but declared "he himself was well, quite well, and only suffered a little from the heat." Alas! woman's affection cannot be long deceived: and the mournful strains his piano breathed forth when he pressed the keys, betrayed to her listening ear the secret he had resolved to yield up to the great conqueror Death alone.

On Wednesday evening, the thirtieth of May, his friends, Boucher and Kieckhefer, brought Mr. Halma, the violinist, to assist at their weekly Trio; which, after a long desire to assemble two or three together in the name of Beethoven, our artist had recently succeeded in organizing. The little knot, which might have become the nucleus of a future Philharmonic, promised themselves great pleasure in the uninterrupted observance of this rite. But, on this occasion, Schlesinger was unable to officiate. Those fingers, once so alert and energetic, suddenly became powerless, and refused to do the soul's bidding. Exhausted by the effort he had made to take part in a single movement of one of Beethoven's trios, he lay down upon the sofa; and his comrades withdrew, with sad forebodings. He never woke those echoes more.

Returning to this city, from a visit to Boston, on Tuesday morning, the twelfth of June, the writer of this memoir was overpowered by the sad intelligence of the demise of Mr. Schlesinger; whom he loved as a brother, and of whose danger he had no suspicion. He gradually gathered from a pupil of the deceased, that he had died in the night of the eighth, and been buried, the Sunday after, in the Marble Cemetery, whither his mortal remains were followed by his friends and his Brothers of the Concordia, who sang a requiem over his grave. When he asked her for further details, turning away to hide her tears, she handed him these lines:

THE BURIAL OF SCHLESINGER.

Sad music breathes upon the air,
And steps come mournfully and slow;
Heavy as the load we bear,
Fellow-cren our burden share,
Death has laid our brother low.
Ye have heard our joyous strain,
Listen to our notes of woe!

Do ye not remember him
Whose finger, from the thrilling wire,
Now drew forth tears, now tones of fire?
Ah! that hand is cold for ever!
Gone is now life's fulfilment,
We sing his requiem.

We are singing him to rest—
He will rise a spirit blest—
Sing it softly, sing it slowly—
Let each note our sorrow tell,
For it is our last farewell;
And his grave is lone and lowly.

We sorrow for thee, brother!
We grieve that thou must lie
Far from the spot where thy fathers sleep;
Thou earnest o'er the briny deep
In a stranger land to die.

We bear thee gently, brother!
To thy last resting-place!
Soon shall the earth above thee close,
And the dark veil of night repose
For ever on thy face.

We placed the last flowers, brother!
Upon thy senseless bier;
We kissed that brow before 'twas hid;
We wept upon thy coffin lid,
But all unmoved wert thou!

We've smoothed the green turf, brother,
Above thy lowly head;
Earth in her breast receive thee—
Oh! it is sad to leave thee here,
Alone in thy narrow bed!

Thou art not with us, brother!
Yet, in thy blissful land,
Perhaps, thou still canst hear us,
Perhaps thou hover'st near us
And smilest as the choral band,
Which once obey'd thy master hand,
Now linger with their tears to leave
The sod that seals thy grave!

The sun is sinking, brother!
And with it, our melody.
The dying cadences of our note
Is mingled with the dying light.
Oh, brother! by that fading ray,
And by this mournful parting lay,
We will remember thee.

The sculptor, in his chisel'd stone,
The painter, in his colours blest,
The bard, in numbers all his own,
Raises himself his monument.

But he, whose every touch could wake
A passion, and a thought control,
He who, to bless the ear, did make
Music of his very soul.

Who bound for us, in golden chains,
The golden links of harmony;
Nought as left us of his strains,
Nought but their fading memory.

Then, while a trace of him remains,
Shall we not cherish it tenderly?

SKETCHES FROM THE GERMAN.

THE MAN IN THE BAG.

THERE were two brothers who were both soldiers: the one had grown rich, but the other had had no luck, and was very poor. The poor man thought he would try to better himself; so, pulling off his red-coat, he became a gardener, and dug his ground well, and sowed turnips.

When the crop came up, there was one plant bigger than all the rest; and it kept getting larger and larger, and seemed as if it would never cease growing, so that it might have been called the prince of turnips; for there never was such a one seen before, and never will again. At last it was so big that it filled a cart, and two oxen could hardly draw it; but the gardener did not know what in the world to do with it, nor whether it would be a blessing or a curse to him. One day he said to himself, "What shall I do with it? If I sell it, it will bring me no more than another would; and as for eating it, the little turnips, I am sure, are better than this great one. The best thing, perhaps, that I can do, will be to give it to the king, as a mark of my respect."

Then he yoked his oxen, and drew the turnip to the court, and gave it to the king. "What a wonderful thing!" said the king. "I have seen many strange things in my life, but such a monster as this I never saw before. Where did you get the seed? or is it only your good luck? If so, you are a true child of fortune. 'Ah, no!' answered the gardener, 'I am no child of fortune: I am a poor soldier, who never yet could get enough to live upon; so I set to work, tilling the ground. I have a brother who is rich, and your majesty knows him well, and all the world knows him; but as I am poor, everybody forgets me.'"

Then the king took pity on him, and said, "You shall be poor no longer. I will give you so much, that you shall be even richer than your brother." So he gave him money, and lands, and flocks, and herds; and made him so rich, that his brother's wealth could not at all be compared with his.

When the brother heard of all this, and how a turnip had made the gardener so rich, he envied him sorely, and bethought himself how he could please the king, and get the same good luck for himself. However, he thought he would manage more cleverly than his brother; so he got together a rich gift of jewels and fine horses for the king, thinking that he must have a much larger gift in return; for if his brother had so much given him for a turnip, what must his gift be worth?

The king took the gift very graciously, and said he knew not what he could give in return more costly and wonderful than the great turnip; so the soldier was forced to put it into a cart, and drag it home with him. When he reached home, he knew not upon whom to vent his rage and envy; and at length wicked thoughts came into his head, and he sought to kill his brother.

So he hired some villains to murder him; and having shown them where to lie in ambush, he went to his brother, and said, "Dear brother, I have found a hidden treasure; let us go and dig it up, and share it between us." The other had no thought of fear of his brother's roguery; so they went out together; and, as they were travelling along, the murderers rushed out upon him, bound him, and were going to hang him on a tree.

But whilst they were getting all ready, they heard the tramping of a horse afar off, which so frightened them that they pushed their prisoner, neck and shoulders together, into a sack, and swung him up, by a cord, to the tree, where they left him dangling, and ran away, meaning to come back and despatch him in the evening.

Meantime, however, he worked and worked away, till he had made a hole large enough to put out his head. When the horse-man came up, he proved to be a student, a merry fellow, who was journeying along on his nag, and singing as he went. As soon as the man in the bag saw him passing under the tree, he cried out, "Good morning! good morning to thee, my friend!" The student looked about, and seeing no one, and not knowing where the voice came from, cried out, "Who calls me?" "Lift up thine eyes; for, behold, here I sit, in the sack of wisdom!" Here have I, in a short time, learned great and wondrous things. Compared to what is taught in this seat, all the learning of the schools is as empty air. A little longer, and I shall know all that man can know, and shall come forth wiser than the wisest of mankind. Here I discern the signs and motions of the heavens and the stars; the laws that control the winds; the number of the sands on the sea-shore; the healing of the sick; the virtues of all simples, of birds, and of precious stones. Wert thou but once here, my friend, thou wouldst soon feel the power of knowledge."

The student listened to all this, and wondered much; at last he said, "Blessed be the day and hour when I found you! Cannot you let me into the sack for a little while?" Then the other answered, as if very unwillingly, "A little space I may allow thee to sit here, if thou wilt reward me well, and treat me kindly; but thou must tarry yet an hour below, till I have learnt some little matters that are yet unknown to me."

So the student sat himself down, and waited a while; but the time hung heavy upon him, and he begged hard that he might ascend forthwith, for his thirst of knowledge was very great. Then the other began to give way, and said, "Thou must let the bag of wisdom descend, by untying yonder cord, and then thou shalt enter." So the student let him down, opened the bag, and set him free. "Now then," cried he, "let me mount quickly!" As he began to put himself into the sack, he felt first, "Wait a while!" said the gardener, "this is not the way. Then he pushed him in, head first, tied up the bag's mouth, and soon swung up the searcher after wisdom, dangling in the air. "How is it with thee, friend?" said he: "dost thou not feel that wisdom cometh unto thee? Rest thee in peace, till thou art a wiser man than thou wert!"

So saying, he borrowed the student's nag to ride home upon, and trotted off as fast as he could; for fear the villain should return, and he left the poor student to gather wisdom, till somebody should come and let him down, when he had found out in which posture he was wisest—on his head or his heels.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

GOING TO SCHOOL.*

IX looking over the pages of "The Mirror," a few days since, I was attracted by the title of a piece, "Going to School;" and, feeling a deep interest in whatever relates to the education of youth, read it attentively. I found it to be the gashings of a fond mother's heart, in parting, for the first time, with her only son. It touched a chord that vibrated in my own bosom, for I too am a mother, and know something of the cares and anxieties, the hopes and fears, that so often agitate a tender mother's breast. I could enter somewhat into her feelings, for I too have had to part with dear ones, and commit to others the instruction of those that I love as my own soul. Will that mother, then, bear with me while I suggest to her mind a few reflections, that ought to reconcile every parent, when obliged to consign to others the education of their children. Did she, before consenting to part with her son, make every possible inquiry as to the qualifications of the principal, his scientific attainments, his "aptness to teach," his fitness to govern, the influence that would probably be exerted over the mind of her child? If so, and she felt willing to place her darling boy under his guardianship, then she should have resigned him altogether, and never have allowed herself for one moment to suppose that ought but justice would be done to her child. Without entire, unreserved confidence in a teacher, but little will be satisfactory to the parent, and I know of nothing more depressing to the exertions of an instructor, than the suspicion, that he has not the full and cheerful confidence of those he is striving to please.

The pupil, in order to receive the full benefit of instruction, must be made by his parents to feel that the teacher is one of his best friends, that if his wishes are sometimes thwarted, and his waywardness repressed, it is for his advantage; and, above all, a parent should never, in the presence of his child, call in question the justice of the teacher's authority. If a child knows that his parent doubts, as to the propriety of a certain course of discipline, farewell hereafter to all proper influence by the teacher over the mind and heart of that child. Let teachers and parents have frequent interviews, and understand each other's wishes in regard to their children. It boozes up the spirits of a teacher to enjoy the friendship and co-operation of parents; "it is like a sudden sunburst," a cordial to his drooping and wearied mind, soothing as sweet music, the consciousness that, though pupils rebel, and are oft-times inattentive, obstinate, and indifferent, there are those who appreciate his motives and exertions, and cherish towards him a kind and sympathizing feeling. I should suppose prejudice never rested in the mind of a christian teacher; preference for the amiable, studious, and obliging, he cannot help feeling; but his good sense and justice to those committed to his care, will never allow him to act with a prejudiced eye. I would advise that mother to cultivate an acquaintance with the person to whom she has entrusted her earthly treasure, ascertain more fully his manner of instruction and mode of government, his reasons for what may seem to her a wrong course of conduct, and, perhaps, her mind will be more at ease, and she will, ere long, "feel that perfect reliance upon the guardianship to which her dear Harry is committed," which is so desirable for teacher, pupil, and parent. May that anxious mother realize every thing that she wishes for her sweet boy, and may "blessings undigested ever rest on parents and child."

FRAGMENTS OF A CHINESE BALLAD.

IN vain is the female's apartment inaccessible to public view: if irregularly finds its way into it, the news of it spreads far and wide with rapidity; it is a fire, of which those who are not near enough to see the flames, are sure to perceive the smoke.

Employment is the guardian of female innocence: do not allow women time to be idle: let them be the first dressed and the last undressed all the year round.

No in-door household work is repugnant to a modest and sensible woman. The shuttle and the needle are only the occupation of her leisure: the neatness of her house is the work of her cares; and it is her glory either to attend a sick person, or to prepare a repast.

The pearls and precious stones, the silk and gold, with which a coquette studiously bedecks herself, are a transparent varnish, which makes all her defects the more apparent.

A hopeful reliance a family has on a young girl with carmine lips and painted cheeks! The more she resembles an idol, the less will be the number of her worshippers.

THE PRESS

THE press is a messenger of truth, the herald of science, the interpreter of letters, the amanuensis of history, and the teacher of futurity. Like the sun, it dispels the gloom of night, irradiates the shade of ignorance, and pours a flood of knowledge on the world: it dilates the perceptions of man, extends his intellectual vision, inspires his heart with sensibility, and his mind with thought, and endows him with past and present omniscience: it directs his way to the temple of fame, and discovers to him the path by angels trod to Zion's holy hill.

HAIRTS OF THE TARTAR WOMEN.

THE Tartar women have a frank and confiding look; they appear willingly in public, and are met in great numbers in the streets of Peking. They sometimes walk, and sometimes ride on horseback, sitting, not aside, in the manner of English ladies, but across, like men. They wear long silk gowns which reach to their heels. Their hair is fastened up and smoothed on all sides, nearly in the Chinese manner. Although they use as much paint, red and white, as the Chinese, it may easily be seen that their complexion is naturally finer. They almost all ornament their hair with flowers.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF CHARACTER.

THE FASTIDIOUS MAN.

BY WILLIAM COX.

To be fastidious is to be a torment to yourself, a plague to your wife, a nuisance to your friends, a vexation to your acquaintance, and an annoyance to society in general.

Yet how many people, unable to discern the difference between a fine discrimination and a foolish fastidiousness, affect the latter "antic disposition."

You may know a fastidious man by his mincing gait, faint smile, feeble laugh, and "point device" appearance. There lurks no wrinkle in his neckcloth, and the polish of his boots realizes the glowing descriptions of the advertisements. His clothes seem a part of himself, not "troublesome disguises," put off and on like those of other people. He is great in all things little—superb in mediocrity. He can detect half a dozen faults in a coat where others see only perfection, and his tailor would assassinate him were it not for the dread of consequences.

His countenance has a mild, milk-and-water expression; only when you look closely at it, there is an incipient superciliousness observable in the elevation of his eyebrow and slight curl of his upper lip, but his face is never discomposed by any strong or boisterous passions. He detests extremes. He shakes no man roughly by the hand, and was never seen in a hurry in his life. There is neither heart nor soul about anything he does, and he is generally a bachelor.

Hearty and decided opinions frighten him. He seldom says "yes" or "no," but is made up of "ifs" and "buts." He is himself a spiritless preposition—an unpleasant disjunctive conjunction.

The Author of the universe has not been able to make anything to please the very fastidious man. Point out to him a glorious view or a lovely landscape, enough to fill any one else with rapture or serene delight, and he thinks it "very well," upon the whole, but he would have liked it better with a little less wood and a little more water, or a little more water and a little less wood, as the case may happen. He holds it derogatory to be altogether satisfied—anybody can be that. He has somewhat the feeling of the famous painter, Sir Godfrey Kneller, about him, of whom it is recorded that he was so thoroughly self-conceited, that Pope and some brother wits resolved to make an experiment whether any dose of flattery could be concocted too strong or gross for Sir Godfrey to swallow. The trial was made. It is well-known that Sir Godfrey's strength lay in portrait-painting—his landscapes are not anything particular. However, in viewing one of his freshly completed efforts in the latter department, Pope fell into a pretended transport, and more profusely than wisely or wittily expressed an opinion that if the Almighty had been favoured with his (Sir Godfrey's) advice and valuable suggestions at the construction of the universe, he would have made several important improvements; to which Sir Godfrey responded with the greatest gravity imaginable:—"Fore God, Mr. Pope, I believe you are right!" This is the feeling of the fastidious man. He sees nothing but what he thinks might be improved—a little. Without a soul for the sublime, he would alter the Alps and the Alleghenies, and Niagara comes not "exactly" up to his expectations. He is utterly incapable of a hearty thorough-going admiration. He thinks it unbecoming to give way to any strong impulse or emotion, and "fears and scruples shake him strongly," as to the propriety of laughing.

Of women he is a special judge. Of course not any of the fair daughters of Eve have altogether the good fortune to suit his taste—that would be too much to be expected. Should the reigning belle be such a rare piece of nature's workmanship as to exhaust hyperbole and set every one else crazy, still there is some little—some very little—but still some little deficiency which prevents her coming up to his connoisseurship's standard of perfection. In fact, he smiles with a calm self-satisfied superciliousness upon all wholesale admiration, and never dreams of praise without a reservation. He is a finic—a fribble.

To use a phrase which would make him perspire at Christmas, he never "goes the whole hog."

If the works of heaven please him not, much less do those of men. Of the fine arts he is a connoisseur of the first water. The Medicean Venus and the Apollo Belvedere come "nearest" his ideas of what is perfect, but still he deems that there is a curve in the neck of the Venus "a little" too angular, and in his "humble opinion," (very humble), the middle toe-nail of the left foot of the Apollo is not "exactly" what it might have been. He can admire with an "if," or a "but," a Titian, a Vandyke, a Raphael, a Rembrandt, or a Correggio, if well ascertained to be such, but modern works of art he cannot away with. They may do well enough for some people, but, really, to a "practised eye" they are an annoyance.

In literature there is no end to his troubles. The irregularities, the inconsistencies, and improbabilities of Shakespeare affect him worse than they did Voltaire, and the "Paradise Lost" he admits is a noble poem upon the whole, "but,"—yielding he dislikes, and of Smollett, as of all other not over particular writers, he has an instinctive horror. Anything with the smack of roughness and originality about it is foreign to his nature. Amid all the "shows" and affectations of which he is made up, this feeling is genuine, strong sense, vigorous delineation, sketches of low life, and coarse humour being naturally his antipathies.

In music he is perfectly consistent with himself. He is never carried away by a gush of melody, or entranced by "the concord of sweet sounds," but is always considering during a charming performance how he may express with the best effect his very refined opinion at the close of it. He is a great admirer, as far as he can admire, of little prettinesses, and much prefers Rossini to Mozart or Weber. Had "Der Freischütz" not been stamped by the approbation of judges from whose opinion there is no appeal, he would have held it to be outré in the extreme, and most supremely ludicrous; for, with all his affectation of superior taste, he has not vigour of mind for a bona fide opinion of his own, but wishes to acquire credit by "refining" on the opinion of others.

Even in cookery—in the natural perception of the flavour of meats, fowls, and fishes, wherein every man might be expected to have, and ought to give, a free and decided opinion, uncontrolled and unbiassed by that of other people, he has no real opinion to give. He dares not. He receives and attempts some small refinement upon the tastes of others, and passes that off for "taste" of his own, sneering insolently perchance the while at any one who has the manhood to brave the "world's dread laugh," and fearlessly assert that he likes rump steaks better without oyster sauce than with it. The slave! for is he not truly a slave who submits to have his sense of taste regulated by the shifting whims and caprices of others? He has no idea of that dauntless independence—that high moral courage, and lofty reliance on self, which would enable some men, though all the world stood tittering by, to eat, in that world's despatch, cheese to chicken, and pickled onions to turtle soup—if they liked it.

The fastidious man, on the contrary, shuns all bold innovations on established rules. With all his pretensions he eats what others who are considered authorities eat—learns, parrot-like, to list the names of the most fashionable wines, and drinks them whether abhorrent or not to his palate!

The puppy, the presuming, tame, spiritless puppy! Such a fellow ought to be banished to Russia, wear sheepskin, eat black bread, drink seal oil, be wedded to a Calmuc Venus, and sleep on chaff!

FRENCH LITERATURE.

SPIRIT OF THE PARISIAN JOURNALS.

Translated for the New-York Mirror.

MARRYING IN HASTE.

The Marseilles Semaphore of the sixteenth July contains the following anecdote, for the correctness of which it vouches.—Mademoiselle D—, a very pretty young lady, was on the point of leaving Marseilles to return to her family at Gap. The horses were already harnessed to the diligence, and the driver was calling over the list of passengers. But just as she entered the vehicle, while she was standing on the step-ladder alongside, Mademoiselle D— felt herself suddenly seized by the arm. She turned hastily round to see who it was that took such a liberty, and discovered in the aggressor a gentleman of a certain age, of a prepossessing countenance and good figure, very well dressed withal, but a perfect stranger to her. The gentleman begs her most urgently to be good enough to delay her departure for a moment, and favour him with a short interview. "Sir," said the lady, "I have not the pleasure of knowing you; what object can you have in an interview?" Saying which, she descended the steps, and stood by his side. "We shall soon become better acquainted, miss," eagerly replied the stranger, "but be good enough not to interrupt me; I see plainly that your time is short, that the driver is growing impatient, and that your fellow-travellers do not know what to make of me; but a single word will explain everything. I love you, miss, and I feel that it is impossible for me to exist without you. Come, will you marry me? I lay my fortune and my hand at your feet."—"But, sir, you cannot have known me long; what does all this mean?"—"I did not know you an hour ago, it is true; I have just seen you for the first time, and love came over me like a clap of thunder. Do, in mercy, decide my fate, whether for life or death—will you be my wife, or not?"—"Really, sir, I am at a loss what answer to make to such a request, under such circumstances."—"On! decide at once. Believe me, if you will marry me, you will be as happy as the day is long. I am rich, too; I have a fortune of three hundred thousand francs. I have but two children of my first marriage, my daughter has entered a convent, and my son is a curate. I am yet young, and to be alone in the world, is too hard a lot for me to bear; it depends on yourself whether you will marry me, and take the place of the children whom God has taken from me for his own service."

Mademoiselle D— did not go to Gap that day. Inquiries were made on both sides, the results of which were perfectly satisfactory, and the marriage will take place in a few days.

THE TARANTULA.

Quackery, which seizes hold of every subject, long since inscribed music on the list of universal remedies. John Baptist Porter, in his "Musica Panacea," affirms seriously that instruments made of the wood of medicinal plants, produced tones which have the same property as the plants themselves. Music figured largely, too, in the magical and astrological therapeutics of the ancients. From them has been derived the fable of the efficacy of music in curing the bite of the tarantula. All the old books treat very minutely on this subject. The tarantula, we may remark, is a kind of spider, found only in Italy, and most common in Apulia. It is larger and stronger than those found with us. The legs and belly are spotted with black and white, the breast and back, dark. The eye is covered with a moist and tender cornea, which dries up after death, a peculiarity not found in any of the other species. Another singularity is, that its eyes are of a golden yellow colour, and sparkle in the dark like a cat's. So much for the animal, now for the disease.

Signor Baglivi, a celebrated Roman professor, has written a voluminous treatise on this subject. He brings forward a number of cases, with the greatest gravity and good faith. A woman, he says, who went down into a cellar, was bitten by a tarantula. She did not feel the bite at the moment, nor till some little time afterwards. In the afternoon, a small swelling appeared on her leg, no larger than a pea, accompanied with feebleness and difficulty of breathing. She threw herself on a bed, and began to shake so violently, that two strong men could hardly hold her down. A physician was sent for, who opened the tumour, and applied plasters. In spite of his remedies, the patient grew worse, with a violent thirst, nausea, loss of speech, and stricture of the heart. Her parents, supposing that she had been bitten by a tarantula, sent for musicians, much against her wish, as she insisted that the pains she felt in her hands and feet would not admit of her dancing. When the men of art came, they asked the patient what were the size and colour of the spider that bit her, so that they might procure in the proper key. The patient told them she did not know whether she had been bitten by a tarantula or a scorpion. The musicians, thus left in the dark, began several airs which produced no effect on the patient, but on the fourth trial, she began to listen attentively, to sigh, and to fling out her feet. Soon she began to dance with a violence that brought about a speedy cure. Only: adds the learned professor, every year afterwards, about the same time when she was bitten, she had similar attacks, but, slighter, which were cured in the same way. In another case, the patient had unfortunately tried so many violent remedies before he called in the musicians, and weakened himself so much, that when they began to play, though his legs and arms moved convulsively, he was not strong enough to get up or dance, wherefore, we are told, he died. A more distinguished man than Baglivi, the celebrated Doctor Richard Mead, was also a believer in this malady. He admits that there have been many impostures and many merely nervous disorders which were regarded as being the effects of the bite of the tarantula, but still he firmly believed that the disease did exist at times, and that music was the only specific for it. Spite of the weight of these names, all the physicians of the present day are unbelievers. Some look upon the disease as being a nervous affection, produced by the heat of the climate, and the melancholy temperament of the people, who are represented by Baglivi as being meagre, fiery, tormented by sleeplessness, living under a burning sun, etc. The other opinion is that it is all trick and quackery. M. Laurent, a distinguished French physician, who has lived in Naples twenty years, assures us that in the present day at least this disease does not exist, and that it never was anything but a piece of jugglery performed by quacks and their accomplices. The bite of the tarantula, he insists, is perfectly harmless.

PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF NAPOLEON.

THE CARTEL.

"Jailer, look to him;—tell not me of mercy."—Shakespeare.
"Flee, I beseech thee, Isidore! If the peace and comfort—(why do I name such words)—if the very existence of thy poor wife be dear to thee—I implore thee flee! By the memory of our young loves, by the happy days that we have known together—by that close and dearer tie, the sorrows that we have shared—by the precious boy at whose sick couch we have watched in vain—by the smiling girl who now lies lapped in the unconscious sleep of infancy—by the dead for whom we mourned—and by that living blessing whom God, in his mercy, sent to compensate that mighty woe—by a father's hopes and a father's duties I conjure thee, flee! See, I am tall—the cloak hangs nearly as low over thy ankles as over mine; thou need'st but droop a little from my form, as if in grief—oh! what wife could walk erect thus the prison of her husband! Thou hast but to draw the capote over thy brow, and to let fall the veil, and hold thy handkerchief to thy eyes—alas! did I ever leave thee otherwise than weeping!—and thou wilt pass undiscovered. Dost thou not remember how often, in our wooing days, we have passed for brother and sister? Flee, my Isidore! if thy wife, if thy child be dear to thee, wrap thee in this disguise, and flee!"

"And leave thee here to perish!"

"Nay, my husband, nay! not to perish, but to join thee speedily in some distant land, and live a calm and blissful life, in safety and in freedom. Wrap thyself in this cloak, and away; away, then, I conjure thee! The patrol will soon go their rounds, and the sentinel who is now on duty will be changed. Nay, I have not taken him into our counsel. Look not reproachfully. But well I know that André Duval will show naught but respect and sympathy when he sees me, or one whom he takes for me, pass in sorrow from the place. Delay no longer. Lisette awaits without to conduct thee to her mother's abode, one of the old niches about Notre Dame, where thou mightest be safe for ages. There thou shalt stay until the search be passed, and then we will depart for America. Nay, therefore shake thy head! I shall be safe and free. Be sure of that. The imperial Josephine, although even she may not venture to intercede for one who has so transgressed the hard iron martial law as to challenge his superior officer, will yet full surely protect her favoured hand-maiden—one whose wedding she was graciously pleased to honour with her presence—from the effects of her wifely love. Alas, was I not the wretched cause of this calamity! Is it not through thy love for me that thou art in prison? and wilt thou deny me the blessed privilege of setting thee free?"

And no longer able to resist her persuasions, Colonel de Goubillon did submit to array himself in Adèle's garments, and, having safely passed the sentinel on guard, was, in a few minutes, following the steps of Mademoiselle Lurette, from the prison of La Force, to the precincts of Notre Dame.

The escape was complete and successful; but an unexpected circumstance rendered poor Adèle's stratagem unavailing, and re-placed Isidore once again in his dungeon.

It was a right queenly chamber that boudoir, into which the soft air of an April morning stole so wooingly; and yet its pervading beauty spoke rather of elegance than of splendour. The prevailing air of its fair and gentle mistress was everywhere visible. Flowers, pictured to the life by the deft needle of the embroideress, bordered the pale pink hangings, which shed a tender blush on the apartment; flowers, bright from the loom of Arras, seemed strewn in gay confusion over the rich but delicate carpet; flowers, fresh from the dewy gardens, glowed in the flower-painted jars of Sévres porcelain, which crowded the marble tables, whilst plants, the fairest and choicest of the hot-house and conservatory, were grouped in alabaster vases, catching the soft light of the veiled windows.

On a Grecian couch, near a half-curtained recess, sat a gracious and graceful lady, the fitting inmate of this scene of enchantment. Her dress, even to the lilies in her bosom and the Provence rose in her hand, was of pure and pitiless white, the most exquisite in texture and most becoming in form. Her shape and features were faultless in contour and expression. If the bloom of youth were faded, it was more than replaced by sweetness and sensibility. At the moment of which we write, that lovely countenance wore the gentlest look of pity, as she addressed a sad and weeping lady, who had just been admitted to her presence.

"Ma pauvre Adèle! I had hoped and believed that you were still the joyful occupant of your husband's prison. I never thought to be sorry to see you at St. Cloud. Colonel de Goubillon is, then, retaken?"

"Not retaken, may it please your majesty: he accomplished his escape in safety, and reached a retreat where he might have remained undiscovered until the day of doom; but the sentinel who watched the door of his cell on the evening of his departure was to be held responsible for his prisoner. Had not Isidore surrendered himself, that poor soldier must have now been his victim; and dearly as I love my husband, or rather, because I do love him dearly, I could not have wished him so saved. He is again in prison, and the sentinel free."

"Was that sentinel an accomplice in the escape?"

"No, on my word of honour, gracious madam. He was my foster-brother, the son of my good old nurse, and would not, as we well knew, raise the veil, or pull away the handkerchief from, as he supposed, a weeping wife, as a rougher warder might have done; but we took more than common pains to preserve him from all suspicion of our plans, for his sake and our own. Poor André! he, at least, will escape!"

"And, after all, what was the cause of this unhappy challenge?"

"Alas! alas! royal madam, I was the third unhappy and most unconsucious cause! Walking on the Boulevard Italien, with Madame le Vasseur, General Villaret, heated, as he says, by wine, and mistaking me for my cousin Pauline de St. Brie, (your imperial majesty has often noticed our sister-like resemblance,) to whom, as it now appears, he has been for some months secretly married, accosted me in a manner which occasioned me the most lively alarm. My husband came up at the moment, the general, certainly not himself, and hardly aware of his mistake, treated the matter with provoking levity. Madame le Vasseur's presence, and my tears, put, for the time, an effectual check on Isidore. He hurried us home, and then wrote that unhappy letter—that challenge to a superior officer—which filling, I hardly know how, into the hands of the minister of war, constitutes the sole and fatal proof of his breach of martial law; for General Villaret, as much disturbed as any man can be, and full of self-blame and self-accusation, denies all recollection, except of his own misconduct. O! if that fatal letter could be regained and destroyed! or, if the real facts of the case could be brought under the notice of him in whose word will lie the final sentence—the awful doom of life or death. O! if he could know the provocation, the palliation! he, that soul of honour, who holds his imperial consort's purity as the brightest jewel of his crown. How often have we heard him quote Cæsar's axiom—"

Here a slight movement of caution, and, perhaps, of uneasiness, on the part of Josephine, and a noise like the rustling of papers, suddenly stopped Adèle's pleadings, and directed her attention to the half-curtained recess. It opened on a small turret-chamber, fitted up as a private study, and, at a writing-table, folding a letter, sat a gentleman plainly dressed in a single breasted green-coat, a white kerseymer waistcoat, and the ribbon of the legion of honour at his button-hole. His little cocked-hat was on a chair at his side; and although his mobile hand was bent over the letter which he was folding, Adèle felt, at once, that it was no other than Napoleon. Papers were strewn before him, and amongst these, the eyes of the trembling wife rested upon the husband's well-known writing, the challenge upon which her fate and his depended.

The emperor paused in his occupation, and applied to his snuff-box for his habitual luxury; his countenance was calm and untorn, and but for a momentary glance towards the curtained doorway, it might have been doubted if he were conscious that he was not alone.

"Speak!" whispered Josephine, encouragingly; "plead your husband's cause!"

Five minutes before Madame de Goubillon would have given her right hand for such an opportunity. Now it had arrived, and between habitual awe of her great master, and the tremendous interest which she had at stake, she knelt before him, weak and wordless as a child.

"Pardon, sire! pardon!" Her voice died away, and, had not a passion of tears come to relieve her, she would have fainted.

Napoleon could not answer. He was about to seal the letter which he had folded, and, selecting a paper from the table, he first used it to light the wax-taper, which stood in a richly-chased golden candlestick by his side, and then flung it into the brazier, tapping his snuff-box as he watched the burning fragments, and glancing upon the happy wife, and her sympathizing mistress, with a smile exquisite in its sweetness and beauty. Perhaps, at that moment, his sensations were the most enviable of the three.

Need I say that the paper which he had destroyed was the only proof of Isidore's guilt—the all-important cartel?

TALES OF THE WOODS.

THE FOUNDING OF THE FOREST.

"I thought that all things had been savage here."—Shakespeare.

Few persons were more chivalrously attached to the person and principles of the unfortunate Charles I. than the ancient and wealthy house of Coningsby, of Simonbury; and yet such was the jar and conflict of opinion in those stormy days, that the levain of democracy and puritanism made itself manifest at an early period of his reign in a younger son of that loyal and flourishing race. Ralph Coningsby, the cadet in question, was a grave and thoughtful youth, who, being intended by Sir Walter to pursue his fortunes at the bar, under the auspices of one of the corrupt and subservient judges of the time, threw up his profession in disgust at the oppressions of the Star Chamber, and the levity of his fellow Templars, and returned with all speed to Simonbury, when his departure from the family tenets in politics and religion occasioned, to the jolly old knight, his father, and the gay gallants, his brothers, much such a shock of painful and ashamed surprise, as might have been produced by the discovery of some deadly crime. Alienated from his relatives and connexions, he was naturally thrown amongst the professors of his own stricter and sterner faith; many of whom, little anticipating the tremendous convulsion which was about to shake the kingly power to its very foundation, were turning their eyes towards that far new world, that distant and interminable wilderness which the voyages of Raleigh had opened to their view; and where their wildest visions of religious freedom and republican equality might be realized. Ralph Coningsby's desire to join one of these bands of pilgrims met with a ready assent from Sir Walter, who willingly advanced, even at the expense of a grove of oaks at the back of his hall, the moderate sum required for the outfit and the voyage; so much did he rejoice at the prospect of ridding himself of one, whose austerity of morals and of manners was silently felt as a reproach by the whole household, even whilst proclaiming him the abnegator of his race. To get rid of the first professor that ever bore the name of Coningsby the sacrifice of a grove of oaks seemed nothing. Rather than see that rigid and sanctimonious young face glooming twice in every day over the wild-flow and the wine-flask, in the great hall, Sir Walter would have cut down every tree in the park. Moderately, therefore, but sufficiently provided, Ralph Coningsby set sail from the port of Hull for New-England. But, although unaccompanied by any of his kindred, the young adventurer had a companion on his voyage, whose society would have been enough to reconcile him to a less voluntary exile. Alice Ravenshaw was the orphan daughter of a former Vicar of Simonbury. She was an early pupil of Ralph's, reared in the same tenets, and, separated by death from all natural ties, readily consented to become his wife, and to share his fortunes in that distant land. A young girl, who had been her personal attendant, went with them also from pure affection and fidelity; and, perhaps, no three persons ever left their native country with less regret. A tedious, but on the whole prosperous voyage, brought them to Nantuxek, (afterwards called Salem,) on the eastern shore of Massachusetts; and Alice, and her attendant Lucy, were specially settled in a log-but in the middle of a small clearing, which Ralph, with such assistance from the other pilgrims as kindness offered or money could buy, applied himself assiduously to bring into cultivation. Their husbandry prospered. Ralph, young and active, and used to the manly exercises of the time, found health and content in his labours; whilst Alice and Lucy, accustomed to the rude and hardy mode of living, which was in those days the lot of all, except the very highest ranks—(in thinking of the hardships of the pilgrim fathers we are a little too apt to forget the march of civilization, and that the comforts now found in every cottage were then hardly to be commanded in the palace.) Alice and her faithful handmaiden, habited at home "to winter and rough weather," would have been without a grievance of which to complain, had they not naturally cherished an undefined but un-governable fear of their neighbours of the woods, the true lords of the soil, the fierce and warlike red Indians. Even this feeling was destined to undergo a change. One day, shortly after she had become a mother, Mrs. Coningsby had advanced farther into the woods, tempted by the freshness of a close and narrow valley, in the bottom of which was a clear dark pool, surrounded by magnificent trees, whose foliage exhibited all the tender beauty of tint peculiar to that month, which the Indians call the moon of flowers; she had wandered far, and was thinking of returning to her home and her infant, when her ear was caught by the low wailing of a babe, and, following the sound, she saw a squaw seated on the ground, her back supported by a large white oak, and an infant clinging to her bosom, while a warrior stood leaning upon his bow, in an attitude of dejection, and with an expression of painful suffering which those "stoics of the woods" seldom allow themselves to exhibit. On approaching them nearer she saw that the squaw was dead, and that the wailing child was vainly pressing its little fingers against her breast, for the nourishment it could no longer afford. The cry of nature is alike in all languages. It went straight to the young Englishwoman's heart. She snatched the famished infant from the lap of its dead mother, and, regardless of colour or race, placed it to her own bosom, wept over it as it inhaled the nutriment, which it so much wanted; and contrived to make the grateful chief understand that his little son should have her cares and her love with her own boy. And for two years Corbitant (such was the name of the Narragansett chief, one of the most powerful of his tribe,) left the child in her hands. At the end of that period, just when he had begun to lisp the name of mother, a dead deer was one morning found at the door of their cabin, and the Indian boy was gone. Time rolled on. Divisions upon points of doctrine and church discipline had arisen among the religious community of Salem, as Maumkeak was now called; and they who had sailed three thousand miles to escape the intolerance of the dominant establishment in the old country, became themselves intolerant of the opinions of their neighbours. Alas, and these are the wise! Ralph Coningsby had mingled deeply and bitterly in these differences; and, partly from that cause, partly from an adventurous love of life in the wilderness, he and his now large family retired deeper into the woods, and were settled at an extensive clearing remote from other habitations. One evening the father, his two elder sons, and their male domestics, had gone to some distance to seek for their strayed cattle; and their trusty damsel, Lucy, was standing at the door listening to the mournful note of the whip-poor-will, whilst the mother and her young children were pursuing their customary avocation in the house. Suddenly Lucy rushed in, and seized a carbine, whilst an arrow falling at Mrs. Coningsby's feet, explained too clearly the motive of her strange action, and told the startled household that the Pequods, the most treacherous and dangerous of the Indian tribes, were upon them. In another second, before the faithful handmaiden, bold from the very desperation of fear, could fire the carbine which she had seized, they heard the terrible war-whoop, and gave themselves up for lost. Another minute passed; the frightened inmates of the dwelling, expecting the instant entrance of their merciless foes; almost dreading, so numerous did they seem, that the return of Mr. Coningsby and his sons would but add fresh victims to those whose doom seemed already sealed: when they were aware of another and more powerful band of warriors advancing from an opposite point; and a yet shriller war-whoop, at the sound of which the cowardly Pequods fled, whilst the friendly Narragansetts formed a guard around the house, and their young leader, approaching Mrs. Coningsby as she advanced to give him entrance, bent to kiss her garment, and whispered in the well-remembered accents of infancy, "Mother! dear mother!"

INDIAN TALES AND LEGENDS.

AN ALLEGORY OF THE SEASONS.

BY H. E. SCHOOLCRAFT.

An old man was sitting alone in his lodge, by the side of a frozen stream. It was the close of winter, and his fire was almost out. He appeared very old and very desolate. His locks were white with age, and he trembled in every joint. Day after day passed in solitude, and he heard nothing but the sounds of the tempest, sweeping before it the new-fallen snow.

One day, as his fire was just dying, a handsome young man approached and entered his dwelling. His cheeks were red with the blood of youth, his eyes sparkled with animation, and a smile played upon his lips. He walked with a light and quick step. His forehead was bound with a wreath of sweet grass, in place of a warrior's frontlet, and he carried a bunch of flowers in his hand.

"Ah, my son," said the old man, "I am happy to see you. Come in. Come, tell me your adventures, and what strange lands you have been to see. Let us pass the night together. I will tell you of my prowess and exploits, and what I can perform. You shall do the same, and we will amuse ourselves."

He then drew from his sack a curiously-wrought antique pipe, and having filled it with tobacco, rendered mild by an admixture of certain leaves, handed it to his guest. When this ceremony was concluded, they began to speak.

"I blow my breath," said the old man, "and the streams stand still. The water becomes stiff and hard as clear stone."

"I breathe," said the young man, "and flowers spring up all over the plains."

"I shake my locks," retorted the old man, "and snow covers the land. The leaves fall from the trees at my command, and my breath blows them away. The birds get up from the water and fly to a distant land. The animals hide themselves from my breath, and the very ground becomes as hard as flint."

"I shake my ringlets," rejoined the young man, "and warm showers of soft rain fall upon the earth. The plants lift up their heads out of the earth, like the eyes of children glistening with delight. My voice recalls the birds. The warmth of my breath unlocks the streams. Music fills the groves wherever I walk, and all nature rejoices."

At length the sun began to rise. A gentle warmth came over the place. The tongue of the old man became silent. The robin and bluebird began to sing on the top of the lodge. The stream began to murmur by the door, and the fragrance of growing herbs and flowers came softly on the vernal breeze.

Daylight fully revealed to the young man the character of his entertainer. When he looked upon him, he had the icy visage of Polarum. Streams began to flow from his eyes. As the sun increased, he grew less and less in stature, and moon had melted completely away. Nothing remained on the place of his lodge but the misshapen, a small, white flower, with a pink border, which is one of the earliest species of the northern plants.

GALEITIES AND GRAVITIES.

DISASTERS OF A DIFFIDENT MAN.

It was at a dinner in Paris. The ordinary routine of a French table had commenced. A regular series of servants appeared each instant at our elbows, inviting us to partake of a thousand different kinds of wine. Resolute to avoid all further opportunities for displaying my predominant trait of bashfulness, I sat in the most obstinate silence, saying out to everything that was offered to me. What could I do? The lady's eyes were fixed upon me, waiting a reply to her question. But my mouth was in a flame. I rolled the burning morsel hither and thither, rocking my head from side to side, while my eyes, which involuntarily I had fixed on her, were strained from their sockets. She regarded my grimaces, of the cause of which she was ignorant, with an expression of amazement and surprise, at which I can laugh now when I think of it.

"Monsieur is ill!" at length she gently and in an anxious tone inquired. I could hear no more. My mouth was flaying with intolerable pain; so, quietly abandoning the point, I opened it to the utmost and out dropped the infernal brand upon my plate. Not the slightest tendency to rashness ruffled the imperishable politeness of the lady. She soothingly condescended with me on my misfortune, then gradually led the conversation to a variety of topics, till exerting the magic influence that true politeness always exercises, I began to forget even my own blunders. Gradually my cheeks burned less painfully, and I could join in the conversation without the fear that every word I uttered shared the fate of the action I attempted. I even ventured to hope, nay, to congratulate myself, that the catalogue of calamities was completed for the day.

"Let no man call himself happy before death," said Solon, and he said wisely. The Ides of March are not yet over. Before us stood a dish of cauliflower, nicely done in butter. This I naturally enough took for a custard pudding, which is very much resembled. Unfortunately my vocabulary was not extensive enough to embrace all the technicalities of the table, and when my fair neighbour inquired if I was fond of coffeur, I verily took it to be the French for custard pudding, and so high was my panegyric of it that my plate was bountifully laden with it. Alas, one single mouthful was enough to dispel my illusion. I would to heaven that the coffeur had vanished without a trace. But that remained bodily, and as I gazed dependently on the huge mass that loomed almost as large and burning as Vesuvius, my heart died within me. Ashamed to confess my mistake, though I could as readily have swallowed an equal quantity of soft soap, I struggled manfully on against the mountainous heap at its base—shutting my eyes, and opening my mouth, to inhale as large masses as I could without stopping to taste it. But my stomach soon began intelligibly enough to intimate its intention to admit no more of this nauseous stranger beneath its roof, if not even expelling that which had already gained admission.

The seriousness of the task I had undertaken, and the resolution necessary to execute it, had given an earnestness and rapidity to my exertions which appetite could not have inspired, when my plate, having got somewhat over the edge of the table, upon my leaning forward tilted up, and down slid the disgusting mass into my lap. My handkerchief, unable to bear so weighty a load, bent under its turn, and a great portion of it landed safely in my hat. The plate instantly righted itself, as I raised my person and saw as I glanced my eye round the table, that no one had noticed my disaster. I inwardly congratulated myself that the nauseous deception was so happily disposed of. Resolved not to be detected, I instantly rolled my handkerchief together, with its remaining contents, and whipped it into my pocket.

The dinner-table was at length deserted for the drawing-room, where coffee and liquors were served. Meanwhile I had sought out what I considered a safe hiding-place for my hat, beneath a chair in the dining-room, for I dare not carry it any longer in my hand, having first thrown a morsel of paper, to hide the cauliflower, should any one chance, in seeking for his own hat, to look into mine. On my return to the drawing-room, I chanced to be again addressed by the lady by whom I had sat at the table. Our conversation was resumed, and we were in the midst of an animated discussion, when a huge spider was seen running up her arm.

"Take it off!—take it off!" she ejaculated in a terrified voice. I was always afraid of spiders; so, to avoid touching him with my hand, I caught my pocket-handkerchief from my pocket, and clapped it at once upon the miscreant, who was already mounting over her temple with rapid strides. Gracious heavens! I had forgotten the cauliflower, which was now plastered over her face like an emollient poultice, fairly killing the spider, and blinding an eye of the lady—while little streamlets of soft butter glided slowly down her neck and bosom.

"Mon dieu! Mon dieu!" exclaimed the astonished fair one.

"Mon dieu!" was re-echoed from every person's mouth.

"Have you cut your hand?" inquired one.

"No! no!—the spider—monieur is killing the spider."

Well might the company be astonished; the spray of the execrable vegetable had scattered her dress from head to foot. For myself, the moment the accident occurred, I had mechanically returned my handkerchief to my pocket, but its contents remained.

"What a monster must it have been," observed a young lady, as she helped to relieve my victim from her cruel situation, "I declare I should think he had been living on cauliflower!"

At that moment I felt some one touch me, and turning, I saw my companion, who had come with me.

"Look at your pantaloons," he whispered.

Already half dead with the confusion and disaster I had caused, I cast my eyes upon my own white dress, and saw, at a glance, the horrible extent of my dilemma. I had been sitting on the faded pocket, and had crushed out the hot butter, and the soft, paste-like vegetable, which had bedaubed and dripped down them, till it seemed as if it were actually dissolving my pantaloons.

Darting from the spot, I sprang to the place where I had left my hat; but, before I could reach it, a sudden storm of wrath was heard at the door.

"Secret! Secret! Secret!" the rin the first syllable being made to roll like a watchman's rattle, mingled with another epithet and name that an angry Frenchman never spares, was heard rising like a fierce tempest without the doors. Suddenly there was a pause, a gurgling sound, as if one swallowing involuntarily—and the storm of wrath again broke out with redoubled fury. I seized my hat and opened the door, and the whole matter was at once explained; we had exchanged hats—and there he stood, the soft cauliflower gushing down his cheeks, blinding his eyes, filling his mouth, hair, mustachios, ears, and whiskers. Never shall I forget that spectacle. There he stood statue-like, like the Colossus, and stooping gently forward, his eye fixedly closed, his arms drooping out from his body, and dripping cauliflower and butter from every pore.

I staid no longer; but, retaining his hat, I rushed from the house, jumped into a "fiacre," and arrived safely home, heartily resolving that I would never again deliver a letter of introduction.

GRAND TOURNAMENT AT EGLINTON CASTLE.

"Now all the youth of England are on fire,
And silent glaucance in the wardrobe lies;
Now thrive the armourers, and honour's thought
Rings solely in the breast of every man."

The grand preparations making for the tournament at Eglinton Castle, which is fixed to take place on the twenty eighth of August, and the two following days, is at present the all-engrossing subject of conversation with lords and ladies fair and bright. This day week was the last practising day, when the gardens of the Eyre Arms Tavern, St. John's-wood, were honoured with the presence of upwards of three thousand persons of distinction, for the purpose of viewing the prowess of knights of the nineteenth century. The gardens were opened for the admission of the nobility and gentry at three o'clock. We have, on a former occasion, given a sketch of the appearance presented by the lists—the scene enlivened by party-coloured pavilions and flaunting banners, and the spirits excited by the braying of trumpets. On the present occasion there was no change. On each side of the ground were elevated benches for the accommodation of the spectators. At the extreme end were three tents, where the knights were equipped. At the opposite end a marquee was erected for the royal family and principal nobility. The ground was furnished with a barrier, and all the other appurtenances of the ancient tilting-yard. By four o'clock the benches were crowded with a splendid assemblage of the rank and beauty of this metropolis. Her highness the Duchess of Cambridge, accompanied by the Princess Augusta and Mary of Cambridge, arrived shortly before four, attended by Baron Kneesebeck and the Hon. Miss Kerr. Her royal highness was received immediately on her arrival by the Earl of Eglinton, Earl of Winton, etc. The practice then commenced with running at the Quintain. The Hon. Captain Gage, Lord Glenlyon, Viscount Alford, the Hon. Captain Maynard, and Viscount Alford, distinguished themselves by the force of their attacks. The horsemanship of the Hon. Captain Maynard was much praised. Viscount Alford and Lord Glenlyon received falls during the afternoon. The young Marquis of Worcester, who very successfully pierced the oranges with his spear, through his horse shying, was thrown, but, we are happy to state, not hurt by the fall.

"Come hither, herald—Let the trumpet sound—
Ann. read out this."

At a quarter to six, the marshal of the lists (Lord Gage) made the subjoined proclamation, preparatory to the Earl of Eglinton and Viscount Alford entering the lists:

"No knight to ride more than three courses with the same opponent, in which advantage of any kind, gained twice by the same lance decides the victory; so that if these be gained in the two first, the victory is decided, as in heats at a race.

"N. B.—In default of other advantage gained in any course, the judge will decide for the attaint made nearest to the centre of the shield."

"It is expressly ordered by the Earl of Eglinton, and must be distinctly understood by each knight upon engaging to run a course, that he is to strike his opponent on no other part than the shield; and that an attaint made elsewhere will be adjudged foul, and the match forfeited."

Attention is most earnestly requested to be paid to this injunction, as any untoward accident might throw disaster upon it, or even prevent its ever again taking place, by force of law or public opinion.

"No knight can be permitted to ride without having on the whole of his tilting pieces.

"Lances of equal length, substance, and quality, as far as can be seen, will be delivered to each knight, and none others will be allowed."

"GAGE, Marshal of the lists."

"And from the tents,
The armourers, accomplishing the knights,
With busy hammers closing rivets up,
Give dreadful note of preparation."

A flourish of trumpets announced the readiness of the noble combatants, "plated in habiliments of war." And instantly the Earl of Eglinton and Viscount Alford entered the lists.

"Ask him his purposes, why he appears Upon this call of the trumpet."

The Earl of Eglinton wore a superb suit of brass armour, and from the crest which surmounted his helmet proceeded a plume of blue and yellow feathers. His horse was richly caparisoned with blue satin and cloth of gold.

Viscount Alford was clad in a magnificent suit of polished steel, which covered him from top to toe, the steel shoes, or solerets, being of the immense squarated fashion of the time of Henry VIII. His lordship's horse was also caparisoned in blue and white cloth.

Both knights having made their devoir before the bery of noble dames in the principal pavilion, took up their positions. The herald then sounded a charge, and the knights rushed to the encounter; but the pass was made without damage. After a slight pause the noble lords again rushed forward, the lance of the Earl of Eglinton slightly touching the pass-guard of his adversary.

In the next course the Earl of Eglinton struck the pass-guard of his opponent, and the concussion splintered his lance. In the next course Viscount Alford came full upon the pass-guard of the Earl of Eglinton with such force as to shiver his lance into several pieces. After this course the noble knights dismounted and retired to their respective tents to disarm. It was a sight that might have roused the spirit of old Froissart, or the ghost of Hotspur. The knights had certainly no easy task to perform; the weight of armour was rather heavier than the usual trappings of a modern cavalry, and the heat of the sun appeared to be baking the bones of some of the competitors.

At this point the Duchess of Cambridge retired, and was followed by a portion of the company. Lord Glenlyon and

Mr. Gage then entered the lists; but the beautiful horsemanship of the latter was unable to bring his horse up to the charge. Nothing could induce the animal to face his opponent; and so much time was lost in the attempt, that the concluding joust between the Marquis of Waterford and, we believe, Captain Maynard, was of necessity postponed—it being then eight o'clock in the evening. A grand flourish of trumpets announced the conclusion of the sports, and our company regarded their horses and carriages as best they might. From the great crowd it was an undertaking of immense difficulty, and of some danger. Captain Maynard proved himself a superior rider, by the splendid style he leaped his horse at speed repeatedly over the barrier, and the admirable manner in which he performed the modern lance exercise, and made a very beautiful charger curvet round and round his lance placed upright on the ground. The whole of the arrangements were under the direction of Mr. Pratt, to whose discretion the ordering of the tilting, the armour and arm, and all the appliances for the tournament, have been entrusted. Considering the business of Saturday was but a rehearsal, and, putting entirely out of the question the folly or wisdom of the whole thing, it must be acknowledged that it has been well got up. Some of the heralds' and pursuivants' costumes are very peculiar. There is an immense store of armour of all sorts—pennons, lances, trappings, and all the details of the wars of the middle ages. The display in Scotland will certainly be a gorgeous pageant, and a most extraordinary piece of pastime. There were crowds of pretty women on the ground.—London paper

THE FREAKS OF FORTUNE.

A gentleman dreamt that a certain number would be a prize in the lottery. The morning after his dream, which was only a week previous to the drawing of the lottery, he wrote a note to his clerk to desire him to buy the ticket immediately; and subsequently told many of his neighbours and acquaintances of his dream, the number, and of his purchase of the ticket. Being a very popular person, all who heard of the circumstance were anxious that his dream should be realized; and, to their great satisfaction, the number was drawn; and, very large. Forthwith, a numerous party of artisans and peasants, employed by the gentleman in question, called forth from Naples, with musical instruments, colours flying, and a banner gaily decorated; on which the lucky number was inscribed, and also the amount of the prize. In this manner they proceeded to the habitation of Mr. —, and announced the joyful intelligence, which it is needless to say, spread a general hilarity through the house. This procession was followed by several friends and acquaintances, who came to congratulate the fortunate owner of the prize. Refreshments in abundance were served out on the lawn for the peasants and artisans; and a collation in the sal-là-manger was offered to the friends. Sufficient wine of an inferior quality not being in the cellar, the best was copiously supplied, in the generosity occasioned by the good fortune of the host. The health of the winner of the prize was repeatedly drunk, and many suggestions relative to the disposal of a portion of the newly acquired wealth were given. The news spread, and the pleasure-grounds of Mr. — became literally filled with visitors of all classes; when, in the midst of the general rejoicing, the clerk who had been a week before deputed to purchase the ticket arrived, with a visage so rueful and wo-begone, that one glance at it announced some disagreeable news. Alas! this unlucky sight had, in the pressure of more than ordinary business, forgotten to buy the ticket! and thought not of it until informed of its having been drawn a prize. The rage and disappointment of Mr. — may be more easily imagined than described, when he saw the wheel of fortune, which had paused at his door, driven to that of another; who, having heard of the dream of Mr. —, selected the number, and became the buyer of the ticket only the day before it was drawn. The refreshments so liberally dispensed on this occasion had quite exhausted the larder of the dreamer, and nearly emptied his cellar; and thus ended the affair of the lottery.

THE JEWELS—A TRADITION OF THE RABBIS.

The celebrated teacher, Rabbi Meir, sat during the whole of one Sabbath-day in the public school instructing the people. During his absence from the house his two sons died, both of them of uncommon beauty, and enlightened in the law. His wife bore them to her bed-chamber, laid them upon the marriage bed, and spread a white covering over their bodies. In the evening the Rabbi Meir came home.

"Where are my two sons?" he asked, "that I may give them my blessing? I repeatedly looked round the school, and I did not see them there."

She reached him a goblet. He praised the Lord at the going out of the Sabbath, drank, and again asked—

"Where are my sons, that they too may drink, of the cup of blessing?"

"They will not be far off," she said, and placed food before him, that he might eat.

He was in a gladsome and genial mood; and when he had said grace after the meal, she thus addressed him.

"Rabbi, with thy permission, I would fain propose to thee one question."

"Ask it, then, my love?" he replied.

"A few days ago, a person entrusted some jewels to my custody, and now he demands them again: should I give them up?"

"This is a question," said Rabbi Meir, "which my wife should not have thought it necessary to ask. What would thou hesitate or be reluctant to restore to every one his own?"

"No," she replied, "but yet I thought it best not to restore them without acquiring thee therewith."

She then led him to the chamber, and, stepping to the bed, took the white covering from the dead bodies.

"Ah, my sons, my sons!" thus loudly lamented the father; "my sons! the light of my eyes and the light of my understanding!—I was your father: but ye were my teachers in the law."

The mother turned away, and wept bitterly. At length she took her husband by the hand and said—

"Each of us must teach the other: we must not be reluctant to restore that which was entrusted to our keeping! See, Lord Gave, the Lord has taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord!"

"Blessed be the name of the Lord!" echoed Rabbi Meir, "and blessed be his name for thy sake too, for well it is written, 'Whoso hath found a virtuous wife, hath a great treasure than costly pearls; she openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness.'"

LITERARY NOTICES.

"The Naval Foundling." By "the Old Sailor," author of "Tough Yarns," "Night at Sea," "Greenwich II speaks," etc. In three vols. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

This preface to this work is so characteristic, that we must quote it entire:—"My first launch was a single volume; I then tried a two-decker; and now I have boldly commenced a first-rate, with three tiers of artillery. I make up my mind to some random shots, and perhaps a rattling broadside; but I have nailed my colours to the mast, and will never strike. As for sinking me—it must be precious heavy metal to do that; so that I hope to carry my flag triumphantly into the port of public favour, that has given me snug moorings heretofore. Now, for a preface, I say this is short and sweet." So much for the author's introduction. His three volumes, we have read. The nautical portions are capital; rich in humour, true to the life in sketches of scenes and characters at sea, and highly interesting. But when the author gets on shore, and tries to talk sentiment, and describe tender interviews between lovers, he is as awkward and ridiculous as a sailor on horseback, or a marine at the mast-head. At the same time, the "Naval Foundling" is a very readable work—a little coarse occasionally—but quite equal to anything by Marryat, and superior in its healthy moral tone.

"Confessions of a Schoolmaster." Andover: Gould, Newman and Saxton. New-York: Corner of Fulton and Nassau streets.

We are informed by the author in his preface, that this work is a faithful though painful exhibition of facts as they occurred during ten or twelve years of the life of a common-schoolmaster. It is called his "Confessions," because his errors and confessions of error appear to predominate; especially during several of the first years. From a rapid glance through the volume, we can attest to the author's candour. Rousseau himself is not apparently more frank and sincere. The style is pure and familiar, and the speculations of the writer are for the most part sensible and philosophical. Teachers and all persons interested in the instruction of the young will find much in the work worthy of their attention. We do not agree with the author in his remarks upon corporal punishment. Thanks to the dawn of a better era in education, the brutal Vandalism of the practice is fast growing into desuetude and contempt.

"Sketches by Box, illustrative of Every-day Life and Every-day People." By Charles Dickens. With twenty illustrations by George Cruikshank. New edition, complete. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

This is a very neat edition of some of the earlier productions of Dickens, written, as he informs us, from time to time to meet the exigencies of a newspaper or magazine. They are quite amusing, and abound in those characteristics, which have given such extensive popularity to the Pickwick papers and Nicholas Nickleby. The illustrations by Cruikshank are among the best things that have ever been accomplished by that artist. The frontispiece, representing Box and his picaresque co-labourer ascending in a balloon, is quite original and appropriate. Into the plate accompanying the sketch entitled "Public Dancers," the caricaturist has introduced excellent likenesses of himself and Dickens. Most truly it is remarked by the Quarterly Review, that Cruikshank is as great an artist in his own way as Box himself—and it is difficult to say, on laying down the book, how much of the powerful impression we are conscious of may be due, not to the pen, but to the pencil.

"The Charter Oak, and other Poems." By John Jay Adams. Pp. 60. New-York: Samuel Combs.

A poem, which has received the enthusiastic eulogy of Woodworth, can be little affected either by our praise or our censure. The "Charter Oak" was originally published in the Mirror, and has met with numerous readers and admirers. Mr. Adams has a correct ear in versification. His style is peculiarly his own, and in these days of pillaging and imitation, we look upon originality as no small recommendation. We should not omit to observe that the typography of this volume is very beautiful—well worthy of the contents.

"The Young Merchant." Philadelphia: R. W. Pomeroy. New-York: Ransom, 156 Fulton-street.

This is truly an excellent little work. It treats, in a liberal and intelligent manner, of the proper qualifications, intellectual and moral, for the merchant—of conduct during apprenticeship—hints to young merchants upon setting up in business—elementary principles of commerce—the merchant's duties, conduct under reverses, recreations and rewards. The author evidently writes from practical experience and observation, and his advice cannot but carry weight. The following extract shows too truly the uncertain nature of our commercial business:

"Commerce is not the surest road to wealth, or even to competence. If its statistics for the United States were sufficiently full to enable us to present the reader with a complete list of all who have been engaged in it during the last thirty years, we firmly believe, it would be found, where one has realized a fortune by it, ten have failed, and brought losses upon those connected with them in the relations of business."

"Jack Sheppard," a romance. By W. Harrison Ainsworth, Esq., author of "Rookwood," "Crichton," etc. In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

The first volume of this ingenious romance has appeared. It is full of bustle, incident and well-delineated character. The author rarely essays anything like humour, but his pictures of low, criminal life, his descriptions of burglaries, thefts and escapes from prison are conveyed with great power and effect.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

By an inadvertence on the part of the proof-reader, the last paragraph in Mr. Cushing's first article on the scenery of the Merrimack, was printed without quotation marks. It should have been credited to James.—"Q." is informed that Mr. Fay's new novel has been received, and will probably be put to press immediately.—"Y. T. F." in our next.—We have sent "T. S." an amusing account of his visit to the long, low, rakish-looking schooner, is one of the daily papers.—A correspondent wishes to know if any one can tell him of the whereabouts of the man in the claret-coloured coat. The last we heard of him he was prowling about the Saquehannock with John Smith, shooting woodcock.—We shall have no occasion for the contributions of "Stella," "M. N.," "T. Z.," "Mountain Bard," and "Vorick," not wishing to add anything this week to the stock of bad poetry.—We cannot reply to the personal inquiries of "C. H." and would not if we could.—The "Cartel," and the "Founding of the Forest," being sent to us in manuscript, were mistaken by the compositor for original papers. They were copied by a fair correspondent, from the writings of Miss Milford, and we regret the inadvertence that omitted her name.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1839

Want of a national name.—The last Knickerbocker Magazine contains an excellent article by Washington Irving on our national nomenclature. After advising the restoration of the original Indian names in all cases where they are euphonious, he remarks:—"We want a national name. We want it poetically, and we want it politically. With the poetical necessity of the case I shall not trouble myself. I leave it to our poets to tell how they manage to steer that collocation of words, 'The United States of North America,' down the swelling tide of song, and to float the whole raft out upon the sea of heroic poetry. I am now speaking of the mere purposes of common life. How is a citizen of this republic to designate himself? As an American? There are two Americas, each subdivided into various empires, rapidly rising in importance. As a citizen of the United States? It is a clumsy, lumbering title, yet still it is not distinctive: for we have now the United States of Central America; and heaven knows how many 'United States' may spring up under the Proteus changes of Spanish America." Mr. Irving then proceeds to recommend our substituting the name Appalachia, or Alleghanis, (he prefers the latter,) in place of America. The title of Appalachia, or Alleghanis, would still announce us as Americans, and would specify us as citizens of the Great Republic. Even our old national epithet of U. S. A. might remain unaltered, designating the United States of Alleghanis. We think these suggestions well worthy the serious attention of our legislators. It is most true that we have no distinctive national title. "Columbia," the poetical appellation sometimes applied to our country, has already been appropriated by a South American state. Alleghanis would be a title at once sonorous and expressive—an appellation drawn from one of the grand and eternal features of our country;—from that noble chain of mountains, which formed its back-bone, and ran through the 'old confederacy,' when it first declared our national independence." We heartily second the motion of Washington Irving.

Look on this picture and on this.—We were struck with the contrast between two letters, received at our office the other day, from persons residing in the same village, in this state, both of whom were two years in arrears for the New-York Mirror. The first was as follows:

"Sir—Yours received. I enclose you ten dollars. If you write me any more undignified letters I shall stop your paper."

Postage unpaid.

The second letter (on which the postage was paid, by the way) was as follows:

"DEAR SIR—I thank you for reminding me of my delinquency. I enclose you the amount due for the past and present volumes, (ten dollars,) with much pleasure, and trust you will forgive me for not attending to your claims at an earlier date. Yours cordially, etc."

We need not ask, who was the reasonable man and the gentleman in this case? Few persons have any idea of the innumerable expenses attending a periodical establishment, and of the importance that all demands, though severally small and apparently trifling, should be collected to form a respectable aggregate. It is quite as unpleasant to dun as to be dunned; and, if this fact were but duly considered, there would be more tolerance in the world.

The claqueur system.—It is well known, that in the Parisian theatres, when a new piece is produced, an organized body of men, called claqueurs, are placed in the pit for the purpose of applauding. They are guided by a signal from their chief, and measure their approbation by his movements. The profession has become quite as distinctive as that of the actors themselves. A letter from Paris says that the claqueurs the other night, at one of the theatres, absolutely rose up and beat some of the audience for hissing an indifferent piece. They charged their antagonists also with the crime of paying for their places, calling them "those wretches who pay." By the way, is not the puffing system of our own press quite as much of an imposition as the claqueurisme of the French? We would rather be beaten by claqueurs than compelled to listen to some of the trash that is produced at our theatres and puffed by respectable journals.

Asphaltum.—This pavement has stood the test of snow, frost, rain, and summer's scorching sun. It will be remembered that it was Dr. Brandt who had the spirit to make the first trial of it in this country, before his office, in Broadway, at some trouble, and much cost. How well the side-walks would appear, and what relief to those promeneing this fashionable part of the city, if all our trottoirs were paved with this even and smooth bitumen.

The city of Palenque.—We learn it is the intention of Mr. Stevens, the traveller, and newly appointed envoy to Guatemala, to visit the ruins of Palenque, in company with Mr. Catherwood, the artist, and give to the public the result of his investigations. The professor of chemistry and natural philosophy in William Mary college of Virginia, has addressed a letter to the editors of the Richmond Compiler, requesting information of a book said to have been published by a Mr. F. Waldeck, a native of Germany, and afterwards a resident of this country, compiled from a number of plans, drawings of buildings, hieroglyphics, and other documents relating to, or said to have been found in, a city called Palenque, believed to be one of the largest, most magnificent, and ancient cities of the western world, which had been collected during an investigation of the ruins of the city. "From these documents," says the professor, "it appeared that Palenque was situated on the banks of the Rio Hornoza, or Tobasco, in the state or district of Chiapa, immediately south of that of Tobasco; and that its latitude was about seventeen degrees north, and its longitude from Greenwich ninety-one degrees fifty minutes west. The city itself was so completely covered with soft alluvial soil, and the vegetation over it so luxuriant, that it was with difficulty any traces of it could be found; but small excavations had been made to a sufficient extent to prove that its circumference exceeded six miles. They had also laid open several stone buildings of vast extent and magnificence, and several columns, statues and other works of art had been partially brought to light; all of which appeared to indicate so close a resemblance to the temples and idols of ancient Egypt, as to almost induce a supposition that these distant spots must formerly have had intercourse. Mr. Waldeck being a man of great perseverance, and having devoted much time to the study of antiquities, and the ancient Indian languages and hieroglyphics, submitted the documents and information he had obtained, not only to the principal merchants and citizens of Mexico, but likewise to the government authorities of that country, and to those of France and England; and he not only obtained a free dispensation from the government of Mexico to visit the place, and make such excavations as might be necessary, but was aided by the subscription of a considerable sum of money, amounting, it is believed, to several thousand dollars, to enable him to carry his investigations into effect; it being understood that those who subscribed the necessary funds should be put in possession of his drawings and researches, that they might be able to reimburse themselves by their publication. The writer, (long since an inhabitant of this country,) has made inquiries at some of the principal public libraries of the cities of the United States, in hopes of finding this report, and has also searched the foreign reviews and periodicals, hoping to find some notice of its publication, but in vain. Discoveries of so much importance to the early history of America ought not to be passed over slightly; and the object of the present notice is to ask your numerous readers whether they have seen or heard of such a publication."

Mr. Barry.—We have before alluded to Mr. Barry, the active manager of the Bowery Theatre, and to the fact that he has brought much additional strength to that establishment. But he is entitled to more than a casual notice. As manager and lessee of the Tremont Theatre in Boston, his reputation for enterprise, liberality and gentlemanly deportment has been for some years familiar to many of our readers. He has left behind him in that city a host of friends, and we have no doubt that his return would give a new impulse to theatricals, now in a precarious condition. But Mr. Barry has once more, after an absence of several years, pitched his tent among his New-York friends, who have welcomed him back, in a manner the most flattering and enthusiastic. Under his intelligent superintendence, we have a sure guarantee that the theatrical department of the Bowery will be managed with propriety, skill and effect. The public here will not forget his deserts.

Annual Fair of the Mechanics' Institute at Castle Garden.—The fifth annual fair of this institution is now open at Castle Garden, and it is truly well worth a visit. The array of articles is extremely creditable to American mechanic industry and skill. Strangers should not leave the city without enjoying the exhibition. We are glad to learn that it is fully attended.

Memoir of Schlesinger.—The conclusion of this most admirable paper will be found in the Mirror of to-day. It is a literary production of the highest order of merit, and we have reason to know that it has been universally read, and everywhere with entire approbation. It will shortly be published in the book form.

Wooden pavements.—We see by the London papers that a wooden pavement company, with a large capital, has been established in that city. How happens it that none of our speculators have thought of getting up such a kind of stock here?

The Hungarian brothers.—We are glad to learn that these ingenious vocalists have been quite successful in their remarkable exhibitions at the Apollo Concert-room.

Tell him he hasn't me yet.—It is proposed to change the name of the fashionable watering-place of the East from Nahant to Snake-haunt; the vicinity being so extensively patronized by the sea-serpent.

New music.—Messrs. Hewitt and Jaques have published a beautiful song, called "Morning's Ruddy Beam," a song of the Alpine hunters, written and composed by George Hurley.

Astronomical.—Four of the larger planets are now visible in the south-western sky early in the evening; namely, Venus, Jupiter, Mars and Saturn.

Flattering.—The London Age calls the people of the United States "the reprobate robbers of the universe."

NUMBER TWELVE.

YOU REMEMBER THE MAID.

You remember the maid with her dark-brown hair,
And her brow where the finger of beauty
Had written her name, and had stamp'd it there,
Till it made adoration a duty?

Each charm, as a new one was given,
Till she grew in our eyes to a vision of light,
And we thought her a spirit from heaven!

And your heart can recall—and mine often goes back,
With a sigh and a tear, to the hours
When we gazed on her form, as she followed the track
Of the butterfly's wing through the flowers:—

When, in her young joy, she would smile with delight,
On its plumage of mingling dyes,
Till she let it go free—and look'd after its flight,
To see if it enter'd the skies!

But she wander'd away from the home of her youth,
One Spring, ere the roses were blown!
For she fancied the world was a temple of truth,
And she measured all hearts by her own!

She fed on a vision and lived on a dream,
And she followed it over the wave;
And she sought—where?—and found a milder gleam,
For a home—and they gave her a grave!

There was one whom she loved, though she breathed it to none.

And he said he loved her, but he left her alone,
With the worm of despair in her heart!
And, oh! with what anguish we counted, each day,
The roses that died on her cheek,

And hung o'er her form as it faded away,
And wept for the beautiful wreck!

Yet her eye was as mild and as blue to the last,
Though shadows stole over its beam.

And her smiles are remembered, since long they are past—
Like the smiles we have seen in a dream!

And—it may be, that fancy had woven a spell,
But—I think, though her tones were as clear,
They were somewhat more soft, and their murmurings fell
Like a dirge on the listening ear!

And while sorrow thrills round her a holier grace,
Though she always was gentle and kind—
Yet, I think, that the softness which stole o'er her face
Had a softening power o'er the mind!

But it might be, that her looks and her tones were more dear,
And we valued them more in decay,
As we treasure the fast fading flower of the year—
For we felt she was passing away!

She never complain'd—but she loved to the last!
And the tear in her beautiful eye
Often told that her thoughts were gone back to the past,
And the youth who had left her to die!

But mercy came down, and the maid is at rest,
Where the palm-tree sighs o'er her at even;
And the dew that weeps over the turf on her breast,
Is the tear of a fair foreign heaven!

AMERICAN MEMORIALS.

ANCIENT REMINISCENCES.

In King's Chapel, in Tremont-street, Boston, is a monument to the memory of Frances Shirley, wife of Governor Shirley. There are none of the contemporaries of this lady remaining. We know but little of her except from this monument, and the faint and visionary sketches that become more and more indistinct, as they pass through successive generations. After a panegyric on her virtues, his record follows:

"Near this excellent woman, lie the mortal remains of her second daughter, Frances Bullen, late wife of William Bullen, Esq., the King's Advocate in the Vice-Admiralty Court of the Province of Massachusetts, whose virtue and great beauty, prudence, industry, cultivated understanding, and gentle manners, were the delight of all with she lived:

"The too brief space of her life was passed ere she had attained her twenty-fourth year, and she died on the twelfth of March, 1744, deeply lamented by her husband, parents, and friends."

It is truly said we live a second time in our children. Of the daughter of this lady and granddaughter of Governor Shirley, Frances Shirley Bullen, there is much known that is interesting. A friend of hers is still living at an advanced age.

Her mother died while she was very young, and her father, being appointed agent for Massachusetts to the court of St. James, went to England, and left her to be educated in this country. The property which she was to inherit made it proper to appoint guardians of distinguished respectability. These were Judge Trowbridge, Judge Russell, and her uncle, Mr. Temple.

With Judge Trowbridge, she principally resided. Her wealth and beauty attracted admirers at an early age; but it was well understood, that her father was averse to her forming any matrimonial connexion in America, and that he looked forward to her making a splendid alliance in England.

The early part of her life was passed in innocent gaiety, unclouded by thought of the future. She formed those associations with friends of her own sex, to which the youthful mind so naturally turns, and felt as if her world of happiness existed on this side of the Atlantic. At the age of eighteen, she received a summons from her father to come to him; and, with deep sensibility, she parted from Mrs. Trowbridge, who had supplied to her the place of her own mother. There was no mother to welcome her to the strange land to which she was going; of her father she had but a slight remembrance; and, if friends were in store, they must be new ones. She made a thousand promises to write constantly; and said, "that to lay open her whole heart" to those she had left behind "would be her greatest solace."

Soon after her arrival in England, letters came; but they were not the transcripts of her warm and affectionate heart; it was evident to her friends, that they were written in a depressed and constrained manner. At length, all correspondence ceased, and they heard of her only by report. It was soon understood, that her father did not wish her to continue her intercourse with her American friends, and was continually haunted by fears that she might defeat his ambitious projects by forming some alliance beneath her. This led him to keep a constant guard upon her movements, and to prohibit her from general society. One solace, however, he allowed her, and that was the privilege of passing a few days with Mrs. Western, a female friend of great respectability and influence. The lady became fondly attached to Frances, who, acquired, from her elegant and cultivated manners, a polish that she could not have gained in her father's family.

Mrs. Western resided a few miles from the city, and it was happiness to her young friend to quit its noise and dust and enjoy those scenes in the country, that reminded her of her early walks in Cambridge, and the winding course of Charles river. Mrs. Western had sons, but they were absent from home, and the father's apprehensions, with regard to them, seem not to have been awakened. One of them returned home on a visit to his mother, while Frances was staying with her. Mrs. Western immediately made arrangements to restore the young lady to her father's residence the next day, knowing his extreme anxiety on the subject.

The breakfast hour, with her, was one of cheerful meeting. She took her seat as usual at the table, and, after waiting some time in vain for the appearance of her guest, sent a summons to her room. The messenger returned with the intelligence, that she was not there, and that the room did not appear to have been occupied during the night. She sent to her son's room; the young student was not to be found, the truth flashed upon her mind,—they had eloped together! Nothing remained but to send a despatch to the father, acquainting him with her suspicions.

He lost no time in repairing to her mansion, and loaded her with reproaches. His accusations were violent and unfounded, and he more than hinted, that she was accessory to the elopement. Mrs. Western preserved a calm and dignified deportment, and replied, "that the measure was as unpleasant to herself as to him; that her son had not yet finished his education, and a matrimonial connexion might prove a blight to his future prospects and exertions." She also observed, "he was not of age, and could not, for some time, come into possession of his own property. That, as now the thing was irretrievable, they had better submit to it with magnanimity."

Necessity is a never-failing counsellor. The father contented himself with solemnly protesting he never would forgive, or see, his daughter. Mrs. Western, on the contrary, received the young couple with gentleness when they returned, which they did after a few days' absence, and endeavoured, by maternal counsel, to obviate the evils of this rash and disobedient step.

Years passed on, and they had several children. Though the father still adhered to his determination of not forgiving his daughter, in the tenderness of her husband and his mother, and surrounded by blooming and healthy children, her life was tranquil and happy.

Some months after the birth of the youngest child, Mr. and Mrs. Western set out on a journey, taking the infant with them. At an inn, where they stopped, Mr. Western got out of the phaeton. At that moment the horses, which were usually perfectly gentle, took fright, and ran with his wife and child, notwithstanding all his own and his servant's attempts to stop them.

The mother's first thought was for her infant, and seizing an opportunity when the spread of the horses was a little checked, by a hill, she threw it upon a hedge of foliage. A mother's ears are quick, she distinguished the cry of the child; it was not one of distress, and she felt new courage, and, springing herself from the carriage with but slight injury, was able to hasten immediately back to recover the child. She found it safe and unharmed, and it recognized its mother with the joyous welcome of infant affection. With a heart filled with gratitude for their preservation, she walked on to meet her husband, knowing he must be enduring dreadful anxiety.

The first person she met was her own servant, "We are safe and unharmed," she exclaimed, "hasten back and tell your master."

He neither moved nor spoke, and as she looked in his face she perceived signs of deep distress. "What has happened?" what have you to tell?" she exclaimed. He was unable to evade her eager inquiries, and the information he gave her was abrupt and over-whelming. Mr. Western, in endeavouring to stop the horses, as they rushed furiously forward, received a violent blow on his breast, from the pole of the carriage, and fell dead on the spot. His wretched wife, faintered at the intelligence, and so dreadful was the shock, that for many months her reason was partially estranged. Her father could not resist this accumulation of distress. He went immediately to see her, and continued the intercourse, soothing her grief by parental tenderness.

After these melancholy events took place, she resided wholly in the country, devoting herself to the education of her children. She died many years since; and only one of her American friends still survives her.

We hope this little narrative is sufficiently interesting to make one of her early letters acceptable. It was addressed to the friend just alluded to, after returning from a visit she had been making her. The contrast it forms between the thoughtless gaiety of a girl, and the heart-rending events of after-life, is very striking. The local allusions it contains to people who existed before the revolution, as well as the mode of travelling it describes, making a journey from Newburyport to Boston occupy nearly a day and a half, have something of a picturesque effect in contrast with the present times, and modes of travelling by railroad and steam.

Cambridge, 1762.

"DEAR SISBY—Last evening I heard of an opportunity to send to you what I cannot omit writing; but must give a short account of my journey back, which was not very agreeable, on account of the roads. You cannot imagine how bad the travelling was—we could only walk the horses for several miles, and just as we got to Parker's river, one of the wheels of the chaise came off. It took some time to get it on again, and by the time we entered Rowley woods I was heartily tired. They looked dark and dismal, and I thought of nothing but robbers, and determined, if we were attacked, to surrender even my N. P. ear-rings to save my life. Well, all at once I saw a man on horseback, coming towards us. I began to tremble, but who do you think it proved? why, Mr. Jonathan Jackson! of all persons in the world, the least like a robber! We had a little pleasant conversation, and then proceeded; but did not get to Beverly till quite dark. The next morning we left early, found the roads much better, and arrived at Cambridge about one o'clock.

"To-day is Sunday, and we have had a sermon upon dress, from Mr. Appleton. Upon my word, I think he made it out very well; for he told us people should dress according to their rank, and not go beyond their circumstances. He touched a little upon the propriety of our being subject to the other sex, and gave us a hint upon silence. I suppose, my dear, you will think I could not help taking this to myself. I confess it touched me a little, but I shall soon recover from it; for it is so natural to my tongue to go, that I cannot easily stop its motion.

"Here am I, sighing and moaning that we had not some of this good weather while I was with you, at N. P. I liked the place so well that I had quite a curiosity to see how it looked when the sun was out.

"I had almost forgot to tell you how much my N. P. ear-rings were admired. I thought of them during the sermon, and ventured to wear them again in the afternoon. How I want to take a serious walk with your ladyship through those long rope-walks—a walk! no, I think the weather is cool enough for a run. I don't believe you have had any knots tied in your handkerchief since I came away. Only think of my forgetting to deliver a message from Mr. M. while I was at N. P. I am positively afraid to walk out lest I should pop upon him, and he should ask me about it. I must beg the favour of you to do it for me. It was to ask your father if he received a letter by one Mr. Whitefield? He is a great preacher, and quite the fashion; they say he makes people cry and laugh in the same moment; pray go and hear him, and write me word, which you do most heartily, cry or laugh!

"The spring is delightful, the trees are coming out in blossom, and Charles river really looks majestic. How I wish you were here! Write soon, and don't forget the message about Mr. Whitefield. Your sincere friend, FRANCES SHIRLEY BULLEN."

SKETCHES OF REAL LIFE.

THE NOVICE.—A TRUE STORY.

BY AMELIA OPHE.

"I, in probation of a Sisterhood."—Shakspeare.

The events which I am about to relate took place at Paris, in the reign of Louis the Fifteenth; all excepting the names, or rather titles of the parties, for their first names are those which actually belonged to the actors of the drama, being literally true.

The Count de Villeroi, a noble of high descent and great feudal possessions, had an only daughter, Heniette, who, almost in her childhood, evinced so decided a vocation for a convential life, that, before attaining the age of sixteen, she entered upon her novitiate in the convent in which she had been educated. Returning home, in consequence of a severe illness, a few months after, she met, at her father's, Adrien, Viscount de Mornay, a young man, her equal in birth, fortune, and endowments; a mutual attachment ensued, and they were on the point of marriage, when M. de Villeroi died, leaving his daughter under the guardianship of his only sister, the Marquise de Chamillart.

This lady, still young enough for coquetry, had, unfortunately, imbibed an attachment for de Mornay, and, in revenge for his neglect of her charms, resolved to separate the lovers; an opportunity for which purpose unluckily offered itself, in his being appointed secretary to an embassy at the court of St. Petersburg.

The marquise immediately placed her niece at the royal abbey of Pantheon rue de Grenville in Paris; the abbess of which convent was nearly connected with her family, and joined her heartily in endeavouring to induce the fair novice to increase the already large number of illustrious ladies of the house of Villeroi, who had attained the highest honours of the church.

The marquise adopted the further precaution of sending to the Abbey of Panthemon, partly as companion, partly as attendant upon her niece, a tenant's daughter, Eugénie Latour, whose vocation for a religious life she well knew, promising that if she succeeded in inducing Henriette to take the veil, she would herself furnish the money required for her entering the same convent. In addition to this, anonymous letters were dropped, by unknown hands, into the apartment of the fair maiden, announcing that Adrian was on the point of marriage to a Russian princess; and the Marquise showed communications addressed to herself to the same effect; so that poor Henriette, hearing nothing from her false lover, and assailed on every side by persuasions and arguments in favour of a religious life, was at last driven to resume the dress and duties of a novice, and to announce her intention of becoming a nun as soon as the requisite forms could be undergone.

Although, however, the marquise had, to a certain point, succeeded in her end, one of the means which she employed had completely failed her. Eugénie Latour, an affectionate, honest-hearted girl, had, with the quick sympathy of youth towards youth, become unoriginally attached to her young lady, and seeing at once, and the more strongly from her own deeply-seated religious feelings, that poor Henriette's vocation was the result rather of disappointed love than of devotion, and mistrusting, most justly, the good faith of the marquise, who seemed to her sense of simplicity taking too much pains to establish that which, if true, needed not such reiterated proofs, suddenly demanded her dismissal and her wages, and set forth from the ruined Genoville, determined, if possible, to go to the speech of the Viscount de Moray.

Whether her pilgrimage might not have conducted her to St. Petersburg, there is no saying; but she not, luckily, he thought herself of returning to the hotel of the noblemen in whose suite Adrian had ravished the court of the Czar, where she immediately ascertained that the secretary of the embassy had been unable to encounter the severity of the climate, and had been sent, under medical advice, to his château, near Lyons.

Hither the faithful girl repaired, and, as best she could, her own small means, and performing, partly on foot, and partly by the aid of good-natured travellers, a journey whose duration and difficulty can hardly be adequately estimated in these days of steamboats and rail-ways. She found the Viscount de Moray, as she expected, sick rather of grief than of disease. A similar system of deceit had been practised with respect to him; and he, when Eugénie made her appearance in his apartment, fully believed that Mademoiselle de Villoriot, to whom he had written repeatedly, without receiving any answer (letters which the Marquise had taken good care should never reach the convent), had already taken the veil.

The tidings which his unexpected visitor had to tell him gave him fresh life. He immediately despatched her to the Princess Potocka, the Russian wife of a Polish nobleman, and the friend in Paris upon whose aid he most confidently relied, and proposed following himself as speedily as his health would permit.

Eugénie arrived at the Hôtel Potocka on the very eve of the profession. The fourteenth of March was the fatal time, and this was late on the evening—eventing do I say!—before the necessary explanations had taken place, it was deep in the night of the thirtieth, and the princess, as her only chance, resolved to set forth at once on her search for the archbishop.

The archbishop was, however, no where to be found. All that she could learn from the drowsy Swiss porters of the palace was, that he was either in retirement at the seminary of Saint Magloire, or he was gone to pass the fête of St. Bruno with the father of the Chartroux in the cité d'Enfer, or he was resting himself at his country-house at Confians sur Seine!

Baffled and disappointed, the princess drove back to her hotel. She retired to rest, after giving Eugénie the care of her attendant. But, as her love of justice, her hatred of perfidy, and her affectionate pity for its humble and innocent victims, made it impossible for her to sleep, while any means to prevent the meditated injury was as yet untried, at seven o'clock Eugénie was summoned to the carriage, and they drove to the abbey. "Let me see the abbess as soon as possible," was the message sent. The answer, as might be expected, was a refusal. Eugénie was obliged to be in office at that hour in the church. She then asked if she might not be permitted to enter the convent, to reveal something to her of the greatest importance. The reply was, "By no means, except by permission of the archbishop of Paris." And now, almost in despair, the princess re-entered the carriage, and established herself at the door of the church, there to await the arrival of the prelate.

The clock had struck eleven, when one of the servants of the princess forced his way to her carriage. "Madame," said he, hastily, "the archbishop entered by the cloister-door; he is already at the altar, and the ceremony is going to begin."

The princess and Eugénie shuddered when they heard this intelligence; but, recovering her presence of mind, the princess wrote a few lines on her tablets, and then ordered her valet to make way for them through the crowd, and conduct her to the sacristy without losing a moment: giving Eugénie, meanwhile, to the care of another servant, desiring him to see her safely seated in the church. Never had a more brilliant assembly of royalty, nobility, and persons of varied claims to distinction, been gathered together on such an occasion. The pride of the aunt had led her to make the ceremony of her niece's profession as imposing and dignified as possible.

It did her sparkling dress, however, accord with the deadly whiteness of her cheek, and the languor of her countenance, as she awaited, with the firmness of despair, the opening of the gates of the choir.

As she rose from her knees a sort of loud murmuring was heard at the bottom of the church, amongst the servants in livery. "Turn those footmen out!" cried a nobleman, in a very loud voice; but they were already departing unbidden, for they were bearing out a young man who had fainted, but was recovering, and struggling to remain where he was. This circumstance drew Henriette's attention to the spot, just as the priest was leaning to kneel before the observant prelate. She saw, she recognized her lover in the now passive youth whom they were bearing away, and who uttered an "Oh Dieu!" which thrilled to her very soul; but the angry pressure of her arm by her enraged and alarmed relation, recalled her to her self. What an expression of interest, love, anxiety, and agony beamed from her glancing eye, as she turned to kneel at the feet of the archbishop! But when there, when the awful moment was really come, she felt that the ceremony must go on, though she would be a wretch for life. Neither that look of agony, nor that of humble resignation which succeeded, was lost on the benevolent prelate, who was holding in his hand tablets enamelled in gold.

"Sister," said he, in the kindest tone, "what is your age?" "She is nineteen," cried her aunt.

"You will have to answer me, madame, by and by," replied the archbishop; and he put the same question to Henriette again.

"I am just turned seventeen," faltered out the blushing novice.

"In what diocese did you receive the white veil?"

"In the diocese of Toul,"

"How!" in the diocese of Toul!" exclaimed the archbishop, in a very loud voice. "The seat of Toul is void; the bishop of Toul has been dead these fifteen months, and no one there can be authorized to receive novices. Your novice is null and void, young lady! and we refuse to receive your profession."

He then rose from his seat, assumed his mitre, took his crozier from the hands of an acolyte, and said, addressing the assembly—"My very dear brethren, there is no necessity for us to examine and interrogate this young lady on the sincerity of her religious vocation. There is, at present, a canonical obstacle to her profession. As to any future impediments, we reserve to ourselves the means to ascertain whether any such exist. In the meanwhile, I forbid any other ecclesiastical whatever to assume the power of accepting her vows, on pain of interdiction, suspension, and nullity, and this in virtue of our metropolitan rights, according to the bull cum proximis!"

When he had pronounced these words, a sound, as of approbation, was heard from many parts of the building, but the prelate instantly sung, in a grave and solemn voice, "Adiutor nostrum in Nomine Domini;" and, turning to the altar, he proceeded to give the benediction of the holy sacrament, while Henriette, scarcely able to support herself, was led to the nearest seat, where she hid her face in her hands to conceal her varied emotions, among which thankfulness was predominant.

Meanwhile, though the considerate prelate, in order to avoid a public exposure of the nefarious proceedings of the marquise, that he might not disgrace a noble family, had taken advantage of a violation of forms to annul the ceremony, that lady found herself so despaired and avoided in the circles in which she had hitherto moved, that she was forced to quit Paris; and, on pretences of illness, she set out to travel in a foreign land. And in a happy marriage terminated this romance of real life.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

AN INCIDENT IN THE CAREER OF NAPOLEON.

THE question has often been asked, why did Napoleon abandon his design of invading England? In a late work by M. Anault, entitled "Souvenir de la vie privée de Napoléon," the author says—"Would it be thought to, refine too much on the involuntary emotions of Napoleon, if in them we were to seek the solution of this question? I was an eye-witness of the following adventure, in which I believe I have traced the primary cause of his change of plan. Several of us were sitting with him one evening at Boulogne, when an aide-de-camp suddenly entered, saying that a storm was raging, and that a gun-vessel had just been carried away. Napoleon snatched up his hat, and without speaking a word to us, hurried out of the room, leaving to myself, 'another storm!' We followed, and were soon on the shore with him. The night was dark, the wind roared, the sailors shouted, and every now and then we heard signals of distress from the vessel. 'Let us go to the rescue of your comrades,' cried the emperor. No one replied, and at that moment the morn burst from behind the clouds, and, sailing out of the darkness, the vessel was seen. He became irritated and vexed at the indolence of those around him. He loudly and haughtily exclaimed: 'Ah! the sailors are afraid of the sea! I shall send for my grenadiers!'"

At these words all were in motion; the emperor urged the departure of the boats with voice and gesture, and followed them with his eyes, till they disappeared in the darkness and swell of the sea. There was soon covered with spectators, but the alarm-gun was the only sound which could be heard above that of the waves. Each time it fired the emperor looked uneasily at the water, and then turned to those near him, in order to collect their opinions.

Among these he several times heard, "What folly! it is impossible for us to make a sea of this sort!" "Would he better to abandon the gun-vessel?" said one, "it would be better to wait and understand." Again the gun was fired, and again. "They have drifted more than a league," said Napoleon; "they will perish on the rocks. Where are the boats! Do you not see anything of them?" "Nothing, sire," I replied. "We must go," cried the emperor. "A moment; get a boat." A naval officer ventured to remark on the state of the sea. Napoleon looked at him, and sternly answered: "Have you no ears, then? Do you not hear the vessel at her last gasp? A fresh shot was fired—'That is perhaps her last sigh,' he continued. A boat was made ready, the emperor stepped into it, I followed him with four rowers and the above-mentioned naval officer. The men vigorously struggled with the waves; the emperor stood upright at the prow, one foot resting on the gunwale, so that the waves which sometimes inundated us broke over his knees; looking fixedly before him, he several times said in a low voice—"Do we advance?" "Scarcely, sire," answered the naval officer. "You men have neither strength nor courage," he returned. "Sire," said the officer, "we cannot expect them to do more, the sea runs so high." "The sea! the sea!" muttered Napoleon: "it rebels; but we can conquer it!"

At this moment we were driven back by a huge wave, which caused us to lose the way we had made, and seemed like an answer from the ocean. The emperor stamped; the rowers began again; when another gleam from the moon showed us the other boats. "Stupid fellows!" said the emperor, "they are wrong! The vessel is to the left; they will throw themselves into the English guard. We must warn them. Order some one to go and tell."

He turned round, and then first ascertained that his habits of command had betrayed him into an absurdity: there were no more aide-de-camps near him; his will and his orders could not extend beyond the boat, and were imprisoned by the waters. His snuff-box was in his hand, and he tossed it into the wave, which was rising against us. It seemed as though he were trying to exorcise the sea, but the boat was nearly swamped, and our danger became imminent. Again the officer ventured to speak. "The sea is fearful, sire, we shall soon be unable to steer the boat." "Shall we then suffer these unfortunate persons to perish?" said Napoleon. "Sire! our loss will not save them."

No answer was made to this. I gave a sign to the officer to return, when Napoleon seated himself on the prow, and remained buried in thought. At length we reached the shore; when, jumping out, he took hold of my arm, and said, "The land! the land! do you comprehend? it never fails the foot of a soldier; it never swells nor opens; it is obedient; it has always a field of battle ready for victory. Oh the land! the land!" and, as he uttered these words, he stamped with enthusiasm. The first boats saved the emperor; the emperor returned home, wrote a letter the next morning, and gave it to me to deliver to Josephine, whom I was about to join. I fancied that he had there given vent to feelings, at which I could only guess from the few words he had uttered.

I started, and presented the letter to the empress. She read it in my presence, and then said, "You have passed a terrible night." "The empress has just described it to you?" I observed, feeling anxious to know what he had been so completely baffled. A storm deluged him by him must indeed be a picture." "Nearly so," returned Josephine; "he is even poetical, see." Saying these words, she handed the letter to me, and I read as follows:

"MADAME AND DEAR WIFE—During the four days that I have been absent from you, I have been incessantly on horseback, and in motion, without any injury to my health. M. Moret has informed me of your plan of starting on Monday, and if you travel by easy journeys you will reach the waters without fatigue. The wind having freshened much during the night, one of our gun-vessels in the roads was driven out to sea, and became entangled among the rocks, a league from Boulogne. I thought all were lost; but we succeeded in saving every thing. It was a grand sight: the firing of the alarm-guns, the shore covered with lights, the sea roaring with fury; the whole night passed in anxious efforts to save, or the expectation of seeing the unhappy crew perish; the long drive out that was in their heads all night, and eternally. At five in the morning all brightened again, all were saved, and I lay down as if a romantic or epic drama, a feeling which would have made me aware that I was alone, in fatigue and drenched limbs had left me any other power than that of sleeping."

LAW OF COPYRIGHT.—We extract the following from a capital petition by Hood to the wisdom of Parliament on the subject of the law of copyright—"I, the undersigned, have two children, who look up to him not only as the author of the Comic Annual, but as the author of their being. That the effect of the law as regards an author is virtually to disinherit his next-of-kin, and cut him off with a book instead of a shilling. That your petitioner is very willing to write for posterity on the lowest terms, and would not object to the law of copyright, but that when his heirs shall apply for payment to posterity, he will be referred back to Antiquity. That as a man, he belongs to his head, so his head should belong to his heirs; whereas on the contrary, your petitioner has ascertained, by a nice calculation, that one of his principal copyrights will expire on the same day that his only son should come of age. The very law of nature protests against an unnatural law which compels an author to write for posterity, and thus to deprive his own posterity of the fruits of his everyday's posterity—except his own. Finally, whereas it has been urged 'if an author writes for posterity, let him look to posterity for his reward.' Your petitioner adopts that very argument, and on its very principle prays for the adoption of the bill introduced by Mr. Margaret Telford, seeing that by the present arrangement, posterity is bound to pay anybody and anybody but the true creator. And your petitioner shall ever pray."—Times as HOOD.

VOICE OF THE WIND.—Mr. Head, the author of "North American Forest Scenes," who passed a winter on the shores of Kempenfield Bay, an outlet of Lake Huron, has described, in a very pleasing manner, the various natural appearances and events that give interest to a sojourn in those frozen regions. "I was," says he, "occasionally surprised by sounds by the wind, and, occasionally awful and grand. Whether the vast sheet of ice was made to vibrate and yell, like the copper which generates the thunder on the stage, or whether the air, rushing through its cracks and fissures, produced the noise, I will not pretend to say; still less describe the various intonations that struck upon the ear. A dreary, undulating sound wandered from point to point, perplexing the mind to imagine whence it came or whether it went, whether aerial or subterranean; sometimes like low moanings, and then swelling into deep-toned notes, as if produced by some Eolian instrument, it being in fact, and without metaphor, the voice of winds imprisoned in the bosom of the ice." "This night," he continues, "for the first time, to what was now perfectly new to me, although I experienced no repetition on many subsequent occasions, when the temperature fell suddenly."

PURSUITS OF PLEASURE.—Lord Chesterfield spent his whole life in the vain pursuits of pleasure, and yet happiness continually eluded his search. Listen to his candid confession. "I have seen the various pleasures of business and pleasure, and have done with all. I have enjoyed all the pleasures of the world, and continually know their futility, and do not regret their loss. I appreciate them at their real value, which, in truth, is very low; whereas those who have not experienced always overrate them. They only see the outside, and are dazzled with the glare. But I have been behind the scenes. When I reflect upon what I have seen, what I have heard, and what I have done, I cannot persuade myself that all the frivolous and useless of the world had any reality. Shall I tell you that I bear this melancholy situation with the meritorious resignation and consistency which most men boasts! No sir! I really cannot help it. I bear it, because I cannot help it, whether I will or no. I think of nothing but killing time the best way I can." What a comment is this confession upon what is generally called worldly pleasure.

NOTICE OR ALARM GONG.—A very ingenious instrument has been invented by Captain George Smith, R. N., intended to give warning of the approach, and to announce the course a steamer is sailing on in a fog. It consists of a gong, on which a hammer is made to strike every ten seconds, a certain number of blows, by a very simple machinery, according to the course the vessel is sailing on. For example, if she be sailing north, the gong is struck once; if east, twice; if south, three; and if west, four times every ten seconds. By this systematic method the position, course, and proximity of a steamer will be clearly announced to any other vessel. In rivers Captain Smith proposes the vessel to emit single sounds every ten seconds, which would be sufficient to give warning.

PYROS.—We find the following beautiful specimen of the art of sinking, in a late number of the Logansport (Indiana) Herald—"On Sunday evening last we were visited with the heaviest storm we recollect to have experienced for years. The rain descended in torrents—the thunder roared incessantly—and the lightning seemed a colossal monster—a sheet of livid fire. During the storm, the tin-shop of Mr. Higgins was struck by lightning and much damaged."

A READY REPARTER.—A young man in a large company, despatching on a subject which he knew little about, a lady asked him his name. "Scarlet," replied a gentleman. "That may be," replied the lady, "and yet he is not deep red."

KING ARTHUR'S ADVENTURE.

BENEATH the castle's gloomy pride,
In ample round did Arthur ride
Three times; nor living thing he spied,
Nor heard a living sound.
Save that, awakening from his dream,
The owl now began to scream,
In concert with the rushing stream,
That washed the battle mound.
He lighted from his gaily steed,
And he left him to gaze on bank and mead;
And slowly he climbed the narrow way,
That reached the entrance grim and gray,
And he stood the outward arch below,
And his bugle-horn prepared to blow,
In summons blithe and bold,
Deeming to rouse from iron sleep
The guardian of this dismal keep,
Which well he guessed the hold
Of wizard stern, or goblin grim,
Or pagan of gigantic limb,
The tyrant of the world.

The ivory bugle's golden lip
Twice touched the monarch's manly lip,
And twice his hand withdrew.
Think not but Arthur's heart was good!
His shield was crossed by the blessed rood,
Had a pagan bent before him stood,
He had charged them through and through;
Yet the silence of that ancient place
Sunk on his heart, and he paused a space
Ere yet his horn he blew.
But, instant as its larum rung,
The castle-gate was open flung,
Portcullis rose with crashing groan
Full harshly up its groove of stone,
The balance beams obeyed the blast,
And down the treading drawbridge cast.
The vaulted arch before him lay,
With naught to bar the gloomy way,
And onward Arthur paced, with hand
On Caliburn's restless brand.

An hundred torches, flashing bright,
Dispelled at once the gloomy night
That lowered along the walls,
And showed the king's astonished sight
The inmates of the halls.
Nor wizard stern, nor goblin grim,
Nor giant huge of form and limb,
Nor heathen knight, was there;
But the cressets, which odours flung aloft,
Showered, by their yellow light and soft,
A band of damselfair!
Onward they came, like summer wave
That dances to the shore;
An hundred voices welcome gave
And welcome o'er and o'er!
An hundred lovely hands assal
The bucklers of the monarch's mail,
And busy laboured to unshap
Rivet of steel and iron clasp;
One wrapped him in a mantle fair,
And one flung odours on his hair:
His short curled ringlets one smooth'd down,
One wreathed them with a myrtle crown.
A bride upon her wedding day
Was tended ne'er by troop so gay.

Loud laughed they all—the king, in vain,
With questions asked the giddy train;
Let him entreat, or crave, or call,
'Twas one reply—loud laughed they all:
Then o'er him mimic chains they flung
Framed of the fairest flowers of spring.
While some their gentle force unite,
Onward to drag the wondering knight.
Some, bolder, urge his pace with blows,
Dealt with the lily or the rose.
Behind him were in triumph borne
The warlike arms he late had worn.
Four of the train combined to rear
The terrors of Tintagel's spear;
Two, laughing at their lack of strength,
Drag'd Caliburn in cumbersome length;
One, while she sped a martial stride,
Placed on her brow the helmet's ridge,
Then scream'd 'twixt laughter and surprise,
To feel its depth o'erwhelm her eyes.
With revel shout, and triumph song,
Thus gaily marched the giddy throng.

Through many a gallery and hall
They led, I ween, their roval thrall.
At length, beneath a fair arcade,
Their march and song at once they staid.
The eldest maid, the fairest,
(The lovely maid was scarce eighteen,)
Raised, with imposing air, her hand,
And reverend silence did command,
On entrance of their queen;
And they were mute.—But as a glance
They steal on Arthur's countenance
Bewildered with surprise,
Their smothered mirth again 'gan speak,
In archly dimpled chin and cheek,
And laughter-lighted eyes.

The attributes of these high days
Now only live in minstrel lays;
For Nature, now exhausted, still
Was then profuse of good and ill.
Strength was gigantic, valour high,
And wisdom soar'd beyond the sky,
And beauty had such matchless beam,
As lights not now a lover's dream.

Yet e'en in that romantic age,
Ne'er were such charms by mortals seen,
As Arthur's dazzled eyes engage,
When forth on that enchanted stage
With glittering train of maid and page,
Advanced the castle's queen.
While up the hall she slowly pass'd,
Her dark eye on the king she cast,
That flash'd expression strong;
The longer dwelt that lingering look,
Her cheek the livelier colour took,
And scarce the shame-faced king could brook
The gaze that rested long.
A sage, who had that look espied,
Where kindling passion strove with pride,
Had whispered, "Prince, beware!
From the chafed tiger read the prey,
Rush on the lion when at bay,
But the fell dragon's blighting way,
But shun that lovely snare."

At once, that inward strife suppressed,
The dame approached her warlike guest,
With greeting in that fair degree,
Where female pride and courtesy
Are blended with such passing art
As aces at once and charms the heart.
A coyly winking first she gave,
Then of his goodness 'gan to crave
Construction fair and true
Of her light maidens' idle mirth,
Who drew from lonely gleams their birth,
Nor knew to pay to stranger worth
And dignity due.
And then she pray'd that he would rest
That night her castle's honoured guest.
The monarch meekly thanks expressed,
The banquet rose at her behest.
With lay, and tale, and laugh and jest,
Apace the evening flew.

The lady sate the monarch by,
Now her heart unshook and shy,
And with indifference seemed to hear
The tales he whispered in her ear.
Her bearing modest was and fair,
Yet shadows of constraint were there,
That show'd an over-cautious care
Some inward thought to hide:
Of old she pause in full reply,
And oft cast down her large dark eyes,
Of cheek'd the soft voluptuous sigh,
That heaved her bosom's pride.
Sight symptoms these, but shepherds know
How hot the mid-day sun shall glow
From the mist of morning sky;
And so the wily monarch guess'd,
That this assumed restraint expressed
More ardent passions in the breast,
Than ventured in the eye.

HONOUR TO WOMAN.

Nay, hear me out, dear nephew. I am not blaming you, but I would have you remember, that though dear Lady Malory may be a year or two older than yourself, and though you have been accustomed for years to treat her almost as an older sister, yet she is still most beautiful, young, and deeply interesting; and what is still more to the purpose, Ralph, she is evidently of an affectionate, warm, and sensible heart. Now, Ralph, in the good world which we live, I am sorry to say that men who consider themselves persons of high honour, seem to place their dealings with women beyond that code of laws by which they regulate their dealings with other men. The man who would think himself disgraced, and would be so in his own eyes for ever, if he were to tell a lie, to break a promise or a vow—to cheat or deceive, in the most trifling particular—to mislead, by any false showing whatsoever, another man—scripless not but too often, to mislead, deceive, to break his promise, to violate his oath to a woman, to cheat her out of that which is her noblest possession—peace of mind and tranquillity of heart—to trifle with her affections, to insult, to dishonour, to betray. Even after he has done so, he is received in society, courted, flattered, liked, and the acts which should stamp him with eternal infamy are regarded almost in the same class with some gallant feats performed in the chase—some act of skilful policy, or manly daring. There are some, however, who differ from the creed, and who abhor such conduct. I own myself one, Ralph. I look upon it that the man who behaves ill to a woman, and yet would not do so to a man, only shows himself to be at heart a coward; for the only cause which enables, permits, or justifies any such act is, that woman cannot protect or avenge herself. She is trusted, Ralph, by God and by her weakness to man's honour; and if we prize our honour—if we hold it really dear as a true and veritable principle for the guidance of our conduct, and not merely as a fantastic and relative notion to be formed upon the opinion of others—we should be far more scrupulous, delicate, thoughtful, in all our acts and feelings towards woman than even towards man. We know that every gentleman has his sword by his side to redress himself if we do him wrong; but we know that a woman has no redress but silence, sorrow and endurance. Do not look grieved, Ralph, for heaven forbid that I should ever impute such a charge against you, that you could knowingly behave ill, or would ever break a vow, or willingly fall in any promise to a woman. I know you too well, Ralph—your mother was my sister—it is impossible. But sometimes men of the very best principles and inclinations do not consider sufficiently that the structure of a woman's heart and feelings is as fine, as delicate, as easily affected and injured as her corporeal frame. We may unintentionally raise thoughts and expectations which may be disappointed, for the gratification of a few hours in pleasant society; we may teach a woman to believe that we seek to make that society our own for ever. From that belief may grow up feelings deeper, stronger, more enduring; and then when disappointment comes, sorrow takes possession of the heart where joy once dwelt; shame at having aided to deceive itself, gives an additional pang to the agony of being deceived, an age of regret, and mortification, and cold chagrin, very often succeeds from such causes alone, to a youth of joy and thoughtless happiness.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

SIMPLE PLEASURES.

A GREAT laugh is endeavoured to be raised at what are called simple pleasures. We have, in the present day, some laughing philosophers: not of that abject sort, indeed, whose ridicule was excited by the follies of their fellow-creatures. Innocence, chastity, and religion, are among the topics of modern pleasantry; especially with our men of strong thinking. For our parts, we are not disposed to join in this laugh; because, notwithstanding his well-intended satirists, we cannot help thinking that there does exist a class of simple pleasures, in which it is not merely safe for a woman to indulge, but which not to love, or to be capable of loving, argues some original defect in the heart and in the understanding. But let us not be understood to mean by simple pleasures, the entertainments of cup and ball, or bandalore. Neither do we confine the idea to the picking up of plants, the collecting of shells, the instruction of parrots, the fabrication of pin-cushions, and the painting of charades upon firecreens. But to contemplate the Creator's works, to study them, to imitate them, to fill the eye and the imagination with their beauties, to cling to the sentiments they inspire, and to pursue them to their ultimate grand conclusions; to ride, to walk, to meditate, to luxuriate in the cheerful influence of fine weather; to train vegetation, to plant and improve the garden, to mitigate the physical and moral evils that press around one, by reconciling, relieving, and instructing; are all, when modified by virtuous education, enjoyments of simple relish and home-bred felicity; all capable of flourishing in innocence and retirement, with little aid from artificial culture. These may properly be ranked among simple pleasures, because they want no machinery to act them up. They have at first hand—that is, at nature's—their subjects and incitements; they are the companions of virtuous leisure and unsophisticated habits. But, to qualify for these cheap and innocent pleasures, there must be a proper preparatory education; a first impulse must be given to the sensibilities, which may set them forward in a right direction. Before the works of the Deity can be made to interest and delight, the fear and love of his power and goodness must be established in our minds upon other grounds than the fluctuating foundations of taste. No education can be profitable without the sanction of religion. It should, however, be presented to the mind, not as a task, but as a recreation; which may be well fitted to become when judiciously inculcated. It affords a natural entertainment to the sprightly curiosities of children, an excellent exercise to their opening faculties, and a sufficient incitement to all the good propensities of the young mind. It is the sun in the system of education; the dispenser of light and heat to its whole, and by its attractive power, it maintains every part in its proper place and destination. From leaving it out of the system, or from giving it only a secondary place, results that complexity, disproportion, and disorder, which have found their way into almost every scheme and treatise of education; and to this cause is to be ascribed the multiplication of these treatises in such a fatiguing succession of rapid productions. Were religion properly attended to, in female education, young women might be trusted with more learning and more accomplishments, without danger to the equilibrium of their minds, and the modesty of their manners. Without religion intellectual education is mutilated; but moral education is reduced to a solecism. The fitness of morals and the beauty of virtue are frigid arguments to young understandings. They require the support of unnatural expedients and forced measures. But the principle of pious obedience is taught to children by their wants, and confirmed by the unceasing consciousness of dependence. They must, of necessity, feel it towards their fathers and mothers; and it is easy for them to carry it upwards to the universal Parent and Protector.

TASTE FOR LITERATURE.

A taste for literature and valuable knowledge cannot be taught without being felt. To bribe the early curiosities to the exercise and development of the mind, the early instructor must have been well instructed, and have acquired the art of blending information with delight. The powers, the beauties, the copious use of the mother tongue can only be known, felt, and transmitted by talents improved by various and studious reading in English literature, aided by some acquaintance with other idioms. And it is, perhaps, to the want of this preparation of the mother's mind for the task of early instruction, that the melancholy blank in respect to all the primary, professional, and practical acquirements of reading, articulation, elocution, reasoning, and composition, left by the education of our principal schools, so often remains to the end of life, disgracing the pulpit, the senate, and the bar. The pleasure that occupies the highest place, and fills the widest space in rational existence, is free intellectual conversation. If women are to be our companions, we must share this pleasure with them, or we give them only a vain compensation—a nominal rank—the title without the estate. The most solid parts of intellectual culture are those by inexpressible right as rational beings; it is the fairest of all their privileges, and our own sex has an equal interest in maintaining it for them against a perverse arrangement, which gives up their first years to fugitive attainments, that sparkle in the sunshine of youth, but perish, and their memorial with them, as age increases the want of resource.

THE GREAT AND THE SMALL.

From the cottage to the palace, from the castle to the hotel, through all the imperceptible shades and grades of life and station that intervene between greatness and littleness; from the sage to the idiot, from the conqueror to the worm, fate, in darkness and in silence, with movements that men seldom see and never appreciate, is spanning that small, fine, but binding thread, which weaves their common destiny into one inextinguishable web. It is not alone that the mouse disentangles the lion from the toils; it is not alone that the stronger saves or destroys the weaker; but it is that every being, at every step, affects the destinies of millions of others, present and to come, and carries on the train of cause and effect that is going on from eternity to eternity. The dependence of the great upon the small, and the continual reference of our fate to petty circumstances, is a consideration full of weighty moral, and is never to be forgotten.

LOVELESS.

The worst vices, springing from the worst principles, the excesses of the libertine, and the outrages of the plunderer, usually take their rise from early and unshuddered idleness.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

FAIR PEOPLE VIZIER DARK.

THERE must be some strange and hidden connexion—some mysterious sympathy, between the complexion and colour of the hair and eyes of men, and certain qualities of mind and body, or else our novelists are altogether wrong. How seldom in their writings do we find such an anomaly as a fair-complexioned hero, or a villain with flaxen hair. Both breeds are "dark" men. Heroes and villains alike have a tinge of the bilious. Clear, wholesome, white skins, ruddy cheeks, and light blue eyes, are held to be somewhat insipid. They may belong to easy, negatively-good sort of people, but all the heroism and desperate daring is confined to the dark-complexioned gentry. In a novel a man's courage is beyond all dispute if his hair be black and glossy (that is greasy) and his eyes dark and flashing; but that quality is by no means taken for granted if a young fellow happens to have good-humoured blue eyes, light hair, and a clear complexion. Had the fictionists and "great unknowns" of Abyssinia, or Caffriland, or Timbuctoo evinced the partiality for black folks, it might have been overlooked as a pardonable sort of self-love; or had the nations bordering on the Mediterranean, where yellow skins predominate, so set it down in romance or song, it might not have been wondered at; but that the descendants of the fair-haired Saxons, and still fairer Scandinavians, should fall into this unjust depreciation of the characteristics of their own tribe is rather surprising. They ought to recollect that they come of a race of white-skins who need to drink vast quantities of mead over-night, get up without quail or headache the next morning, go on board their galleys, hoist their flags, set sail, raise the song of triumph and thrash all the dark-looking people they come in contact with, with very little inconvenience to themselves. It was the blue-eyed, yellow-haired unconquered Northmen or Norwegians who were the hardest mariners and best fighters in the "dark ages," the lords of the sea, and the founders of kingdoms in all parts of Europe. Short and sharp work did they make with all the sallow or yellow people who came in their way, however dark and glossy might be their hair, or black and flashing their eyes. They were used to conquer, brought up to it, and quite conscious of their superior strength, daring, and hardihood. Well are themselves and their habits described in the spirited lines of a modern bard—

"The eagle hearts of all the North,
Have left their stormy strand;
The warriors of the world are forth,
To seek another land."

Then why this manifest partiality among their descendants for dark-complexioned people as the beau ideal of all that is high, lofty, passionate, daring and energetic? It is mighty perverse and somewhat unnatural.

WEARING THE

The feminine desire for wearing a certain nameless portion of male apparel, appears to have prevailed in all countries and in all ages. Milton, who had some experience of the connubial state, having been thrice married, knows it to be of very great antiquity. In fact, he makes it the very first whim that Eve takes into her head after her fall from innocence, which may account for the vehement desire to do the same thing manifested by many of her daughters to this day. Reasoning upon the additional knowledge she has acquired by eating the forbidden fruit, Eve exclaims—

"But to Adam in what sort
Shall I appear? Shall I to him make known
As yet my change, and give him to partake
Full acquaintance with me; or rather not,
But keep the odds of knowledge in my power
Without caper? No! so to side want wants
In female sex the more to draw his love,
And render me more equal, and perhaps,
A thing not undervalued, sometimes
Superior; for inferior who is free?
This may be well."

And how all the woman peeps forth in what follows. How skillfully has Milton imbibed all the virtues, follies, and weaknesses of the sex in the mother of all.

"But what if God have seen,
And death ensue! then I shall be no more,
And Adam wedded to another Eve,
Shall live with her enjoying; I extinct,
A blight to think. Confirmed then I resolve
Adam shall share with me in bliss or woe
So dear I love him, that with him all ceaseth
I could endure, without him live no life."

There is an old proverb meant as a pithy satire of good-advice giving, to the effect that every man can manage a bad wife but him who has her. Milton, with all his knowledge, sound sense, and supernatural genius, found it, perchance, an easier task to write the "Paradise Lost" than to guide aright one of these fair and fanciful descendants of his heroine; and doubtless his domestic experience furnished him with many excellent matrimonial maxims scattered over his divine poem. How good comes out of evil! The first Mrs. Milton was peculiarly skittish, and ran away during the honeymoon. Penna, or "glorious John" had drawn the bands of discipline rather over tight, for he seems to have possessed what the ladies now will doubtless consider rather austere notions of male superiority. Though not at all deficient in gallantry, he is by no means an advocate for letting them have their own way, but makes Adam prophesy, after his own malap arising from too ready compliance, and Eve's ungrateful and ungrievous upbraidings—

"Thus it shall befall
Eve who to worth in woman overrating,
Leta her will rule; restraint she will not brook;
And left to herself, if evil thence ensue,
She first a weak indulgence will accuse."

SONG-WRITING.

Whence the extreme difficulty of song-writing? That it is extremely difficult there can be little doubt. The numerous and incessant failures in that line, place the matter beyond dispute. Song after song is issued from the fashionable music saloons, the words of which read smoothly and sing smoothly, but which make no sort of impression upon the mind. Sometimes they are neat and pretty, and may tickle the fancy, but they have little to do with the heart. They seldom touch the deeper and finer chords of feeling. They ooze from the memory; and this is one of the most infallible marks of a poor song—you cannot remember it. A good one, after once or twice hearing, you cannot forget. There lies the difference. One line suggests the other, until the sentiment or picture is complete. Who forgets "Oft in the still night," or "Auld Lang Syne."

How few good song-writers have we—Burns, Moore, Tannahill. True, we meet with here and there a scattered gem—the casual effusion of a fine mind, such as "Auld Robin Gray," and "The Flowers of the Forest;" and there are some beautiful lyrics to be found among the "Jacobite Relics," and the unworn Scotch ditties which are "lilted" among the hills and valleys of the "land of the mountain and the flood," the names of the writers of which have passed into oblivion, though the intrinsic merits of the songs themselves have preserved them from a similar fate; but still we have few good professed song-writers. The prominent objects of our "new and fashionable" songs are wordiness and no-meaning. They are made up of vague, unsubstantial images, which float away with the music, and which you can no more retain than the sound which accompanies them.

Song-writing, simple as it seems, is either a natural gift, or a severely beautiful art, which requires much self-denial. Diffidence cannot be tolerated. And here is one great difficulty; for many a clever man finds it easy to sketch a story or detail an incident in three or four stanzas, who would be extremely puzzled to do it in three or four; and if he resolutely sets to work to condense (a terrible task to poets) how it mangles his rhymes, and cuts away his little prettinesses! Now Bulwer, with all his ability, nay, undoubted genius, cannot write a song. Look what thin, evanescent things are all his attempts in this line. That splendid romance, "The Last Days of Pompeii," is especially encumbered with them, yet who that has read that work remembers a single rhyme it contains!

In a song every line should tell. Few long songs are good ones, "Auld Robin Gray" and "Black-eyed Susan" to the contrary notwithstanding. But they, correctly speaking, are ballads, in which a little more latitude is allowed. But look at the degree of compression in such songs as "Scots who ha' Wallace bled," or "The Minstrel Boy," or even "The Banks of Allan Water," with its sweet simplicity and touching repetitions, which tell far more effectively than any new or varied lines could possibly do. There are exceptions, it is true, to every rule. Moore's "Go, deerie, go!" is a long song if you measure by lines, but how short when reckoned by sensations! If well sung how surpassingly beautiful is it. The verses glide away like lost pleasures, and you sorrow at the too rapidly approaching termination.

Any man that can write songs after that fashion, is privileged to make them as long as he pleases.

Perhaps the most striking instance of rigid compression is to be found in the ballad of "John Anderson." It is worth quoting as a curiosity in this respect, and a model—

"John Anderson, my jo, John, when we were first acquaint,
Your locks were like the raven, John, your bonny brow was bent;
But now you're turned blind, John, your locks are like the snow—
My blessings on your frosty pow! John Anderson, my jo!"

John Anderson, my jo, John, we've clim'd life's hill together;
Amny a canty day, John, we've had wi' us another;
Now we maun tiddle down, John, but hand in hand we'll go,
And we sleep together at the foot, John Anderson, my jo."

Here is the life of two people in eight lines. Their youth, their first acquaintance—the long train of happy days they have spent in each other's company—their gradual decay, but with affections deepened with hearts unchanged, and, lastly, their hope to "sleep together" at the close of life's long day; and to render it still more of a curiosity, you have sentiment from the withered lips of seventy, of a deeper character than any could have been proceeding from the rosy ones of love-breathing seventeen.

Of how much rhyme has the little ballad been the root. How often, since it was written, have the sentiments, feelings and affections which it concisely embodies, been diluted and expanded over pages and pages of melting reminiscences!

Scott was a capital song-writer. Perhaps he never studied it as an art, yet there are scattered here and there throughout his poems and romances specimens of this style of composition of great and varied excellence—"County Guy"—"Where shall the Lover rest?"—"Brigade Banks"—"The Marjory's Gathering," etc.

For a tumultuous assemblage of images what can exceed the "Pi-broch of Donald Dhu;" and there is a tender yet solemn and subdued melancholy in the song commencing, "The sun upon the Weirland hill," that has been but seldom equalled. Scott's gigantic genius has not yet been fully appreciated. Rokeby contains a little ballad but seldom sung or quoted, of peculiar sweetness and delicacy, though perhaps the germ of it is to be found in an old Jacobite relic. These rambling remarks will at least have a "swan-like end."

A PATRON.—The Steubenville Herald says:—"A subscriber who has been patronizing us for nearly ten years without paying, and whose lovely wife not long since broomscooped our collector out of the house for presenting the bill, wanted to know of us last week why we stopped his paper."

FRENCH LITERATURE.

SPIRIT OF THE PARISIAN JOURNALS.

Translated for the New-York Mirror.

THE SULTAN AND HIS VIZIER.

AN eastern sultan, who was far from being a tyrant in his general way, got one day very much out of temper. All the courtiers kept aloof as soon as they saw clouds on the visage of the Brother of the Sun; but one careless attendant came near him abruptly, and committed some slight offence. His highness broke out into a torrent of rage, and ordered the offender to receive the bastinado forthwith, and then to be impaled in front of the great gate of the palace.

"Lord of the faithful!" said his honest vizier, "let the fulfilment of thy commands be delayed, while I relate thee a story." The sultan gave a mute, early sign of assent, whereupon the vizier began to relate the following tale, for which, be it remarked, he drew on his invention, not on memory:

"A wealthy and benevolent mussulman had a slave, whom he wished to make happy, so he gave him his freedom, and presented him, moreover, with a good ship, loaded with costly merchandise. The bondman, now free from his fetters, set sail joyfully for his native country; but suddenly a storm arose, and flung him on the shore of an uninhabited island. His vessel went to pieces, and he was left to bemoan his sad fate on the desert beach. At first he saw no traces of human abode, but, as he left the shore and journeyed further on, he saw the walls and towers of a large city in the distance. Joyfully he bent his steps towards it, and hardly had he reached the gates, when he was met and welcomed with shouts of joy. Countless multitudes of the inhabitants surrounded him, bowed their faces to the dust, and cried, as with one voice, 'long live our sultan.' The poor shipwrecked freedman brought them not to make sport of his misery; but he was assured by the rejoicing multitude, that these honours were paid him in sober earnest. Spite of his struggles, he was lifted by force into a splendid chariot, and conducted to a palace glittering with gold and jewels. Here he was dressed by officious attendants in royal robes, while a crowd of grave dignified-looking old men, who declared themselves to be the great officers of state, did him homage as their sovereign, and vowed eternal fidelity. So, whether he liked it or not, rule he must. He was little used, as your highness may imagine, to managing the affairs of a great people, and would have cut but a sorry figure had it not been for a wise and aged vizier, who always gave him prudent counsels to aid his inexperience.

"Tell me, vizier," so the monarch not long afterwards addressed his sage adviser, "tell me how is it that I, a poor friendless stranger, have been made a great king, and let me know when this humnery is to end?"

"Mighty sultan," said the vizier, "all the inhabitants of the island, whom thou takest for men, are only spirits." The king shuddered under his royal robes, but said nothing, and the vizier proceeded. "We are, however, always under the government of a mortal, who is sent us from time to time, by the great Lord of all, to rule over us. As soon as he lands among us, he is pointed out as our future ruler, and we are told, at the same time, how long he is to wear the crown. This, however, is never told our sultan until the appointed time comes, when he is to lay down his dignity. When that time comes, he is suddenly de throne, dressed in a coarse and unsightly garment, and carried away to a barren desert island."

The sultan trembled once more from head to foot, and asked if his predecessor had been told, like him, what a sad fate awaited them.

"They were all told of it," said the wise vizier, "but they made no good use of their knowledge. They enjoyed the pleasure of the moment, without thinking of the future. So the time for their de throne ment came upon them before they had made the slightest preparation for rendering their future life in the desert island an agreeable one."

"Why, can that be done?" asked the astonished sultan.

"Surely it can," was the answer. "No one kinders thee from now, at this very moment, beginning to plant a colony on the barren island, which is to be thy future habitation. If thou doest this, its barrenness will be changed to beauty, thou wilt be joyfully received when thou goes to dwell upon it, and never regret the splendour thou hast left behind thee. But hasten, hasten, if such is thy intention! Feeble man is master of the present moment only, the coming one belongs to destiny."

The prudent Sultan did not, like his predecessors, turn a deaf ear to the warning voice of his good vizier; without loss of time he sent a large number of his best and most valuable subjects to the desert island, and commanded them to prepare a pleasant retreat for him against his coming. Therefore, when he was de throne, and forced, as others had been, to visit the abode of barrenness, he found it fertile and pleasant to look upon, and full of blooming flowers and sweet fragrance; and there he lived for ever in cheerfulness and peace, for he knew that this was his final resting-place, and that he had no further change or accident to fear. And here my tale endeth," said the vizier, and was silent.

"And what is the meaning of all this?" said the caliph, impatiently, "what is the hidden meaning of thy long-winded story? It contains, I suppose, some useful moral reflection; but, if it does, it is so carefully concealed that I cannot find it. Speak more clearly!"

"Know then," said the vizier, "the rich and benevolent man is God; the slave, to whom he gave freedom, a newly-born mortal; the island on which he lands, which he at first thought uninhabited, the world; his adviser; wisdom; the line of his government; his life; and the barren island to which he is banished, the after-world. The colonists he is permitted to send into it, to beautify it, are the good works that he performs in this life, and the careless rulers are those who get drunk with the pleasures of this life, without thinking on that which is to come. And now, commander of the faithful, suffer me likewise to point out the application of my story. During the period of thy government, thou hast sent many colonists before thee to make green the face of the desert island which is the appointed resting-place, but all the labour they have performed will be in vain, if thou shouldst take the life of a true and faithful servant for a trifling matter. Forgive him, even as thou hopest in God that he will one day forgive thee."

This bold remonstrance induced the caliph to lay aside his anger, and pardon his innocent servant.

REMINISCENCES OF THE OLDEN TIME.

COMMON COUNCIL RECORDS.

"Orders made at the General Court of Assizes in New-York, begun on the sixth and ending on the thirtieth of October, in the twenty-seventh year of his majesty's reign, Anno Domini 1675

"Upon a proposal whether it will not be convenient at this juncture of time, of the Indians disturbance to the eastward, to bring all canoes on the north side of Long-Island to this place, or to have them all destroyed to prevent intercourse with the Indians on the Main and our Indians, or that those canoes be brought to the next townes and secured by the officers. It is resolved that all canoes whatsoever, belonging to Christians or Indians on the north side of Long-Island to the east of Hell-gate shall within three days after the publication hereof be brought to the next townes and delivered into the constables custody to be laid up and secured by them near their black-houses; and that whatsoever canoe shall be found upon the sound after that time be destroyed.

"That the Indians at Mr. Pells on Anne Hook's neck be ordered to remove within a fortnight to their usual quarters within Hell-gate upon this island, &c."

In the above extract you will see that the celebrated passage on the East River, commonly called Hell-gate, has preserved its genuine and original orthography; notwithstanding that some modern and very delicate innovators in philology have endeavored to substitute the term hurl or skirl, in the room of Hell gate, a much more forcible, and certainly not an objectionable, term.

Another part of the ordinance relates to the taxing and marking of horses.

"The payment in the rates for horses and horsekind being recommended from the townes of Southampton, and other townes at the east end of Long-Island to be considered of whether not so high, it being too much above the present value. Ordered; that the rates do continue as they now are; and that all persons who have horses upon Long-Island, doe within the space of six months, prove their horses before the constable and overseers, or chief officer of the respective townes to which they doe belong; and such as shall be found unmarked (according to law) shall be forfeited, the one half to his Royal Highness, the other half to the town to which they shall be brought; and that no person presume to mark any horse or colt, but before the constable and overseers, or chief officer of the place.

"That all persons upon Long-Island who have estates from the value of twenty pounds may keep one breeding mare and noe more; and see proportionably."

The following part of the ordinance shows that the practice of whaling on the eastern part of Long-Island, had begun at that early day:

"Upon complaint of the great abuse at the east end of Long-Island in their oyle cask: It is ordered that there be a sworn gager and tapper of oyle in the respective townes where the whaling designe is followed," etc.

It was the custom to maintain a public priesthood by taxes, as it is still the practice in despotisms:

"The church affairs being taken into consideration, and particularly the affairs of the ministry as to their maintenance; It is ordered, that towards the maintenance of the ministry, besides the usual country rate, there shall be a double rate levied upon all those townes that have not already a sufficient maintenance for a minister."

A fair was established at Brooklyn:

"Upon proposal of having a fayre or market in or near this city: It is ordered that after this season there shall yearly be kept a fayre and market at Breucklyn near the ferry for all grain, cattle, or other produce of the country; to be held the first Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday in November, and in the city of New-York the Thursday, Friday and Saturday following."

Staten Island had a separate jurisdiction:

"That by reason of the sepearcon by water, Staten Island shall have jurisdiction of it selfe, and to have noe further dependence on the courts of Long-Island, nor on their nullia."—Neo-Bononensis.

It was also the custom to direct the cleansing of the streets in the same manner as now.

BY THE DEPUTY MAYOR AND ALDERMAN,
City of New-York, &c.

"Whereas many all conveniences heretofore have happened by several young people firing off of pistols and other guns upon the new-year's day, being the first day of January; and whereas there hath been several orders made to that end, that no person or persons whatsoever should set any wagon or carts, or lay any wood, timbers, dirt, mucke, or stones, or any other rubbish, in the streets for six dayes: These are, therefore, in his Majesty's name, to charge and command all persons within this city on the said 1st day of January next; as also, that all persons take notice that they cleanse the streets; that every person cleansing before his or her doors. And that they and every or any of them, presuming to fire any pistoll or gunn as aforesaid, shall be proceeded against, as persons not obedient to the lawes and government of this city: and that all persons that shall fayle to cleanse their doors within one weeke after the publication hereof, or set any waggons, carts, or sledges in the streets, shall be proceeded against as before: and the lawes in force to bee put in execution against them. Given under my hand this last of December, 1675."

The following extract will throw some light on the state of the city police at that early period:

"Orders to be observed by the Constables, Watch, and the Citizens Soldiers in the City of New-York.

"That the watch bee set every night by eight of the clock immediately after the ringing of the bell.

"That the city gates be locked up by the constable or deputy, before nine of the clock, and opened in the morning presently after day light at the discharging of the watch; and if any person goes from or absent himself without consent, bee or they shall forfeit for every such default, tenn guilders.

"That the sergeant or corporall of the watch shall at all times succeed the deputy constable upon the watch for the execution thereof.

"That the constable or his deputy (the city gates being shut) bee upon the watch by nine of the clock, and by his roole call over all the names of those who are to give their attendance there that night, and the faylers to be marked to pay their fine, which is to bee as formerly—four guilders per every default; and if any one comes to the watch after the roole is called over hee shall pay twice the fine aforesaid.

"That whosoever shall come upon the watch, that is overcharged with drinke; hee or they shall pay halfe the aforesaid fine: but if abusive or quite drunke, the whole fine to be paid as if absent, and secured upon the watch till night.

"Upon complaint made unto the court; It is ordered, that no carriage or sweating shall be suffered upon the watch, nor any gaming at dice or cards, nor any exercise of drinking upon the penalty of four guilders for every such offence. The sergeant being, (read, belonging) to every watch shall come with his halberd; and see that every one of the watch bring his armes, that is to say his sword and good halberd pike, on the penalty of four guilders for every offence.

By orders of the Deputy Mayor and Aldermen,
For mee, SAMUEL LLETT, Clerk."

EXTRACTS FROM NEW WORKS.

THE BARON'S DAUGHTER.

"The pleasant'st angling is to see the fish
Cut with her golden ears the silver stream,
And greedily devour the treacherous bait.
So angle we for Beauty!—Shakespeare.

"WHEREFORE SO sad and silent, Helen mine!" was the question of the fair Agnez Montreux to her fair cousin, the daughter and heiress of the Lord Scrope, as followed by a goodly retinue of waiting gentlemen, grooms, and pages, they threaded, with a solemn dignity that might have done honour to elder dames, the narrow winding woodland path that divided the glassy mere, at the side of which they had been fying their falcons, from the ample park, dotted with noble groups of venerable oaks, in the sunshine that surrounded the baron's stately mansion of Beau-Repaire.

"What hath troubled thee, Helen, that thou sittest on thy jennet as mute as the merlin on thy wrist? Art-thou wrath thyself for chiding the young Lord Devereux from thy bridle rein! Or—alack that a knight so lately from the gay court of France should know so little how to construe a fair maiden's wishes when her words say one thing and her looks another!—is that same Archib Devereux fallen into disgrace for the too readily obeying thy behests? What aileth thee, sweet cousin, thou herress of these broad lands; for whose fair grace the champion strives in the lists, and the minstrel at the board; thou to hang drooping over thy saddle-bow, as sad as a turtle dove that hath lost her mate—whilst thy poor kinswoman, and thy very lowly maidens, Margaret, and Cicely, are as blithe as so many larks? Pie on thee, sweet cousin! This wayward humor is fit treason against thy happier destiny! Betrothed thou to the man whom thou hast loved! At the king's command! and with thy lord and father's approval!

"Why there it is!" responded the fair Helen, suddenly reigning in her palfrey, and turning towards her cousin with an air of desolation that contrasted strongly with the sprightly demeanour of her young kinswoman. "Have I not cause enow for melancholy, think'st thou, to be bestowed by the king's behest upon the Lord Devereux, so that love me, or love me not, he must needs espouse me? As he to be the daughter and heir of a wealthy baron, into whose ear all men seem bounden to pour false feignings! oh! that I were as little in debt to fortune as thou art, Agnez, that I might for once hear words of truth!"

And the pretty spoiled child sighed; and it may be—for I suspect that the sad rogue called Human Nature played beauties and herresses the same tricks in the days of bluff King Hal as in the reign of our sovereign lady, Victoria—it may be that she really thought she would prefer flattery, even from the lips of the Lord Devereux.

Her cousin smiled with some archness. Perhaps she perceived, or thought she perceived, that what the fair heiress really wanted was praise in a newer and more piquant form.

"Nay, as thy melancholy have no deeper root than a lover's courtesy, sweet coz, I'll gage my very bow against thy overdone woe, that I find thee a medicine. Hearken, Helen.—This brisk October wind is gathering to a tempest. The golden leaves of this close beechen alley are falling about our ears; and the clouds gathering above our heads as though the very blessed skies were part and parcel of our council. The rain that admonisheth us to seek shelter, will greet the falcons from their sport; the mere, that Put thy creed to his fall pace, dearest! We must win afore these gallants to the great hall of Beau-Repaire; and there thou must hide thee behind the warden's great carved chair. No! no! Sit thee down there, as though overbrought by the sport and the riding and fall asleep; that were the cunninger device; and then when the Lord Devereux spyeth his lady and mistress, as he and my varlet, Philip Poyning, pass through with their hawks, mark him as he speak not as softly as if thou wert thy poor penniless kinswoman with no dowry but her merry heart, instead of the rich heiress of the Lord Scrope."

"So said; so done. The fair cousins rode as for life and death; and not only reached the goodly mansion of Beau-Repaire before the party from the lake, but had plenty of time to adjust the Lady Helen's costume and position, so that she could enact the part of the Sleeping Beauty as naturally and becomingly as possible. That the attitude was natural, she had satisfactory proof after Agnez and her waiting woman had retired. Her old nurse, passing accidentally that way, having testified a nurse-like anxiety on the score of her catching cold, and even evinced some disposition to awaken her by way of averting the danger; whilst the good baron, her father, happening also to cross the hall, and seeing his darling, as he believed, asleep, took incredible pains to mitigate his iron tread, and stifle, as far as possible, the jingling of sword and spear, lest he should disturb her slumbers. In short, so admirable was the counterfeits, that the only person (except those in the secret) not taken in, was the baron's favourite mastiff, Wolf, who looked up in her face with an expression which seemed at once to detect the counterfeits, and to wonder, like an honest animal, as he was, what could be the possible motive for such a deceit.

At last, according to Agnez's prediction, Lord Devereux and Sir Philip Poyning entered the hall, and after some talk of the falcon flown and the game taken, of jesses and lures, and a certain beam called Donzelle, and a riding palfrey light, Lancelot, the good knight appeared suddenly to perceive the fair lady who filed so grossly the warden's chair.

"Ha! Thy bonnie!" said he in a low voice.

Although her eyes were closed, Helen felt with absolute certainty that Lord Devereux glanced towards her, and she also felt, she knew not how, that he smiled.

"She looketh well asleep!" continued the knight.

"Indifferent well!" rejoined his companion in a voice as chilling as his words.

"She's a fair damsel," quoth Sir Philip.

"Indifferent fair!" was the response.

"And hath a light foot in a coranto."

"Indifferent light."

"And a sweet voice in a virole."

"Indifferent."

"Nay," interrupted the knight, "thou art a very heretic in the matter of beauty, an infidel, a Pagan. Thy very blood is frozen, that thou speakest thus of one of the fairest maidens of King Henry's court. If the Lady Helen be not a beauty where will you find one?"

"The damsel is indifferent fair," replied the Lord Devereux quietly. "But the Lady Catharine Sandys hath a finer shape, and the Lady Pearly a prettier foot. And, for a virole or a coranto, commend me to the bright-eyed Provencelle, the burgher's wife of Lyons. Besny quotha! Thou talkest like the scurvy of dames in the legend. Ha! the rain pours down again. Come and I'll show thee a suit of Milan armour fit to have figured at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, or we'll have a bout with the rapiers, or what you will! There's a good hour yet to dinner. Thou'lt beat me at the rapier. I have not gripped my weapon against one so well-skilled as thyself this half year. Come, it lacks an hour of noon, we shall have time to breathe ourselves." And off the Lord Devereux marched, just soon enough to save his betrothed from the imminent danger of proving her admiration of frank speaking, and her severe love of truth, by an explosion of tears, or of scolding—or, by our Lady, inflicting upon the cheek of her lover such a slap from her fair hand as, half a century later, was no uncommon act of grace from good Queen Bess to her more favoured courtiers.

Poor Helen! from this risk she was happily saved; and when they met at the banquet the recusant had nothing worse to encounter than cold monosyllables and averted eyes. The storm still continued to rage without, and in spite of his lady lover's declaration that she was ill at ease, both Lord Devereux and Sir Philip Poyning followed the damsels to the large low pleasant chamber, with the rich gilding of its panelled walls, its bay windows and carved chimneys, where the young kinswomen, surrounded by their female attendants, pursued their several avocations at the tapestry loom or the bower of fancies.

For the first five minutes a dead silence reigned in the apartment. The lady Helen was what an enemy would have called sullen, and a friend would have dignified by the name of melancholy; and her hand-maidens dutifully followed their lady's example. Agnez was the first to speak, whilst her cousin was now amusing herself with entangling her gold and silver threads under the notion of winding them, and now filling up a rosebud with blue silk and a pansy with crimson.

"Hast thou no French rondelay, or English madrigal to sing or to say, my good Lord Devereux? No minstrel tale, or courtly jest to grace thy lady's bower?"

"Say, how chanced the wooing betwixt Maximilian de Montmorency, and Marguerite de Bethune?" said Poyning, siding his fair mistress in her attempts to bring about conversation. "When I left the Chateau of St. Germain, Mademoiselle had taken it into that silly head of hers that the count wooed her for her broad lands, and the more he courted and flattered the more she disbelieved, until at last it was a moot point whether the pretty heiress would not fling herself, and heriefs and vineyards, olive-groves and all, into a nursery, from more distrust and suspicion. What might be the end of that love passage, Anrour?"

"Why the little damsel improved day by day in mistrust and jealousy until, as thou say'st, (twere a chance but she took refuge in the church from poor Maximilian's luckless courtship. And so it chanced that one fair summer morning, standing beside a close planted bower of rose and woodbine, the Chevalier d'Harcourt and Jules de Montmorency began to bicker the count on his misdeed mistress. "Thy pity of her," quoth the chevalier, for of a surety she's the fairest lady in France." "Nay," replied Maximilian, "Horcine du Plessis hath brighter eyes; and Adine du Beaulieu a sweeter smile; Leocadie de Blondeville hath a finer shape, and for a hand and foot, the young countesses—what name had followed now can tell—for the fair Marguerite darted from the arbore, and Montmorency, who had known all the while that she was listening, caught her in his arms—aye, even as I shall catch another listener, and said—'Oh fairest, sweetest, dearest, how may I tell what he said, when I am thinking of none save thee! Of nought save that entire and perfect love which beareth not to thy father's broad lands, even to thy surpassing beauty, but to thine own dear and precious self!—and catching her in his arms, his lip touched—did it touch!—her snowy brow."

"No, there was no traitor, no treachery," continued he, answering the half-murmured question which stole forth amidst her blushes and smiles. "I was wending disconsolately among the beechen trees within hearing of my lady love, when mistress Agnez's desire prompted me into a countertrial of sauciness. But I am pardoned! Full surely I am pardoned, and if ever again thou shouldst must-trust my love or thine own beauty, thou hast but to take a nap in the warder's chair!

The following extracts are from Lady Chatterton's Rambles in Ireland, lately published:

DARRYNAME ABBEY AND SCENERY.

"Darryname house is situated in a beautiful spot, facing the south, and overlooking a little bay, where the waves came rolling upon the smooth sands. The plantations now seem to thin, well protected, as they are, from the northern blast, by a fine range of rocky heights. The house is an irregular pile of building, having received various additions at different times; the interior is most comfortable, and affords the extensive accommodation which the hospitality of its proprietor renders necessary. The drawing-room is a spacious apartment, on each side of which is a row of windows commanding beautiful views. It is well furnished, and adorned by a fine bust of the owner's lovely daughter. The tables are covered with the latest publications, and numerous good prints, and caricatures. Near this room is the library, full of well-chosen books. The walls of the dining-room are covered with family portraits; and on a slab at the end opposite the fireplace, are some old spear and hatchet heads, of a mixed metal, which were dug up not far from Darryname. The next morning I took a delightful walk before breakfast, on the sand hills, at whose base the house is situated, and whose slope, covered with fine grass, forms the grounds beyond the plantation. The view over the bay is beautiful; its fine sandy beach—the rocky mountain which forms its western boundary—the magnificent sea breaking in heavy billows against it—the indented shore of Darryname—the islands at its entrance, and ocean beyond, create a splendid landscape. The enjoyment of such a scene was rendered perfect by the sunshine and brilliancy of the finest day we have had this year."

"Short and sweet," and very completely to the purpose, are the following verses on

THE BLARNEY STONE.

"We went up to kiss the far-famed stone— There is a stone there, That whoever kisses, Oh! he never misses, To grow eloquent. 'Tis he may clamour To a lady's chamber, Or become a member Of Parliament."	A clever spouter, He'll sure turn out, or An out and out, 'To be let alone,' Don't hope to hinder him, Or to bewilder him; Sure he's a pilgrim From the Blarney stone!
--	---

I had neglected to kiss this stone on my previous visit, because the important ceremony could not be performed without the risk of falling headlong down a height about a hundred feet; but in these days of marching intellects, and diffusion or confusion of knowledge, even the privilege of being able to pay extravagant compliments is made of easy attainment."

A CARPENTER'S FIRST ACQUAINTANCE WITH TREES.

"I heard to-day an anecdote, which shows how apt we are to be afraid of what is new. A young carpenter came here for employment, from Kilkree, a delightful sea-bathing place on the western coast, abounding in ocean scenery, but where there are no trees—literally none. The highest growing plants usually seen by the inhabitants of that place were the 'praties.' The astonishment of the poor fellow at the first sight of a tree, cannot be described. He looked timidly at the roots; then, with an expression of the greatest alarm and wonder, slowly raised his eyes up the stem, and, when it arrived at the upper branches, his terror, lest the stupendous mass should fall upon him, was extreme. He could never be persuaded to go home at night along a road which unluckily was bordered by a row of his gigantic enemies, without having some one to accompany him; and even then used often to exclaim, in dismay, before encountering the tree, 'How do I know now but some of them big, tall caryphs will be down on me before I know what I am about?' It was winter when he first went to the country, and all the larger trees were, of course, leafless. When summer came, and he saw these fearful giants become more and more massive every day, and all those large formidable leaves flapping about in the wind, the poor fellow's astonishment knew no bounds."

"Extremes meet," says the proverb. When a jovial Irish widow sets about being worldly wise, the following is the style in which she does it; contriving even to make prudence hereditary, as far as the next generation; and in what a manner! Pray admire the dissipation and beautifully divided political opinions of her sons, Teigue and Donough:

PRESERVATION OF THE O'BRIEN PROPERTY.

"There is a romantic traditionary story told of the manner in which the O'Brien property has been preserved amid the revolutions in Irish affairs. Connor O'Brien is said to have been the only gentleman in the county of Clare, who, after the commonwealth party was triumphant, refused to make terms with Ireton; and Ireton is believed to have caused him to be assassinated, having despatched a party of five of his best marksmen, in the disguise of sportsmen, for the purpose. Connor O'Brien's wife, Mary-Mahon, informed her sons, Teigue and Donough, of the murder of their father, and, at the same time, advised them to offer no further opposition to the dominion of the English regicides. The assassins, however, was taken and hanged; and, immediately after his execution, the widow of Connor O'Brien ordered her carriage to be prepared. Dressing herself in a superb suit of blue and silver, she travelled, with six horses, towards Limerick, which then was the head-quarters of Ireton, and where he soon after died. It so happened that, on the evening of her arrival, there was a large entertainment at the general's quarters. Upon demanding, at the door, to see Ireton, she was refused admission by the sentinel. A discussion followed, which, it would appear, was of no noisy character; that it attracted the attention of Ireton, who, coming to the door, inquired the cause of the sentinel's violent conduct, and why he refused admittance to a lady of noble appearance; asking, at the same time, the name of his fair visitor. 'I was,' she replied, 'the wife of Connor O'Brien, but I am now his widow.' Ireton hesitated to believe her; but the disconsolate widow convinced him that she was free, by offering to marry one of his officers. He assented to the proposal, and she was married to an officer named Cooper. By this marriage the O'Brien property was saved from forfeiture. Her sons, Teigue and Donough, finding that a political struggle was again likely to occur in Ireland, in the contest between James II. and William III., and that their property would be again endangered by their decidedly espousing either party, they consulted together, and determined that one should take the Jacobite, and the other the Orange side of the question. The first choice was made by Teigue, as the eldest brother, who determined to follow the cause of James, his lawful king. Donough became a partizan of William's, and the possessor of the property."

MRS. HEMANS.

The powers of her memory were so extraordinary, as to be sometimes made the subject of a wager, by those who were sceptical as to the possibility of her achieving what she would, in the most undoubting simplicity, undertake to perform. One of these occasions, to satisfy the incredulity of one of her brothers, she learned by heart, having never read it before, the whole of Heber's poem of Europe, in one hour and twenty minutes, and repeated it without a single mistake or a moment's hesitation. The length of this poem is four hundred and twenty-four lines.

She had also great talents for drawing and music, and was a proficient in nearly all the modern languages; and she added to all this indomitable energy in the acquisition of information.

Her eagerness for knowledge of every kind was intense; and her industry may be attested by volumes, still existing, of extracts and transcriptions, almost sufficient to form a library in themselves. The mode of her studies was, to outward appearance, singularly desultory, as she would be surrounded by books of all sizes, in divers languages, and on every variety of topic, and would seem to be turning from one to another, like a bee flying from flower to flower; yet, whatever confusion might reign without, all was clear and well-defined within. In her mind and memory, the varied stores were distinctly arranged, ready to be called forth for the happy illustration, the poetic imagery, or the witty comparison.

It was interesting to observe the manner in which any new idea, accidentally suggested in the course of her reading, would take hold of her imagination, awakening, as with an electric touch, a whole train of associations and developments. Most truly, in her case, was exemplified Mr. Wordsworth's observation respecting poetic sensibility, in which he says, that "the more exquisite it is, the more wide will be the range of a poet's conceptions, and the more will he be incited to observe objects, bold as they exist in themselves, and as reacted upon by his own mind."

The practice of keeping a faithful record of transient images and suggestions, need not be commended, since everybody knows how quickly these slight visions of fancy fly away, and how utterly impossible it is to recover them, if they be not seized and shaped into words at the instant. A few specimens of these interesting notes are highly emblematic of the tone of Mrs. Hemans' mind, and the general character of her poetry.

"A traveller, sleeping on the banks of the Orinoco, has heard the mysterious sounds of the Lacuz de musica. He awakens his Indian guide, and tells him these are the voices of his departed friends from the regions of the dead, giving him assurance that they are happy, and that they watch over him; that he need not now fear the paw of the tiger, nor the bite of the serpent, for he is thus protected; but far happier are they who thus guard him."

"A scene of surpassing beauty in Switzerland, with a cottage, inhabited by the wife of a chamois hunter. Soliloquy of a wanderer, who imagines that no human passion can ever have disturbed the repose of that solitude.—The chamois hunter is brought in dead."

"The maid before the wizard's glass—her mind wearied with the excitement of its scene, turns in joy to the green fields and the skies."

"On leaving a church full of sculpture, and coming into the open air. The blessing of those feelings which withdraw us occasionally from thoughts too high and awful."

Early in the summer of 1830, Mrs. Hemans published her volume of Songs of the Affections, which was dedicated to her revered friend, Sir Robert Liston. In the month of June, of the same year, she accomplished the project which she had long had at heart, of making a visit to the lakes of Westmoreland. Her treacherous health, which had undergone many vicissitudes during the winter, needed repose and refreshment; her spirit was wearied out with the "glare and dust of celebrity," and she longed to "fly away and be at rest," for a season, amongst the green hills, and beside the still waters. Mrs. Liston, that all she was attracted to that lovely land by the yet stronger spell exercised over her mind, by the prospect of immediate communion with Mr. Wordsworth, of whom she was daily becoming a more zealous disciple, and whose invitations had been kind and reiterated. Her son Charles was her companion on the journey to Rydal Mount; and the two other boys joined her as soon as they were established in a temporary abode of her own. No words but those of her own letters can do justice to her impressions of society and scenery, which, by those who have once enjoyed them, can never be forgotten.

"My nervous fear at the idea of presenting myself to Mr. Wordsworth, grew upon me so rapidly, that it was more than seven o'clock before I took courage to leave the inn at Ambleside. I had, indeed, little cause for such trepidation. I was driven to a lovely cottage-like building, almost hidden by a profusion of roses and ivy; and a most benignant-looking old man greeted me in the porch. This was Mr. Wordsworth himself; and when I tell you that, having rather a large party of visitors in the house, he led me to a room apart from them, and brought in his family by degrees, I am sure that little trait will give you an idea of considerate kindness which you will both like and appreciate."

LITERARY NOTICES.

England, and other Poems. By William Marsh. New-York. Printed for the author.

This is an extraordinary work, by an extraordinary man, and deserves at our hands an extraordinary notice: we shall, therefore, avoiding the customary manner of reviewers—begin with the end, and end with the beginning of the volume, though we confess the result of our critical observations will be precisely the same as if we followed the usual mode; for so artfully and elegantly has Mr. Marsh woven his verses together, that whether they are read backwards or forwards, the sense is equally apparent.

We do not believe—and we say it with all sincerity—that there has ever been published, either in this or any other country, a volume of original poems that could justly be compared with this; we may say this with no little feeling of national pride, for although Mr. Marsh is descended in a sinuous line from

"Richard who robbed the lion of his hair, Fighting the bloody wars of Palestine," yet he is an American, and was born in the vicinity of Boston, where he is most favourably known as the "Swan of Apple Island." Apple Island lies in Boston harbour, and is now made classic ground, being the subject of our author's poem entitled, "My Island Home."

Mr. Marsh belongs to no school—he is no servile copyist—no dealer in second-hand thoughts and fancies, but like all the great bards who have gone down to the grave before him—like Homer and Dante, Shakespeare and Milton, "who darkened nations when they died," he sends out to the world nothing but pure coin wrought out of the solid and inexhaustible ore of his own mind, and purified by the alembick of his own brain. Mr. Marsh is evidently a deep thinker—he writes not for the multitude—Ad captivum vulgus forms no part of his motto, but he says with Milton, "Fit audience let me find though few." In some of his serious compositions Mr. Marsh reminds us of the author of Paradise Lost; we feel sure that he will take no offence at the comparison; for although Milton's style is sometimes heavy and scholastic, it must be confessed he occasionally reaches the highest point of sublimity. But let us no longer detain the reader with prefatory remarks, the poet shall speak for himself. On the last page our author bids farewell to his muse in four verses, but takes leave to inform her in the most delicate manner possible, that he intends to return to her "Parnassian bower." Farewells are always painful, and this, but for the encouragement held out of a return, would be particularly so. On page one hundred and six we find Ad medley, addressed to the eminent bards of New-York, of which the lover of epigrammatic wit will not fail to catch the point—we know of nothing similar in the whole Greek anthology. The poem on slender is very powerful, though not altogether to our taste; we regret that we have not room for the whole of it: we give the last three verses, remarkable for pathos and sublimity:

"See you maiden whose pale thin cheek
That so late in rosy health did bloom,
Whose once bright eyes no more will lighten
Nor can joy again that heart retrace.

For slender has breathed upon that form,
And all that's lovely is blighted there,
Now fast sinking to an early tomb,
Whilst thou, mocking, laugh at her despair
Think ye then, reptile, thy glory's gained,
From whose deathly grasp none can sever,
Yes!—e'en now fiends for thee are howling,
Thy hideous name they'll howl for ever!"

We must make room for the opening lines of the poem "Addressed to the ladies of New-York on New-year's day." The subject alone would claim our attention, and the admirable handling of it makes it irresistible:

"Know ye this day how each bosom will swell
With joys to some and with some a farewell
Of joys fleetly passed brought sadly to mind
By loved ones departed, false ones unkind.
Then, if the heart be o'ershadowed with gloom,
Let hope on it smile, and pleasure with bloom,
And feuds and estrangements forgotten will be,
As they breathe, New-year's morn, welcome to thee:
And may matron and maid in gladness shine,
And sparkle their eyes as sparkles the wine."

The following gem may be found on page thirty-three:

"Dear girl! I love thee yet
As in that joyful time
Which I can never forget
While memory is mine.
When fades the cheering light
Upon the world and thee,
I dream of thee by night,
And you may dream of me!"

We have italicised the last line for the extreme beauty of its simplicity. Like Shakespeare or Wordsworth, Mr. Marsh, by the power of his genius, makes the simplest objects in nature serve as suggestive agents to his muse—exempli gratia:

"The spring time of our youth,
The sports that never tread
When hope and love and truth
Went hand in hand inspired;
Thus soon life's morning steps away
The brightest sunshine of our day."

Who does not at once see that the poet was indebted for the word steps to the eccentric movements of that interesting little insect, the flea? It is curious and instructive to trace the rise and progress of thought in great minds: in all probability, some adventurous flea, taking advantage of the poet's reverie, while he was composing the foregoing lines, skipped upon the paper before him, and to this simple circumstance the world may be indebted for

"Thus soon life's morning steps away."

In our critical capacity we have searched diligently for faults, as well as beauties. The following is the third line of the poem "England"

"Where all the polished arts refulgent reigns."

And, in the "Maid of Venice," we find this couplet:

"For now the winds are fresh and free
That teases me o'er the boundless sea."

We would suggest, though with no little diffidence and timidity, that the letter s might, with propriety, be omitted from the italicised words, in a second edition.

Every poem in the volume is characterized by a high moral tone. Mr. Marsh has a heart inferior only to his head. This is clearly manifested by his writings, which remind us as much of the fragments of the pure and tender-hearted Sappho as of anything else; and if the lament of Danaë, the daughter of the king of Argos, should have preserved the name of its author to the present time, we see no reason why Mr. Marsh may not safely congratulate himself upon, at least, an equal immortality.

The work is dedicated to Philip Hone, Esq., and, in his dedication, the author says the volume is inscribed to him "as a small token of the esteem in which he is held by the community."

The Token and Atlantic Souvenir. A Christmas and New-Year's present. Edited by S. G. Goodrich. Boston: Otis, Brodgers and Co. Pp. 304.

The volume of this beautiful and long-established annual for 1840 is a decided improvement on that of the last year; but it is still hardly worthy of the reputation it once enjoyed. The engravings form the principal attraction of the work, and many of them are in no respect remarkable. The vignette titlepage, engraved by Cheney, is very beautiful, and so is the plate entitled "The Nibble," from a design by that admirable artist, Chapman. "The Haunts of the Sea-Poet," by Dick, is well engraved, but the subject is old. The same may be said of "The Politician," by Pelton. The literary department of the volume is not of a superior order. Miss Sedgwick furnishes a tale of considerable interest, and there is a good article by the authoress of the "Three Experiments of Living," entitled, "Ancient Reminiscences," which we have copied. We do not find much among the poetry which calls for our special admiration—although there are several very clever pieces by the editor, and others from the pens of Miss Gould, Grenville Mellen, the author of "Miriam," James T. Fields, Miss M. A. Browne, R. C. Waterston, Mrs. Sigourney, Tuckerman, Thatcher, and other writers favourably known to the public.

Memoir of the Life and Writings of Mrs. Hemans. By John Euter. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard. One volume. Pp. 317.

In another part of our paper we have alluded to this new memoir of the sweetest of modern poetesses. It is a compendious and interesting biography, and gives a most engaging view of the estimable character of the lamented subject. Mrs. Hemans was a woman of undoubted genius, and to her belongs the credit of striking out a new style or vein of poetry. From many interesting passages in the work before us, we select the following from the diary of the poetess, in relation to Walter Scott:

"July, 1829.—I walked with Sir Walter Scott through the Rhymour's Glen. He showed me the site of a little hamlet, which had been deserted on account of the supposed visits of a spirit. He described to me some extraordinary cavern scenes he had explored in his voyage round the northern coasts and isles of Scotland; mentioned his having sometimes heard the low, ruminant murmur of storms in the air along those dreary coasts; for hours before the bursting of the tempest, told me of a friend of his, a man of by no means an imaginative mind, who had heard the Wild Huntsman in the air at night, at Valenciennes. So persuaded was this gentleman that a real chase was sweeping past him through the streets, that he turned aside into the porch of a church, in order to make way for it. Nothing, however, was visible; and he at last became afflicted with feelings of supernatural fear. On mentioning the circumstance to the people with whom he lodged, they were much awestruck, and told him it was fortunate that, heretic as he was, he had sheltered within the shadow of a catholic church. Sir Walter repeated, with much animation, part of the Spanish ballad of 'Dragut,' (see Lockhart's Collection)."

"How, row, my slaves, quoth Dragut," etc.

"He gave me a thrilling description of a scene which had been witnessed by a friend of his at Ehrenbreitstein—the German army of liberators crossing the Rhine after their victories. Upon the first gleam of the noble river, they burst forth into the song of 'Am Rhein, am Rhein!' They were two days crossing, during which the rock and the castle rang out to the peal of this gallant strain; and even the Coscaques, as they passed over, caught the national enthusiasm, and, with the clash, and clang, and the roar of their stormy war-muscle, swelled out the chorus of 'Am Rhein, am Rhein!'"

The Ladies Companion. A monthly publication. W. N. Snowden, Fulton-street, New-York.

The last number of this widely-circulated journal contains a handsome steel engraving, entitled "The Young Recluse." The contents are various and spirited. The following, from the pen of Francis Sargent Osgood, would do no discredit to the pen of Campbell:

THE TRIUMPH OF SOLO.

An anecdote of John Howard Payne, Esq.

Far from his own bevered land,
Within a western wood,
Seized by a rude barbarian band
The minstrel rover stood.
Sad dreams of home were in his mind,—
Hark!—echoing to the thought,
"Home! home!—sweet home!" the forest wind
Softly that burden brought
Then flashed the poet's lifted eye,—
And proudly rose his tone;
Warm glowing his cheek,—his heart beat high—
"That song!—it is my own!"
"Tune!—Tune!"—they dash with eager hand
The fetters from his frame,—
And mutely reverent, round him stand
In sorrow and in shame
And safe and free they bade him part,
The bard whose gift it is—
To trace in every other heart
The song he sends from his!

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

If Florio will turn to the page of Shakespeare, he will find a most satisfactory reply to his question:

"Where you are liberal of your loves and counsels,
Be sure you be not loose; for those you make friends,
And give your hearts to, when they once perceive
The least rub in your fortunes, fall away
Like water from you, never found again
But when they mean to sink you."

Several contributions from musical correspondents shall receive the earliest attention.—We must decline G.'s elaborate criticism upon the Richelieu of Mr. Forrest. We differ with him entirely regarding it a failure. The play was certainly well received, and Mr. F. did ample justice to the part of the Cardinal, as portrayed by Delser. We have already expressed the opinion that this play is of too heavy and undramatic a character to retain possession of the stage; and, on witnessing its representation, we were confirmed in our views.—We must respectfully decline the articles signed Philon, R. X., Philotattler, Index, and G. F.—We have no disposition to become a partisan in the controversies of other journals.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1839.

Twelfth annual fair of the American Institute.—This anniversary celebration of industry and the arts will take place at Niblo's Garden, the seventh of the next month. The competition will, we learn, be greater than on any previous occasion. Among the novelties will be a variety of new agricultural implements and machines—a full display of American silk in all forms, from the cocoon to the finished fabric—specimens of beet sugar—new machinery for the spinning of flax—iron castings—and fine specimens of all the innumerable branches of manufacture in the country. The objects of this institution are so praiseworthy, that we always take a lively interest in its success, and it is with gratification we learn that its condition is flourishing and its prospects flattering. The following paragraph we extract from the circular of the committee:—"At each of the eleven preceding fairs, the exhibition-rooms have uniformly, at an early hour, been adorned with the delicate and tasteful productions of female ingenuity and skill, and the gaiety, fashion and beauty displayed through the day and evening by the fair visitors, have always been among the strongest attractions of the celebrations. They have shown that our Institute is their favourite institution. It has not been the gay tint and the glare of unsubstantial show, or unmeaning curiosity, that have moved them. It is a portion of that diffusive patriotism and pride of country which they have imbibed, and which every real American experiences, from the proud reflection that the triumphant displays are the exclusive products of their own native America. They are respectfully solicited to honour the twelfth annual fair by a continuance of their exhibitions, and with their accustomed cheering presence and approbation. At the four last fairs, there were awarded as premiums, one hundred and twenty gold medals; six hundred silver medals; and about fifteen hundred diplomas—solely at the expense of the Institute. The managers do not intend to diminish the appropriations for rewarding merit, whilst the liberality of the public confers the power to bestow them. The determination of the merits of the respective articles entered for competition, will be submitted to competent and disinterested judges."

Conversation in Wall-street.—"How are you, B. J. What's the news? Do you know how stocks stood to-day?"—"I only know that I bought none. Have you got five hundred dollars you could let me have till next Wednesday?"—"No, have you?"—"No. Why doesn't the next Western come along?"—"I can't say. I wonder if the Bank of England has suspended specie payments?"—"Nonsense. How is cotton?"—"Bad. We are a ruined nation. I have a great mind to put G. T. T. on my cards, and clear out for Texas. By the way, have you been to the opera, lately?"—"Yes; glorious, isn't it, and no mistake?"—"Will you go to-night?"—"With all my heart."—"Meet me at Blancard's at five; we will take a frugal dinner, and go together. What do you think of Kean?"—"Capital actor. Great in many of his characters. His Sir Giles is magnificent."—"Well. Don't forget five o'clock Egad! It is half-past two, and I have a note to take up before the bank closes. I'm off. Remember five."—"Assuredly. Good-by."

Foreign musical items.—A young composer, who promises to become a rival of Bellini, has excited considerable attention in Messina. His name is Laudano. He has produced an opera, entitled "Ettore Fieramosca," with the most decided success. His style is that of true music—graceful and touching melody, constructed upon the purest and most scientific harmony.—M. Auver has been appointed director of the private band of King Louis Philippe, which post had become vacant by the decease of Paer.—Rossini's new opera is nearly ready.—Donizetti has lately written the music to an opera by Scribe, entitled "Polyeucte."

Grace Darling.—The name of this modern heroine is familiar to all who take an interest in the passing events of the day. We perceive that Ackerman, the great London publisher, is about getting up an engraving worthy of the thrilling event of which she was the moving genius. Subscriptions will be received by Colman, Broadway, where an etching from the plate may be examined.

Pleasant occupations.—In Paris there is a class of men, who make it a business to get run over by carriages for the purpose of recovering damages. Some libeller of the sex adds, that in this country there is a class of young ladies, who sell themselves to be engaged in order to sue for breaches of promise.

The approach of autumn.—Our forests are fast putting on their splendid autumnal hues.

The painting of Boissy d'Anglas.—One of the most extraordinary works of art ever exhibited in this country is now open for public inspection at Clinton-Hall. It is a painting by Vinchon, twenty feet high and thirty feet long, representing a remarkable scene, which took place in the hall of the National Convention of France in the third year of the republic, on the twentieth of May, 1795. This wonderful picture is of itself a history of the origin and character of the French Revolution. You see upon canvas the very fiends who instigated the excesses of that period of massacre and blood. The mob have broken into the hall of legislation. Boissy d'Anglas, then a young man of thirty, takes the president's chair, which Dumont had just vacated. Deputy Feraud, a young man, at the head of several of his colleagues and some national guards, twice repels the invaders; but on a third attack, he is overpowered. The majority of the deputies, under the protection of some few guards, take refuge upon the upper benches of the chamber. Feraud is wounded by a pistol shot at the very instant he steps forward to defend the president. In that situation he is transported to the Hall of Liberty; but no sooner is he there, than his head is cut off by a young woman, Aspasie Megilli, and stuck upon a pike. Aspasie soon after re-enters the chamber, marching before the head which is borne in, yet streaming with blood. She has on the scarf of the murdered deputy, and she carries the bloody knife in her hand. Disorder is at its height. A young officer, the son of Deputy Mailly, pierced with three blows, falls at the foot of the tribune. It is all over with the representation. But in vain do the people threaten President Boissy d'Anglas! In vain do a thousand arms brandish their weapons upon him. In vain is the blood of Feraud presented to damp him. He is firm, self-possessed, undismayed. He bares his head, and bows reverently to the head of his martyred colleague, and he cries aloud to the people:—"Take mine too." But he refuses to re-open the session of the chamber broken up by violence, and to put the question upon the measures clamoured for by the factions, the pillage of provision-stores, and the desecration of private domiciles, by the visits of rapacity and brutality. This last scene, so tragic and full of the most thrilling interest, Vinchon has traced with the hand of a master on canvas. The grouping is remarkably spirited; and the expression of the different faces are at the same time animated and various. Nothing can be finer or more natural than the countenance of Boissy d'Anglas, uniting as it does strong moral firmness and control, with a slight indication of physical agitation. Not a muscle quivers; but the eye, while it is full of the energy of a high determination, is yet not blind to the danger of the scene and the wrath of the infuriated wretches, who have their daggers at the throat of the president. We strongly recommend our readers to examine this noble painting. It will not disappoint their expectations.

The theatres.—Having no skill in prophecy, we cannot as yet undertake to say which of our principal theatres is to bear away the palm of success the present season, which commenced brilliantly at the National with the performances of Mr. Forrest, undoubtedly the most eminent native actor that has ever appeared, and, in our judgment, the best representative of Otello living. His engagement has been followed by that of Mr. Charles Kean, of whom we shall take a more particular notice in our next. Mr. Vandenhoff and daughter will succeed Mr. Kean—tragedy enough in all conscience—and then comes the ever-delightful opera, with Miss Suzzette, Wilson, and, we hope, Seguin. After them, we trust Wallace, the manager, will engage Wallace, the actor, for a few nights. We will endeavour in our next number also to say something of the opera at the Park, in whose cause many admirable musical talent has recently been enlisted. There are many novelties forthcoming at Old Drury, not among the least of which is that irresistible, mirth-provoking and capital fellow, Power. The principal attraction at the Bovey, has been the "long, low, black practical schooner." This, with Guefar al Barnicki, has drawn the people "up town" in multitudes. While noticing the theatres, we should not forget the Hungarian singers, who ought forthwith to be engaged at the Eagle Theatre, where, we are confident, they would prove an attraction of the first description, and where the public would have an opportunity of gratifying their curiosity in larger numbers than could be accommodated at the Apollo—an unsuitable place for the display of such peculiar and inimitable qualities as these four brothers possess.

Aurora borealis.—There was a splendid Aurora the other evening. The whole vault of the heavens seemed like an illuminated rotunda, and from the centre of its roof streamed down rays of all the colours of the rainbow. The constellations from the northern horizon were remarkably luminous, and the shifting lights that played across the zenith were so translucent, that the stars glittered through them unshorn of their lustre. We have never witnessed a more beautiful aerial display.

Baths.—The bathing establishment of Messrs. Leonard and Steel, 600 Broadway, combines all the recent improvements and conveniences that have been invented in this department of the animal economy. It is remarkably well ordered and arranged.

Old Trinity.—The walls of old Trinity are at last razed to the ground, and the spot where thousands have annually assembled to worship, is now cumbered with the debris of brick and mortar. We trust that a noble structure, worthy of the society and of the site, will be erected in its place.

Nix's Mate.—This is the title of a new novel by Rufus Dawes, in the press of Samuel Colman. It will be published in a week or two. From the specimens that have appeared, public expectation has been favourably excited in regard to it.

FIFTH VARIATION TO THE ANDANTE.

COMPOSED AND DEDICATED TO JOHN CRAMER, BY THE LATE DANIEL SCHLESINGER.

MISCELLANY.

THE following was never more appropriate than at the present time:

A SONG OF THE SEASON.

"Out of my way, sir! or I will knock you into the middle of next week."
 "My dear sir, you couldn't possibly do me a greater favour, for how in the devil I am to take up my notes, and get safely over Saturday, is more than I can tell."—Collegist in Wall-street.

The last day of summer is one of regret,
 The first one of winter a harder day yet;
 But another there is to which these shall appear,
 Like the sunniest noons in the spring of the year.

On this day we number, with sorrow, the hours,
 Which, however they hasten, dance not upon flowers.

"One fatal remembrance" the minutes embrace,
 That this day of dismay, is the last one of grace.

"A note signed by you for four hundred to-day Becomes due, and the same you're requested to pay."

"The sugar plum lines on my card-rack appear,
 Signed by one who writes better, i. e. the cashier.

To an idler, his time is a bore and disaster;
 I can tell him a secret will make it move faster:
 Let him sign a few notes—the agreeable things—
 His wits will have work, and his time will have wings.

ANECDOTES OF WASHINGTON.—When the American troops were quartered at Newbury, at the close of the revolutionary war, and the soldiers were stirred up to rebellion against the government by the famous anonymous letters, which, it has since been ascertained, were written by General Armstrong, then a major in the army, General Washington convened the officers for the purpose of addressing them on this subject, and calming the tumult which was beginning to rage in their bosoms. He held a paper in his hand on which the remarks he intended to make were written—and then it was, that finding himself unable to read without assistance—as he was drawing his spectacles from his pocket that unpremeditated expression broke from him—one of the most pathetic that ever fell from human lips—"Fellow-citizens," said he, "you perceive I have not only grown gray—but blind in your service." The effect of this remark was electrical. No bosom—no eye was proof against it.

BACKWOODS MORALITY.—In Illinois, recently, an elderly man discovered several of his own horses, which had been stolen, tied to a tree in the woods. Determined on punishing the thief, he laid an ambush, with his rifle, to shoot whoever might come to feed the horses. At length a person approached, and was shot down. The thief proved to be his own son, who confessed the crime, and gave to his father about three thousand dollars, which he said he had acquired by horse-stealing. He gave information of fourteen confederates in the vicinity, twelve of whom have since been taken into custody and sixty stolen horses recovered.

FIRST-RATE BUSINESS.—A doctor in Vermont had a son who studied his father's profession, removed to a distant state, married, and went into practice. After a lapse of about three years, the father visited his son, and during his visit he requested the latter to take him around his "ride," that he might see the extent of his son's practice. During the excursion the old gentleman remarked two new meeting-houses with grave-yards attached, which the younger informed him had both been erected since his residence there. He also told his father that he had very frequent calls to a distance from his regular circuit. Upon the old gentleman's return home, his wife asked him "how Fred was doing." "Well—very well—first-rate," he replied; "he has already filled one grave-yard full, another nearly so, and is doing a pretty fair chance business all about in other parts of the country."

A POZZLER.—Among a number of amusing interrogatories, put by the Philadelphia Gazette, to an enthusiastic astronomer and mathematician, some time since, was the following:—"If the apple which William Tell shot from the head of his son gave liberty to Switzerland, how many bushels of the same size would it have taken to make a barrel of cider, from the same orchard?"

DEAR JOKE.—The secret of Dante's struggle through life was in the reckless sarcasm of his answer to the prince of Verona, who asked him how he could account for the fact, that in the household of princes, the court fool was in greater favour than the philosopher. "Similarity of minds," said the fierce genius, "is over all the world a test of friendship."

SOLITUDE.—Solitude, it has been well said, makes its votaries particularly fond of their dinner. They have no other event where-with to mark their day—they think over it, they anticipate it, they nourish its soft ideas with their imagination; if they do look forward to anything else more than dinner, it is—supper!

PAINTERS AND SCULPTORS.—Aristotle says of painters and sculptors, that they teach and recommend virtue in a more efficacious and powerful manner than philosophers by dry precepts, and are more capable of amending the vicious than the best moral lessons without such aid.

A TEMPERATE DIVINE.—A certain reverend, who is not a member of the temperance society, being lately asked by a dealer to purchase some fine old Jamaica, dryly answered—"To tell you the truth, Mr. —, I cannot say I'm very fond of rum; for, if I take more than six tumblers, it's very apt to give me a headache."

A HINT.—"The evidence of a good tavern," a contemporary remarks, "is in being well supplied with newspapers and periodicals." Let that fact be remembered. Observation will confirm the assertion.

HOGARTH'S OPINION OF GENIUS.—"I know of no such thing as genius," said Hogarth to Mr. Gilbert Cooper; "genius is nothing but labour and diligence."

BOOK-KEEPING.—"You're a good book-keeper," as the librarian said to the man who wouldn't return a hired book.

A WEALTHY CONVERT.—The late Baron de Rothschild left two daughters. Each have a fortune of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, dependent on the consent of their brother, Baron Lionel de Rothschild, to their marriage. One of them, I believe, is married to Montfere, late sheriff of London, a Hebrew gentleman of great wealth and respectability. The Rothschilds move in the very first circles in London, and thus Miss Rothschild became acquainted with young Fitzroy. He was formerly in the army. When her father was alive, a young Austrian nobleman, private secretary to Prince Esterhazy, made proposals of marriage to her, but her father declared she should marry none but one of the Jewish faith. When Miss Rothschild determined to marry Mr. Fitzroy, she went to see the archbishop of Canterbury, and told him that she wished to become a Christian. His grace inquired into particulars, and then very properly told her that he did not consider a love affair sufficient reason for her abandoning her religion. She is said to have assured him that it had long been her intention to become a Christian, and that her family were well aware of it. On this, the archbishop said that, if it appeared her sincere desire to become a Christian, from conviction, he had no alternative but to accept and baptize her. He communicated with her family, and it appears that she had informed them of her intention. The marriage was private, and unattended by any of her family. Her brother has the power of withholding the fortune left to her by her father, but is not expected that he will do more than have it so settled upon herself and her children as to prevent the chance of her husband squandering it. It is expected, also, that her family will shortly receive her. Should she become a British peeress, as it is likely in the course of time, she will be the first Jewess who has ever been in a like situation.

MATRIMONIAL ADVICE.—The following short sentence of advice by William Penn, should be kept in mind by all young persons who are thinking of committing matrimony—"Never marry but for love, and see that thou love what is lovely."

A SOUND SLEEPER.—"Do you snore in your sleep, marm?" "Not as I know of. Do you?" "Well, I can't say, I never lays awake long enough to find out."

A MILLIONAIRE.—The editor of the New-Orleans Picayune calculates that he is bitten by two millions of mosquitoes every night.

POETRY.—Pouring out the soul's devotion to the cook by moonlight, supposing her to be one's mistress.

WELL-BEING.—"The preservation of liberty requires eternal vigilance," as the chief said when he was deigning the office.

"Anything to please the child," as the nurse said when she let the baby crawl out at the third-story window.

TALES OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

THE SISTER THERESE.

BY H. F. GOULD.

THE following little story is drawn, as a fine silver thread, from among the many of a sadder and more fearful hue, that make up the crimson cord of the history of that bloody period, the reign of terror in France. It is given in the writings of a French author veraciously, concerning the events of that day, from whom it is here rather recomended than translated.

Among the unfortunate persons who were cast into the prisons of Bourdeaux to await their turns at the guillotine, could it please those inhuman monsters in the human form, Robespierre and his associates in cruelty, to find them guilty of opposing their designs, by standing in their way to rule, was Henri Delorbe, an inhabitant of the city, and a young man of high and forcible nature.

In the person of Delorbe, a striking beauty of face and form, and a noble bearing and winning grace of deportment, were united with a richly-endowed mind and high-toned virtuous principles. The horrors of his situation and impending fate preying on his spirits, and the miasma of the prison infusing poison into his frame with every breath, proved too much for his physical energies to resist. "The spirit of a man may sustain his infirmities, but a wounded spirit who can bear?" Nature's forces in the constitution of Delorbe, sapped by his accumulated ills, were made for a while to succumb. He was brought low in sickness, and thought near to death. In this state of prostration and languishment, it was permitted him to be removed from his prison cell to the hospital, where the devout sisters of charity took their truly benevolent and Christian services, attending on the sick, relieving their wants, and closing the eyes of the dying.

It fell to the lot of Delorbe to have his ministering angel appointed in the form of the young Sister Therese; a fair, compassionate, self-sacrificing girl, who, having renounced "the world," and the two other persons of that federal head of wickedness, which, occupying the human heart, is the nucleus of so much evil, felt only a single desire to carry out the principles of her profession into action, while she watched over the suffering, endeavouring to soften their pains, and to keep up the faint and flickering flame of life, or, when it must be so, smoothed the pillow of the dying.

The gentle nun had never heard of the history of Cupid and Psyche, and their near alliance; nor, though she owned that she had a heart "desperately wicked," had she suspected it of having a vulnerable spot, where a random arrow from the little, busy archer, reaching her unawares, might strike and enter, and bury itself beyond the power of extraction.

The pleasing external of the young stranger had at first won her notice and drawn out her sympathy towards him in his suffering state. But, as his character disclosed itself, and he recounted to her his misfortunes and his fears, compassion completed what a tender interest had begun in the bosom that had never suspected of being susceptible to any but a heavenly love; while Therese resolved to do all within her power to restore him to life and health, and then to effect his escape from confinement and peril, if the ways of a nun could devise the means. And she had not only "charity, which hopeth all things," but also, ingeniously to "seek out many inventions."

Her health and works were at length blessed in manifest signs that the disease had run to its limits, and was giving way, subdued by the superior powers in the constitution of her patient. But her own heart had become agitated by a strange uneasiness—the seat of a new malady, which the physicians do not reckon with the self-limited diseases, or number among those within the sphere of their medical practice; and about which the metaphysical talk very clearly and wisely, while they can neither solve its nature, calculate its duration, prescribe an antidote, nor resist its attacks. Yet, among her most earthly thoughts, Therese admitted not the possibility of her ever seeing Delorbe beyond the walls which then enclosed them, should he recover, and regain his liberty. She only wished that he might go forth to life and liberty, while she remained behind, dead to the world, but alive to memory and self-denying beneficence, to think of him; and, if this were sinful, to regret, get absolved, and then go on and sin again. Yet, at the same time, like a good little nun, she shuddered at the thought of leaving her consecrated hearth run so far astray, as to fasten its heaven-devoted strings on an earthly object. Nor did she let the secret of her bosom escape in word, or deed, or look. She kept her sentiments to herself, and gave no attention to her duties and her charge.

Meantime the soft sensibilities of the malade had not been deadened or idle under the care of his gentle nurse. "Patience," says one student of the human affections, "is the art of hoping." This was confirmed in the diligent endeavours of Therese to revive the object of her kindness, and to win him from "Hope," says another, "is the dream of a waking man." This also might have been pronounced true concerning the invalid, could his thoughts have been read as they passed unuttered through his mind. Strange as it may seem to those who do not understand how wildly and perversely the wayward heart will sometimes take it upon itself to act independently of the reasoning head, while Delorbe was yet uncertain whether he was virtually a sinner or not, but certain that his benefactress had renounced the world and professed herself devoted to earthly attachment, his heart had warmed as with new vitality beneath her care; and was shooting out its young affections after her like the roots of an air-plant, that grow without ground, and live upon the wind that shakes them.

Therese had now fixed on a time and a way to bring about his liberation. He was "sick and in prison, and she had ministered unto him," and now would she "throw open the prison-doors to him that was bound;" not forgetting, that, while it was enjoined on her to do one thing, it was also her instruction "not to leave the other undone." But, to do this latter good, it became necessary for her to confide her plan to a third person, and to enlist his assistance in carrying it out to success. This person, as will shortly appear, was the surgeon of the hospital.

In the trying day, she instructed Delorbe to feign fatal symptoms, and then a dying struggle; after which he must sink away as if life had departed, a little while before the usual hour for the attending physician to make his rounds among the patients. Delorbe obeyed; for he saw that she knew well how to combine the wisdom of the serpent with the harmlessness of the dove, while he became her docile pupil. He affected a strong paroxysm, succeeding languor, and, at last, the sleep that has no dream. As was the custom when one had expired, Therese spread the sheet up over his face, to signify that he had ceased to breathe; and there he lay like a form of spiritless clay, when the physician entered. Supposing that his patient was beyond the need and the reach of his skill, he made no further investigation, than to ask when he died; and, being told by the nurse how recently his last struggle was over, and how he had sunk away, he then passed on to feel the pulses of others, that beat, no doubt, more feebly than that of the supposing corpse.

In the evening, Therese pretended that the body of the prisoner was demanded for the instruction of the pupils, and had him removed into the dissecting-hall. Here the kind surgeon, seeing that the subject was under the influence of a more tender and skilful operator than his own hand and blade, and that the body needed to be clothed rather than dismembered, had made provision against exposure, and furnished a suit of his own garments, in which the pretended dead was hastily habited, and in the disguise passed out, unsuspected, to a place of refuge.

The next day, Therese, being questioned, threw herself upon the mercy of her superiors, and confessed the whole truth, as to her stratagem, with so much candour and apparent contrition for the offence, and such protestations of the pity that had led her to take such a course, that she was forgiven, without penalty.

Delorbe had engaged her to meet him once more in his asylum, that he might thank her again for the life she had, in a twofold sense, restored, or saved; and the gentle nun found means and inclination to fulfil her promise. Here Delorbe made a full disclosure of his sentiments, and entreated his benefactress to consent that she would bless the life he owed her, by accepting his hand and fortune, and rendering her destiny henceforth inseparable from his; and proposed that she should fly with him beyond pursuit, where their union might be speedily consummated.

The good sister was at first startled—shocked—and she shuddered at the thought of breaking her religious vows, and returning into the ways of temptation and folly, and the delusions of a wide and wicked world. "For the pearl," thought she, "is pure and safe from blemish, while locked in its shell, though among the monsters of the deep, and the sands and sea-weeds. But, when thrown out of the shell, how soon must it be ruined by the elements, or lost irretrievably." Still there was another idea that rose in opposition to this, about the pearl—a thought that it might be brought to light, and set in gold, and shine in the crown of a monarch, whether that monarch were the earthly lord of his happiness, or of a wider sphere of dominion, if indeed one's own concerns and sphere do not comprise more, and assume a wider influence and higher importance, than all the world besides. But still she paused—while her heart proved a traitor to her in the very moment of necessity; and she could not, for her life, rally the arguments of objection, which she thought it was perhaps her duty to raise against her lover's proposal, and a voice within was pleading strongly in its favour. A subtle essent was operating on her wavering soul; and she reasoned, that, if it were sinful to break her covenant vows and go back to the paths of the worldling, she was already guilty, since the transgression of the heart was the very soul of actual transgression; she should never cease to regret that she had bound herself to the letter of her vow, when in spirit she had broken it, should she let her lover depart without her; and, since her heart had gone into the ways of the wanderer, hand, foot and all, might as well go with it.

Thus the prudent nun deliberated, balanced, and reasoned; and finally, like the young bird, that, having once found the use of its wings, returns to the nest no more, she resolved to keep clear of the monastic restraints of the sisterhood, and to intrust her fate with him who had rendered a life of seclusion irksome.

They made haste to depart, and passed over into Spain, where the narrator, whose purpose was not to make out a long, romantic story about a pair of lovers, but to record the facts of Delorbe's imprisonment and liberation, and the noble traits of female character by which the latter was brought about, simply says, they were married. Thus, by legendism, he wafts them, as on wings, over all the perils, the escapes, the rocks, hills, ravines, rocks, thorns, hedges and ditches, that we may suppose upon the way, by an airy and short course, straight to the triumphal altar. There he discreetly takes leave of them, wisely forbearing to follow them beyond it, to see if the disclaimed nun proved any more faithful to her latter than her former covenant; or, carrying out her theory touching the sins of heart and life into practice, maintained, that since she was out in a wicked world, she might "follow the multitude to do evil." Yet, from the moral elements whose strong mutual attraction had drawn them into this sacred union, we judge, that neither Therese nor Delorbe ever had cause to wish that her first vow had been kept inviolate, or that his death in the hospital had been a reality instead of a feint.

REMINISCENCES OF THE OLDEN TIME.

THE BETRAVER.

SCENE I.

It was a summer's evening in July, a bright sun was shining on the golden crops of corn, ready for the reaper, and gay groups of village maidens rejoicing in all the light-heartedness of youth, for past sports or anticipated pleasures.

One attached couple had wandered by the side of a river; the maiden looking up to her companion's face with all the confidence of affection, while the tall and even stately form of her companion responded to her look with a kind pressure of the hand, or affectionate glance of the eye.

"You will not forget me," said Marion Gray, for so was the maiden named, "when you are mixing with the great world. I hope, nay, I am sure, you will still remember her whose every thought will be devoted to you."

"Doubt it not, dear Marion," was the reply. "Walter Edwards will not forget the fair who has plighted her affection to him truly and faithfully."

"Yet, Walter, there is one thing on which I think with pain. I, who should have no secret from you, good and kind as you are, have that on my mind which I scarcely dare to tell."

"What is that?"

"You have been to me all that I could desire—you have left no wish unfulfilled—yet now, while your vows are ringing in my ears, and your hand is clasped in mine, the thought creeps over me, that—this—dear Walter, you will forgive the past concealment—that our belief is not the same—that we trust to different fairs for our salvation."

She paused. He waited for her to proceed with an air of anxious expectation; but the fair one still hesitated.

"And is it this which has so often made you restless? Nay, then, I wonder not; for there is a fearful penalty hangs over the creed of the heretic; and fear you not that it may fall upon you?"

"I have sometimes been apprehensive that my Bible might be discovered, and that—"

"A Bible—a Bible! and were you really possessed of a Bible? and in the vulgar tongue? But where—where do you conceal it? You know that—"

"An awful penalty awaits those so offending. I do. Death is denounced against those who court the book of life."

And this was then the mournful truth. The spirit of bigotry and vengeance had let loose the forces of the mind. Stern priests believed that they presented a grateful offering to a God of mercy, by destroying their fellow-men for differing from them in spiritual matters, and that, too, while one of the gentle sex sat upon the throne. The emissaries of the exasperated ministers of religion spread themselves everywhere throughout the country in disguise among the people. Fires were blazing in Smithfield—daughters were torn from their parents—brothers from their sisters—the aged husband from her whom he had protected for fifty years, and given to the flames for the very deed which Marion had confessed.

Aware of this, the young man manifested a trembling eagerness to know where this all-important volume could be safely concealed. On this point he questioned Marion very closely, and it was not till she had minutely described the secure hiding-place in which it was deposited, that he seemed moderately at his ease.

"I know," said she, "that there is danger, but greater, more terrible danger still would exist for me were my soul left in darkness; and rather than this, if it must be so, I am ready, if need be, to seal the truth with my blood; and, feeble as I am, the fearful struggle with death would be trifling compared to the thought that you were left to mourn, with none to comfort."

"Night after night," continued Marion, "ere I retire to rest, do I ponder over the word of God, and the sacred volume placed beneath my pillow, I sleep with more confidence for the knowledge of its presence."

"The sun is sinking," said Walter Edwards hastily. "Ere many hours are over I must be far on my journey to London."

"You will not forget me?"

"Trust to me, Marion, farewell!"

They tenderly exchanged adieus, and parted. Walter turned repeatedly to look back on the fair one he promised soon to claim once for all.

That period, from the circumstances above described, during the reign of Queen Mary, was a fearful one for England—the blood of her best and most pious sons was poured forth like water. Envoies, to discover the followers of the new creed, were secretly dispatched to every county in England.

Walter Edwards had come, an unknown man, to the village of Sevenoaks, and had been attracted to Marion by the mildness of her demeanour, and perhaps by the report which was spread about from some unknown source, that she had been converted to the religion of Luther.

That she was such as we have seen by the conversation recorded, and that he had succeeded in winning the guileless affections of poor Marion is beyond all doubt.

He left for the great city. The mandate of authority soon compelled Marion to follow him.

SCENE II.

In an antique and stately room, of which but few specimens now remain, sat one, whose name had spread terror over England—Cardinal Pole. Near him was a table, strewn with papers, at which his secretary was writing. Pictures of the saints, and of their martyrdoms, hung around, excepting on one side, which was concealed by a crimson drapery.

The door opened, and Marion Gray, attended by two guards, entered, and with a firm but subdued demeanour, stood, face to face, with the dreadful man who was the author of her fate. For a space he sternly regarded her, as if surprised to see one so young.

"Know you the crime," he at length said, with a stern calmness, "for which you are this day brought here?"

"I have been told," replied Marion, "that it is for following the true faith, and that," she added, meekly but firmly, "I hold to be no crime."

"How, maiden? that which our church forbids, and which holy men disavow, call you that no crime? Hast thou not broken our sovereign's commands, and held in thy possession a copy of that volume which is forbidden to such as thou?"

"It is true."

"And canst thou, a child, pretend to understand it?"

"It is written there, 'a child shall not err therein,'" said the captive, simply, quoting the divine word. "But who has accused me?"

"Maiden," replied the Cardinal, "thou shalt behold thine accuser." As he spoke he made a sign to his secretary, who rang a small bell which rested on the table.

At the summons the crimson drapery was moved, and slowly stepping forward, the tall form of Walter Edwards appeared.

"And art thou, too," exclaimed Marion, with a deep sigh, "in the hands of this terrible man? Now, God protect us, for our hopes on earth are few!"

"What mean you?" exclaimed the Cardinal.

"What mean I?" replied Marion, wrought almost to frenzy by the sight. "Could not cruelly be content with the destruction of one over whom scarce eighteen summers have passed? Will not my blood suffice, but must ye slay one who has only sinned by loving me. Spare him and I will bless you."

"Woman, thou art beside thyself. Speak, Walter Edwards, and say how thou dost track this guilty one to her home, and bring from her the secret of her false faith. Say, man," he continued, not heeding the agonizing remorse which passed over Edward's face—"say that thou hast denounced her to the church, and given her to our chastisement. Speak, art thou dumb?"

Gasping for breath the accuser muttered, "Pardon me, my lord—a sudden faintness—it is as thou hast said."

"You do not mean it, Walter; you cannot mean it: the presence of the slayer of God's saints hath turned thy brain. Yet, no," he exclaimed, suddenly; "by the eye which meets not mine—by thy bowed form, and by the quivering whiteness of thy lip, thou hast spoken truly."

"It is even so," in a low voice murmured the accuser.

"Honour, honour!" exclaimed Marion, now fully comprehending the mighty calamity which had fallen on her. "And from your hands, Walter Edwards—you, on whom I leaned in all my troubles; you, who seemed to me so kind, so gentle; you! God of my fathers, in this hour of trial, save me and sustain!"

"What is this answer?" demanded the Cardinal.

"I never read the sacred book," said, or rather muttered Marion, utterly disregarding the question, "but his name seemed written there. I never knelt before it, but his name rose to my lips; I never placed it beneath my pillow, but his image rose, blended with peaceful thoughts and earnest prayers. Walter, 'twas a poor triumph—man's wit against woman's love. Earth hath nothing more monstrous to tell."

"Time presses," said the Cardinal: "thine answer, girl!"

"My answer, Lord Cardinal, is this," and the speaker seemed inspired with unearthly energy as she proceeded, "that of all those whom thy cruelty has laid low—of the hundreds thou hast destroyed, and of the hearts thou hast blasted, none disregard thy punishments or laugh to scorn thy threats more than the despised village maiden now before thee."

With a stern glance he pointed to the door by which she had entered, and the prisoner was led to the only lodging she was to possess on this side the grave.

SCENE III

In a cell, to which the light of day could scarcely reach, lay Marion Gray. The fiat had gone forth, and on the morrow she was to add another to the list of those who had died for faith. It was midnight, when noise, as of the grating of a door upon its hinges, aroused her; and, springing from her bed, she saw the form, once so dear, of him who had betrayed her. He entered with a slow and melancholy step; and there, in that damp cold cell, by the flickering light of a dull lamp, met, for the last time, the betrayer and his victim!

"Marion," said a low melancholy voice.

"What would you, Walter, with one who has done with the world?"

"I have come to implore your pardon," was the answer, in a voice almost choked by tears.

"Ask it of God, Walter—I am at peace with all the world."

"Within this week, Marion," said Edwards, "I have suffered the anguish of years. Look on this furrowed cheek—on this wasted brow—and on these hollow eyes."

"You have cause for bitterness. I am doomed by you. Is my face as fresh as when you first sought me? Is it nothing to die in the spring-time of youth? Is it nothing to feel that a terrible death awaits me?" said Marion, touchingly.

"Oh, Marion, would you but consent to live! Recant in time. You may yet be saved. For your repentant lover's sake renounce your heresy."

"Peace, Walter."

"If you could but say the word, and worship your God in a different form, happiness would await us. In a distant land you might teach me that which you have learned, and on a foreign shore might our bones rest, peacefully and calmly in the same grave, with but one hope, one faith, and one God!"

"Walter, Walter! you trouble me, yet you plead in vain. Weak and frail as I am, I am content to die in the faith I have avowed, for the Deity I worship will give me comfort in the hour of affliction. And now farewell—I would gather strength in sleep for my last trial."

He renewed his importunity, but in vain; and at length despairingly passed from her presence, and Marion Gray fell on her knees and prayed long and earnestly for divine assistance; and, strengthened by that power on whom she leaned in all her troubles, felt a victim to the fierce intolerance of the times.

Of Walter Edwards little is known, save that, from that time, his name is no more found among those "who went about like roaring lions seeking whom they might devour."

INDIAN TALES AND LEGENDS.

THE RED HEAD.

BY HENRY R. SCHOOLCRAFT.

As spring approaches, the Indians return from their wintering grounds to their villages, engage in feasting, soon exhaust their stock of provisions, and begin to suffer for the want of food. Such of the hunters as are of an active and enterprising cast of character, take this occasion to separate from the mass of the population, and remove to some neighbouring locality in the forest, which promises the means of subsistence during this season of general lassitude and enjoyment.

Among the families who thus separated themselves, on a certain occasion, there was a man called Oshelodoph Wanchecentongh, or the Child of Strong Desires, who had a wife and one son. After a day's travel he reached an ample wood, with his family, which was thought to be a suitable place to encamp. The wife fixed the lodge, while the husband went out to hunt. Early in the evening he returned with a deer. Being tired and thirsty, he asked his son to go to the river for some water. The son replied that it was dark, and he was afraid. He urged him to go, saying that his mother, as well as himself, was tired, and the ground beneath him. He was very short. But no persuasion was of any avail. He refused to go. "Ah, my son," said the father at last, "if you are afraid to go to the river you will never kill the Red Head."

The boy was deeply mortified by this observation. It seemed to call up all his latent energies. He mused in silence. He refused to eat, and made no reply when spoken to.

The next day he asked his mother to dress the skin of the deer, and make it into moccasins for him, while he busied himself in preparing a bow and arrows. As soon as these things were done, he left the lodge one morning at sunrise, without saying a word to his father or mother. He fired one of his arrows into the air, which fell unobserved. He took that course, and at night coming to the place where the arrow had fallen, was rejoiced to find it piercing the heart of a deer. He refreshed himself with a meal of the venison, and the next morning fired another arrow. After travelling all day, he found it also in another deer. In this manner he fired four arrows, and every evening found that he had killed a deer. What he was accomplishing, however, he kept to himself, and he hid the carcasses, and passed on without withdrawing them. In consequence of this, he had no arrow for the fifth day, and was in great distress at night for the want of food. At last he threw himself upon the ground in despair, concluding that he might as well perish there as go farther. But he had not lain long before he heard a humming noise, and he looked beneath him. He sprang up, and discovered, at a distance, the figure of a human being, walking with a stick. He looked attentively and saw that the figure was walking in a wide beaten path, in a prairie, leading from a lodge to a lake. To his surprise this lodge was at no great distance. He approached a little nearer, and concealed himself. He soon discovered that the figure was no other than that of the Red Head, who makes war. Her path to the lake was perfectly smooth and solid, and the noise our adventurer had heard, was caused by the striking of her walking-staff upon the ground. The top of this staff was decorated with a string of the toes and bills of birds of every kind, who, at every stroke of the stick, fluttered and rung their various notes in concert.

She entered her lodge and laid off her mantle, which was entirely composed of the scalps of women. Before folding it, she shook it several times, and at every shake the scalps uttered loud shouts of laughter, in which the old hag joined. Nothing could have frightened him more than this horrible exhibition. After looking by the cloak she came directly to him. She informed him that he had known him from the time he left his father's lodge, and watched his movements. She told him not to fear or despair, for she would be his friend and protector. She invited him into her lodge, and gave him a supper. During the repast, she inquired of him his motives for visiting her. He related to her the story in the manner in which he had been disgraced, and the difficulties he laboured under. She cheered him with the assurance of her friendship, and told him he would be a brave man yet.

She then commenced the exercise of her power upon him. His hair very short, she took a large leaden comb, and after drawing it through his hair several times, it became of a beautiful shining length. She then proceeded to dress him as a female, furnishing him with the necessary garments, and decorated his hair with paint of the most beautiful dye. She gave him a bowl of shining metal. She directed him to put in his girdle a blade of scented sword-grass, and to proceed the next morning to the banks of the lake, which was no other than that over which the Red Head reigned. Now Pah-luh-undootah, or the Red Head, was a most powerful sorcerer, and the terror of all the country, living upon an island in the centre of the lake.

She informed him that there would be many Indians on the island, who, as soon as they saw him use the shining bowl to drink with, would come and solicit him to be the wife of the Red Head, and that if the chief could not come for her in his own canoe, she should return to her village. She said that as soon as the Red Head heard of this, he would come for her in his own canoe, in which she must embark. On reaching the island he must consent to be his wife, and in the evening must lead him to take a walk out of the village, when he was to take the first opportunity to cut off his head with the blade of grass. She also gave him general advice how he was to conduct himself to sustain his assumed character of a woman. His fear would scarcely permit him to accede to this plan, but the recollection of his father's words and looks decided him.

Early in the morning, he left the witch's lodge, and took the hard beaten path to the banks of the lake. He reached the water at a point directly opposite the Red Head's village. It was a beautiful day. The heavens were clear, and the sun shone out in the greatest effulgence. He had not been long there, having sauntered along the beach, when he displayed the glittering bowl, by dipping it into the water. Very soon a number of canoes came off from the island. The men admired his dress, and were charmed with his beauty, and a great number made proposals of marriage. These he promptly declined, agreeably to the concerted plan. When the facts were reported to the Red Head, he ordered his canoe to be put in the water by his chosen men, and crossed over to see this wonderful girl. As he came near the shore, he saw that the ribs of the sorcerer's canoe were formed of living rattlesnakes, whose heads pointed outward to guard him from enemies. Our adventurer had no sooner stepped into the canoe than they began to hiss and rattle, which put him in a great fright. But the magician spoke to them, after which they became pacified and quiet, and all at once they were at the landing upon the island. The marriage immediately took place, and the bride made presents of various valuables which had been furnished by the old witch.

As days were sitting in the lodge surrounded by friends and relatives, the mother of the Red Head regarded the face of her new daughter-in-law for a long time with fixed attention. From this scrutiny she was convinced that this singular and hasty marriage augured no good to her son. She drew her husband aside and disclosed to him her suspicions: "This can be no female, said she, the figure and the manners, the countenance, and, more especially, the expression of the eyes, are, beyond a doubt, those of a man. Her husband immediately rejected her suspicions, and rebuked her severely for the indignity offered to her daughter-in-law. He became so angry, that seizing the first thing that came to hand, which happened to be his pipe-stem, he beat her unmercifully. This act required to be explained to the spectators, the mock bride immediately rose up, and assuming an air of offended dignity, told the Red Head that after receiving so gross an insult from his relatives he could not think of remaining with him as his wife, but should forthwith return to his village and friends. He left the lodge followed by the Red Head, and walked until he came upon the beach of the island, near the spot where they had first landed. Red Head treated him to remain. He pressed him by every motive which he thought might have weight, but they were all rejected. During this conference they had seated themselves upon the ground, and Red Head, in great affliction, reclined his head upon his fancied wife's lap. This was the opportunity ardently sought for, and it was improved to the best advantage. Every means was taken to tell him to sleep, and partly by a soothing manner, and partly by a seeming compliance with his request, the object was at last attained. Red Head fell into a sound sleep. Our aspirant, for the glory of a brave man, then drew his blade of grass, and drawing it once across the neck of the Red Head, completely severed the head from the body.

He immediately stripped off his dress, seized the bleeding head, and plunging into the lake, swam safely over to the main shore. He had scarcely reached it, when looking back, he saw, amid the darkness, the torches of persons come out in search of the new-married couple. He listened till they had found the headless body, and he heard their piercing shrieks of sorrow, as he took his way to the lodge of his kind adviser.

She received him with rejoicing. She admired his prudence, and told him his bravery could never be questioned again. Lifting up the head, she said he need only have brought the scalp. She cut off a small piece for herself, and told him he might now return with the head, which would be evidence of an achievement that would cause the Indians to respect him. In your way home, she said, you will meet with but one difficulty. Maunkah Kesh Woc-caud, or the Spirit of the Earth, requires an offering from those who perform extraordinary achievements. As you walk along in a prairie, there will be an earthquake. The earth will open and divide the prairie in the middle. Take this partridge and throw it into the opening, and instantly spring over it. At this happened precisely as it has been related. He cast the partridge into the crevice, and leapt over it. He then proceeded without obstruction to a place near his village, where he secreted his trophy. On entering the village he found his parents had returned from the place of their spring encampment, and were in great sorrow for their son, whom he had lost. One and another of the young men had presented themselves to the disconsolate parents, and said, "Look up, I am your son." Having been often deceived in this manner, when their own son actually presented himself, they sat with their heads down, and with their eyes nearly blinded with weeping. It was some time before they could be prevailed upon to bestow a glance upon him. It was still longer before they recognized him for their son; when he recounted his adventures they believed him mad. The young men laughed at him. He left the lodge and soon returned with his trophy. It was soon recognized. All doubts of the reality of his adventures now vanished. He was greeted with joy, and placed among the first warriors of the nation. He finally became a chief, and his family were ever after esteemed and respected.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

HUMOURS OF A GERMAN STUDENT.

From "Morton's Hope," published by the Harpers.

Ten next morning I lounged up the Weender Strasse. The day was fine, and the streets were thronged with more than the usual number of students and Philistines. As I got near the end of the street, I saw one or two small boys, and half-a-dozen house-maids, looking with wonder at a strange figure, preceded by a strange dog, that was passing along the side-walk.

On looking at him at first, at a short distance, I took him for a maniac, escaped from the lunatic asylum. He wore a cap embroidered in crimson and gold, shaped like a shaving-bason, and of the sort usually denominated beer-caps, a dressing-gown of many colours, strapped tightly about his loins with a leathern girdle, in which were thrust two home-pistols, and a pair of Turkish slippers, or duelling-sword, and on his feet a pair of red Turkish slippers. His head was open, and his legs bare from the ankle to the knees. In one hand he brandished an oaken cudgel, and in the other he held a small memorandum-book. He was preceded by a small dog of the comical breed called "Deckel," a kind of terrier, which considerably resembles the English turnspit. The individual one which now presented itself, was, like all his class, as ugly as a dog can well be. His body was very long, and his legs very short; his colour was a mixture of black and a dirty red; his tail curled itself as gracefully as a pig's, his knees were bowed parenthetically outwards, and he turned out his toes like a country dancing-master. In order to heighten the effects of these personal ornaments, his master had tied a wreath of artificial flowers round his neck, and decorated his tail with fancy-coloured ribbons.

Attired in this guise, the dog and his master proceeded gravely down the street, apparently without heeding the laughter of the admiring spectators. There seemed to be no students in the immediate vicinity, and the Philistines were beneath his notice. As I approached him, I observed something familiar in his countenance, and, immediately afterwards, the singular individual caught me by the hand, and kissed me affectionately on both cheeks. It was Rabenmark, my Leipzig acquaintance. He invited me to accompany him to his rooms, and smoke a pipe, and, seated about with him; and we continued our walk down the street. I was not sufficiently intimate with him to expostulate with, or to interrogate him with regard to the peculiar costume in which he had thought proper to array himself, and I accordingly took him as gravely as if he had been the burgomaster of the town, in his holiday suit. We had not gone far before I perceived a group of students approaching. I was curious to observe as he would treat their animadversions with the same indifference as he had done those of the town's-men. The terror was about a rod in advance of us, and on his passing the students, there was a universal laugh. Rabenmark hastened toward them. They were four stout fellows, in blue and silver caps, and on observing the absurd appearance of my companion, they all began to laugh the louder.

"What the deuce are you laughing at?" said Rabenmark, ferociously, with his arms akimbo; "I see nothing to laugh at!" "I was laughing at your dog," said the first student.

"I was laughing at his master," said the second.

"And I—" "And I—" said the third and fourth.

"Have the kindness to tell me your names?" said Rabenmark to the second, third, and fourth.

"Pott," "Kopp," "Fizzleberg," answered the three.

"Your address?" continued Rabenmark.

The addresses were given, and Rabenmark wrote them all carefully down in his note-book.

"Now," said he, "allow me to observe, Messrs. Pott, Kopp, and Fizzleberg, that you are all three stupid boobies, (dumme Jungen!)"

This epithet, "dumme Jungen," which the "drole," in French, is an insult, or a "touche," and requires a duel of twelve rounds (Gangs) to revenge it. There is, however, another insult, which is a grade beyond it, and which is about equivalent to the pleasing epithet, in English, of "infamous scoundrel." This may be repeated, and the consequence is a challenge of twenty-four "gangs," from the opposite party.

"Your name?" demanded the second student.

"An Rabenmark," answered my companion.

"You are an infamous Hundsfott!" said Pott.

"You are an infamous Hundsfott!" said Kopp.

"You are an infamous Hundsfott!" said Fizzleberg.

"Very well, gentlemen," said Rabenmark; "very well, indeed; all perfectly in order. You shall hear from me this afternoon, or to-morrow morning," and he politely touched his cap, as if it was the most agreeable thing in the world to be called an infamous Hundsfott.

"As for you, sir," continued Rabenmark, turning to the first student, "our quarrel is not so easily settled. I care not so much for insult to myself, because I can defend myself: but an insult to my dog, to little Fritz, is cowardly; for Fritz, according to the 'Comment,' cannot resist the injury. Fritz, sir, as you perceive, bears the name of the immortal hero of Prussia—Frederick the only—a monarch for whom I have the most profound respect, and I request you instantly to apologize to Fritz."

The student laughed in his face.

"Your name?" said Rabenmark.

"Weissier," said the student.

"Well, Mr. Weissier, I request you instantly to repair with me to my apartment. Choose either of your three friends for your second; here is mine," said he, pointing to me; "and we will settle Fritz's quarrels with these instruments, at three paces, and no barrier," he concluded, touching his pistols.

Weissier began to look scared.

"What a devil of a renegade!" said Pott, shaking his head.

"Shocking!" said Kopp and Fizzleberg, shaking their head.

"I shall accept no such challenge," said Weissier; "I do not feel myself bound thereby by any code of honour. I will fight you with sabres, without axes or duelling-breeches, if you choose. I will accept no other challenge."

"Ah, you are not fond of gunpowder. I am sorry you met Fritz this morning. He is, perhaps, foolishly strict on this point. I am not near so exacting myself; but Fritz is incorrigible. I am sorry, sir, but I shall be obliged to post you publicly: you will be expelled from your club;" and Rabenmark was moving away.

"Stay," said Weissier, looking very pale and very foolish, "if there is no alternative—but how am I to apologise to your cursed dog?"

"Ah, now you are beginning to be reasonable; and I shall be very happy to assist you in your endeavour to appease Fritz's wounded honour. You will readily understand that it would be of little consequence to apologise to him in words, because he would not understand you. There is, however, a very simple method. Fritz is fond of jumping—he is fond of a companion in his sports; and if you will have the kindness to afford him your company, his anger will be extinguished at once. Here, Fritz—Fritz!" cried he, calling to the terrier.

The dog came to his whistle, and Rabenmark held his stick, a foot's distance from the ground.

"Hopp, hopp!" said Rabenmark, and the dog jumped over the stick.

"Now, sir," he continued, "if you will have the kindness to place yourself on all fours, and jump over the stick in like manner, I pledge my honour to you that Fritz will be perfectly satisfied."

"Thousand Thanks West!" roared Mr. Weissier, in a rage, "what upon earth do you take me for, Mr. Von Rabenmark?"

"A coward, sir—only a coward! If you are willing, however, to prove I am mistaken, I shall be very happy to show you the way to my rooms; but really I must request you to hasten your decision, for time presses, and I have many things to attend to."

I believe that Weissier thought he had really got hold of the devil. He had become very pale, and his teeth began to chatter.

"In the name of heaven, there is no way of getting out of this infernal scrape!" said he, looking round in despair.

His companions turned their backs upon him.

"Well, well, I cannot have my brains blown out for this miserable dog. Hold out your stick, Mr. Von Rabenmark, if it is heaven's will."

So Mr. Von Rabenmark, as it was heaven's will, held out his stick—down plumped the miserable Weissier on his hands and knees.

"Hopp—hopp!" said Rabenmark—over jumped the detected bully, and, jumping up again, fled rapidly up a narrow lane.

"Good morning, Mr. Weissier," said Rabenmark—"a good morning, Messrs. Kopp, Pott, and Fizzleberg. You shall hear from me this afternoon;" and so saying, he gravely continued his promenade.

THE EGLINTON TILTING MATCH.

A London paper says—"The most splendid and magnificent specimen of ancient armour, to be worn on this interesting occasion, is generally considered to be that recently brought from the armoury of the baronial hall of Hylton Castle, near Sunderland, Durham. This princely and gorgeous suit is made of pure Milan steel, burnished blue, decorated with gold studs or rivets, curiously chased with the same costly metal, and elaborately wrought in arabesque. The casque or helmet alone weighs nearly forty pounds, and the bars of the vizor are of solid gold. This warlike specimen of the olden time is in beautiful preservation, and is said to have cost one thousand guineas nearly five hundred years ago, when it was worn by the then Baron of Hylton at the victorious battle of Cressy. The total expenses of this grand and chivalric display will, it is supposed, exceed fifty thousand pounds. We have been informed that the grand tournament at Eglington Castle will take place on the twenty-eighth of August, and we understand that the list of knights and esquires exceeds the number originally intended. The tilting and other chivalrous sports will occupy three days. The procession to the lists leaves the castle about noon every day, and will comprise the knights, their esquires and retainers, the king of the lists and the lord of the tournament, the queen of beauty, and the other principal personages who will figure in this revival of the glories of other days. The encampments of the knights, strictly copied from ancient authorities, and painted in the colours and decked with the emblazoned banners and crests of their martial occupants, will be an interesting sight; and when the gothic galleries surrounding the lists are crowded with the beauty and fashion of the three kingdoms, and the steel-clad champions rush to the encounter, we can easily imagine the splendour of the spectacle. The sports will be concluded with banquets, balls, and masques, given to the assembled déjeûners by the noble holders of the festival. Their royal highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge are likewise expected to be guests of Lord Eglington during the tournament, with many amongst the most distinguished of our own and foreign noblesse, in gorgeous costumes of the middle ages. The Ayrshire archers, headed by their captain, Claude Alexander Esq., clad in a brilliant and characteristic costume, will muster in great force and add to the attraction of the spectacle."

The following anecdote will be pursued with some interest:—

Lord Eglington is descended in a direct line from Roger de Mundegumbrie, since changed to Montgomery, who followed William of Normandy at the time of the conquest. One of the family afterwards settled in France, in the reign of Francis the First, and his son John de Montgomery, better known by the title of Captain of Lorraine, was renowned for his address in all kinds of warlike exercises, which, however, did not prevent his wounding with a burning brand, Francis the First, in the forehead, during a mock siege, given for the entertainment of the court at the Hotel Saint-Pol.

This gentleman's son, Sabel de Montgomery, was also a great admirer of tournaments, and had the misfortune in one given in the Rue St. Antoine, to wound mortally King Henry the Second, who was his adversary. After a life of great vicissitude, caused by his involuntary regicide, he was taken prisoner in 1574, shut up in one of the towers of the Conciergerie, and here he died by order of Catherine de Medicis, who thus avenged her husband's death twenty-four years after. It is singular enough, that two ages and a half after, his descendant should again exhibit marks of the same inclination for tournaments.

GENERAL PUTNAM.—During the war in Canada, between the French and English, when General Amherst was marching across the country to Canada, the army, consisting of one of the largest vessels of twelve guns upon it. The general was in great distress, his boats were no match for her, and she alone was capable of sinking his whole army, in the situation in which it was placed. While he was pondering on what should be done, General Putnam came to him, and said, "General, that ship must be taken." "I take her," says Putnam. Amherst smiled, and asked how? "Give me some wedges, a beetle (a large wooden hammer or mallet used for driving wedges), and a few men of my own choice." Amherst could not conceive how an armed vessel was to be taken by four or five men, a beetle, and wedges. He, however, granted Putnam's request. When night came, Putnam, with his materials and men, stole quietly in a boat under the vessel's stern, and in an instant drove in the wedges behind the rudder, in the little cavity between the rudder and the ship, and left her. In the morning, the sails were seen fluttering about, she was adrift in the middle of the lake, and being presently blown ashore, was easily taken.

CORONATION OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—Martin, so celebrated for his illustrations of Milton, and various other paintings, in which extensive grouping is essential, has completed a grand picture of the "Coronation of Queen Victoria." It contains upwards of one hundred and twenty portraits, and is distinguished for the representation of an incident which took place on the occasion. During the "homage" it is stated that the venerable Lord Rolle stumbled, in ascending the steps of the throne, and that her Majesty instantly rose and presented her hand to the aged peer. The painter has taken advantage of this, and instead of the stiff and hard exhibition of a Queen merely sitting in state, has given this anecdote life on the canvass, and thereby given the picture a tenfold value as a work of design. Martin is an artist in copper, as well as canvass, and is therefore able to embody the spirit of his paintings in his very exquisite mezzotints.

BLANCHE OF NAVARRA.—Mr. G. P. R. James has produced a drama. It is called "Blanche of Navarre," and the critics seem to be nearly unanimous in their opinion concerning it. The dialogue is spirited, and the poetry good; but in his desire to save the plot from the charge of heaviness, he has heaped on his incidents in too crowded a manner. The piece bears marks of hurry, the author not having allowed himself time to trim the passages. How few are they who excel at once in narrative and in dramatic action!

SHAKESPEARE.—In Shakespeare one sentence begets the next naturally; the meaning is all involved. He goes on kindling like a meteor through the dark atmosphere; yet, when the creation in his outline is once perfect, then he seems to rest from his labour, and to smile upon his work, and tell himself that it is very good. You see many scenes and parts of scenes which are simply Shakespeare's disposing himself in repose to triumph and vigorous fun after a great achievement of his highest genius.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

A CHILD'S SONG, FROM A MASK.

I have a garden of my own,
Shining with flowers of every hue;
I loved it dearly while alone,
But I shall love it more with you;
And there the golden bees shall come
In summer time, at break of morn,
And wake us with their busy hum,
Around the Sula's fragrant thorn.
I have a fawn from Edon's land,
On leafy buds and berries nursed,
And you shall feed him from your hand,
Though he may start with fear at first.
And I will lead you where he lies,
For shelter in the noon-day heat,
And you may touch his sleeping eyes,
And feel his little silvery feet.

EVENING SCENES ON THE ST. LAWRENCE.—From the moment the sun is down, everything becomes silent on the shore, which our windows overlook, and the murmurs of the broad St. Lawrence, more than two miles immediately before us, and, a little way to the right, spreading to five or six miles in breadth, are sometimes for an hour the only sounds that arrest our attention. Every evening since we have been here, black clouds and splendid moonlight have hung over, and embellished this tranquil scene; and on two of these evenings we have been attracted to the window, by the plaintive Canadian boat-song. In one instance, it arose from a solitary voyager, floating in his light canoe, which occasionally appeared and disappeared on the sparkling river, and in its distant course seemed no larger than some sportive insect. In another instance, a larger boat, with more numerous and less melodious voices, not indeed in perfect harmony, passed nearer to the shore, and gave additional life to the scene. A few minutes after, the moon broke out from a throne of dark clouds, and seemed to contrast the whole expanse of water into one vast sheet of glittering silver; and, in the very brightest spot, at the distance of more than a mile, again appeared a solitary boat, but too distant to admit of our hearing the song, with which the boatman was probably solacing his lonely course.

IMITATORS.—It is the fate of literary men whose style is peculiar, to have their effusions besmeared with the trash of imitators. The Rasselas of Johnson was followed by somebody's Dinarrhas; the witty and eccentric Sterne has had his legion of followers; the witty and eccentric Sterne has had his legion of followers; and the very brightest spot, at the distance of more than a mile, again appeared a solitary boat, but too distant to admit of our hearing the song, with which the boatman was probably solacing his lonely course.

ON THE STUDY OF LANGUAGES.—Though a linguist should pride himself to have all the tongues that Babel cleft the world into, yet if he had not studied the solid things in them as well as the words and lexicons, he were nothing so much to be esteemed as a learned man, as any yeoman or tradesman competently wise in his mother dialect only. Hence, appear the many mistakes which have made learning generally so unpleasing and so unsuccessful; and we do amuse to spend seven or eight years merely in scraping together so much miserable Latin and Greek as might be learned otherwise easily and delightfully in one year.

FLATTERY.—Sensible women have often been the dupes of designing men, in the following way—they have taken an opportunity of praising them to their own confidante, but with a solemn injunction to secrecy. The confidante, however, as they know, will infallibly inform her principal, the first moment she sees her; and this is a mode of flattery which always succeeds. Even those females who are not so much flattered by the flattery of the world as this; just as we can hear the light of the sun when reflected by the moon.

DEATH.—Death is the great treasure-house of love. There he buries the real wealth of passion and of youth; there the heart, once so prodigal, now grown the miser, turns to contemplate the hoards it has hidden from the world. Henceforth, it is but the common and petty coins of affection that it wastes on the use and things of life.

TRUE RELIGION.—If St. Paul were again to appear on earth, since all the multifarious denominations of Christians would claim him, which would he choose? The apostle himself shall answer, "Pure religion, and undefiled before God, and the Father, is this—to visit the fatherless and widow in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

SECRETS OF COMFORT.—Though sometimes small evils, like invisible insects, inflict pain, and a single harp may stop a vast machine, yet the chief secret of comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex one, and in prudently cultivating an undergrowth of small pleasures, since very few great ones, alas! are let on long leaves.

THE BIRD-MESSAGE.—The imagination never conceived a more exquisite picture of beauty, than the dove of the ark gliding towards Ararat with the olive-branch, over the still, solitary, measureless surface of the waters, gazing down upon its own shadow, and listening to the music made by its own wings.

THE CHEAP DEFENCE OF NATIONS.—Dr. Franklin said, "Where I see a house well furnished with books and newspapers, there I see intelligent and well-informed children; but if there are no books or papers, the children are ignorant, if not prodigues."

PAID.—It has been well said, that the thing most likely to make the angels wonder, is to see a grand man. But pride of birth is the most ridiculous of all vanities—it is like the boasting of the root of the tree, instead of the fruit it bears.

HISTORY.—If men could learn from history, what lessons it might teach us! But passion and party blind our eyes; and the light which experience gives is a lantern on the stern, which shines only on the waves behind us!

TIME.—Time is the cradle of hope, and the grave of existence. It deprives beauty of its charms, while it transfers them to her picture.

Original.
THE KING OF THE WIND.

BY MISS ELIZA COOK.

He burst through the ice-pillar'd gates of the north,
And away on his hurricane-wings he rush'd forth—
He howled with delight in his strength and his speed—
He mock'd at the lion, and taunted the steed;
The arrow and eagle were laggard behind,
Alone in his flight sped the King of the Wind.

He swept o'er the earth—the tall battlements fell,
And he laugh'd as they crumbled, with maniac yell;
The broad oak of the wood dared wrestle again,
Till wild in his fury he hurl'd it in twain:
No power could brave him, no fitter could bide—
Supreme in his sway, was the King of the Wind.

He career'd o'er the waters with death and despair,
He wreck'd the proud ship, and his triumph was there;
The cheeks that had blench'd not at foeman or blade,
At the sound of his breathing turn'd pale and afraid.
And he shriek'd in his glory, "Where, where will you find,
One so great or so free as the King of the Wind!"

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

A COMPLAINT AGAINST CONVENIENCE.

BY A MAN BORN OUT OF SEASON.

THE world is getting far too convenient. I, for one, have watched the progress of improvement for some time past, in silent indignation; but it is really time to speak out.

A plague of new-fangled inventions! We are making a god of machinery, and in doing so, we are making that which will, in time, unmake us. The sparrow hatched the cuckoo's eggs, and then the young cuckoo put the old sparrow out of the nest, as a reward for her officiousness! So are we bringing into existence prodigious creatures, who, in due time, will take this nest of ours—the earth—out of our care and keeping, and look after it themselves.

True, man, with his usual shortsightedness and self-sufficiency, talks very largely about machinery being his servant—doing his work for him—the mere creature of his will—and such bombastic stuff. Tush! a precious servant, truly, that will snap his master's head off for the slightest undue interference! Already are there a host of overbearing monsters running, puffing and blowing, over all the level land in the country, in most domineering fashion; and if man, that used to be lord paramount, chances to meet one of them, and does not skip out of its way, with most undignified alacrity, he is forthwith reduced to the consistency of a pinch of snuff, and the "servant" pursues "the even tenour of its way," with as much indifference as if it had merely passed over a pumpkin!

And in such a case what is the course pursued? Is the creature laid hold of and brought to justice? No such thing. Even in the most barbarous times there was a parade or show of this article, when blood was shed or brains knocked out; but now, in this, our nineteenth century, man's life is of too little moment to cause the slightest interruption to business, and the next day the destroyer is seen openly pursuing the same track, defying opposition, and threatening all who presume to obstruct its path with a similar fate! Servants, forsooth!

Meanwhile a few fellow-imbeciles gather up the "master's" powder, sneak into a small out-of-the-way room, and deprecatingly call the affair an "accident." Should the case happen to be marked by circumstances of peculiar atrocity, perhaps they summon resolution enough to levy a paltry "deadend" upon the monster. As if such an overbearing bully cared a whit for their deadends!

There is another class of these servants, who do not hold their heads quite so high, and who do an immensity of work, if humoured and attended to, carrying hundreds of their self-styled lords hundreds of miles, and thinking it no trouble. This is all very well; but only let the smallest slight be passed upon them; let the most trivial neglect take place, even supposing it is merely forgetting to hand them a drink of water, at regular intervals, and straightway they begin to fume and fret, and, if not pacified in time, a prodigious "blow-up" ensues, and any quantity of their employers are sent skimming through the air in every diversity of position and attitude, without the slightest previous warning.

Servants, faith!

The truth is, we make machinery, and machinery is fast making machines of us. As Hamlet says—"This was sometime a paradox, but now the times give it proof."

I mentioned those matters to an acquaintance of mine—a great admirer of the present improved state of affairs.

"Look at the despatch—the expedition," quoth he.

"No question," quoth I;—"a few dozen fine fellows—lovely women—blooming children, full of life, health, hope, and all the pleasant anticipations of a joyous existence, sent whizzing from one world to another in the fraction of a second. No question at all about the expedition!"

"Casualties, my dear sir,—casualties will occur."

"Casualties!"—Zounds!—"The web of life of hundreds so frequently and so rudely torn—loves, joys, affections scattered—ties severed—wives widowed, children fatherless, hearths desolate; and all for the sake of a little extra speed!—Casualties!—murders!—massacres!—"

My friend took me gently by the hand. He smiled benignly upon me, as we may suppose a superior intelligence to smile upon an inferior, shook his head, and said he truly lamented to find me so much behind the "spirit of the age"—advised me to take the "Railway Magazine"—and concluded by exclaiming, impressively, as he left me—"Speed, my good friend, speed is everything!" "I don't think so," bawled I after him.

"You are an eccentric," retorted he, from the opposite side of the street.

An eccentric! Precious times we live in, when a man is charged with eccentricity merely for disliking the chance of being reduced to powder or blown into fragments!

But it is in vain reasoning with these sort of people. They have a quiet self-sufficiency—a calm consent about them—that is impetuous. Solomon said, two thousand years ago—"Show me a man that is wise in his own conceit; there is more hope of a fool than he!" and what Solomon said is a truth that has received the confirmation of four and twenty centuries. You might as well attempt to reason with a "quick train." They have an idea that the present age is immeasurably superior to any that has preceded it, and that they, as appertaining to it, are greatly above all who have gone before them. They will tell you Archimedes was a pretty ingenious fellow, but had no idea of eighteen miles per hour by water, and thirty by land.

But were even our improvements and conveniences physically safe, are they not objectionable in a moral point of view?

I deprecate man becoming a secondary object on the earth. I have nobler views of the creature. I stand up for his primary rights and privileges. It is too bad for him to be crowded over by the work of his own hands. Not that a primitive or patriarchal state of existence is altogether to be advocated, but we are getting over-improved—over-civilized—over-regulated. Our mechanical propensities are introducing fatal habits of rule and method. We will have no fancies, outbreaks, whims, or vagaries soon. Punctuality will be the great virtue. It will be recorded on men's tombstones, as the same of human perfection, that they were as regular as chronometers. Indeed, some leading utilitarians are scarcely to be distinguished from pieces of mechanism already. They are wound up with a certain quantity of motives and duties in a morning, go through the day with unvarying precision, and, when run down at night, come home and go to bed, not being able to do without sleep as yet; though doubtless some substitute for that time-sleeping habit will be discovered one of those days.

These sort of folks are truly what Wordsworth calls,

"Reasoning, self-sufficient things."

Ask one of these people his opinion of "Colleen's Ode on the Passions," and he will tell you the passions belonged to the ancients—that he is no antiquarian, and sees not the utility of wasting his time about the irrationalities of a past age.

This is a truth. Many people are already as methodical and passionless as if they were actually in the course of transmutation into metallic substances; and there can be little doubt that flesh and blood is tending that way. A process of petrification is undoubtedly going on.

I have myself noticed an extreme rigidity in the feel of young children of the rising generation; and more especially in those that are swept into an Infant School in a morning, in order to be out of the way of their parents for the rest of the day.

This is alarming.

And what, if these things go on—if materialism continues unchecked—what will 'come of that humanizing spirit of the universe—divine Poesy! Without doubt, in a brief time they will be making a tunnel through Parnassus! They will water their locomotives at the fount of Helicon!

Poesy, it is true, has been leading rather a city life of late, and has become somewhat sophisticated. She is more polished, but has lost somewhat of her moor and mountain freshness. But, however, she will have to abscond. She cannot exist in the state to which society is tending. She will have to take up her abode, as of yore, with the herdsmen in his hut and the shepherd in his shealing. She will have to pace the mugged glen, and climb the heath-clad hill, and be thankful that there are still uneven portions of ground of which surveys have not been made and levels taken.

But she will have to exist upon the sorrows and sufferings of the past. There will be no new materials of which she will be able to avail herself. True, there will be wholesale death and destruction enough, and consequently sorrow and suffering, but it will all come under the commonplace heads of "accidents" and "casualties." From her crags and peaks she will look down upon a mercenary and utilitarian generation who have forsaken her worship, and taken themselves almost exclusively to the manufacturing and boiling of huge kettles of water. She will see old ocean traversed by creatures all but independent of the elements, and voyages performed from distant land to land with the greatest facility and amidst the most derogatory comforts and conveniences—"Ah! the brave old voyagers!" she will exclaim.

And when she looks landward, how much will her prospects be bettered! She will perceive the verdant, undulating, and picturesque old world hacked and levelled in all directions—the smiling valley filled up, the gentle eminence cast down, the majestic mountain bored through, and the hoar forest, felled to the earth; and in her more sequestered and rural domains, in place of gazing complacently on some young votary—some incipient Burns, guiding his plough!

"In joy and glory on the mountain side,"

she will have the pleasure of witnessing a patent steam-ploughing machine stalking solitarily and monotonously over the furrows from the rising to the going down of the sun. And when the sun does go down, she will have reason to be thankful if instead of rosy-cheeked, light-hearted damsels "lilting" and milking the kine in the "gloaming," she does not chance to find wooden dairy-maids with wash-leather fingers officiating in their place!

It is well that the "Tempest," and the "Midsummer-Night's Dream," and such fine fancies have been secured to us. There would have been small chance of their being engendered or quickened into vitality amidst the fume and vapour of this generation. Everything must now be either lucrative or useful. Speed, profit, utility, and convenience are the idols of the age. The spiritual and visionary is trampled under foot as not paying sufficient interest for the capital invested; and were it not for the exertions of the missionaries, and the unflinching determination to discover the North Pole, we might well suppose that enthusiasm had vanished from the earth. Such men (the Pole-seekers and the missionaries) are the salt thereof, and are to be revered for their brave unworldliness and contempt for the beaten tracks of society. It will be one of the things to be envied in our prosaic times when the Arctic or Antarctic voyages succeed in their object, (as they will do,) startle the bears with their uproarious cheers, and feel at length

"They are the first, that ever burst
Into that silent sea!"

All other voyages are getting commonplace. The vague and remote corners of the world have been visited and eulogized. There are gun-shops in Otaheite; they drink London porter in Ceylon; and they have got a steamboat upon the waters of one of the rivers that ran through Eden!

This is not to be deprecated or found fault with, because it has resulted from the glorious spirit of enterprise; but it is plain and evident that we are getting too accurate a knowledge of our planet. There will be nothing left to dream about.

Oh! we are crammed with information—suffocated with facts and statistics.

So it is with discoveries and explorations. The topography of the earth is pretty well settled. Lake Tchad, and the river Niger, the interior of the country of convicts and kangaroos, with a portion of the Celestial Empire, alone are left to stimulate expiring curiosity. And if a gentleman, by any rare marvel has the good-fortune to find himself in a place that has never been visited before, he dare not entertain us with a few amusing incredibilities on his return, as his footsteps are sure to be followed the next year by whole parties of pic-nics. This is a hardship.

No—the days of Mendez de Pinto are gone—and for ever! The privileges of a traveller are extinct!

But to return to our improvement and conveniences. There is one thing morally certain, and that is, that our improvements will not improve us, and that our conveniences will be no comfort. We will deteriorate. Our bodies will dwindle—our minds will dwarf. The characters of our bold forefathers were formed by trial and tribulation—by rough and perilous adventure—by confidence in their individual energies—in the clear head, the true heart, and the strong arm. Everything now-a-days is performed by "Joint Stock Companies." In this mechanical age the spiritual portion of man is fast falling into desuetude; and as for the physical part of his apparatus, it will be so mused and pampered by small and manifold artificialities, that he will gradually lose the use of a great proportion of his faculties.

There are fearful indications that the time is fast approaching when a gentleman will have little else to do than sit with his feet on the fender and his hands in his pockets, watching the manoeuvres of a self-acting poker stirring a self-supplied fire.

And when that time arrives there will be a toss up between the man and the poker.

SKETCHES OF AMERICAN SCENERY.

THE VALLEY OF THE MERRIMAC.

BY CALLED CUSHING

NUMBER THREE.

Or the numerous lovely points of view in the fine old town of Newbury, where the beauties of hill and dale, of stream and land, of sky and ocean, are spread out beneath the eye, go with me to this, a gently rising hill by a bend of the Merrimac, with laurels and blue-bells bedecking its base and sides, and admire the exquisite prospect around you. To your left, on the opposite bank, is the village of Amesbury, relieved on the back-ground of Pow-wow Hill, the streamlet of the same name winding, like a silver thread, in the dell near at hand; behind you are the hills of Haverhill, Bradford, and West Newbury, vanishing into the horizon; to the right is a wide expanse of hill and valley and plain, rich in its waving corn-fields, and sprinkled with clumps of woodland, reaching northward into Byfield and Georgetown and Rowley; at your feet is the broad current of the Merrimac, meandering along between the steep pine-clad cliffs at Deer Isle, united by a bold bridge of chains stretched across the dizzy steep from Newbury to Salisbury; and before you, in the distance, is the long extent of Belleville and Newburyport, stretching on by the bank of the river to the sea—their white houses and church-spires looming up to the eye, amid their green trees and gardens—while the harbour, and the bright-sailed vessels winging their flight along the glittering surface of the water—the white towers of that long bridge spanning across it—and the yellow sands of Salisbury and Hampton Beach, and of Plum Island, with its lofty light-houses, cutting along like a line between the green meadows and the blue sea—are closed in to the east by the waters of the great Atlantic, with the sun just rising from its bosom, to add the feature of sublimity to a scene otherwise of unrivalled beauty and magnificence. Welcome to that glorious orb!

The sun! the sun! he mounts yon airy steep
Below the line that bounds the rolling deep!
The beauteous orient kindles at his face!
Fast fire the shades to give his glory place.
Day's herald-star, that lingered like a tear
On morn's dark eye-lash, as the sun draws near,
Sinks in her blushing cheek before his power,
Gone as a dew-drop buried in a flower.

Now his warm beams are twinkling on the waves,
Hail him, great ocean, from thy deepest caves!
Give thy grand organ's bold, majestic swell;
Send the glad mermaid from her pebbly cell,
Up the green islet in the soft, light air,
To hymn the sun, and spread her amber hair!
Bid all the dwellers in thy crystal coves
Come forth to greet him, through thy coral groves,
Lifting their various powers to catch the streams
Of morning glory pouring from his beaming brows.
Behold, he shines upon thy watery hills!
Thy deep green dells his flowing raiment fills.
Thy little billows from their cradles leap
For crowns of light; then play themselves to sleep.

Drear wast thou, ocean, to the lonely bark,
When brooding night sat on thee thick and dark,
While sound, nor shape, nor shadow from the shore,
Nor cheering ray, the pathless wastes stole o'er!
Then with thy rolling delirium thou seemest to be
A dismal, restless, round eternity.
Whose awful mysteries yet unopened lay;
Foretolden only by a fiery spray,
And deep, unearthly voices, as they came
All dissonant, in strangeness, all the same!
More solemn still, in this primeval night,
Before thy Maker said, "Let there be light."
For then no human fear—no human thought,
With fancy's colours, on the blackness wrought
The past or future: they were yet confined
To one clear present—the Eternal mind.

But now, transfigured by the radiant sun,
Thy face is brightness from that glorious one.
Thy mighty heart with a thee seems to burn,
With rapture glowing, at his blest return.
Touched by the rays that played on Memnon's lyre,
Thy voices melt to music with their fire,
For higher, holier notes than this, to be Poured in the noble anthems of the sea.

Hail! thou great luminary! Sun, all hail!
Pure type of his unbounded light and love,
Who fills the earth, and all the world above
How great, how good, how glorious must he be
Who gives his brightness shadowed forth in thee!
Sun in thy beauty, ocean in thy might—
Winds in your freedom—heavens in your height—
Dark must the spirit be, the vision dim,
That could not here look through you all to Him!

How many a memory lingers in how many a spot of all which that hill-side view exhibits to the eye! There, in that green wood, shall the soul have music which no art can minister:

FOREST MUSIC.

There's a sad loneliness about my heart—
A deep, deep solitude the spirit feels
Amid this multitude. The things of art
Fall on the senses—from its pargantry
My weary eye turns off; and my ear shrinks
From the harsh dissonance that fills the air.
My soul is growing sick—I will away
And gather balm from a sweet forest walk!
There, as the breezes through the branches sweep,
I hear aerial minstrelsy, like hurys
Untouched, unseen, that on the spirit's ear
Pour out their numbers till they fall to peace
The tumult of the bosom. There's a voice
Of music in the rustling of the leaves:
And the green boughs are hung with living lutes,
Whose strings will only vibrate to his hand
Who made them, while they sound his untaught praise!
The whole wild wood is one vast instrument
Of thousand, thousand keys; and all its notes
Come in sweet harmony, while Nature plays
To celebrate the presence of her God!—H. F. GOULD.

And there again is a sheltered vale, which tells of the careless hours of childhood:

MY OWN WILD BOWER.

I stood in the halls where wealth and state
Their glittering robes displayed;
Vice, Vanity, Folly, Ambition and Hate
Assembled in masquerade.
From the trappings of fashion, the pomp of pride,
The wiles and deceit of art,
A child of nature, I turned aside,
With a chilled and sickening heart.
I sighed to return to the hill and the glen,
The scenes of my earliest hours—
To breathe in my native air again,
As it swept through the sweet wild flowers
I longed to recline on the violet bed,
Close down by the murmuring stream,
Where oft I have pillowed my infant head,
And sunk in a blissful dream.

Then my moments of life were rapid and bright
As the rivulet sparkling there;
And the hearts that surrounded me true as light,
And pure as the woodland air.

The velvet couch and the gilded hall,
Gay vicinas of pomp and power,
Art, fashion and show, I would give you all
For a seat in my own wild bower!

And yet another of riper days, beyond that graveyard of the old time, and that church, with its tall spire pointing the beholder's eye to heaven, where the meadows slope off to the river's bank and the sea, the fit scene of the following:

THE SABBATH BELL.

How sweetly, through the lengthened dell,
Where wintry airs are mild and clear,
Fleets chiming up the sabbath bell,
In softened echoes to the ear!
"Come, gentle neighbours, come away!"
So doth the welcome summons say;
"Come, friends and kindred, 'tis the time!"
So seems to peal the sabbath chime.

Done are the week's debasing cares;
And worldly ways and worldly will;
And earth itself an aspect wears
Like heaven, so bright, so pure, so still!
Hark, how by turns, each mellow note,
Now low, now louder, seems to float,
And falling, with the wind's decay,
Like softest music dies away!

"And now," it says, "where heaven resorts,
Come, with a meek and quiet mind;
Oh, worship in these earthly courts,
But leave your earth-born thoughts behind."
And, neighbours, while the sabbath bell
Peals slowly up the winding dell,
Come, friends and kindred, let us share
The sweet and holy rapture there.—G. LUNT.

And that other, where a green carpet of verdure, by the rocks, overhangs the river, the scene of the following:

THE GROUND LAUREL.

I love thee, pretty nursing
Of vernal sun and rain;
For thou art Flora's firstling,
And leadest in her train.
When far away I found thee,
It was an April morn;
The chilling blast blew round thee;
No bud had decked the thorn.

And thou alone wert hiding
The mossy rocks between,
Where, just below them gliding,
The Merrimack was seen.

And while my hand was brushing
The sear leaves from thee,
It seemed that thou wert blushing
To be disclosed to me.

So modest, fair and fragrant,
Where all was wild and rude,
To cheer the lonely migrant
Who crossed thy solitude.—H. F. GOULD.

Or that other, by the Mall, and its grass-bounded pond, as the twilight of a fair summer's day dissolves in the dews of evening, to walk and muse, and study "the bright leaves of the poetry of heaven."

TO THE EVENING STAR.

O bright and beautiful, that all alone,
Sitt'st queenlike on the deep blue arch of even,
And seem'st thyself a drop of golden heaven,
Before the stars surround thy burning throne;
Lo, if the lady of my love be now
Gazing upon thy beauty, be, O star,
The mirror of my heart, and from afar
Let her behold my truth, and from her brow
Fair as thyself, and from her soft blue eye
(Like heaven new lighted by a summer moon)
And from her pure young heart bring me a boon,
A token of her love; so shall no sigh
Or tear disturb my peace, but I will rest
Content until once more I fold her to my breast.—G. LUNT.

Or if sea-side musings be the rather attract:

HAMPTON BEACH.

Again upon the sounding shore,
And oh how blest, again alone!
I could not bear to hear thy roar,
Thy deep, thy long majestic tone;
I could not bear to think that one
Could view with me thy swelling might,
And like a very stock or stone,
Turn coldly from the glorious sight,
And seek the idle world, to hate and fear and fight

Thou art the same, eternal sea!
The earth hath many shapes and forms,
Of hill and valley, flower and tree;
Fields that the ferid noonday warms,
Or winter's rugged gage deforms,
Or bright with autumn's golden store:
Thou coverest up thy face with storms,
Or smil'st serene,—but still thy roar
And dashing foam go up to vex the sea-beat shore

I see thy heaving waters roll,
I hear thy stem uplifted voice,
And trumpet-like upon my soul
Falls the deep music of thy noise
Wherewith thou dost thyself rejoice;

The ships, that on thy bosom play,
Thou dashest them about like toys,
And stranded navies are thy prey,
Strown on thy rock-bound coast, torn by the whirling spray.

As summer twilight soft and calm,
Or when in stormy grandeur drest,
Peals up to heaven the eternal psalm,
That swells within thy boundless breast;
Thy curling waters have no rest,
By day and night, the ceaseless throng
Of waves that wait thy high behest,
Speak out in utterance deep and strong,
And loud the craggy beach howls back their savage song.

Terrible art thou in thy wrath,—
Terrible in thine hour of gloe,
When the strong winds, upon their path,
Bound o'er thy breast tumultuously,
And about their chorus loud and free
To the sad sea-bird's mournful wail,
As heaving with the heaving sea,
The broken mast and shattered sail
Tell of thy cruel strength the lamentable tale.

Ay, 'tis indeed a glorious sight
To gaze upon thine ample face;
An awful joy,—a deep delight!
I see thy laughing waves embrace
Each other in their frolic race;
I sit above the flashing spray,
That foams around this rocky base,
And, as the bright blue waters play,
Feel that my thoughts, my life, perchance are vain as they.

This is thy lesson, mighty sea!
Man calls the dimpled earth his own,
The flowery vale, the golden sea;
And on the wild gray mountain-stone
Claims nature's temple for his throne!
But where thy many voices sing
Their endless song, the deep, deep tone
Calls back his spirit's airy wing,
He shrinks into himself, where God alone is king!—G. LUNT.

And again.

SEA-SIDE MUSINGS.

O, let me go down, all alone,
And sit by the side of the sea!
The sounds of its voice give my spirit a tone,
That hushes her murmur, and quiets her moan,
Till woes that have pierced me are dreams that have flown,
Or drowned in the glory to be.

Each billow, that mounts to my sight,
And sinks for another to rise,
Adoring its God, in its moment of light,
And owning his power in its fulness of might,
To him gives a smile by a gleam from its height,
And calls on his name as it dies.

He holds the wild waters! they curl
And sing in his hand to my heart:
The gems they roll o'er points my thoughts to the pearl,
Which clasping, my spirit her pinions would fur,
To rest where no blast of the tempest can hurl
The soul and her treasure apart.

My wishes, that vainly would roam
And fasten on bubbles of air,
Are chid by the wave—by the hiss of the foam,
And drop of the spray!—they are hiding me home!
Home, to my country beyond the blue dome!
My Father's bright mansion is there.—H. F. GOULD.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

SPIRIT OF THE PARISIAN JOURNALS.

Translated for the New York Mirror.

RECOLLECTIONS OF TALMA.

TALMA was but only nine years old, and I seven, when we entered the school of M. Lamaignière, at Chaillot. Talma had just returned to France from London, where his father practiced as a dentist. Our teacher was passionately fond of the drama, and used to make us rehearse parts of good tragedies and comedies every season. The second year we were there, a tragedy was got up, called The Son of Tamerlane. The young tragedian performed his part with great applause. As for myself, a severe fit of sickness prevented my performing my character, which was that of a Mogul general, who had, in all, about thirty lines to deliver, and deprived me of the pleasure of boasting that, for once at least, I had played with the greatest of actors. The instinct of the stage was already so marked in him, that, at the age of twelve, he composed a short play, in which our teacher saw indications of decided talent.

After we left school, I was separated from him for some time. When I saw him again, he was eighteen years of age, and had already the reputation of being one of the most pleasing young men in Paris. His figure was fine, his manners elegant without stiffness, his wit ready, his mind well stored with various information, he had besides a pleasing voice, sang with much taste, and was well read in the literature of France and England. No wonder that he was well received. His friends feared, indeed, that he would be led to neglect serious pursuits and give himself up to a life of pleasure. He was intended by his family for his father's profession, that of a dentist, and he pursued his studies with docility, yet with indifference. Under these circumstances we thought that it would be of service to him to revive his fondness for the drama, as a means of giving employment to his mind, and preventing his degenerating into a mere man of pleasure. We used to take him with us to the Théâtre Français, especially when standard tragedies were performed. It was the play of Edipe that first incited his passion for the stage. Lauvé performed the hero, and was rapturously applauded. Talma alone did not share in the general enthusiasm. When the play was over, he merely said, "He does not understand the part. If it was mine, I should play it very differently." The very next day he communicated to an old friend his desire of adopting the stage as a profession. This step was a painful one to him. With all his seductive qualities, his principles were high, and his religious sentiments strong. He was, therefore, agreeably surprised when he heard himself—not blamed, but encouraged. "It is much better," said his judicious friend, "to be a good actor, than to run the risk you do now, of leading the miserable existence of an idle man of pleasure." Encouraged by this advice, he studied some subordinate characters, and soon announced to us that he was to make his first appearance in the character of Scide in Mahomet. He told us—"You must all of you come and see me, for I depend chiefly upon your judgment. You are familiar with the stage, and can tell whether I comprehend my part, and produce any effect on the audience. Unless you think I have in me the materials of a great actor, I will stop, for I am not willing to be lost in the ordinary crowd. I ask of you then, as my friends, to tell me frankly, whether you think, that by time and study, I can raise myself to the first rank. Your opinion will decide my future career in life."

We all went to see our friend's début, about the end of 1783, if I remember rightly. His success was unexampled. Unluckily, however, we were not of the same opinion with the audience. We came there, in fact, with a prejudice against Talma, arising from the vivid recollection of his great predecessors. His acting produced no impression on us; we remained cold and unmoved: and when we met to compare opinions, after the play, we agreed unanimously, "that Talma had all the qualities necessary to success, except the most important one, the inspired fire of genius." This opinion was made known to him with all the frankness he had insisted on. Talma, mortified, but placing too much confidence in our judgment, and sincere in the want of self-confidence he had expressed, gave up all idea of the stage, and resumed his studies as a dentist.

Three years elapsed before I saw Talma again. In the latter part of 1787, happening to meet his cousin, I learned that he had been induced by the advice of several distinguished actors, to appeal from our sentence of condemnation and pursue again the theatrical career. He was to make his first re-appearance that very evening. I must confess, that I was sorry to hear this. I felt a sincere friendship for my old schoolfellow, and as I feared the result, I determined not to be present. After a few days, hearing his acting highly praised by the best judges, I resolved to see him. This time, there was no coldness or indifference on my part. I soon recognized the "inspired fire of genius." After the play was over, I went into his box. When he saw me, he made an exclamation indicative of uneasiness. I saw that he was thinking of our former ill-judged condemnation. Grasping his hands, I congratulated him most warmly on his success, but he still seemed to doubt my sincerity; at last I told him—"You know me well, and may be certain that I should not have called on you unless I could offer you perfectly sincere congratulations." These anecdotes may seem trivial, but I mention them to show the candour, simplicity and honesty of his character.

The affection constantly shown towards him by Napoleon is well known. The tragedian had known, loved and even obliged him, when he was only General Bonaparte. Talma told me one day, that he had been invited to breakfast with the emperor the morning after he had appeared, by his orders, in the Death of Pompey.

"You played the part of Cæsar very well," he said, "but on his entrance, where he says to Pompey,

"Know'st thou not Cæsar, to accost him thus?"

you gave him the tone of an orator at one of the clubs. You should remember that Cæsar had nothing of the Jacobin about him, that he was speaking in the presence of his officers, and that what he said was official." Then getting warm, added—"Besides, what such people say (Cæsar, Mahomet and myself) is always so different from what they think!"

When passing to the actor who played Ptolemy, he criticised his manner, blaming him for having given too contemptible a character to the part.

"I know very well," said he, "that Cornelle does not make the prince too very elevated language—he offers Cæsar his crown—he believes himself forced to do it; but even with his humble language, there ought to be a certain air of dignity about him. He is a monarch, and a monarch, whatever he says, is always dignified in attitude and expression."

The play reminded him of the Egyptian expedition. In the course of conversation, he mentioned, that when he first set foot on that celebrated shore, which had been trodden by Alexander and Cæsar, looking down at the sand, he saw something lying in it. Picking it up, he noticed with surprise, that it was an antique cameo, and that the head upon it was a striking likeness of himself.

PETTY DEBTS.

Make two large debts sooner than one small one. These petty, trifling, clamorous, troublesome, vexatious little debts, crush them in the egg, my dear young friends; despise them, defy them, pay them! In point of fact, these debts have no real existence. They slip through your fingers like an eel, just when you think you have hold of them—when you want to discharge them, your purse, the moment before well filled, is suddenly found to be empty. There is something supernatural about it! Happy is the man that can make petty debts with impunity, thrive happy he who makes none!

From these petty debts arise daily thousands of ingenious expedients, sublime sacrifices, stoic privations.

For instance, most young men of the present day, rich or poor, have no money for the necessities of life, while they always have enough to waste on its most frivolous indulgences. They are lavish of everything that is got on credit, saving of all that must be paid for in cash. Thus a student or a fashionable man about town, or any other spendthrift, takes far greater care of his hat than of his coat.

There is logic in this. The enormous profits of the tailor make him in his very essence a crediting tradesman, while the small gains of the hatter make him the most obstinate of all dealers for cash only. Many a young man offers to the admiring eyes of the fair dazling waistcoats, overpowering cravats, diamond shirt-pins, a whole shop-window of jewelry, who, very probably, has no stockings on. There is a reason for this too. The hatter don't trust.

You are walking, one balmy summer's evening, with the pretty widow hanging on your arm, who is soon to make you a present of her fair hand, with all the lands, houses, tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereto appertaining. While you are talking about love and happiness, and also about economy and a well-regulated household, a gaunt hideous monster crosses your path. He has something wrapped up in a coloured handkerchief, which he thrusts at you. It is your tailor—and his bill. Farewell, to the fair hand of the pretty widow, with all the lands, houses, tenements, etc.

To sum up all in one word—run in debt for a hundred thousand francs sooner than for a hundred.

POOR KINGS.

Alas! for the good old days when the dignity of the king was worth having! when there were no newspapers, no opposition, no discussions on the budget! Then, monarch and people had but one purse between them, which the latter took care to fill, and the first to empty—an agreeable division of labour. No popular movements, no petitions, no insurrections! If trouble arose, it passed over in silence, and some fine morning the old oaks of Plessis were seen with a crop of insurgents hanging at their branches instead of acorns. Alas, for the good old times! Then, my dear friends, then it would have been a fine thing to be a king! what a glorious one I should have made! I would have been as brave and generous as the good Henry IV., who is praised as a model of honour and openness, and who changed his religion twice; first for fear, afterwards to save his crown, and who wanted to set all Europe by the ears because his cousin, the prince of Condé, would not give up his wife to him. I should have been as magnificent as the great Louis XIV., who governed France for sixty years, and was governed himself by Colbert, Louvois, Madame de Maintenon, and his confessor, and whose statue we see crowned with laurel, because he gained twenty battles, while all the time he never went outside the walls of Versailles. These halcyon days are gone, never to return. Kingship is but a poor trade now-a-days. Once the people knelt before their king, now the king bows low to the people. Poor creatures, how I pity you! Rain or shine, you must stand with hats off, smiling and bowing, as your sovereign throws up his cap, and utters his greasy hurrahs. Don't be impatient, it will be over in five hours, or so, only five hours of smiling and bowing, and then you shall have permission to go home and get your dinners, and exclaim, as did England's young queen, unused as yet to the miseries of royalty, "Oh, mother, mother, thank heaven it's over!"

I regret it, with all sincerity. I love monarchs: I view them with pity and respect, as unhappy beings, branded by destiny, and condemned to live in splendour, on the charity of the public. I accordingly never meet a king, but I bestow on him the aims of a bow or a hurrah. Kings or queens, absolute, legitimists, chartist and constitutional, I embrace them all in my affection. I hear, all around me, the same cuckoo complaints of despotism, ambition, treachery. "Why don't he dismiss his ministers?" screams one. "Why don't he follow the advice of the opposition?" yells another. You are right, gentlemen, no doubt; the ministry might be a better one; but—was it never your own luck to have careless or awkward servants! The opposition gave most excellent advice, I admit, which was not followed; but do you always follow the advice of your wife, the standing domestic opposition! Allow a monarch to be mistaken sometimes; remember that he is a man, after all, and that the walls of a palace are four or five feet thick, so that it is hard for them to hear what is going on out of doors. Witness poor Charles X., who was very coolly playing whist on the evening of the twenty-eighth July, without suspecting that his crown had been just knocked off his head. I repeat these arguments continually, but without effect; so that all I can do is to conamine to pity monarchs; especially when I remember that it is not their fault if they are so.

His a poor actor, if you will, a hesitating counsellor, a deaf man that plays on the piano: I have no objection; the poor feels close to be actors, lawyers, or musicians; but it is not so with a king. Chance chose him; even if he is deaf and dumb, he must make speeches, and act the king; if he happens to be a fool—which may very well be the case—it is ten times worse for him. Twenty trumpets—that is, twenty newspapers—proclaim, every morning, to the whole world, all his sacred majesty's follies, and fifty post-coaches start off at full speed, every morning, to spread the news. Better be a cow-herd or a country squire! To think that your most trifling actions will survive you, engraved on tablets of brass—that your name will go down to posterity with the epithet of simple or cruel attached to it—that your vices, your faults, and your absurdities will one day form a part of a common school education, and that little boys will be flogged to the end of time, for not learning them by heart—that your successors will found colleges, in order to teach them to youth, and that an antiquary will one day be made a member of the academy for having brought to light one of your previously undiscovered failings. Who would not weep to think that it might have been his lot to have been a king himself!

If all the monarchs of the world could live their lives over again, I am much mistaken if they would not, every man, choose some other mode of existence. Charles V. would be a watchmaker, his son a sexton, Louis XV. a cook, another, perhaps, a blacksmith, like my honest neighbour Pierre, whose ringing hammer awakens me every morning before cock-crowing. Let no one be offended at the comparison. Pierre is an excellent man, and a capital workman, only he is a little jealous, and quick to anger. Yesterday I heard an unusual noise in the shop—I regret to say it, but Pierre was beating his wife. All the neighbours put their heads out of the windows; but everything was soon quiet again, and went on happily; and even the very gossips of the neighbourhood had forgotten the blacksmith and his quarrel. Happy man, happy condition! where anger is but a transient flash, and a piece of scandal forgotten in a moment.

Let a king beat his wife once, and you shall see.

Poor kings! poor kings!

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

PARISIAN ON DITS.

SOME persons have spoken of inviting the king to a fete in the galleries of the wooden edifice in which the exhibition of the products of French industry has taken place. The difficulties in the way of this intention are two-fold—arising, first, from the unwillingness of the exhibitors to invite his majesty; and next, from their determination of speaking, should the banquet take place, on the actual wants and position of French industry. As yet, a vote of thanks has merely been passed to the magistrates of the Hôtel de Ville for the kindness of raising a wooden edifice, which is to remain in existence but sixty days. It is proposed now to erect a large and handsome structure at the expense of the state. It ought to be divided into sections for the various objects of industry, and the passages would serve for a promenade during the brief season of winter sports. I think it exceedingly probable that this plan will eventually be carried into effect.

The new hobby of the Parisians is the improved malle-postes. For the last fortnight a crowd of well-dressed persons is collected in the court of the hotel from whence they start. They are lighter carriages in their construction than the former rough machines, and are very elegantly fitted up inside. The imperial is removed, and the numerous robberies, which formerly took place so easily during the noisy progress of the vehicle, will now be prevented. They are of a deep brown colour, are drawn by four horses, and have a postilion with a large coat, in place of the jacket hitherto worn. This appears to be anything but an improvement. There are looking-glasses in the interior, and a deep seat, with arms, is softly spread for the traveller. Four of the great public roads of France have been provided with these new carriages, and similar ones will speedily be ready for the other four roads.

Paris is now perfectly quiet, notwithstanding that the trial of the prisoners may be said to have terminated. The inhabitants are opposed to more blood-shedding. Sometimes a single fact paints the physiognomy of a city more than a laboured description. Let us give an example of what I mean—Last week, at Tirol, and at the Jardin-Turc, fireworks were let off, and in the crowd of the display several reports as loud as that of a musket took place. Well, in ten minutes the whole city, inhabitants, police, garrison, and Garde Nationale, were on the alert; rumours of émeutes immediately began to fly about, and half the world would not believe that the other half were unharmed. Since then the fireworks are ordered to go off without noise. The Comte de Paris is a remarkably stout fellow—the latest refinement introduced into his bringing up, is to place in his nursery cherry-trees growing in large cases, that he may gather them himself whenever he pleases. He shows great aptitude, it is said, at this ingenious pastime.

The annual meeting of the Orphéon took place since my last at the Sorbonne. This is the union of the fifty schools for singing, which have sprung up under the paternal guidance of M. Willem. Singing is now part of the system of instruction given at the Paris schools; and if a doubt exists of the possibility of making musicians of illiterate workmen or children, the exhibitions at the annual meeting would set the matter at rest. There were about four hundred children present last week and two hundred men. The latter were common workmen, and the former the children of the poor. Yet they sang admirably the music of Cherubini, Spontini, Boieldieu, and Carafa. Two pieces of M. Willem's composition were exceedingly applauded; one La Romanesca, a piece of the sixteenth century, and the other a barcarole, forming a solo and chorus. The lad who gave the solo has a voice of wonderful flexibility and power. His name is Montmaud, and he is the son of a labourer. The sale of the Sorbonne was crowded, and the applause was most enthusiastic. As I am speaking of music I may mention that you are shortly to have in London an M. Petosa, who is the projector of a musical lottery, by means of which he asserts, any person, though not knowing a note of music, may compose four hundred thousand quadrilles and one hundred thousand waltzes. This gentleman, during an exile of seven years in Siberia, invented this lottery, formed of five hundred and seventy-six fragments of musical measures, each differing from the other. They are enclosed in a box, and the even numbers, destined to compose quadrilles, are red, whilst the odd ones, intended for waltzes, are black. These pieces are taken out by chance, and are arranged according to the letters on the back, on a desk marked A, B, C, etc. They, when thus arranged, form a piece. As the projector is about to proceed to London, you will probably hear more of this strange plan.

We have had three new pieces here this week, but not one of them is worth remark, except to speak of their excessive stupidity. Yet M. de Rougemont, the author of one of them, Il faut que jeunesse se passe, is decidedly a man of talent. Indeed he showed it, in getting his piece performed at the Théâtre Français. How the good judges, generally found at that theatre, could allow themselves to be imposed on by this stupid piece, is inconceivable. They excuse themselves by saying that the author read so well, that the piece seemed excellent.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Travels in North America, during the years 1834, 1835, and 1836. Including a summer residence with the Pawnee tribe of Indians, and a visit to Cuba and the Azore islands." By the Hon. Charles Augustus Murray. In two volumes. New-York: Harper and Brothers.

ALREADY has this work been received in a most flattering manner by the American public. We like it; not because it presents a favourable view of our people and their institutions, but because it is truly an interesting book—a fair and candid transcript of the author's adventures and impressions. There is an absence of that carping and feeble spirit, that preposterous assumption of superiority, which characterise the works of Hamilton and Marryat. The author does not introduce a sneer for the sake of giving piquancy to a sentence or truckling to the senseless prejudices of a great mass of his countrymen. He writes with the candour, impartiality and sincerity of a young man whose vision is clear and unobscured. There is nothing like bigotry or egotism in his speculations. His style is florid and animated, and many of his descriptions are remarkably spirited. We cheerfully make room for a few extracts, at the same time recommending the work to our readers as rich in entertaining matter:

A PAWNEE DANDY DESCRIBED.

I have seen some dandies in my life—English, Scotch, French, German, say, and American dandies too; but none of them can compare with the vanity or coxcombry of the Pawnee dandy. Lost any of the gentry claiming the distinction, and belonging to the abovementioned nations, should doubt or feel aggrieved at this assertion, I will faithfully narrate what passed constantly before my eyes in our own tent, namely, the manner in which So-ri-ta-tah-shi's son passed the days on which there was no buffalo hunt. He began his toilet, about eight in the morning, by greasing and smoothing his whole person with fat, which he rubbed afterwards perfectly dry, only leaving the skin sleek and glossy; he then painted his face vermillion, with a stripe of red also along the centre of the crown of the head; he then proceeded to his "coiffure," which required great attention, although the quantum of hair demanding such care was limited, inasmuch as the head was shaved close, except one tuft at the top, from which hung two painted "tresses." (Why must I call them "pig-tails"? He then filled his ears, which were bored in two or three places, with rings and wampum, and hung several strings of beads round his ears, sometimes painting the stripes of vermillion and yellow upon his breast and shoulders, and placing "armlets above his elbows, and rings upon his fingers, he proceeded to adorn the nether man with a pair of moccasins, some scarlet cloth leggings fastened to his waist-belt, and bound round below the knee with garters of beads four inches long. Being so prepared, he drew out his mirror, fitted in a small wooden frame, (which he always, whether hunting or at home, carried about his person), and commenced a course of self-examination, such as the severest disciple of Watts, Mason, or any other religious moralist, never equalled. Nay more, if I were not afraid of offending the softer sex by venturing to bring man in comparison with them in an occupation which is considered so peculiarly their own, I would assert that no female creation of the poets, from the time that Eve first saw "that smooth water image," till the polished toilet of the lovely Belinda, ever studied her own reflected self with more perseverance or satisfaction than this Pawnee youth. I have repeatedly seen him sit for above an hour at a time, examining his face in every possible position and expression; now frowning like Homer's Jove, before a thunder-storm; now like the same god, described by Milton, "smiling with superior love;" now slightly varying the streaks of paint upon his cheek and forehead, and then pushing or pulling "each particular hair" of his eyebrows into its most becoming place! His toilet thus arranged to his satisfaction, one of the women or children led his buffalo horse before the tent, and he proceeded to "eck" his steed by painting his forehead, neck and shoulders, with stripes of vermillion, and sometimes twisted a few feathers into his hair. He then put into his mouth an old-fashioned bridle, bought or stolen from the Spaniards, from the bit of which hung six or eight steel chains, about nine inches long; while some small bells, attached to the reins, and sometimes to the neck of the animal, were rung as musical as those of the lovely "Sonnette," in the incomparable tales of Comte Hamilton. All things being now ready for the promenade, he threw a scarlet mantle over his shoulders; thrust his mirror in below his belt, took in one hand a large fan of wild goose feathers, to shield his fair and delicate complexion from the sun; while a whip hung from his wrist, having the handle studded with brass nails. Thus accoutred, he mounted his jingling palfrey, and ambled through the encampment, envied by all the youths less gay in attire, attracting the gaze of the unfortunate drudges who represent the gentler sex, and admired supremely by himself.

COURTSHIP AMONG THE PAWNEES.

When the lover wishes to break the ice, he comes to her father's tent, uninvited, and sits on the corner of the mat for a considerable time, and then goes away without speaking. This is the preliminary step, answering, perhaps, to the first gentle pressure of the hand—the first blushing hesitation in address—the first mutual glance of understanding. After a few days the young man returns wearing his buffalo-robe with the hair outward, and again sits down silent in the corner of the tent. This is a proposal—a request for the "popping of the question." If the father is determined to reject him, nothing is placed for him to sit on, and no meat is offered him; but if he approve of the match, these rights of hospitality are observed. Feasts are then given by the respective parties, in order to obtain the consent of their relatives. If both feasts terminate favourably in this respect, the younger ones are now successively admitted a right to marry all the young men presents himself once before his bride at the door of her tent, and then turns round and walks slowly off towards his own—she rises and follows him—the marriage is then complete. If she remains sitting, it is a sign that her family decline the match. All this is done without a word passing between the intended bride and husband that is to be. But the most extraordinary part of the affair is, that having married an elder sister, a younger one has a right to marry all the younger ones as they successively attain the age of womanhood. The author adds, "I have seen several chiefs who have in this manner married a whole family; the eldest wife being the greatest drudge, and the youngest being generally the favourite Sultana, and consequently doing the least work."

The first volume of Mr. Dunlap's long-expected "History of New-York," has been issued. We shall notice it in our next.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We publish to-day an extract from a new American novel, soon to be published by the Messrs. Hargree, entitled "Martin's Hope." It will, if we are not mistaken, be very popular.—Ours "Thoughts on Literary Men" shall have a place.—A correspondent, whose address we have lost, is informed that we cannot pay for selections.—The verses by "H. T. P." were put on file for a season. If not published his request shall be attended to.—The verses to Miss Poole are very good, but hardly worthy of the subject.—"C's" criticism on Miss Maymood's performance is quite out of date. It would have answered a month ago.—"J's" "Walk on the Battery" is a little too long. We fear that its readers would be quite as much fatigued as we.—A correspondent inquires if any further communications from the "Academy and Properties" of the Park Theatre have been received. No. We suspect they are too far gone to write.—We have not seen the work criticised by "X." We do not doubt it is very good, but would like to have some evidence of the fact. The annual put forth by the same publishers are well deserving of all that "X" says in their behalf.—We shall have no occasion for the contributions of "Phiz," "Y. R. L. N. R." and "Rockaway."—"Sister Theresa," which will be found on the first page, is copied from the Boston "Tribune and Atlantic Souvenir," for 1840.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1839.

John Bull and Brother Jonathan.—A writer in Blackwood's Magazine, for August, commences his lucubrations with the following compliment to the good people this side of the great pond: "When we told you, some few months back, O gentle reader! that, (to borrow a phrase from Brother Jonathan, about the only thing, by the way, which our occidental relatives possess worth the lending,) beyond all the beasts of the field, a dog 'went a-head' in our affections, we intimated, at the same time, that our heart" (should you not have said your head!) "had many corners for many other animals." If the intelligent person who gives utterance to this philosophic remark as to the poverty of our resources, will but look at Bentley's Miscellany for the last year, and other British periodicals, he will find that some of his countrymen have practically shown their dissent from his opinion. Nearly one-fourth of the articles in many of these literary journals are made up of pieces "borrowed," without credit, from the New-York Mirror, the Knickerbocker, and other American works. Now we do not object to being robbed by England of our literary productions, so long as this country returns the compliment, with interest; but we do enter our protest against being-insulted for our poverty, at the same time that we are plundered, and compelled to see our pilferers flaunting in "borrowed" finery. Fair play is a jewel, Mr. Bull.

Andon, the ornithologist.—We learn that it is the intention of this distinguished artist and ornithologist to enter upon a new field of investigation, and that he will shortly commence a history of the quadrupeds of this country—very copious and elaborate data for such a work having already been obtained by him in the course of his other labours and researches. We learn from the Gazette, that Mr. Andon, who is now in the city, has in his possession the original drawings of all the plates in his magnificent work upon the birds of America. They are said to be as much superior to the coloured engravings as any other original picture is to the copies from it, however able and faithfully taken. We agree with our contemporary, that Mr. Andon neither does justice to himself nor to his countrymen if he refuses to permit these masterpieces to be publicly exhibited.

New painting of the Queen by an American.—A letter from a friend in London says: "You may have heard, ere this, that your countryman, Leslie, is engaged upon a picture of the coronation of Victoria. No sooner did the queen hear of his intention than she ordered a room to be assigned him in the palace, and extended all the facilities which could promote his object. The artist has chosen a most felicitous position for his principal figure—taking her at the moment when the sunshine streamed in upon her person, and played upon the splendid jewels of the crown. The queen has even complimented the artist so far as to order the picture for herself, in anticipation, telling him to fix his own price. Of course, out of regard to her majesty, Leslie ought to put a high valuation upon her picture."

The Madison papers.—We learn from the National Intelligencer, that this valuable work will be published early in November. Much unexpected delay has been occasioned by the state of the manuscript, and the necessity of explaining many allusions familiarly made, at the time of writing, by Mr. Madison, but which a lapse of sixty years had rendered obscure. Mr. H. D. Gilpin, the Solicitor of the Treasury, to whose superintendence the work was committed by the committee of Congress, has taken much pains to elucidate these passages, having added some hundreds of notes in explanation of the text. Mr. Sparks, also, has lent his assistance for the same object. The work is all stereotyped, and will make three volumes instead of two, as originally announced. It is printed in a large and handsome type, and will be got up altogether in a style worthy of the subject.

A new and beautiful song.—On our fourth page will be found an original poem, by Miss Eliza Cook, an English lady, whose productions are making their way wherever the English language is spoken. It forcibly reminds us of Mackay's "Wind of the Winter Night," with which it will bear a not unfavourable comparison. It has been set to music by William L. Phillips, and will be sung by Mr. Giubeli, and published by Messrs. Davis and Horn, 367 Broadway.

Miss Sterling.—This accomplished pianist has removed to No. 7 Carroll Place, Bleeker street, where she continues to receive pupils in music.

The Park and Fidelity.—Notwithstanding the universal cry of "hard times," the theatres do not appear to share in the depression. Never, since the appearance of the elder Keen, (if we except the occasion of the benefit given to Mr. Simpson in September last,) has the Park presented so much sterling attraction and genuine talent upon the same evening. So great has been the array of stars, that the services of a portion of the stock company appear to have been dispensed with. Mrs. Martyn, Miss Pool, Mr. Manvers, Mr. Martyn, Mr. and Mrs. Giubeli, and Mons. and Madame Taglioli—a noble opera and a brilliant ballet on the same evening—is certainly an attraction of no ordinary character, and deserves to be noted as an epoch in the theatricals in New-York. The opera of Fidelity, by Beethoven, has been performed in a manner highly creditable to the skill of all concerned in its production. Mrs. Martyn, in one of the most difficult parts in the whole range of the operatic drama, showed powers fully adequate to her task, and won the admiration of all the judicious lovers of music. The scene, which she executes in the second act, was delivered with wonderful effect and sweetness. Mr. Giubeli, though the part of Pizarro was a most ungracious one, and the opportunities for display were limited, gave the audience a very favourable idea of his powers, and was warmly applauded. His personal appearance is remarkably fine. Miss Pool is, we do not doubt, destined to become a favourite. She plays the part of "Marcelline" with inimitable archness and grace, and her vocal powers are of a superior description. We hope to see her in a part more worthy of her versatile talents. Mr. Manvers, the tenor, made a decided hit in the part of Florestano. We never listened to a burst of applause more spontaneous and flattering, than that which greeted him after his execution of the exquisite solo at the beginning of the third act. Mr. Martyn acquitted himself very acceptably, and was spirited and correct throughout. In noticing the performers in Fidelity, we should not omit to mention that Mr. Placide, by his admirable personation of the aged prisoner, in the chorus in the jail-yard, drew tears from many an eye by the silent pathos of his movements. It was a most artist-like picture. Mr. Edwin is also deserving of mention. The parts allotted to him were sung in good taste and with clearness and precision. If the decision of those, whose musical attainments entitle their opinions to respect, be correct, Fidelity has triumphed signally.

Charles Keen.—After an absence of seven years from the country where his earliest laurels were won, Mr. Charles Keen has returned, backed by an European reputation, and appeared several nights at the National Theatre. His first appearance was in the part of Hamlet, and though evidently labouring under extreme hoarseness, he proved to the satisfaction of all, that report had not exaggerated his merits. We have not witnessed so spirited and impressive a delineation of the character since the days of his father. The new readings which he introduced, were, in general, judicious and apposite. His delivery of the soliloquy was quite successful, and he produced a startling effect in the scene where he starts up from the feet of Ophelia, upon the discovery of his uncle's emotion. The whole performance was loudly cheered throughout, and at the fall of the curtain Mr. Keen was called for, and made a pertinent address. In Othello and Sir Giles Overreach, Mr. Keen developed new powers, and gave additional indications of that high histrionic genius which he has nurtured by assiduous practice and study. The tempestuous scenes in the last act of the latter play were rendered with extraordinary effect. The manner in which he sprang across the stage with every limb quivering, when he gives the lie to Wellborn, was a most thrilling piece of acting. Indeed, the whole scene was infinitely fine. We regret that Mr. Keen has been prevented from appearing several nights in consequence of hoarseness. We hope that he will cease temporarily from his exertions, rather than incur the risk of heightening his illness—notwithstanding the disappointment which may ensue.

Copyright law in France.—A judgment, interesting to authors, and more particularly to writers of novels and romances, has just been pronounced by the Tribunal de Premiere Instance. Several authors have long made claims upon the theatres for a participation in the profits of pieces formed by dramatists out of the plots and incidents of their works. No concession being made to them, M. Paul de Musset, author of a tale published in the Revue de Paris, under the title of "M. Coislin," and which had been converted into a vaudeville, and performed at the Theatre du Palais Royal with the same title, resolved to try the question. He brought his action against the authors of this piece for a piracy, and the court has awarded him three hundred francs damages.

The Bovey Theatre.—Celeste has, as usual, drawn crowded houses at this establishment. It is stated that she receives for twelve nights' performances four thousand dollars. The cultivation of the heels would seem to be more profitable than that of the head. Marsh, in all probability, will not receive two thousand dollars for "England and other Poems," although they cost him the labour of months instead of weeks. Ought such disparity to exist?

New Chatham Theatre.—This establishment opened on the eleventh instant, to a well-filled house. An eloquent address from the pen of H. F. Harrington, Esq., was spoken on the occasion. The theatre has been doing a respectable business with Barnes, J. R. Scott, the Ravel Family, and a very fair stock company. The interior appearance of the building is neat and graceful.

Wooden pavements.—The wooden pavement in Broadway, between Bleeker and Fourth streets, is the admiration of all who have seen it. The contrast between the rude jolting of the pavements and the "smooth sailing" one experiences on this level floor, is indeed remarkable.

HASTEN FROM YOUR CORAL CAVES.

COMPOSED BY W. GRANTHAM.

Scherzo.

Hasten from your coral caves, Ev'ry that nymph sportive laves in the green sea's oozy wells, And gilds the fins and spots the shells, And gilds the fins and spots the shells: Hasten then our morrice join,

Ere the gaudy morn'ning shine.

SECOND VERSE

Rising from the foaming wave,
Instantly your aid we crave;
Come and trip like our gay band,
Traceless on the amber sand;
Haste, or we must hence away—
Yet an hour and all is day.

THIRD VERSE

See the clouds of night retire,
Hesper gleams with languid fire;
Quickly, then, our revels join,
The blush of morn is on the brine:
Lo! 'twere we must hence away,
Yonder breaks the orb of day.

SCRAPS FROM THE GERMAN OF LANGEIN.

Translated for the New-York Mirror.

THE HERMIT, A FABLE.—A pious hermit, who lived in the solitude of the forest, far from the noise of men, was once wandering through the woods in search of a few wild fruits and berries to make up his frugal meal. He heard a moaning in the grass, and looking down saw a fox, both of whose fore-legs were broken, writhing like a snake on the ground, and apparently starving. The good hermit was about to seek some food for the helpless creature, when an eagle appeared, soaring high overhead, and suddenly let a fowl fall from its talons directly at the feet of the fox. The starving animal seized greedily on the precious prize, and soon made a hearty meal on it. "Ah," exclaimed the pious enthusiast, "this is the finger of God. Why did I distrust his providential care, and wander over hill and dale to seek for my daily food? He who brought food to the mouth of this helpless animal, will surely never forget his servant. Henceforth, I will take no more thought for my body's sustenance, but trust to his goodness, and devote all my time to meditation." True to his resolution, he returned to his cell, and neither plucked the fruits that hung on the trees around him, nor went down to the brook to quench his thirst. Three whole days he lived thus, and was wasting away to a shadow, in the vain hope of a direct interference of heaven. On the evening of the third day, just as he sunk into slumber, thunder rolled through the cave, he saw a form of angelic beauty, and heard a sweet but solemn voice that spoke thus—"Mortal, how feeble is thy understanding! Couldst thou thus misinterpret the lesson contained in the eagle's conduct? Thou art not lame and helpless as was the fox, but art strong and active, like the eagle that gave him food. Him thou wert to imitate, in going about and doing good to others; for know that idleness, even if accompanied by constant prayer, is odious in the sight of the Almighty."

A COQUETTE.—When I hear of a coquette's marriage, I am reminded of the dog's custom of marrying Venice to the sea, which, spite of the ceremony, is as free to all flags as before.

BEIERREY.—Do not blame a judge if he sells justice. It is too rare a commodity to be given away for nothing.

UNDER SENSIBILITY.—A woman who is always shedding tears must have a good deal of water in her head.

THE COURT POET.—An eastern tale informs us that Alexander the Great had a court poet, whose vanity was fully equal to his talents, as is apt, by the way, to be the case with the votaries of the muses. The poet sought one day the presence of his sovereign, and addressed him thus—"Mighty sovereign, thy fame extends from pole to pole, and thy exploits have been made known in the farthest corners of the habitable globe. But remember, that tradition is fleeting and uncertain, and he who trusts his fame to the tongue of man, will soon be forgotten. Let me celebrate thy exploits in strains worthy of my theme, which may carry down thy name and fame to all ages. Only, as the sons of Phœbus are subject to the same wants as meaner mortals, let me know what thou wilt give me, if I fulfil my task?" The monarch smiled at the mercenary eagerness of the poet, and after a moment's thought, told him that he should have a piece of gold for every good line, and a blow for every bad one. The laureate accepted the conditions, full of confidence that it would rain gold and not blows. But when the work was read, although he got here and there a good many gold pieces, the blows predominated so fearfully, that before he got through the sixth canto, he was a dead man.

THE POLYGLOT.—The story runs, that once, in the dark ages, a young man was brought before the authorities, charged with having married several wives. When called upon for his defence, "It is true," said he, "most learned judges, that I have married several women, but judge for yourselves whether my object in so doing was not praiseworthy. A man has surely a right, if he buys an article for good, and it turns out to be bad, to reject it. Now I found that the first wife I married was ill-tempered, the second lazy, and the third false, and so forth. All I want is to get a good one, and I shall be satisfied." The bench were puzzled at first at this novel defence, but after a short consultation decreed, that as it would be impossible for the defendant to find a perfect wife, except in the other world, he should be immediately put to death, to enable him to look for one.

AVARICE.—How absurd is avarice in an old man! It is like a man scraping money anxiously together to pay his turnpikes, after he has got to the end of the road.

AMATEUR AUTHORS.—Some distant authors profess that they write and publish only for their own amusement. This is perfectly correct, for it certainly is not for other people's.

LUTHER AND THE DEVIL.—We are told, that when Luther was busy on his version of the Psalms, the Devil came to trouble him, but the reformer flung his inkstand at him, and the fiend flew away. Now a-days, it is not the Devil that gets bespattered with ink, but worthy men and good citizens.

TRUTH AND FALSEHOOD.—Falsehood flies swift as the wind, and Truth creeps behind her at a snail's pace. But Falsehood makes so many twistings and turnings, that Truth, keeping steadily on, looking neither to the right nor the left, overtakes her before long.

HARSH JUDGMENTS.—If you must form harsh judgments, form them of yourself, not of others; and, in general, begin by attending to your own deficiencies first. If every one would sweep up his own walk, we should have very clean streets.

METAPHYSICIANS.—The speculations of some of our metaphysical writers are as fine and delicate as spiders' webs; like them, too, unfortunately, they catch nothing but flies.

SELF-PRaise.—When you hear any one making a noise about himself, his merits and his good qualities, remember that the poorest wheel of a wagon always creaks the loudest.

THE WISE MEN OF GREECE.—All Greece, populous, refined, and cultivated as it was, could boast of but seven wise men: now-a-days, you can find as many as that in every coffee-room.

CONTENTED POVERTY.—Do not sigh for this world's goods, nor lament thy poverty. Out of the meanest hovel thou canst get a sight of heaven.

EXPERIENCE.—Experience is the most eloquent of preachers, but she never has a large congregation.

THE GOLDEN AGE.—We live not in the golden age indeed, but in an age of gold, for it is all-powerful.

ADVERSITY.—We never read of any saint in heaven, who did not have to endure sorrow and suffering in this life.

GENERAL POPULARITY.—Never aim at universal popularity, for know, that fools, like nobody but a fool, like themselves.

SILENCE.—A fool that holds his tongue is almost a wise man.

ROMANCE OF HISTORY.

THE ROMANCE OF THE PAGE.

After the manner of the olden time.

BY ELIZABETH B. BARRETT.

"The truest, loveliest, and the gentlest boy
That ever master had,"—Beaumont and Fletcher.

A knight upon a battle-steed,
And a page on a steed beside,
From the holy war in Palestine,
As slow and thoughtful ride,
As each were a palmer, and told for bead
The dew of the eventide.

"O young page," said the knight,
"A noble page art thou;
And fearing not to steep in blood
The curls upon thy brow
Anon in the tent, and anon in the fight,
Didst ward me a mortal blow!"

"O brave knight," said the page,
Awhile since talked we
In tent and field; and then we talked
Of the deadly chivalry:—
But I have not a breath of that battle-page
To breathe betwixt grass and tree!

"Our friends are far behind;
The calm is very new;
Our steeds, with slow grass-muffled hoofs,
Tread deep the shadows through;
And from leaf to leaf the soul of the wind
Is sliding with the dew.

"Twice, when a pause was won,
I heard my mother pray!
I heard, sir knight, the prayer for me,
Wherein she passed away:
And I know the heavens are leaning down,
To hear what I shall say!"

The page spoke calm and high,
As of no mean degree;
Perhaps he felt in nature's broad
Full heart his own was free!
And the knight looked up to his lifted eye,
Then answered smilingly:

"Sir Page, I pray your grace;
Certain, I meant not so
To cross your pastoral mood, Sir Page,
With the crook of the battle-bow;
But a knight may speak of a lady's face,
If the grasses die or grow!"

"And this I meant to say—
My lady's face shall shine,
As lady's faces used, to soo
My page from Palestine;
Or, speak she fair or frank she gay,
She is no lady of mine!"

"And this I meant to fear—
Her bower may suit thee ill;
For, sooth, in that same field and tent,
Thy talk was very still;
And fitter thine hand for my knightly spear,
Than thy tongue for my lady's will."

Slowly and thankfully
The young page bowed his head;
His large eyes seemed to muse a smile,
Until he blushed instead:
And I ween no lady in her bower
Could blush more sudden red!
"Sir Knight, the bower of thy lady
Will suit me well," he said.

Beati, beati, mortui!
From the convent on the sea,
Which they pass not very nigh,
Swells the dirge as clear and high,
As over brake and over lea
Bodily the wind did carry
The great altar of St. Mary,
And the fifty tapers burning o'er it,
And the Lady Althea dead before it,
And the nuns she yesterweek did bless,
Chanting with their steady breath,
Faintly chanting because less
They think upon the dead than death!
Beati, beati, mortui!
Now they wander back—away—
The uplands will not let them stay
To dark the western sun—
Mortui! away at last,
Or ere the page's blush is past!
And the knight heard all, and the page heard none.

"A boon, thou noble knight,
If ever I served thee;
Though thou art a knight, and I am a page,
Now grant a boon to me!
Now tell me sooth, if dark or bright,
If little loved or loved aright,
Be the face of thy lady."

Gloomily looked the knight:—
"As a son thou hast served me;
And oh that I never had granted boon
To another saving thee!
For haply then I should love aright,
For then I should know if dark or bright
Were the face of my lady."

Yet ill befell it knightly tongue,
To mourn that granted boon!
For her baron-sire avenged the wrong
To the fame of mine, sepulchred long,
By a lying calistif done—
Who looked up the minister nave,
And dared to lie; for my father's glaive
Was changed from steel to stone.

The baron's glaive was steel,
(Wo's me that I did wear it!)
And dashed unto death the mouth
That wronged his friend and ear.
But as the slanderer fell thereby,
He used the dagger for the lie;
Yes, heart-stabbed by the slanderer sent
To speechless dust, th' avenger went
To join th' avenged's spirit.

"Wail shook the baron's house—
"His true wife shed no tear—
She lay upon her bed as mute
As the baron on his bier:
Till 'Ride, ride fast,' she said at last,
'And bring th' avenged's son near!
Ride fast, ride free, as a dart can flee,
For white of bile, with waiting for me,
Is the corpse in the next chamber!'"

"I came—I knelt beside her bed;
Her calm was sad as strife;
'My husband, for thy father dear,
Hath given, when thou wert not near,
His own, and eke my life.
A boon!—of that sweet child we make
An orphan for thy father's sake,
Make thou, for ours, a wife."

"I said, 'My steed neighs in the court,
My bark rocks on the brine;
And the warrior's row, I am under now,
To free the pilgrim's shrine:
But fetch the ring, and call the priest,
And call that daughter of thine;
And rule she wide from my castle on Nyde,
While I am in Palestine."

"In the dark chamber, if the bride were fair
Ye wis I could not see;
But the steel thrice neighed, and the priest fast prayed,
And wedded fast were we:
Her mother smiled in her bed,
As at its side we knelt to wed—
When the bride rose from her knee,
She kissed the smile of her mother dead,
Or ere she kissed me."

"My page, my page, what grieves thee so,
That the tears run down thy face?"
"Alas! what if my own sister
Was in thy lady's case!
But she lay down the silks she wore,
And followed him she wed before,
Disguised as his true servant,
To the very battle-place."

And wept the page, and laughed the knight,
A gay laugh laughed he:
"Well done it were for thy sister,
But not for my lady!"
No woman bright, my loves requite,
Unwomaned if she be."

The page wept not—he smiled cold—
"Some wisdoms may declare
That womanhood is proved best
By golden brooch and glossy vest,
The mincing ladies wear.
Yet almost it is proved as well,
By truth,—or by despair."

No more he smiled, no more he wept,
But passionately he spake,—
"Oh, womanly she prayed in tent,
When none beside did wake!
Oh, womanly she paled in fight,
For one beloved's sake!"

And her little hand defiled with blood,
Her tender tears of womanhood,
Most woman-pure did make!"

"Well done it were for thy sister,—
Thou tellest well her tale;
But for my lady she shall pray
I the kirk of Nydersdale—
No dread for me, but love for me
Shall make my lady pale—
No casque shall hide her woman's tear—
It shall have room to trickle clear
Behind her woman's veil."

"But what if she mistook thy mind,
And followed thee to strife;
Then kneeling asked thee for love,
As Paynims ask for life!"
"I would forgive; and evermore
Would love her as my servant,
But little as my wife."

"Look up—there is a small bright cloud
Alone amid the skies!
So high, so pure, and so apart
A woman's glory lies."
The page look'd up—the cloud was sheen—
A sadder cloud did rush, I ween,
Betwixt it and his eyes.

And so, his eyes did drop away
From welkin unto hill—
Ha! who ride there!—the page is 'ware,
Though the cry at his heart is still!
The page seeth all, and the knight seeth none,
Though banner and spear do fleck the sun,
And the Paynims ride at will.

He speaketh calm, he speaketh low,—
Now, ride, my master, ride;
Or ere within the broadening dark,
The narrow shadows hide!"
"Yes fast, yes fast, my zealous page,
And keep thou at my side."

"Now, nay, now nay, my master dear,
Thy faithful page precede—
For I must loose, on saddle-bow,
My battle casque that gallich so
The shoulder of my steed;
And I must pray a wotted prayer
For one in bitter need."

"Ere night I shall be near to thee—
Now ride, my master, ride!
Ere night, as parted souls are near
The thrice beloved they loved here,
I shall be at thy side."
The knight smiled free at the fantasy,
And down the dell did ride.

Had the knight looked up to the page's face,
No smile his words had won;
Had the knight looked up to the page's face
I ween he had never gone!
Had the knight looked back to the page's geste,
I ween he had turn'd anon!
For dread was the wo in the face so young,
And wild was the geste wherewith he flung
Casque, sword, to earth,—and downward sprung,
And stood,—alone, alone.

He clench'd his hands, as if to hold
His soul's great agony;
"Have I renounced my womanhood,
For widowhood unto thee,
And is this the last, last look of thine
That ever I shall see!"

"Yet God thee save,—and mayst thou have
A lady to thy mind—
More woman-proud, not faithfuller,
Than one thou leav'st behind!
And God me take with Him to dwell,—
For Him I cannot love too well
As I have loved my kind."

She looketh up in earth's despair,
The hopeful heavens to seek—
There floateth still the little cloud
Whereof her love did speak!
How bright the little cloud appears!
Her eyelids fall upon the tears,
And the tears fall down her cheek.

The stroke of hoof, the flash of steel—
The Paynims round her coming!
The sound and sight have made her calm,
False page, but truthful woman!
She stands amid them all unmoved—
The heart once broken by the loved,
Is strong toward the foe-man.

"Ho! Christian Page! art keeping sheep,
From pouring wine-cups, resting?"
"I keep my master's noble name,
For warning, not for feasting.
And if that here Sir Hubert were,
My master brave, my master dear,
Ye would not stay to question."

"Where is thy master, scornful page,
That may seize and bind him?"
"Now search the lea, and search the wood,
And see if you can find him!
Nathless, as he has been often tried,
Your Pnymin heroes faster ride
Before him than behind him."

"Give smoother answers, lying page,
Or perish in the lying."
"I trow, an if the warrior brand
Beside my feet, were in my hand,
I were better at replying."—
They cursed her deep, they smote her low,
They cleft her golden ringlets through,—
The loving is the dying!

She felt the cimeter gleam down,
And met it from beneath
With smile more bright in victory
Than any steel from sheath,—
Which glanced across her lip serene,
Most like the spirit-flash between
The darks of life and death!

Ingenusmo, ingenusmo!
From the convent on the sea!
As over wood and over lea,
Bodily the wind did carry
The great altar of St. Mary,
And the fifty tapers paling o'er it;
And the Lady Abbess stark before it,
And the weary nuns with hearts that faintly
Beat along their voices saintly.

Ingenusmo, ingenusmo!
That dirge for Abbess laid in shroud,
Sweepeth o'er the shrouded dead
With the dew upon her head,
All as sad, if not as loud.

Ingenusmo, ingenusmo!
Is ever a lament begun
By mourner underneath the sun,
Which, ere it end, will suit but one!

INDIAN TALES AND LEGENDS.

THE SON OF THE EVENING STAR.

BY H. R. SCHOOLCRAFT.

THERE once lived an Indian in the north, who had ten daughters, all of whom grew up to womanhood. They were noted for their beauty, but especially Oweenee, the youngest, who was very independent in her way of thinking. She was a great admirer of romantic places, and paid very little attention to the numerous young men who came to her father's lodge for the purpose of seeing her. Her elder sisters were all solicited in marriage from their parents, and one after another went off to dwell in the lodges of their husbands, or mothers-in-law, but she would listen to no proposals of the kind. At last she married an old man called Osseo, who was scarcely able to walk, and was too poor to have things like others. They jested and laughed at her, on all sides, but she seemed to be quite happy, and said to them, "It is my choice, and you will see in the end who has acted the wisest." Soon after, the sisters and their husbands and their parents were all invited to a feast, and as they followed along the path, they could not help pitying their young and handsome sister, who had such an unsuitable mate. Osseo often stopped and gazed upwards, but they could perceive nothing in the direction he looked, unless it was the faint glimmering of the evening star. They heard him muttering to himself as they went along, and one of the elder sisters caught the words, "Sho-wain-ne-shin-roo." "Poor old man," said she, "he is talking to his father, what a pity it is that he would not fall and break his neck, that our sister might have a handsome young husband!" Presently they passed a large hollow log, lying with one end toward the path. The moment Osseo, who was of the turtle totem, came to it, he stopped short, uttered a loud and peculiar yell, and then dashing into one end of the log, he came out at the other, a most beautiful young man, and springing back to the road, he led off the party with steps as light as the reindeer. But on turning round to look for his wife, behold, she had been changed into an old, decrepit woman, who was bent almost double, and walked with a cane. The husband, however, treated her very kindly, as she had done him during the time of his enchantment, and constantly addressed her by the term of neo-moo-sha, or my sweetheart.

When they came to the hunter's lodge with whom they were to feast, they found the feast ready prepared, and as soon as their entertainer had finished his harangue, (in which he told them their feasting was in honour of the Evening, or Woman's Star), they began to partake of the portion dished out, according to age and character, to each one. The food was very delicious, and they were all happy but Osseo, who looked at his wife, and then gazed upward, as if he was looking into the substance of the sky. Sounds were soon heard, as if from far-off voices in the air, and they became plainer and plainer, till he could clearly distinguish some of the words.

"My son—my son," said the voice, "I have seen your afflictions and pity your wants. I come to call you away from a scene that is stained with blood and tears. The earth is full of sorrows. Giants and sorcerers, the enemies of mankind, walk abroad in it, and are scattered throughout its length. Every night they are lifting their voices to the Power of Evil, and every day they make themselves busy in casting evil in the hunter's path. You have long loved your victim, but shall be their victim no more. The spell you were under is broken. Your evil genius is overcome. I have cast him down by my superior strength, and it is this strength I now exert for your happiness. Ascend my son—ascend into the skies, and partake of the feast I have prepared for you in the stars, and bring with you those you love.

"The food set before you is enchanted and blessed. Fear not to partake of it. It is endowed with magic-power to give immortality to mortals, and to change men to spirits. Your bow and kettle shall be no longer wood and earth. The one shall become silver, and the other wampum. They shall shine like fire, and glisten like the most beautiful scarlet. Every female shall also change her state and looks, and no longer be doomed to laborious tasks. She shall put on the beauty of the star-light, and become a shining bird of the air, clothed with shining feathers. She shall dance and not work—she shall sing and not cry."

"My beams," continued the voice, "shine faintly on your lodge, but they have a power to transform it into the lightness of the skies, and decorate it with the colours of the clouds. Come, Osseo, my son, and dwell no longer on earth. Think strongly on my words, and look steadfastly at my beams. My power is now at its height. Doubt not—delay not. It is the voice of the Spirit of Stars that calls you away to happiness and celestial rest."

The words were intelligible to Osseo, but his companions thought them some far-off sounds of music, or birds singing in the woods. Very soon the lodge began to shake and tremble, and they felt it rising into the air. It was too late to run out, for they were already as high as the tops of the trees. Osseo looked around him as the lodge passed through the uppermost boughs, and behold! his wooden dishes were changed into shells of a scarlet colour, the poles of the lodge to glittering wires of silver, and the bark that covered them into the gorgeous wings of insects. A moment more, and his brothers and sisters, and their parents and friends, were transformed into birds of various plumage. Some were jays, some partridges and pigeons, and others gay singing-birds, who hopped about displaying their glittering feathers, and singing their songs. But Oweenee still kept her earthly garb, and exhibited all the indications of extreme age. He again cast his eyes in the direction of the clouds, and uttered that peculiar yell, which had given him the victory at the hollow log. In a moment the youth and beauty of his wife returned; her dingy garments assumed the shining appearance of green silk, and her cane was changed into a silver flower staff. The lodge again shook and trembled, for they were now passing through the uppermost clouds, and they immediately after found themselves in the Evening Star, the residence of Osseo's father.

"My son," said the old man, "hang that cage of birds, which you have brought along in your hand, at the door, and I will inform you why you and your wife have been sent here. The spirit of the directions, and then took his seat in the lodge. "Pity was shown to you," resumed the king of the star, "on account of the contempt of your wife's sister, who laughed at her ill-fortune, and ridiculed you while you were under the power of that wicked spirit, whom you overcame at the log. That spirit lives in the next lodge, being a small star you see on the left of mine, and he has always felt envious of my family, because we had greater power than he had, and especially on account of our having had the care committed to us of the female world. He failed in several attempts to destroy your brothers-in-law and your sisters-in-law, but succeeded at last in transforming yourself and your wife into decrepit old persons. You must be careful, and not let the light of his beams fall on you, while you are here, for therein is the power of his enchantment; a ray of light is the bow and arrows he uses."

Osseo lived happy and contented in the parental lodge, and in due time his wife presented him with a son, who grew up rapidly, and was the image of his father. He was very quick and ready in learning everything that was shown in his grandfather's dominions, but he wished also to learn the art of hunting, for he had heard that this was a favourite pursuit below. To gratify him, his father made him a bow and arrows, and he then let the birds out of the cage, that he might practise in shooting. He soon became expert, and the very first day brought down a bird, but when he went to pick it up, to his amazement, it was a beautiful young woman with the arrow sticking in her breast. It was one of his young wives. The moment her blood fell upon the surface of that pure and spotless planet, the charm was dissolved. The boy immediately found himself sinking, but was partly upheld, by something like wings, till he passed through the lower clouds, and he then suddenly dropped upon a high, romantic island, in a large lake. He was pleased to look up to see all his aunts and uncles following him in the form of birds, and he soon discovered the silver lodge, with his father and mother, descending with his waving barks looking like so many insects' gilded wings. It rested on the highest cliffs of the island, and here they fixed their residence. They all resumed their natural shapes, but were diminished to the size of fairies, and, as a mark of homage to the king of the Evening Star, they never faded, on every pleasant evening, during the summer season, to join hands, and dance upon the top of the rocks. These rocks were quickly observed by the Indians to be covered, in moonlight evenings, with a large sort of Puk Wudy Indians, or little men, and were called Mish-in-mok-in-okong, or turtle spirits, and the island is named Sho-wain-ne-shin-roo, after the name of the young man. Their shining lodge can be seen in the summer evenings when the moon shines strongly on the pinnacles of the rocks, and the fishermen, who go near those high cliffs at night, have even heard the voices of the happy little dancers.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

LORD BYRON.

I HAVE seen Lord Byron; and am disappointed. But so it ever is, when we have heard exaggerated accounts of a person; or when, worse still, we have formed a bona fide ideal of him. Yet most people would be more than satisfied with Byron's appearance and captivated by his manner; for the first is highly prepossessing, and the second is graceful, animated, and cordial. Why then has he disappointed my expectations? and why is it, that on thinking of those portions of his writings that have most delighted me, I cannot figure in my mind I have seen him as he is? No, the sublime passages in "Childe Harold," and "Manfred," have not been associated in my mind, with the lively, brilliant conversationist that I this day saw. They still belong, in my fancy, to the more grave and dignified individual, that I had conceived their author to have been; an individual resembling Phillips' portrait of Byron, but paler and more thoughtful. I can imagine the man I saw as the author of "Deppo" and "Don Juan." He is witty, sarcastic, and lively enough to write these works; but he does not look like my preconceived notion of the melancholy poet. Well, I never will again allow myself to form an ideal of any person I desire to see; for disappointment never fails to ensue. And yet there are moments when Byron's countenance is "shadowed o'er with the pale cast of thought," and, at such moments, his head might well serve as a model for a sculptor or painter's ideal of a poet; but, in an instant, an arch smile replaces the pensive character of his countenance, and some observation, half fun and half malice, chases the somber and more respectful feelings, which were beginning to exist for him. His head is peculiarly well-shaped, the forehead high, open, and highly indicative of intellectual power; his eyes are gray and expressive, one is visibly larger than the other; the nose looks handsome in profile, but in front is somewhat clumsy; the eyebrows are well defined and flexible; and the mouth is faultless, the upper lip being of Grecian shortness, and both as finely chiselled, to use an artist's phrase, as those of an antique statue. There is a scornful expression in the latter feature that does not deteriorate from its beauty, and which is not assumed, as many people have supposed, but is caused by the peculiarity of its formation. His chin is large, but well shaped, and not at all fleshy, and finishes well his face, which is of an oval form. His hair has already much of silver among its dark brown curls; its texture is very silky, and although it retreats from his temples, leaving his forehead very bare, its growth at the sides and back of his head is abundant. I have seldom seen finer teeth than Lord Byron's, and never a smoother or more far skin, for though very pale, he is not the pallor of ill health, but the fairness peculiar to persons of thoughtful dispositions. He is so exceedingly thin, that his figure has an almost boyish air; and yet there is something so striking in his whole appearance, that could not be mistaken for an ordinary person.

This description is perfectly exact, and would convey the impression of more than usual personal attractions, which Lord Byron may certainly claim; and yet his appearance has, nevertheless, fallen short of my expectations. I do not think that I should have observed his lameness, had my attention not been called to it by his own visible consciousness of this infirmity—a consciousness that gives a gaucherie to his movements; yet, even now, I am not aware which foot is the deformed one. His are the smallest male hands I ever saw; finely shaped, delicately white, and the nails, couleur de rose, showing nearly half moons at the bottom, and so polished, that they resemble those delicate pink shells we find on the sea-coast. He owes less than any one of my acquaintance to his toilet, for his clothes are calculated to disfigure, rather than to adorn him, being old-fashioned and fitting ill. His voice and accent are particularly clear and harmonious, but somewhat effeminate; and his enunciation is so distinct, that though in general tone in speaking we have not a word is lost. His laugh is musical, but he rarely indulged in it during our interview; and when he did, it was quickly followed by a graver aspect, as if he liked not this exhibition of hilarity. Were I asked to point out the prominent defect of Byron's manner, I should pronounce it to be a flippancy incompatible with the notion we attach to the author of Childe Harold and Manfred; and a want of the self-possession and dignity that ought to characterize a man of birth and genius. Notwithstanding this defect, his manners are very fascinating—more so, perhaps, than if they were dignified; but he is too gay, too flippant for a poet.

He was very indignant at some attacks against him, copied into Galignani's journal from an American newspaper. How strange it seemed to me that a mind like his could be thus moved by such attacks! When did celebrity ever escape similar assaults? and why not attribute them to their true source, envy, and jealousy of that mental superiority, which, not admitting the possibility of being doubted, is in general fated to be an object of hostility. This susceptibility to annoyance under attack from such frivolous sources, is the most striking instance of weakness that I have observed in this gifted and remarkable man; and is, I think, to be attributed to the state of nervous excitement to which he has reduced himself by severe abstinence and mental labour. I have endeavoured to convince him, that by allowing his feelings to be wounded by anonymous enmity, proceeding as it always must from some comparatively insignificant adversary, he leaves his position of mind open to all scribbles, who, jealous of his fame, are vindictive against his politics, adopt this mode of venting their spleen. Byron is very partial to the Americans, and was consequently the more piqued by the censure on him conveyed in one of their newspapers; foolishly imagining the ill-natured comments of some unknown, and probably obscure writer, to be the opinion of the mass of the people.—Lady Blessington's Letter in Italy.

ETHIOPIAN WISEACRES.

Sam Jonsing and Pete Gumbo were walking up Camp-street last evening, on passing the old Camp-street theatre their eyes were suddenly arrested by the handbill of the new grand lottery stuck in front of the theatre. As reading and writing were branches not taught in the school where they got their "education," the darkies at once concluded the old place was about to open.

"Whoo! look dar Sam Jonsing," said Pete; "I declar if dey haint opened de Camp again."

"Well, so dey has, Pete—dats a fact. I wonder wat dey plays to-night, kase I's a notion ob gowin'."

"Dat's more'n I can say. I ruder 'speck, howeber, dats a good deal ob scenery and decoration about him, kase I see so much small print in de bill. If dey'd only print him wid larger letters I could catch de hant ob de piece, and de better. You sees dey neber larn us de use ob de small print war I went to school."

"Ya, ya, ya! no, guess not, nor de big kid eider; needn't try to fool dis child wid your larnin'. Bot, I say, I'd like to find out wat de performances is dis evening. Dar's Stebe Banjo; he's got de advantage ob an illiberal education. P'raps he can gib us some larn."

"Well, so he can; he's jes de child," said Pete. "Look heer, Stebe, I say, can't you jes explain to us us wat de play is to-night?"

"Wat de play is dis ebenin'!" said Stebe.

"Ezactly," returned Pete.

"To-night you has reverence to!" continued Stebe, working his capacious mouth half trying to swallow some of the large letters which adorn the head of the bill and looking very sagacious all the while.

"In course, to-night," returned Pete.

"Well, I guess it is," said Stebe, trying to gain more time.

"Is wat!" said Sam Jonsing, who now began to grow impatient. "I wuz jus de piece de farce ob de Lottery Ticket, wid several oder pieces too teedious to mention. Wen I sees de small bills I'll let you know more about him."

Perfectly satisfied, all parties now turned their way homewards.—New-Orleans Picayune.

THE CASTLE BY THE SEA.

From the German of Uhland.

BY M. W. LONGFELLOW.

"Hast thou seen that lonely castle,
That castle by the sea!
Golden and red above it
The clouds float gorgeously.

"And faint it would stoop downward
To the murmur'd wave below;
And faint it would soar upward
In the evening's crimson glow.

"We'll have I seen that castle,
That castle by the sea,
And the moon above it standing
And the mist rise solemnly.

"The winds and the waves of ocean
Had they a merry chime!
Didst thou hear, from those lofty chambers
The harp and the minstrel's rhyme?

"The winds and the waves of ocean
They rested quietly,
But I heard on the gale, a sound of wail,
And the tears came to my eye."

"And sweetest thou on the turrets
The king and his royal bride!
And the wave of their crimson mantles!
And the golden crown of pride!

"Led they not forth in rapture
A beauteous maiden there?
Resplendent as the morning sun
Beaming with golden hair!

"We'll saw I the ancient parents,
Without the crown of pride;
They were moving slow, in weeds of woe,
No maiden was by their side!"

BEAUTIES OF SAM SLICK.

DIGBY.—Digby is a charming little town. It is the Brighton of Nova Scotia, the resort of the valetudinarians of New-Brunswick, who take refuge here from the unrelenting fogs, hopeless sterility, and calcareous waters of St. John. About as pretty a location for business, said the clockmaker, as I know of in this country. Digby is the only safe harbour from Blomdown to Briar Island. Then there is that everlasting long river runnin' away from the wharves here almost across to Minas Basin, bordered with dykes and interval, and backed up by good upland. A nice, dry, pleasant place for a town, with good water, good air, and the best herrin' fishery in America.

THE FINE ARTS.—Poetry is the music of words; music is the poetry of sounds, and painting is the poetry of colours: what a sweet, interesting family they be, ain't they? We must locate, domesticate, acclimate, and fraternize them among us.

FASHIONABLE LIFE.—There were mirrors and vases, and lamps, and pictures, and crinkum crankums, and notions of all sorts and sizes in it. It looked like a bazaar a'most, it was filled with such an everlasting sight of curiosities. The room was considerable dark too, for the blinds was shut, and I was skeard to move for fear o' don't muschie. Presently in comes Ahah, slowly sailin' in, like a boat droppin' down stream in a calm, with a pair o' purple slippers on, and a figured silk dressin' gown, and carrying a most a beautiful bound book in his hand.

BOOKS OF TRAVELS.—All they got to do is, up Hudson like a shot, into the lakes full split, off to Mississippi and down to New-Orleans full chock, back to New-York and up killock and home in a liner, and write a book. They have a whole stock of notes. "Spit—goin'—lynchin'—burnin' alive—steamboats blowed up—snags—slavery—steelin'—Texas—state-prisons—men talk slow—women talk loud—both walk fast—chat in steamboats and stage-coaches— anecdotes, and so on. Then out comes a book.

THE TOOTH BUSINESS.—The tooth business, said I; what is that? Do you mean to say you are a dentist? No, said he, laughing; the tooth business is pickin' up experience. Whenever a feller is considerable cute with us, we say he has cut his eye teeth, he's tolerable sharp; and the steady of this I call the tooth business.

ANNAPOLIS.—I'll gist ax to-morrow all about her, for folks have pretty cute cars in Annapolis; there ain't a smack of a kiss that ain't heard all over town in two twos, and sometimes they think they hear 'em even after they happen. Its most a grand place for news, like all other small places I ever seed.

GOOD EXAMPLE.

The emperor of China determined, if possible, to put a stop to the opium trade, which it appears has been carried on for a long time by the English merchants, greatly to the injury of his subjects, having committed great ravages upon health, morals, property, and lives in China, than ardent spirits have in this country; has finally appointed a man by the name of Lin to proceed to Canton, clothed with power adequate to any emergency. In order that he may be understood and properly appreciated, this man was furnished with an imperial seal, which invests the holder with all the despotic power of the emperor, and which has been seldom intrusted to high officers of state. The following paragraph, from the New-York Journal of Commerce, will enable our readers to judge as to the final result of the mission, which if properly carried out, as it no doubt will be, will prove a great blessing to the Chinese people. "The amount of opium given up to the Chinese government was no less than twenty thousand two hundred and eighty-three chests, valued at three millions of pounds sterling, or near fifteen millions of dollars! This includes the opium belonging to the subjects or citizens of other nations than Great Britain, and we presume they made clean work. Both in a commercial and moral point of view, the event is of great importance. The next arrival from Canton will be awaited with much interest. The foreign residents appear to have been still in confinement at the date above mentioned."

THE OGUNIM TORUM WRIT.

In 1827, when North Mississippi was cleared of the Indians partially, the whole of this country was then called Yazoo county, extending over one hundred and fifty miles square. The law had not taken effect for want of propagation, except in the militia. One Colonel Casson commanded in his regiment the whole country, and he was all the officer, either civil or military, that lived in that whole tract of country. The country, as was to be expected, was filled up with a horde of trifling fellows, and thieves, and the like. About this time there were missing two horses in the neighbourhood, and Colonel Casson called a meeting of the citizens generally, to consult on the best measures in relation to it. Accordingly, a large collection met at the house of the colonel, on Big Black, (where Holmes' county now is) and called the colonel to the chair. Suspicion soon fell upon a young man by the name of Dobson, who was not present. After consulting and discussing on the subject, pro and con, it was agreed that Dobson should be brought forward for trial. An old gentleman, rather more intelligent than his contemporaries, asked if the meeting could hold him! Colonel Casson drew down his eyebrows in a dignified manner, as if casting about in his mind previous to giving "the opinion of the court," and said, "Gentlemen, I will issue an Ogunim Torum Writ, and have him corporally before me." "But what kind of a writ is that, colonel?" said the old man, with caution. "It is a writ," said the colonel, gravely, "to take him as well where he aint, as where he is, and have him corporally before us." This was satisfactory to the meeting, and six men were despatched with this awful writ, who returned in about an hour with the renowned Dobson in strings. He was arraigned—witnesses sworn—but no evidence of a secondary nature could be obtained; yet after taking the vote, a majority found him guilty. The colonel then put on an awfully solemn visage, and said, "Isaac Dobson! by authority of the ninth section of laws in these cases, I pass sentence of death upon you—to be hung by the neck till you are dead, dead, dead! not for stealing horses, but that horses may not be stolen." That evening Dobson was led to a black-jack, and hung according to the sentence of the court, admitting he had stolen the horses, and that he intended to have taken them to Red River Raft, and acknowledged the justice of his sentence. This country is now well settled, and divided into twenty counties; but, the old colonel was heard the other day to say, "These are shocking times—a man must be tried three or four days for stealing the like, then get clear by some quirk in the law, when he stole the horse as plain as the nose on my face—I will go to Texas, and git among civilized folks."

THE COMMANCHES OF TEXAS.

The Comanches claim to be the lineal descendants of the empire of Montezuma, and the only legitimate owners of the whole Mexican country. The chief said, that when Cortez landed in Mexico, he found the country torn to pieces by internal factions, and was enabled, by employing the disaffected, to raise a force to seize upon the capital. Those chiefs believed, if they could destroy the power of Montezuma, they could easily despatch the Spaniards, and have the control of the country in their own hands. But too late they ascertained that they had introduced a harder master, and that unconditional servitude was all they had to expect. They were required to change their ancient religion, and thousands of them were sent off to work in the mines, from which they rarely ever made their escape. A great proportion of them bound their neck to the conqueror, and became serfs and slaves to the Spaniards; but a few, the best and noblest part, preferred exile to servitude, and set out on a pilgrimage to the north, in hopes to find a land where they could enjoy their ancient institutions in peace.

They travelled for many weeks, and at last came to the great river of the north, the Rio Grande, where they encamped, and sent out twenty chosen men to examine the adjacent country. They crossed the great river and ascended one of the highest peaks of the mountain, which overlooked the adjoining plain. The prairie was covered with buffalo, deer, and antelopes, and they thought they had reached the happy hunting ground, and the word "Tehas!" "Tehas!" burst from every tongue. It was decided among themselves that it should be their future home, and the country should go by the name apparently furnished them by the Great Spirit.

"Tehas is the Comanche name for the residence of the happy spirits in the world where they shall enjoy an eternal felicity, and have plenty of deer and buffalo always at hand. By taking the sound as they pronounce it, and giving it the Spanish orthography, it gives us the word "Tehaz," which is the "Happy Hunting Ground," or the "Elysium" of the Comanches. This is a true history of the name, as derived from Isowacany himself.

ILLINOIS PRAIRIES.

Prairie is a French word signifying meadow, and is applied to any description of soil, destitute of timber and clothed with grass. The great peculiarity of the prairies is the absence of timber, in other respects they present all the varieties of soil and surface that are found elsewhere: some are of inexhaustible fertility, others are of hopeless sterility: some spread out into vast, unbounded plains, others are undulating or rolling, perhaps broken by hills. In general, particularly in Illinois, they are covered with a luxuriant growth of grass.

These strips of prairie that occur along the margins of water-courses are commonly denominated alluvial or wet prairies. They are for the most part of a black, deep and very friable soil of exhausted fertility, and contain evident marks of having been the most recent deposit of running water. A strip of land along the eastern bank of the Mississippi, below the mouth of the Missouri, known as the American bottom, is perhaps the most remarkable specimen of such a prairie. For most agricultural purposes, these are considered the best of soils, but are ordinarily too tender for the cultivated grasses. Yet in the highest estimate of their native grass impresses the beholder with astonishment.

Another kind of prairie, covered with hazel and a great variety of flowering shrubbery, is commonly termed the healthy or bushy prairie. These present a broken and uneven surface, and abound in springs of water. They usually are met with along the skirts of timbered lands. In point of fertility, they are among the choicest portions of soil. Nowhere are flowers of the gayest hue and sweetest fragrance to be found in richer profusion.

Such tracts seem peculiarly adapted to the culture of the vine. But by far the most extensive tracts are the dry and undulating prairie.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

ENTRANCE INTO LIFE.

It is doing a service to mankind to destroy the prejudice which is generally entertained, that youth is educated, when some care has been taken of their infancy. This prejudice, besides other bad effects of it, suspends the zeal of that small number of individuals in the middle rank of life, who wish to give their children the best education they possibly can. From a false notion that the minds of young persons are formed at a very early period, they suffer them to be their own masters at a time when they stand most in need of a guide, to direct them in the course of the most important period of their education, by the wisdoms of his counsels, the gentleness of his insinuations, and the force of his example. Few persons, in their infancy, learn the art of employing and governing themselves; and it is very difficult to learn it till the faculties of the mind are full blown, and the character has taken its true bias. When young persons, therefore, are entering upon the tempestuous ocean of human life, then is the time when they must be taught the pilot's art, the manner of steering their course, so as to avoid rocks and quicksands. A philosopher might begin to take the charge of education, at a time when the vulgar think it finished. Many persons are capable of educating children in the ordinary method; there are few, very few, who are capable of forming men.

TRUE PHILOSOPHY.

Madame Necker relates the following anecdote of M. Abauret, a philosopher of Geneva.—"It was said of him that he never had been out of temper: some persons by means of his female servants, were determined to put this to the proof. The woman in question stated that she had been his servant for thirty years, and she protested that during that time she had never seen him in a passion. They promised her a sum of money if she would endeavour to make him angry; she consented, and knowing he was particularly fond of her, she did well made, she on the day appointed endeavoured to make it. M. Abauret observed it, and the next morning made the observation to her, she answered that she had forgotten it; she said nothing more, but on the same evening she again neglected to make the bed; the same observation was made on the morrow by the philosopher, and she again made some excuse in a cooler manner than before. On the third day he said to her, 'you have not yet made my bed; you have apparently come to some resolution on the subject, as you probably found it fatigued you. But after all it is of no great consequence, as I begin to accustom myself to it as it is.' She threw herself at his feet and avowed all to him."

SLEEP.

There is a kind of sleep that steals upon us sometimes, which, while it holds the body prisoner, does not free the mind from a sense of things about it, but enables it to ramble as it pleases. It is an overpowering heaviness, a prostration of strength, and an utter inability to control our thoughts or power of motion, can be called sleep, this is it; and yet we have a consciousness of all that is going on about us, and even if we dream, words which are really spoken, or sounds which really exist at the moment, accommodate themselves with surprising readiness to our visions, until reality and imagination become so strangely blended that it is almost words almost a matter of impossibility to separate the two. Nor is this the most striking phenomenon incidental to such a state. It is an ascertained fact, that although our senses of touch and sight be for the time dead, yet our sleeping thoughts, and the visionary scenes that pass before us, will be influenced, and materially influenced, by the mere silent presence of some external object which may not have been near us when we closed our eyes, and of whose vicinity we have had no waking consciousness.

REMORSE

We need be careful how we deal with those about us, for every death carries with it to some small circle of survivors thoughts of so much omitted and so little done; of so many things forgotten, and so many more which might have been repaired, that such recollections among the bitterest we can have. There is no remorse so deep as that which is unavailing; if we would be spared its tortures, let us remember this in time. Men who look on nature and their fellow men, and cry that all is dark and gloomy, are in the right; but the sombre colours are reflected from their own jaundiced eyes and hearts. The real hues are delicate, and require a clear vision.

DEATH.

Alas! how few of Nature's faces there are to gladden us with their beauty! The cares, and sorrows, and hungerings of the world change them as they change hearts, and it is only when those passions sleep, and have lost their hold for ever, that the troubled clouds pass off, and leave heaven's surface clear. It is a common thing for the countenances of the dead, even in that fixed and rigid state, to subside into the long-forgotten expression of sleeping infancy, and settle into the very look of early life; so calm, so peaceful do they grow again, that those who knew them in their happy childhood kneel by the coffin's side in awe, and see the angel even upon earth.

PUBLIC OPINION.

When a nation changes its opinion and habits of thinking, it is no longer to be governed as before; but it would not only be wrong, but bad policy, to attempt by force what ought to be accomplished by reason. Rebellion consists in forcibly opposing the general will of a nation, whether by a party or by a government. There ought, therefore, to be in every nation, a method of occasionally ascertaining the states of public opinion, with respect to government.

PAIN.

Misery is thine agent, and affliction is thy messenger; but as night is succeeded by day, and cold by warmth, so hath every evil a twin blessing.

THE REALLY IGNORANT.

He that does not know those things which are of use and necessary for him to know, is but an ignorant man, whatever he may know besides.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

ON THE DECAY OF THE SUPERNATURAL.

BY A MAN BORN OUT OF SEASON.

A GREAT outcry is made now-a-days by many self-satisfied and pseudo-scientific folks about how sensible and well-informed we are as compared with our ancestors, whom they ungratefully look down upon as ignoramuses, steeped to the lips in barbarism and superstition. This is not modest.

Every state of society has its good and its evil—its evil and its good. There is never any complete change for the better. We never make a great gain but we lose a little. We may be, and are, a great deal better off than those who have gone before us in many respects. We are clear of feudalism and all its pleasant accompaniments of dungeons, chains, gibbets, and other implements of high-handed oppression; yet our frame and constitution of society has its plague-spots as well as theirs. We may be wiser—and again, a great portion of our self-satisfied knowledge may be little better than foolishness.

There was a time when the world was full of strange marvels. Earth, air, and fresh water swarmed with the supernatural, and the salt was full of mermaids. Gnomes laboured in the dark mine, and sylphs floated like moths in the sunbeam. Witches danced upon the "blest heath," and at eventide the tinkling of fairy bells was heard on the green hill-side, and the gambols of the "elfin folk" were dimly visible in the gray of morning or the uncertainty of twilight. Demons walked the dark forest, and kelpies haunted the sullen pool; and hill, and stream, and glen, and greenwood, had its appropriate unearthly existences. Slayed, in those days, were belated wights with other spirits than whiskey; and maidens fair, in addition to the ordinary assaults of deceitful men, were sore troubled and perplexed by the gules and wiles of beings who were not of "the earth earthly." Wicked old women left the "gude, gude-man" asleep in his quiet cottage, mounted their broomsticks, had a cruise with the warlocks of Lapland, and were back ere day-break; and the spirits of the departed glided in the wan moonlight around the scene of their wrongs and sufferings, pointing to where blood had been shed, or ill-gotten gold concealed.

Spectacles were invented. People put them on, looked closer into matters, and found those things were not so.

"We are much wiser than our ancestors," quoth they—"a very great deal wiser."

But knowledge is not all clear gain. They robbed themselves, did those wise folks, of many spirit-stirring legends, and wild, and fanciful, and pleasant illusions, by their impudent habits of investigation.

And, after all, they found they could not do without the beliefs, falsely called vulgar—for in nine cases out of ten there was no vulgarity about them—of the past. Though they discarded them as facts, and burned or drowned no more old women on hypothetical evidence, they were obliged to retain them to a certain extent, and give them at least a poetical credence: and in all lands, east, west, north, and south, wherever those beliefs have been most rare, poetry has most abounded, not only in the expression of the gifted few, but in the general prevalence of the sentiment hallowing the popular mind.

And in good truth, viewing it in a moral, rather than a poetical point of view—if the two can be easily separated—it may gravely be questioned whether the decay in the faith of local and national superstitions has been altogether productive of good, more especially in unimproved minds where the place of that faith has not been supplied by higher and purer spiritual views. Knowledge, like medicine, ought to be carefully administered. When retailed in small portions, particularly if it be almost exclusively of a mechanical or purely scientific character, it generates a self-complacency and hardness of mind in the recipients that is anything but satisfactory. This is a good deal the state in which society is at present, and to which it is in a still greater degree tending. The supernatural existences of old are exploded as the gross beliefs of a dark and ignorant age—the various phenomena of nature are explained to half-understanding minds by "cold, material laws," and where a belief in the spiritual, based on safer and surer grounds has not been inculcated, a vulgar incredulity, most anti-poetical, immoral, and unamiable, is almost sure to be the result. People do not choose to believe anything but what can be demonstrated. They are too knowing to be taken in, forsooth! Witches and goblins have been proved to be fabulous, why not all spiritual existences, whether of good or evil? Far more frequently now than of yore does the laqueous mechanic, and the ale-inspired ploughman, make the city tavern and the village inn ring with the coarse and —Reffian boast,

That he believes in neither God nor ghost."

The good of this is not at all perceptible. A belief in the most absurd superstitions is preferable to this villanous skepticism.

They had their salutary effects too, those antiquated notions; the more especially in a wild and unsettled state of society, where the visitation of crime by legal justice was extremely problematical. In such a state, where the comparatively uncurbed and vindictive passions of men were called into frequent and furious action, and the chance of immediate punishment was but small, it was most salutary that a powerful though undefined feeling of retributive justice should pervade the mind. It was well that ghosts were thought to walk the earth, waiting for, or pointing the way to vengeance; that the stain of blood was judged ineffaceable; that the corpse of the murdered bled afresh at the approach of the murderer; that the spirits of evil unceasingly dogged the homicide to destruction; in short, that the feeling universally prevailed which Macbeth so fearfully expresses:

"It will have blood; they say, blood will have blood:
Stones have been known to move and trees to speak;
Angurs, and underwood reactions, have
By magot-pies, and choogies, and rooks, brought forth
The secret'st man of blood!"

They, therefore, who amuse themselves by laughing at the absurd and ridiculous superstitions of the past, laugh unthinkingly, or, if not unthinkingly, unwisely. The superstitions were well fitted for the then framework of society; and could any learned and scientific body of Solomons have had the power of removing them before that society was gradually changed, evil would have come of it instead of good.

And what good is it to us of the present pragmatical and self-sufficient generation that such beliefs have existed? We are hard, and cold, and unimaginative animals enough as it is; but what would we have been without the lays and legends and traditions and romances of the past. Where would have been our poets!—for it is by being fed with such mental nutriment that nearly all true poets are made. Where would have been Shakespeare and two-thirds of the old dramatists? Where would have been Coleridge, and more especially where would have been Scott! And there would have been no translation of the Arabian Nights! We would have been a parcel of thoroughly mercenary and contemptible fellows, with our eyes unceasingly bent towards the latter, instead of occasionally glancing towards the former. With the heavy pressure of mechanical science upon those our times, it requires all the imaginative sustenance we can possibly get to prevent matter from predominating over mind, and save us from retrograding and descending in the scale of intellectual being.

"Crawling between heaven and earth,"

In most nations the quantity and quality of their poetry in general, and their romantic poetry in particular, is in fair proportion with the dearth or abundance of the popular superstitions of their ancestors. Look at the dreamy, and apparently heavy and stupid Germans; what glorious legends have they furnished with their fire-kings; their wood and water spirits—their wild yagers—their demons of the Hartz, and nymphs of the Rhine! and cross that Rhine, to quick, volatile, and airy France, and where, on the European continent, do you find a land, of the same extent, so destitute of old beliefs and gray traditions, and at the same time, a people making such high pretensions to intellectual superiority, with such a paucity of anything worthy the name of poetry!—a land, in fact—

Is whetstone to the tooth—monotony in wire!"

France might have furnished Congresses in abundance, but there could never have been a French Shakespeare, a French Scott, or a French Goethe.

Spain, it is true, had not many national superstitions; but Spain, perhaps, of all European countries, could best afford to do without them in the formation of a poetical character. For centuries, from the defeat of Don Roderick to the discovery of America, her career was a splendid romance. Her every-day life was a romance. Her ordinary state of society was as the grouping of a picture or the arrangement of a drama. The Moorish invasion gave rise to spirit-stirring actions and emotions innumerable, which found their natural vent in legend and song. Antagonistic principles were unceasingly in operation in the born and inherited hatred of two distinct and jealous races to each other, at the same time that the strong under-current of human feelings and affections not unfrequently broke down all barriers of birth and faith, and placed the various actors in the shifting scenes in most picturesque and dramatic contact.

The two nations fought for power, for the land they trod, and for the supremacy of the crescent or the cross. This was the main plot or design of the great drama or epic; while branching from it were episodes without number, of the most intense interest. The Christian knight was found at the lattice of the Moorish lady, and the gallant Moor at the feet of the Spanish Donna. The course of true love, perhaps, never ran less smoothly, and thousands of perilous adventures and hair-breadth escapes, mingled with noble courtesies and generous actions, were the consequence. There was small fear of a prosaic tameness settling on such a land as this, and therefore, despite the absence of what may be called a common-lifemythology, Spain maintained, and maintains, a high station as a land of song.

England, as far as romantic poetry is concerned, is, it must be admitted, flat and commonplace, in comparison with her misty mountain neighbour, to whom she has been largely indebted for this species of composition, as well as to Ireland. Popular superstitions never took such a hold in her level and fertile soil as amid the wilds and fastnesses of the land of the "mountain and the flood;" and the lower orders of her people, at this day, are inferior in poetic susceptibility to those of either Scotland or Ireland.

America, too, is sadly lost in this respect. As a nation, she has not emerged from the shadowy past. She springs from an advanced state of society, and reached maturity without ever having known an intellectual infancy. She has, it is true, the superstitions and traditions of her noble tribes of Indians, at second hand, but even of those her writers have not sufficiently availed themselves.

England and America being, then, both somewhat deficient in the materials for a romantic order of poetry, and being, at the same time, the greatest manufacturing and commercial nations in the world, instead of dreading and lightly laughing at the superstitions and traditions of the past, ought to nurse and cherish them, and by all means to encourage a love for the romantic in poetry, as the best counterbalance to the flat and practical modes of thinking likely to be generated by their triumphs in mechanics. The supernatural, at least in poetical belief, ought to be cultivated as a balance to spinning-jennies and locomotives; else it may happen, in course of time, that we may become a cold, skeptical, mercenary, money-making, money-scraping set of fellows, going round in the ordinary routine of business like a blind horse in a mill—wedded to the near and present—without even a desire for the intellectual and the natural—or without a thought that we are each the possessor of a spirit that belongs to another world besides that on which we eat our dinners and keep our accounts.

Wordsworth has finely expressed his sense of even our at present state society, in one of his noble and indignant sonnets—

"The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;
Lift e we see in Nature that is ours;
We have avers our hearts away, a sordid boon!
The sea that bares her bosom to the moon;
The winds that will be howling at all hours,
And are upgathered now like sleeping flowers;
For this, for everything, we are out of tune;
It moves us not—Great God! I'd rather
Be a Pagan suckled in a creed outworn;
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea;
Or hear old Titan how his wretched horn."

LETTERS ON THE NORTHERN MYTHOLOGY.

"The mighty Ussas, and their feod
With Istanheim's gigantic brood,
The deeds in valorous frenzy true
By Ussas—Odin's dauntless son,
Valhalla's glories, Loki's guile
And Frigg's all-reveling smile—
From ancient Ruess, time honours'd caught,
If theme like this may please ye aught,
Then listen, etc.—Odin's daughter."

C.—3, August 3d, 18—

MY DEAR —: At your request I resume a purpose, for some time laid aside—that of initiating you into the mysteries of that venerable lore known commonly as the "Northern Mythology," but to which the name of "Celtic" is now better applied, inasmuch as (it is universally admitted) its tenets, with some unimportant variations, obtained no less in Britain, Germany and Gaul, than in Scandinavia or "The North."

Aware, as I am, of the little estimation in which this curious relic of antiquity is generally held, perhaps my first step shall be to make you sensible of the weighty claims it possesses on your regard. I might descend upon the wide extent of territory within which it obtained, and which, taking into account the immeasurable regions of Asia from which it originally sprung, far exceeded in Europe alone the dominion of the Greek and Roman institutions; I might tell of the many points of beauty it presents to any other than a careless or prejudiced observer; and which makes rich amends for the rude and extravagant conceits that deform some of its fables. So I might point out its inestimable value, considered as matter illustrative of British antiquities, of British popular usages, legends, traditions and superstitions. But this would lead to a long and tedious disquisition concerning the origin of nations; would bring us back among the Scythians, Goths, Celts, and heaven knows how many other savage and demi-savage people, ages ago "gathered to their fathers," and whose ashes, no less for our own sake than for theirs, it were best should rest in peace; would, in a word, launch us into an ocean of doubts and difficulties, of cavils and conjectures, where many more sea-worthy intellects than yours or mine have foundered; or, taking wrong observations, have gone astray. Without, therefore, venturing upon so perilous an expedition in search of arguments, I shall content myself, at present, with testing the claims of the "Northern Mythology" to your attention, upon the single and incontrovertible fact that some knowledge of its tenets is as necessary to you, in the prosecution of your Danish studies, as an intimacy with their godships of Olympus is to the right enjoyment of the literature of the South.

These things premised, and trusting that enough has been said to inspire you with that holy awe which it is proper you should feel upon approaching the moss-grown altars of Odin and his peers, I proceed to show the way

We are indebted for all we know of the religious and philosophical dogmas we are about to consider (a few detached hints furnished by the Logas, traditional tales of the primitive Scandinavians, excepted) to the zeal and industry of one individual, who deserved to be immortalized, as affording a rare example of a lucid and enlightened spirit, in an age of darkness and fanaticism. When about the year one thousand of our era, the Christian religion was first established in the remote island of Iceland, the last stronghold of the ancient superstitions, the majority of its votaries evinced the same intemperance and intolerant zeal which, in the other countries where that venerable system had once obtained, had so successfully laboured to destroy every monument that might perpetuate its very memory. But their efforts were rendered here abortive by an unlooked-for accident. Samund Sigfusson, though a convert, and even a minister of the true religion, was, at the same time, fortunately, a Scald or bard, and however desirous, in common with others of his order, to destroy the influence of the ancient superstitions of his country, as a system of religious faith, he was no less solicitous to preserve their memory, as containing a body of poetical imagery, the preservation of which was not only necessary to the right understanding of the effusions of the long line of Scalds that graced the annals of Iceland, but of the very existence of that order, whose extinction in a country deemed, par excellence, the land of bards, would have been little short of a national calamity. He laboured, therefore, assiduously, to collect the fragments of the Sacred Odes, through which the tenets of that faith had been inculcated, and which yet survived in the memories of the aged particularly his contemporaries. These fragments he compiled into a work which has been named "The Elder—or Metrical—or Sacred Edda," in order to distinguish it from "The Prose, or Younger Edda," a later work, of which Snorre Sturleson was the author, and of which the object was, to render more easily intelligible those ancient and obscure effusions, and serve as a sort of manual of the art of poetry, for the use of the young aspirants to the honours of Scaldship. In what is to follow, we shall consider these two works as constituting one complete system of Northern Mythology, and shall refer to them indifferently under their common name of "Edda."* It is this we shall consider as our text, availing ourselves, however, upon all intricate and knotty points, of the aids afforded by later works, and in particular by the "Edda doctrine and its origin" of Professor Magnuson; a work of deep research, in which the affinity between the Mythology of Scandinavia, and that of Germany, Britain, etc., and their common derivation from Asia,† are demonstrated.

I have now done—conducted you to the portal of Odin's venerable temple, where I shall leave you for a while to recover breath, and to collect courage for the encounter with dwarfs, demons, giants, and

"Those of horrible and awful
Whence (now) to name was unlawful."

ORIGINAL TALES FROM THE GERMAN.

THE LORD OF THE HILLS.

BY J. A. MUSAUS.

In the deepest recesses of the Silesian mountains, there lived in former days, and yet lives, if the old women in the neighbourhood are to be believed, a gnome or mountain-spirit, known by the title of Lord of the Hills, or more commonly by the familiar nickname of Rubezahl. He dwells in the centre of a huge cliff, and it is given to no mortal eye to detect the entrance to his palace. Here he is surrounded by countless treasures, a part of which sometimes falls to the share of a favoured mortal, when he happens to meet the Lord of the Hill in a good humour. For he it remarked, our gnome, like many a rich old bachelor among ourselves, is somewhat capricious and humoursome. Most especially does he dislike the nickname of Rubezahl, and seldom fails to read a sharp lesson of politeness to any one who is ill-bred enough to use it in his hearing. We may hereafter notice some of the tricks played by him in his fits of ill-humour; but our present story is one in which his spiritual lordship will appear in a more favourable light.

A rich old hunk, who lived near the mountains, once deprived his poor neighbour of his only wealth, his house and little farm, by legal robbery. The land went to the plaintiff, the stock was taken by the officers of the court to pay their fees, and he had nothing left in the wide world but a sickly wife and half a dozen crying children. It pierced his very heart when he heard them moaning and begging for bread. "If we had only a hundred dollars," said he to his wife, "we should not suffer. We could leave this place and hire a good farm somewhere else. You have more than one wealthy relation the other side of the mountains; I will go to them at once, and tell them our pitiful situation, perhaps some one of them will be kind-hearted enough to lend us the sum we want." His feeble, broken-spirited wife did not share in these hopes, but agreed to her husband's plan, as she had none better to offer. Her husband, by break of day, girt his loins for the journey, and took the crust of his last loaf to satisfy his hunger on the road. Weary and faint under the heat of the day he crossed the ridge, and at midnight reached the village where his wife's wealthy kinsmen resided, but not one of them would recognize him or give him shelter for the night. When he complained of his miserable condition, the only consolation he got was, "wifely waste makes woful want," or some proverb equally charitable. He had no money to pay for a bed at the inn, and was forced to spend the night in the fields. Here he lay and watched for the break of day, to resume his sad journey.

As he clambered toilsomely up the mountain, grief and want pressed upon him so sorely, that he was almost desperate. "Two days wages lost," thought he, "broken down by hunger and travel, and no hope left, none! What wilt thou say to thy wife and helpless little ones, when they stretch out their hands when they see thee coming, and cry, give us bread! Let me die at once rather than meet them empty-handed!" Saying thus, the poor man flung himself down on the grass, and wept as though he never would cease. But as hope is always highest in our greatest extremity, so a ray of light beamed on his darkness of mind. He remembered that he was in the dominions of the Lord of the Hill, and called to mind all the wild stories he had heard of his great wealth and capricious bounty. He knew that the powerful spirit liked not to be called by his nickname, but he knew of no other to give him, so he began to shout at the top of his voice, Rubezahl! Rubezahl!

Soon a figure appeared before him, in shape like a brawny charcoal-burner of the mountains, with a red beard that reached down to his girdle, fixed and fiery eyes, and armed with a club like a weaver's beam, which he posed in the air, as though he meant to crush with it the rash mortal who had dared to insult him. "Pardon me, Sir Rubezahl," said Veit, with the boldness of despair, "excuse me, if I did not call you by your right name, only hear what I have to say, and then do as you please with me." The sadness of the man's address somewhat soothed the anger of the spirit, who let his club sink to the ground, and asked him, "Worm of the earth, how dares thou to disturb me! Knowest thou not that thy life must pay the forfeit of thy rashness!" "Sir," answered Veit, "necessity drove me to you. I have a favour to ask of you, which you can easily grant me. Lend me a hundred dollars, and I will pay them back in three years, with lawful interest, as true as I'm an honest man." The spirit exclaimed, "Fool! do you take me for an insurer, that lends out his money at interest? Go to thy fellow-men, and borrow of them what you need." "Alas!" sighed Veit, "there is no fellowship longer among men," and then he told him the whole story of his poverty and troubles, in so moving a manner as to excite the compassion of the spirit, who besides found the man's straightforward request for a loan so new and strange, that it tickled him. He told Veit to follow him, and led the way through the woods to a perpendicular mass of rock. Here he found a narrow entrance, hidden by the bushes, into which he plunged, not without fear and trembling. As he crept on, the opening enlarged, and finally opened into a spacious cavern, lighted by a self-lit flame that hung unextinguished in mid air. But what pleased him most was to see a huge iron chest standing against the wall, filled to the brim with silver dollars. "Take whatever thou needest," said the spirit, "and give me an acknowledgment of the debt." Veit counted out his hundred dollars honestly, while Rubezahl brought out writing materials from a corner. He wrote a promise to pay him the money in three years, with interest, in the best form he could, which the gnome deposited in his huge chest. "And now, my friend," said he, "go thy ways, and make a good use of thy money. Do not forget that you are my debtor, and take good note of the entrance to the cavern. At the end of the third year I shall expect to be paid principal and interest; I am strict in all my dealings, and if I am not paid, will demand my money roughly." Veit promised to make punctual payment, and went on his way rejoicing.

The heavy weight of silver he carried in his pockets seemed to make him lighter instead of heavier. With a joyful heart he hurried homewards, and reached his hut just at nightfall. His starving little ones moaned when they saw him approach, and cried, bread! bread! and his wife, who sat weeping in a corner, had no heart to go to meet him. He bade her to make fire and prepare supper, and flung one of the spirit's dollars on the table. Like a prudent housewife, he did not judge it fit to share so strange a secret with his wife, but told her that the money came from her relatives, who had received him with the utmost kindness, and lent him money to begin the world anew with. The good dame felt no little pride in the liberality of her kinsmen, and took good care to make it known among her neighbours. Veit listened in silence, and only thought of making a good use of his unexpected treasure. He hired a little house and garden, and worked early and late. There must have been magic in Rubezahl's money, for everything he touched turned to gold. In less than three years he was the owner of the house he had hired, and of many a good acre besides, he also rented a large farm in the neighbourhood; in a word, he was already looked up to in the village as a man well-to-do in the world.

Meantime, the day of payment arrived. Veit had so much cash lying by him, that he could easily spare the amount of the debt. He counted it carefully out, principal and interest, and tied it up in a neat little bag. Next he told his wife to put on her bran-new Sunday kirtle, which she had never yet worn, and to dress the children in their best, and get ready for a ride in the wagon. His better half did not understand the meaning of all this preparation, and was curious to know where he meant to take them, so he told her he was going to visit her kinsmen beyond the mountains, and to pay his debts to the kind friend who, three years before, had relieved them in their necessities. She was delighted at the idea of showing off her wealth to the relations who had known her poverty, dress herself out in all her finery and little ornaments, and a team of stout horses carried them rapidly along the road to the mountains. When they came to an ascending sub-path, about half way up, he stopped the horses, descended and bade his wife and children to do the like, and ordered his servant to drive slowly up the hill, and wait for them at the top. He then plunged into the wood and seemed to be looking about him for some landmark. He found it at last, and gathering his family around him, told them for the first time that they were indebted for their good fortunes not to her hard-hearted and unfeeling kinsmen, but to the spirit of the mountain, who lived in that rock, and who would expect to receive his money that day. The women trembled when she heard the name of the much-dreaded spirit, and begged her husband with tears not to venture a second time into the cavern. The children, too, wept and hid behind their mother, and begged papa not to let Rubezahl catch them. Veit was, however, a man of his word, and forced his way through the thick underwood to the place where he had entered the cavern. He found the old blasted oak that marked the spot three years before, but no signs of any opening, nothing but a dead wall of rock. He tried to effect an entrance by every means in his power; he took up a stone and knocked heavily against the rock, pulled out the bag of money and rattled the dollars, laughed, and shouted at the top of his voice, "Spirit of the hill, here is thy money," but Rubezahl was neither to be seen nor heard. He was uneasy in mind, that he was thus prevented from paying his debt punctually, and sat down on a stone by the roadside, thinking what was best to be done. He remembered his first interview with the spirit, and determined to call on him again by his odious nickname, and shouted Rubezahl! Rubezahl! but all in vain. Nothing remained but to return to their homes, and father Veit paced the road in perplexity and disappointment. As they trudged along, a gentle breeze came from the woods, which chased the acorns and brown leaves along the road, and raised the dust in little eddies. This delighted the children, and they ran off in pursuit of the leaves and sticks that were blown about by the wind. A piece of paper was wafted out of the woods along with them, to which one of the little ones gave chase, and caught, as he would a butterfly, by flinging his hat over it. He handed it to his father, who found that it was the paper he had given Rubezahl; at the foot of it was written, "Received payment in full." Veit would have given more than the debt for an opportunity to thank his generous benefactor for all his goodness, but as he obstinately persisted in remaining invisible, he could only thank him in heart. He returned home joyfully, laboured and prospered, grew rich and honoured, and remained an honest man to the day of his death. D.

GALLIES AND GRAVITIES.

A CHAPTER OF EPIGRAMS.

Dr. JOHNSON defines an epigram as "a short poem terminating in a point." The word is derived from the Greek language, and signifies to inscribe or write upon; hence we are to understand that epigrams derive their origin from those inscriptions placed by the ancients on their statues, temples, pillars, triumphal arches, and the like. They were very short at first, being sometimes no more than a single word; but afterwards increasing in length, they were composed in verse, that they might more easily be retained in the memory. This short and convenient method of expressing a thought or epigram soon ceased to be confined to what it was, strictly speaking, an inscription, and came at last to be used upon any occasion or subject; hence the name of epigram now-a-days has a most extensive signification. The fact is, that according to the definition given, nearly the whole of Pope's and Young's poetry, and a great part of the verses of the eighteenth century, consists of a series of epigrams neatly dovetailed into one another, and which, while together they form a harmonious whole, taken separately make good sense, and can be read with pleasure. The last century was indeed the golden age of epigram; but the latter part of the seventeenth was probably the period of our literary history most distinguished for this species of composition. The characteristics of this sort of poem ought to be brevity, beauty, and point; the latter consisting of a sharp, lively, unexpected turn of wit or thought, which concludes the piece. Such was the practice of the famous epigrammatic poet Martial. The following may be taken as a specimen of this writer:

"Great Pompey's ashes Egypt's triumphs swell;
His sons in Europe and in Asia fell:
What wonder that those three so instant died!
So vast a ruin could not spread less wide."

There is subtlety as well as fancy in the last line. Others exclude the point, and require the thought to be equally diffused throughout the whole poem, which is the practice of another Roman poet, Catullus, who imitated the Greeks. There is extant a collection of Greek epigrams by several poets, under the name of Anthologia. These, for the most part, consist of fine thoughts expressed with delicacy, ease, and simplicity. They have nothing pungent in them; but if they do not bite, they sometimes tickle, and always please.

A copy of the first collection of epigrams that appeared in English, has lately fallen under our notice. It is above a century old, and contains so many really very clever short poems, not generally known, that we have selected some of the best for the amusement of our readers. The original, of which the following is a good imitation, although not strictly speaking a translation, is considered one of the nearest little pieces of poetry in the French language. It was addressed to Cardinal Richelieu, who, upon reading the last line, answered very smartly, Nothing. Here we find the point, the wit of an epigram, like the sting of a bee, lies in its tail. Louis XIII. is the monarch referred to in the second verse:

FROM THE FRENCH OF M. MARYARD

Sick of a life, possessed in vain,

I soon shall wait upon the ghost

Of our late monarch; in whose reign

None, who had merit, missed a post.

Then will I charm him with thy name,

And all your glorious wonders done;

The power of France—the Spaniard's shame—

The rising honours of his son.

Grateful the roval shade will smile,

And dwell delightful on your name;

Sweetly appeared his gruff beguile,

And down old losses in new fame.

But when he asks me in what post

I did your wished commands obey,

And how I shared your favour most—

What would you please to have me say!

The impolicy of war is happily satirized in two lines. This epigram bears a resemblance to the well-known anecdote of the lawyer, who gave an oyster-shell to each of his clients, and took the fish to himself:

THE BALANCE OF EUROPE.

Now Europe's balanced, neither side prevails,

For nothing's left in either of the scales.

We can now afford to laugh heartily at the ideas which Englishmen entertained of Scotland a century ago, and even much later. Witness Churchill's poem, "the Prophecy of Famine," and John-

* Commentators differ as to the precise meaning of this word. The most probable conjecture seems to be, that the word signifies great grandmothers, and was applied to the works in question to denote the high antiquity of their contents.

† It is supposed, to wit, that, as early as five hundred years before Christ, a band of emigrants issued from the countries situated between the Caspian and Black seas, and, having traversed Germany, and a part even of Russia, and established colonies at various points of their progress, settled finally upon the shores of the Baltic. That after an interval of four hundred and fifty years, or about fifty years before Christ, another swarm, issuing from the same hive, followed the same track and occupied the possessions (on the north mainly) of their predecessors; and that the various Gothic, Teutonic, and Celtic tribes (of which the prime inhabitants of Britain were one) were the offspring of the former emigrants; the Scandinavians more strictly of the latter.

son's many sarcastic remarks. Multitudes of smaller creatures also made it the butt of their clumsy ridicule. We select the following piece chiefly on account of its brevity:

SCOTLAND.

Had Cain been Scot, heaven would have changed his doom,
Not forced to wander—but condemned to home.

The industry of seventy years, passed under favouring circumstances, has, we suspect, disqualified our country, in some measure, for being a fit residence for a first murderer. The Welsh were also favourite subjects of ridicule with the Scotchman. The venom in the sting of what follows is not very virulent:

A Welshman and an Englishman disputed,
Which of their lands maintained the greatest state;
The Englishman the Welshman quite confuted,
The Welshman would not yet his vaunts abate.
"Ten cooks," quoth he, "in Wales, one wedding sees;"
"Ah," quoth the other, "each man toasts his cheese."

Of all the men ever blasted with poetic fire, Sir Richard Blackmore was the one most persecuted for his verses. He was absolutely like a person in the pillory; all sorts of uncouth things were thrown at him by all sorts of persons. He must have been a man of the most doubtless courage, and have stood always on the very best terms with himself, else he never could have sustained such a furious bombardment of lampoons, epigrams, and all that kind of thing. The publication of his dismal epic of "King Arthur," seems to have thrown the whole herd of versifiers into a sort of phrensy. They appear entirely at a loss for terms of abuse sufficiently gross to pelt the unhappy author with. "Prince Arthur," in ten books, was his first offence; "King Arthur" in twelve, more than doubled the provocation, and a "Satire on Wit" carried it beyond all bounds of endurance. The malignity of the wits of that day rose to a pitch of delirium unprecedented in the history of literature, and led on by Dryden, his professed adversary, the assault was terrific. But Sir Richard did not live in a glass house. The venomous shafts recoiled harmless from the brazen armour of self-esteem by which he was most fortunately protected. We select not the best, but the least objectionable, of the many epigrams of which he was the subject. It is well known that Blackmore was a physician:

TO SIR RICHARD BLACKMORE

I charge thee, knight, in great Apollo's name,
I chod't not dead to all reproach and shame,
Either thy rhymes or physics to disclaim.
Both are too much one feeble brain to rack;
Besides, the bard will soon undo the quack.
Such shoals of readers thy cursed fustian kills.
Thou'lt scarce leave one alive to take thy pills.

Colley Cibber was another unhappy victim of lampoon. Many were the shafts levelled at his devoted head, which was adorned with the laureate wreath of the day. That a person so utterly devoid of political talents should have been elevated to that dignity, was certainly no ordinary provocation, but was the reward of what was deemed great service done to government. It was the "Nonjuror," a play directed against the Jacobites, by which he acquired the place of poet laureate, and the enmity of Pope, who enthroned his monarch of the empire of Dullness in his Duciad. But the other qualities of Cibber were not such as to entitle him to this "bad eminence." His comedy of the "Provoked Husband," written in conjunction with Sir John Vanbrugh, will live as long as there is a stage to act it upon. From a formidable accumulation of epigrams on him, we select two.

ON COLLEY CIBBER.

In merry old England it once was a rule,
The king had his poet and also a fool;
But now we're so frugal, I'd have you to know it,
That Cibber can serve both for fool and for poet.

AGAIN

What different effects does the laurel produce,
In its bough there is honour, but death in its juice;
Since Cibber has humbled its honour so low,
He should taste of the juice, for abusing the bough.

It is well known who Pope gibbeted so many literary small deer in his immortal satire: he had himself suffered in various ways from lampoons, epigrams, and libels of every form and name. His personal defects were a broad mark; so was his torquism. Not content, however, with these subjects as food for ridicule, his enemies attacked him in his intellectual and moral capacity. But here he was invulnerable. The following is a specimen of the skirmishing which he sustained:

ON MR. POPE.

Pride is his pity, artifice his praise,
A mark his virtue, and his fame a blaze;
Insult his charity, his friendship fear,
And nothing but his vanity sincere.

With these calumnious lines, let the following very clever poem pair off. The last verse is eminently happy:

TO POPE.

While malice, Pope, denies thy page
His own celestial fire;
While critics, and while bards, in rage,
Admiring, wond'ring, praise;
While wayward pens thy worth assail,
And envious tongues decry,
These times, though many a friend bewail,
These times bewail not I.
But when the world's loud praise is thine,
And spleen no more shall blame;
When with thy Homer thou wilt shine,
In one established fame;
When none shall rail, and every lay
Devote a wreath to thee;
The day (for come it will) that day
Shall I lament to see.

Pope was made of "penetrable stuff" and quivered beneath the lash of censure, however contemptible the person might be who administered it. But his friend, the dean, was all armed in panoply of tempered steel, from which the dart cast by the small wits of Queen Anne's day rebounded like hailstones from a rock.

THE ANGLES' INVITE.

Come when the leaf comes, angle with me,
Come when the bee hums over the lea,
Come with the wild flowers—
Come with the mild showers—
Come when the singing bird calleth for thee!

Then to the stream side glaily we'll lie,
Where the gay trout glides sulkily by;
Or in some still place
Over the hill face
Hurrying onward tread the light fly.

Then when the dew falls, homeward we'll speed
To our own loved walks down on the mead;
By the bright hearth,
Holding our night mirth,
We'll drink to sweet friendship in need and in deed.

"THEY."—A great many excellent people have had their worldly prospects entirely destroyed, and hundreds, nay, thousands, have had their hearts wrung with anguish in consequence of the slanders of the family of "They." If a man repeats a slander in the street, and he is asked who told him so, his answer is, "They said so." "They" ought to be booted out of society; for "They" have done more mischief in the domestic and social circles than any other family under heaven. How easy it is for a slander to be propagated, and which, perhaps, may ruin a young man's prospects for ever; and it must be borne in mind that "They" are always implicitly believed. An example by way of illustration: A friend meets another in the street, and asks if he has seen Mr. Q. that morning. His answer is no; that he heard that he had been gambling all night. The response is—It is impossible, for he drank tea with me last evening, and did not leave until ten o'clock; who told you so? "They" told me so, is the answer; and, as he desired a favour of me to-day, I shall not grant it until I know the truth of the business, for I don't intend to assist gamblers. So poor Mr. Q., who had always borne a good character—who drank tea with his neighbour, and who, on his return to his residence, retired to rest—and, without having a gaming-table in his life, is branded with the title of gambler, because "They" said so. A slander is like dust; it finds its way into the most remote recesses, and spreads, like the clouds, over the whole face of the heavens. We close this little essay by advising our readers to place very little or no confidence in any story, whose propagator is "They." "They" should never be believed in religion, morals, politics, or in any matter pertaining to social life.

PROGRESS OF IMPROVEMENT.—A correspondent of the New-York American, writing from Utica, says:—"Fifty years ago, the spot where Utica now stands, was the end of the world in this direction. In those days, John Jacob Astor, and Peter Smith, (father of Gertrude), travelled the ground from Schenectady to Utica on foot, pursuing their way through the wilderness. The Indians aided them in carrying the furs back to Schenectady. Returned from their perilous adventure to 'the far west,' they opened a little shop in New-York city, and sold the skins at retail. When their stock was exhausted, they again penetrated the lonely forests of the frontier, and replenished their store. Astor continued the business many years, but Smith commenced the purchase of land. Summers went and came, and waves after waves of emigrants rolled up the long defile of the Mohawk. Mark the change! Two years since, Smith died at Schenectady, leaving millions of acres to his heirs. Astor still lives, one of the wealthiest untitled commoners in the world. Judge Smith lived to travel the route from Schenectady to Utica, in four hours. And to-day when the sun's evening rays shall hush from the undimmed eyes of John Jacob Astor behind the blue hills of Jersey, his vertical beams will be falling on the fur traders of our new Ultima Thule, the mouth of the Oregon. Bishop Berkeley never dreamed of such changes when he penned the line—

"Westward the star of empire takes its way."

THE YANKEES OUTDOGS.—There is an old law of Tennessee, which grants a bounty of three dollars and fifty cents from the state treasury for every wolf scalp taken over the age of six months. One of the papers of that state, the Hamilton Gazette, says a man in that county, wishing to do "the state good," took some hounds and a couple of breeding wolves, took them home, and he and his sons, after some years, in rearing a progeny of that interesting wild beast, which they "came of age," he puts to death and receives the state premium for their scalps! There is a thorn in this operation which fully warrants the Hamilton paper, in heading his article "Tennessee Yankeeism." Whether the operator is or is not a Yankee from the genuine Yankee land, he very well deserves to be considered a Yankee by brevet, at least.

GALLANTRY.—A young chap from "the bush," a short time since, thought he must show his gallantry and take his dulcinea to the city of notions, whither he had never been. As he was passing a restaurant, he espied some bucks drinking of soda. So in steps Sam, with his lady, and says, "Less have some of that." "Kiah—sizz—kerr—went the soda, which soon found its way to the stomach of the beau all full of effervescence as it was. Setting the glass on the stand, the buck turned round to his deer, (who had modestly retired a pace), and said, as he wiped his mouth on his coat sleeve, "I'll tell you what it is, Sal, that is soddy is darn'd good—soddy don't you kiah some?"

FELLOW-SOLDIERS.—At the siege of Capella, 1650, by the French, a Spaniard learnt that his friend had been thrown by the trench by a musket ball. He instantly flew to his succour, but found him stretched on the ground and dead. He threw himself on the body of his friend, embraced him, pressed him for some time to his palpitating breast, and overwhelmed with grief, he expired almost instantly. The archbishop, in witness of this event, gave orders to bury in the same tomb those two friends, whom death itself could not separate. Their bodies were carried in great pomp to Avignon, where a marble mausoleum was erected to their memory. It was the monument which sensibility erected to friendship.

ENBALMING.—It is stated in a French print, that an artist of Paris has succeeded in preparing a chemical compound, that he calls Anti-Septic Fluid, which preserves animal bodies from corruption more perfectly than the ancient practice of embalming. The mode in which it is applied is very simple. All that needs be done is to inject the fluid into the carotid artery, or any other of the great vessels. Bodies thus preserved look more like waxen figures, without having any external corrosion or disfigurement. In birds the plumage, and in beasts the colour, skin and hair, are retained in all the freshness and beauty of life.

WHISKERS.—The Lady's Book—authority in such matters—thus speaks of the very ridiculous dandy custom of wearing long, bushy whiskers:—"Doubtless it is one of the most desirable objects with young ladies and gentlemen to appear amiable in the eyes of each other; but it is quite as evident that they often mistake the proper course for the attainment of that object. Let us take, for example, those beaux who labour so assiduously to cultivate huge whiskers, Boz locks, and mustaches. Could the suffrages of the ladies generally be taken, we incline to think that these fancied improvements would be voted quite objectionable. For besides the immense waste of beard's grease, which results from a taste for these ornaments, they so effectually conceal the countenances of the wearers, that young ladies are sometimes unable to distinguish their own brothers and cousins. Persons who carry their faces behind a mask of this sort, cannot be supposed to possess clear consciences; for honesty and fair dealing have no motives for any such concealment. Ladies, if it's true, are sometimes fond of lapdogs, cats, and kittens, and these have whiskers, and it may be that this circumstance caused the introduction of these appendages among the beaux. But a sheep, notwithstanding all that has been said about its simplicity, is a superior animal to any of those just mentioned, and a sheep wears no whiskers. And if a sheep had any choice in which might be produced on its visage by such means as we are now employed among those of our own species; namely, the application of beard's grease, etc. In short, we may venture to offer it as a general remark, that there is no really valuable animal whose face is disfigured by such additions, either natural or artificial. And, if our authority is worthy of anything, such ornaments are by no means attractive to the more judicious portion of the female observers."

DEFINITION OF THE WORD HUMBUG.—It has been remarked that humbug is that mighty principle which pervades the world, and conducts the operations of mankind. It may be said to be "the air we breathe." The whole town is infected with it; it flies from house to house—darts, like the electric fluid, hither and thither—through the key-hole, down the chimney, along the bell-wires. It hushes in the streets, takes us by the button, overwhelms us, sends us home choking. Persons the least addicted to humbugness are found discharging on others the subtle elements with which they have themselves become unconsciously filled. The truthful and mendacious alike uphold the battery of falsehood—those at the negative, these at the positive end of the lie. The electric chain of humbug is perfect—every knave in communication—every fool a conductor. Humbug is less, and yet more, than a lie. It is the root—the humbug of the flower of falsehood. Humbug is a lie in its practical development. We sometimes hear of such a thing as "a lie with circumstances"—humbug is this circumstantial part of a lie; it is the general country or province of which Lie is the capital. Aware that illustration is the best part of definition, we would proceed to throw new light on the meanings of the word humbug, by examples drawn from every-day political ramblings; but though these are sufficiently promising, they are, perhaps, hardly ripe for gathering. It is unquestionable that a vast amount of humbug in power exists at this time. Lies, in the egg state, it is suspected, have been deposited to an immense extent by political insects of the fungoid class, and only wait the proper time to break the shell and swarm to life. The moral of all this need hardly be pointed—it is pointed. The man, whose understanding its point is not keen enough to penetrate to its pith, deserves to continue all his life what he is—the dupe of faction—i. e. humbug.

HAPPINESS.—The contemplation of human affairs will lead us to this conclusion, that among the different conditions and ranks of men, the balance of happiness is preserved in a great measure equal, and that the high and the low, the rich and the poor, approach, in point of real enjoyment, much nearer to each other than is commonly imagined. In the lot of man, mutual compensations, both of pleasure and of pain, universally take place. Providence never intended that any state here should be either perfectly happy, or entirely miserable. If the feelings of pleasure are more numerous and more lively in the highest departments of life, such also are those of pain. If greatness flatters our vanity, it multiplies our dangers. If opportunities increase our gratifications, it increases, in the same proportion, our desires and demands. If the poor are confined to a more narrow circle, yet within that circle he most of the natural satisfactions, which, after all the refinements of art, are found to be the most genuine and true. In a state, therefore, where there is neither so much to be coveted on the one hand, nor so dread on the other, as at first appears, how submissive ought we to be to the disposal of Providence! How temperate in our desires and pursuits! How much more attentive to preserve our virtue and to improve our minds, than to gain the doubtful and equivocal advantages of worldly prosperity.

DEXTERITY OF THE INDIANS WITH THE BOW.—While the men were packing the horses, after breakfast, I was again engaged with my Indian friend. I took his bow and arrows in my hand, and remarked that the latter was smeared with blood throughout. Upon my expressing surprise at this, he told me, by signs, that they had passed through the body of the buffalo. I assumed a look of incredulity; the countenance of the savage brightened, and his peculiar and strange eyes actually flashed with eagerness, as he pointed to a dead antelope lying upon the ground, about forty feet from us, and which one of the guard had shot near the camp in the morning. The animal lay upon his side, with the breast towards us: the bow was drawn slightly, without any apparent effort, and the arrow flew through the body of the antelope, and skinned to a great distance over the plain.

LOVE-LORN MANIC.—A few miles from Florence, a lady of singular beauty and exquisite symmetry was found dead beneath a tree. She held fast in her lifeless hand the miniature painting of a gentleman, and upon her breast was pendant a paper, inscribed with the following words: "O! you who have hearts susceptible of sympathy and compassion, if ye find the remains of a woman who lost her reason for love, do not disdain to fulfil her desire, and perform the last sad office of affording her a coffin and a grave. Would you open her bosom, which in all the events and vicissitudes of chequered fortune remained chaste and pure, you will find therein a heart the victim of suffering and woe."

A PRESENTMENT.—In Henry the Fifth's time, the clergy, in their consecration, ordered that every priest in every parish should make presentment upon oath of such persons as are defamatory for heretics, in obedience, whereunto, there was a presentment made by some of the parish of St. Mary Overies, in these words, viz.—"Item, we saine that John Stevens is a man we cannot tell what to make of him, and that he hath books we do not know what they are."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Don Quixote of Navarre. A play. By G. P. R. James, Esq., author of "The Gentleman of the Old School," "The Huguenot," "The Gipsy," "The Rover," etc. New-York: Harper and Brothers. Pp. 74.

MR. JAMES has displayed a total contempt for all dramatic rules and proprieties in this play. It is evidently a hurried effort. The incidents of weeks are confusedly crowded together in a single act, in a manner wholly inconsistent with the principles even of that "chartered libertine," the English drama. There are some effective incidents in "Blanche of Navarre;" but to us it seems more like a dramatized novel or tale, than a well-wrought play. Perhaps the author wrote it with no view to its representation upon the stage. We select some passages, which will convey a favourable idea of the style:

Count—Speak, father! speak! you argue like a soldier.
Priest—Once I was one. Now, then, mark well, my son. See you that mighty host, led on by one
All kingly in his mien, with air, and words,
And habit of command; follow'd by troops
Brilliant and glittering, golden arms, and steeds
Beating the eager ground?
Count—Nay, I see naught!
But yet I comprehend.

Priest—Search your own bosom!
Now, see that scanty troop upon a hill,
Plain in their armour, lonely in their guise,
Firm, though not boastful, stern, though calm they stand.

Count—And they shall win the day! Such are the men
That conquer?

Priest—Yes! They conquer if they will.
No power shall force them from that mighty rock;
No light-beel'd charge shall shake their firm array;
No brawling trumpets move their hearts with fear.
But lo! where lies the cause of strife between Those meeting hosts! A castle claim'd by each;
The one from long possession, though usurp'd,
And by the other from an innate right.
Now from the calm old spearman on the hill
Goes down a herald to demand admittance!
Mark how he speaks! "Give entrance to your lord,
To save you from your tyrant's coming power!
We offer peace, tranquillity, and calm
Domestic love, and the bright exercise
Of all sweet charities, hope, trust, and safety!"
The other herald comes and cries, "Fling wide
Your gates! Make room for Joy! The walls we'll keep
With revelry; the doors we'll close with mirth;
Nor sigh, nor tear, nor groan from those without,
Shall e'er disturb our sports. We'll scatter gems—
Youth, purity, and innocence—like dust.
The flowers we tread on shall be human hearts,
Which, when they wather, we will cast away
Fling wide! fling wide the gates! and let us in,
Or we will force the walls and spoil the place!"

Count, (sneakily).—By heaven, they shall not!
Priest—Nobly said, my lord!
You're pledged and sworn, henceforth for evermore,
For heaven's high King, captain and governor
Of that besieged fort. Look to it well!
See that no treason enter; guard the walls
With wakeful vigilance; watch gate and bridge;
And, ever ready with a hero's care,
Start into arms to meet the foe's assault.
That castle is your heart, the foe is vice;
Honour and armed truth are friends at hand.
God's soldier are you! Go and do your duty! [Exit suddenly.]
Count, (musing).—Yes, I will do it! Yes, if there be strength
In any human resolution. Still,
I doubt myself; and doubting argues weakness.
Returning health may bring returning evils.
It may be sickness tames the heart—no love!
Ay, love, perhaps! Such thorns ne'er cross my mind
Without her image rising up therewith
Most beautiful; yet gentle, too, as pure.
How often I have talk'd of love! 'Tis strange!
I would not bring one stain on that bright being
For all imagination's wildest dream
Could picture, or earth give!

Oxford Tracts. New-York: Louis Sherman's Protestant Episcopal Press, 142 Fulton-street.

These papers have, perhaps, created a more important movement in England than any other theological writings of the age. They are from the pens of the most eminent Oxford scholars, and form a distinguished portion of the literature of the day. Their object is to bring back the church to the discipline of the earlier times succeeding the Reformation, and to enable it to rest on a basis independent of the state. Great and, we believe, unmitigated censure has been cast upon them by some who have not read them with proper attention; for, besides their exalted christian character, they are not only harmless, but edifying in the extreme. They are now in the course of re-publication in this, and are exciting great interest among all denominations of christians.

History of the New Netherlands, Province of New-York and State of New-York, to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. In two volumes. By William Dening. Vol. I. New-York: Printed for the author, by Carter and Hoops, Exchange place.

The first volume of this valuable work, embellished with a fine engraving of Governor Stuyvesant, is now for sale. Its typographical appearance is remarkably neat, and it is enriched with several interesting maps and plans illustrative of the early topographical history of the city and state. Mr. Dening has thus far executed his task in a manner honourable to his industry of research, as well as to his literary ability. We shall take a more extensive notice of his labours, so soon as the second and concluding volume shall appear. In the meantime we commend the work to the public as answering, in every respect, the high expectations which have been raised in regard to its execution.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We have placed the contribution of "E. W. P." on file for insertion.—Among the new works upon our table we find the United States Military Magazine for July. This journal is published in Philadelphia by Huddy and Durval. It is beautifully embellished with coloured prints, and contains much interesting matter. It is deserving of the attention of all who take an interest in the progress of our army and navy.—The "Rose of Sharon" is the title of a new annual published in Boston, edited by Miss S. C. Edgerton. It is handsomely printed, and for sale in this city by P. Price, 130 Fulton-street.—We know nothing of Mr. Ashincloss, nor have we heard the particulars of his rencontre with Mr. Finn. Perhaps our friend of the Boston Morning Post can enlighten our inquisitive correspondent.—We have not been informed as to the probability of Nible's opening his little opera-house for the winter season.—The remarks of "Crito" upon the management of the New Chatham Theatre are, we apprehend, of very little concern to the public.—We must decline the communications of "A. R.," "Sivia," "Y. X.," "Claude," and "Dramaticus!"—The fair correspondent to whom we are indebted for the "Letters on the Northern Mythology," is requested to render the chronology of her communications a little more legible.—In the last number of the Mirror, the notice of Mr. Keen, the word Othello was accidentally substituted for that of Leont, in a part of the edit.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1839.

The copyright question.—The friends of the international copyright law cannot be too early in the field, as the session of Congress is near at hand. It would constitute an era in American literature if this important measure could be carried. At present, our publishers being permitted, without "let or hindrance," to prey at large upon English authors, have little or no inducement to pay for native productions. Of course we have no right to expect it of their patriotism to extend an encouragement inconsistent with their interest. The publisher, like other tradesmen, has a right to judge of the value to him of the wares offered; and it is absurd for an author to fly into a rage because his book is rejected. But we would have it made consistent with the interests of publishers to give priority to works of American manufacture; or, at least, to place them on the same footing with English books. The rapid communication with Great Britain, by steam, has made it more than ever desirable and important that an international copyright law should be established. The system of plunder practised by the publishers of this country, and now retaliated by those of England, is truly disgraceful. We hope that Mr. Clay will renew his praiseworthy efforts, at the coming session of Congress, to put a stop to the evil. The measure is due to the interests of American literature, and to the just claims of British authors.

Whittling.—In his late work upon this country, Marryat makes the following remarks upon the Yankee habit of whittling:—"I may here just as well mention the custom of whittling, which is so common in the eastern states. It is a habit, arising from the natural restlessness of the American, when he is not employed, of cutting a piece of stick, or anything else, with his knife. Some are so wedded to it, from long custom, that, if they have not a piece of stick to cut, they will whittle the backs of the chairs, or anything within their reach. A Yankee, shown into a room to await the arrival of another, has been known to whittle away nearly the whole of the mantelpiece. Lawyers in court whittle away at the table before them; and judges will cut through their own bench. In some courts they put sticks before noted whittlers to save the furniture. The Down Easters, as the Yankees are termed generally, whittle when they are making a bargain, as it fills up the pauses, gives them time for reflection, and, moreover, prevents any examination of the countenance; for in bargaining, like in the game of brag, the countenance is carefully watched, as an index to the wishes."

Champagne and Cigars.—It is quite a notorious fact, that much of the champagne drunk in this country is manufactured in New-Jersey, out of the juice of apples and pears, combined with more deleterious ingredients. It may not be so generally known that there are large manufactories of "Spanish" cigars in Massachusetts and Connecticut. The editor of the Northampton Courier, taking a drive lately through the southerly part of Amherst and Hadley, was surprised to find extensive fields of tobacco under cultivation. It is a profitable crop, but highly exhausting to the soil. This tobacco is sent down the river to cigar manufactories in Connecticut. There it undergoes an important transmutation, being changed from a Yankee weed to a delicious "Havana" or "Principe." The inside is principally made up of American tobacco; but an outer covering of genuine tobacco is given, just to deceive the eye, and beguile thousands, who imagine they are luxuriating upon the fragrance of a delicious Spanish cigar. Why should we awaken them from their blissful ignorance?

Astor House.—We notice in the daily papers an advertisement of the lessees of this house, offering to make arrangements with private families, or for single rooms, for the winter. We agree with a contemporary that there is no establishment in the country which combines more of the elements of comfort, convenience and luxury than the Astor House. The order, the attention, the spirit of accommodation, and politeness, which distinguish the heads of the establishment, pervade all the departments, and render it, in all respects, a most agreeable and desirable residence.

Boz.—A new work, "on an entirely new plan," is announced by Mr. Charles Dickens; the first number to appear in March. "Nicholas Nickleby" is nearly completed, and we are glad to see that the last number is to contain a portrait of the popular author from the pencil of Maclise, and engraved by W. Finden. Genius and talent, illustrated by genius and talent, are always acceptable.

The opera at the Park.—No better evidence could be given of the advanced state of musical science in this city than is afforded in the triumphant success of Beethoven's "Fidelio" at the Park. This beautiful opera has been produced night after night to good houses, and with increased applause. Mr. Manvers and Mr. Gubeele have become decided favourites, and Miss Poole and the prima donna, Mrs. Martyn, have won the hearty approbation of large and judicious audiences. Mrs. Martyn's enactment of the part of "Fidelio," so admirably represented by Malibran and Schroeder-Devrent—is above all praise. This lady is an artist in the truest sense of the word, and completely enters into the spirit of her part in its dramatic and musical sense. She interprets Beethoven's beautiful traces of feeling, and imbodies in her performance all those sentiments her position may be imagined to inspire. But this is not all. She forgets herself entirely, nor seeks to display the charms of her voice at the expense of the dramatic flow of the piece. Without an attempt at artificial grace—she sings the part, and nothing but the part, with her whole soul. But the connoisseur, as he listens to her magnificent descents in the diminished seventh, recognizes a talent far surpassing that of most of the singers we have known here. That pathos of voice, and purity of method, that perfect intonation and accuracy require far more artistic talent than trill and roulade, and vocal herat. The one is as much physical as the other is an emanation from the true sentiment of the part.

On which side?—The following, from the American, alludes to a question which was originally started in the Mirror some years since, and which, we regret to perceive, is still far from being decided. Suppose we submit the case to Victoria for arbitration, she being the most distinguished lady equestrian of the day.—"The awfully important question, on which side shall the attendant cavalier of a lady place himself when riding? is daily becoming of greater importance, and we expect to see that several of our contemporaries who have expressed themselves with a positiveness, which will render it very difficult for them to back out, in case they should think it necessary to change sides. The right-siders are wrong-headed. The left-siders have left their wits behind them. There is now an excellent field for the agency of some great compromiser. A similar kick-up agitated the community some time since. Both sides broke loose, and fury was running away with judgment, when a sober old nag suggested a return to the respectable fashion of olden time, when the gentleman rode on neither side of the lady, but before her, on a pillion behind him, her arm necessarily clasping his waist for her greater security. Both sides thought this delicious, and thus the controversy was amicably settled."

Silhouette likenesses.—The apartments of Monsieur Edouard in Broadway, nearly opposite the Apollo Gallery, are well worth a visit. The rapidity with which the artist executes full length, characteristic profiles, is truly astonishing. In two minutes, he will cut you a likeness that shall be generally recognized by your acquaintances. Among his collection will be found some capital outlines of Edward Irving, the eccentric preacher, representing him in all the various attitudes, in which he was accustomed to address his audience. Likenesses of Sir Walter Scott, and many of the most distinguished characters in England may also be seen in the exhibition.

An imperial attribute.—Our foreign papers inform us, that one of the most curious ceremonies, incidental to the accession of the young Sultan to the throne of Turkey, was the solemn shaving of his chin for the last time. This once done, no razor is henceforth allowed to approach his face, the beard being one of the attributes of supreme power, which must be suffered to grow without being touched by any kind of instrument. One meets a number of young exquisites in Broadway, who, if their beards could qualify them, would be Sultans. Why don't they take a trip to Constantinople?"

The Richmond Theatre.—Mr. George Jones has re-opened the Avon Theatre in Richmond for the season. We learn with pleasure that his management gives general satisfaction, and that his success has thus far been most encouraging. He has engaged a respectable company—Mrs. Jones herself constituting no small attraction. She is a lady of remarkable talent, and we learn from a competent judge, that she promises to attain the highest rank in her profession. Cannot one of our New-York managers offer her an engagement?

Architecture in Broadway.—A correspondent finds fault with the architecture of the new building in Broadway near Leonard-street, erected to contain the New-York Society Library. We cannot deny that the good taste of the red sand-stone columns is somewhat questionable. They support nothing, and are quite as useful and ornamental to the building as would be a fifth wheel to a coach. When will our artists abandon this grotesque and anomalous style of architecture?

The National Theatre.—The appearance of Mr. Vandenhoff and his daughter at this Theatre will, doubtless, give a new impulse to its prosperity. Mr. Hill, the excellent personator of Yankee character, will also prove an attraction. We perceive, by the London papers, that his engagements in that city have been quite successful.

The Boocery Theatre.—This establishment has been doing a thriving business during the past month. The house was filled to overflowing on the nights of the benefits of Mrs. Shaw, and of Hamblin and Barry. A new piece, entitled the "Roman Captive," in which Mr. Hamblin and Mrs. Shaw appear, is announced.

Mrs. Butler.—It is rumoured that a new work from the pen of Mrs. Fanny Kemble Butler, may soon be expected; but whether it is to be a romance, a book of travels, or a play, we have not been informed.

JUST MARRIED.—A PICTURE.

She stands down-looking on the sparkling tide
Of the bright river, half in beautiful fear,
Half bounding joy to find herself a bride;
Her blue eyes glistening with an infant tear,
Her lips apart,
Her colour raised—and you may almost hear
Her beating heart.

He sits beside the river's bank; his eyes
Upturn'd to her sweet face, with looks so full
Of admiration, as if earth supplies
To him no object half so beautiful:
One ringle fair
Has left its sister curls, and nestling lies
In his dark hair.

It is the twilight of a summer eve;
A crimson blush just tips the western trees,
As though the lingering sun beams sigh'd to leave
That loving couple fair, sweetening the breeze
With honey words,
'Mid flowers and rippling streams, low humming bees,
And singing birds.

TESTIMONY.—A witness being called to give evidence in a court in Connecticut, respecting the loss of a shirt, gave the following: "Mother said, that Ruth said, that Nell said, that Poll told her, that she saw a man that saw a boy run through the street with a streaked flannel shirt, all checker, checker, checker; and our gals won't lie, for mother has whipped them a thousand times for lying."

A HUMOROUS COBBLER.—A cobbler in one of the eastern cities thus announces his calling:—"Surgery performed here upon old boots and shoes, by adding to the feet, making good the legs, tending the broken, healing the wounded, mending the constitution and supporting the body with sole."

A GOOD MAN.—The influence of the good man ceases not at death; he, as the visible agent is removed, but the light and influence of his example still remain; and the moral elements of this world will long show the traces of their vigour and purity; just as the western sky, after the sun has set, still betrays the glowing traces of the departed orb.

WILLERFORCE.—The late Mr. Willerforce's income, when he came of age, is stated to have been ten thousand pounds a year, one-fourth of which he was in the habit of giving away in charities of various kinds. His liberality to all who stood in need, and his profuse expenditure in the promotion of the most praiseworthy objects, appear, however, to have had an effect upon his once ample fortune; so that in the decline of life he became straightened in his circumstances. A few years before his death he sustained great loss by a milk company, into which, it is suspected, his family were duped. He had himself no personal concern in the affair, but, as having given guarantees for his sons; but his loss, it is said, was not less than fifty or fifty thousand pounds, to meet when his Yorkshire estate was sold. He was obliged to live his last years with two of his sons, one of whom was presented, unsolicited, to a living by Lord Brougham, when lord chancellor.

GHYATNESS OF MIND.—A Corsican, the leader of a gang of banditti, who had been famous for his exploits, was at length taken and committed to the care of a soldier, from whom he contrived to escape. The soldier was tried and sentenced to death. At the place of execution, a man, coming up to the commanding officer, said, "Sir, I am a stranger to you, but you shall soon know who I am; I have heard that one of your soldiers is to die for having suffered a prisoner to escape; he was not at all blameless; besides, the prisoner shall be restored to you. Behold him here—I am the man. I cannot bear that an innocent man should be punished for me, and I come to the myself." "No," cried the French officer, who felt as he ought the sublimity of the action, "thou shalt not die, and the soldier shall be set at liberty. Endeavour to reap the fruits of thy generosity; thou deservest to be henceforth an honest man."

QUITE NEAR.—"Issy, Harry, you were at the Battle of Bunker Hill!" "Not exactly, Tom, but then my daddy says he knew a man that told him that he saw an old friend of his daddy's had an uncle who often affirmed that a great grandfather, by the mother's side, belonged to a regiment of foot, in which there was a man who said that a daddy of his told him that a neventh uncle met a man one day who said that a daddy of his told him ever any closer!" "Not quite as near as that, I thank you."

CANINE THOUGHTS.—An attack was recently made by robbers on the celebrated convent of Mount St. Bernard. The fraternity finding argument and religious exhortation unavailing, let loose eighteen of those dogs, which they are known to keep principally for the benevolent purpose of saving the lives of bewildered travellers. Eleven of the robbers were killed, and several wounded so severely that all the skill of the pious brotherhood could hardly avail to the saving of their lives. Several of the dogs were also killed.

SIR S. GANTH.—Many amusing anecdotes are recorded of this eminent poet and physician. On one occasion, when he met the members of the celebrated Kit-kat club, he declared that he must soon begone, having many patients to attend; but on some excellent wine being placed on the table, and the conversation becoming interesting and animated, the doctor soon forgot his professional engagements. His friend, Sir Richard Steele, however, thought it his duty to remind the doctor of his poor patients. Ganth immediately pulled out his list upon which was written fifteen names. "It is no matter whether I see them to-night or not," said he, "for nine of them have such bad constitutions, that all the physicians in the world can't save them; and the other six have such good constitutions that all the physicians in the world can't kill them."

ORIGIN OF TANNING AND FEATHERING.—The Duke of Brunswick and his army coming before a rich monastery, into which the country people had carried all their goods and cattle, the duke desired the overseer of it to send out some provisions for his army, and he would give them his protection and see them repaid, but they peremptorily refused. "Well," says the duke, "as fair means will not do other means shall," so they fell to butchery and they yielded; there was an infinite store of provisions given to the soldiers. The duke took two of the friars and daubed them all over with tar and pitch, and then made them tumble themselves in feathers, so that they looked like two African monsters; he next sent them home to tell their father he had sent him two fledged owls for his dinner.

THE TITHES SYSTEM.—A clergyman in Ireland lately concluded his sermon with the following words:—"Brethren, next Friday is my title-day, and those who bring their tithes, which are now due to me, shall be rewarded with a good dinner; but those who do not, may depend that on Saturday they will dine on a lawyer's leaver."

EXTRACTS OF SPECULATIONS.—A speculator at the West recently said to a friend:—"When I first came to Chicago I had not a rag to my back, and now I am covered with rags."

BAD THINGS.—An unfaithful servant, a smoky house, a stumbling horse, a scolding wife, an aching tooth, an empty purse, an unfaithful child, an incessant tinker, hogs that break through enclosures, a dull razor, mosquitoes, a fog, and a water-carrier that don't pay for his paper.

CHAPTER I.

An introduction—a character.

AUGUSTE St. Clair was not popular in society, and with reason; for he sought to please only where he liked. Some he courted, others he took pains to avoid. He was indolent and abstracted.

One night as they were leaving the Theatre Italien, the Marchioness of A . . . asked him how Mademoiselle Sontag had sung? "Yes, madam," replied St. Clair, with one of his most agreeable smiles; thinking of anything but the lady's question. This could not be laid to his diffidence, for he would chat with a wit, a nobleman, or even a fashionable woman, on terms of the most perfect equality. So the marchioness decided that St. Clair was a prodigy of impertinence and folly.

Auguste dined one Monday with Madame B . . . and on leaving her, declared that he had never met with a more agreeable lady. Madame B . . . gathered wit abroad for a month, and lavished it in one evening at home. St. Clair met her on Thursday of the same week. This time he was a little enervé. A second visit determined him never more to enter her house. Madame B . . . gave out that St. Clair was a young man decidedly unfashionable, and of abominably bad manners.

He was born with a disposition tender and affectionate, but at an age when we too easily receive impressions that are to last through life, his intense sensibility had excited the ridicule of his companions. He was haughty, ambitious, and obstinate as a child. Henceforward he made it a study to conceal every outward indication of what might appear an unworthy weakness. His end was attained, but the victory was dearly bought. He could disguise from others the emotions of his own too tender heart, but in slating them within himself, he only added to their intensity. In the world, he bore the reputation of an unfeeling and unfeeling creature; in retirement, his restless imagination conjured up a thousand disquietudes, the more tormenting because he could not impart them. How true—that it is difficult to find a friend!

Difficult! Is it possible? Have two beings ever lived who kept no secret from each other? St. Clair was not a believer in friendships, and the world knew it. He was uniformly cold and reserved with young men in society. Never did he busy himself with their secrets; but all his thoughts and most of his actions were to them mysteries. The French love to talk about themselves, so St. Clair was, in spite of himself, the depository of a great many secrets. His friends, and this word designates those whom we see twice a week, complained of his want of confidence; in fact, one who without our asking, imparts his secret, is commonly offended if we fail to impart our own. He seems to think that there should be a reciprocity of indiscretion.

"He is close-buttoned up to his chin," said the gallant Captain Alphonse de Thémènes; "I never could have the least confidence in that devil of a St. Clair."

"I believe him half a Jesuit," observed Jules Lambert, "some one swore to me the other day that he had twice met him coming out of St. Sulpice's. Nobody knows what he is thinking about. For my own part, I never feel at ease in his presence."

They separated. Alphonse met St. Clair on the Boulevard Italien, walking with his head down, taking notice of no one. Alphonse stopped him, took him by the arm, and before they had reached the rue de la Paix, he had given him the whole history of his amours with Madame . . . who was tied to such a jealous and cruel husband.

That evening Jules Lambert lost his money at carté. He attempted to dance. In dancing, he jostled a gentleman, who had also lost his money, and was of course in a very ill humour himself. Sharp words ensued; a meeting was arranged. Julius begged of St. Clair to serve as his second, and at the same time took occasion to borrow some money of him, which he forgot to repay.

After all, St. Clair was well enough as the world goes. His faults annoyed only himself. He was obliging, often amiable, seldom tiresome. He had travelled much, and read much, and never spoke either of his books or his travels except on compulsion. Besides, he was tall and well made; his face was noble and intellectual, almost always too grave, but his smile was full of beauty.

I had forgotten one point. St. Clair was attentive to the sex, and affected their society more than that of men. Had he loved? That it is difficult to say. But if this insensible being was capable of love, the world knew that the pretty Countess Mathilde de Courcy was the object of his preference. The countess was a young widow, at whose house he continually visited. In proof of their intimacy the following were conclusive presumptions: In the first place was a politeness almost amounting to ceremony from St. Clair towards the countess, and vice versa; then, his affectation of never mentioning her name in society, or, if it were necessary, never with the least commendation. Again, before St. Clair was introduced to her, he had been passionately fond of music, and the countess had quite as strong a taste for painting. Since they had become acquainted, their tastes had entirely changed. In conclusion, when the countess left for the Springs the last year, St. Clair set out six days after her departure.

CHAPTER II.

Mourning of the widow.

It was a fine night in July, and so late as to be almost morning, perhaps not much more than an hour from sunrise. At this moment the park-gate of a country-seat silently opened, and some one glided out of it in a very stealthy fashion. This country-seat belonged to Madame d. Courcy, and this somebody was St. Clair. A lady, enveloped in a peignee, accompanied him to the gate, and followed him with her eye till he had reached the end of the path, which ran along by the wall of the garden. St. Clair stopped, cast about him a watchful glance, and waved his hand as a signal for his companion to return. The clearness of a July night enabled him still to distinguish her pale figure, motionless in the same position. He retraced his footsteps, approached, and pressed her tenderly in his arms. He wished to prevail on her to return; but he had still a thousand things to say. Their conversation lasted about ten minutes, when they heard the voice of a peasant who was going out to labour in the fields. A kiss was given and received, the gate closed, and St. Clair at a bound reached the end of the path.

He followed a road which appeared familiar to him. Sometimes he almost leaped for joy, and ran along striking the bushes with his cane; again he would stand still, or walk along slowly, gazing upon the sky, which had begun to put on its orient purple. By his actions one would have thought him a lunatic, overjoyed with having escaped from his cage. After half an hour's walk, he reached the gate of a little solitary mansion, which he had hired for the season. He had a key; he entered; then he cast himself on a splendid couch, and there, his eyes fixed, his lips curved with a gentle smile, he mused—he fell into a waking dream. His imagination visited him only with thoughts of happiness.

"How happy am I!" said he, every moment, to himself. "At last I have met with a heart that can comprehend my own! Yes, it is my ideal that I have found! I have at once a friend and a mistress! What a character!—what an impassioned soul! She has loved no one before myself—and she will never love but me!" Vanity always mingles itself with the affairs of this world. "She is the most beautiful woman in Paris," thought St. Clair; and his imagination repeated all her charms. "She has selected me from all others. She numbered among her admirers the elite of society. This colonel of hussars—so handsome—so gallant—and not so very much of a coxcomb; this young author who makes such pretty acrostics, and is so clever at an epigram; this Russian Lovelace, who has seen the Balkan, and has served under Diebetsch; and, above all, Camille P. . . , who has wit certainly, fine manners, an attractive sabre-wound on his forehead. . . . All these she has rejected. And I!" Then came the old burthen. "How happy I am!—how very, very happy!" He rose and opened the window, for he could not breathe—now he walked about the chamber, now tossed restlessly upon his couch.

A fortunate lover is almost as great a bore as an unhappy one. A friend of mine, who not unfrequently found himself playing the one or other of these characters, knew no other mode of enlivening my attention than by giving me a capital breakfast, during which he was at liberty to speak of his amours; the coffee swallowed—and the subject was changed.

As I cannot give a breakfast to all my readers, I will, at least, spare them the love-sick reflections of St. Clair. Besides, we cannot always live in the clouds. St. Clair was wearied out; he yawned, stretched his arms, and saw that it was broad day: he must needs think of sleep. When he woke, he found by his watch that he had hardly time to dress and hurry to Paris, where he was to make one at a young man's dinner-party.

CHAPTER III.

A dinner-party and a discovery.

They had just finished another bottle of champagne; the reader must divine the number of it. Let him be satisfied with knowing that the moment had arrived—an early moment at a dinner of youths—when all the company tries to speak at once, and the good heads begin to be solicitous for the bad ones.

"I wish," cried Alphonse de Thémènes, who never lost a chance to speak of England, "I wish it were the fashion in Paris, as it is in London, for each one to toast his mistress. In this way, we would find out the charmer that St. Clair is sighing for;" and in speaking thus, he fills his own glass, and those of his neighbours.

St. Clair, a little confused, was on the point of replying, when Jules Lambert anticipated him. "I approve the custom," said he, "strongly;" and, raising his glass—"To all the milliners of Paris! excepting the lame, blind, and the thirty-year-old."

"Horrah! hurrah!" cried the English-mad youths.

St. Clair rose, his glass in hand. "Gentlemen," said he, "I have not a heart so vast as that of my friend Jules, but it is more constant; and my constancy is the more to my credit, as I have for some time been separated from the mistress of my thoughts. I am sure, however, that you will approve my choice; if, indeed, you are not already my rivals. To Judith Pasta! gentlemen!—May we soon welcome back the first tragic actresses of Europe!" Thémènes wished to criticise the toast, but the acclamations prevented him. Having parried this thrust, St. Clair thought himself at rest for the day.

Conversation now turned upon theatricals. The dramatic censorship served as a transition to political. From the Duke of Wellington they got upon English horses, and passed, by a natural association of ideas, to English women: as for young people, the two most desirable objects in life are, a fine horse and a pretty mistress.

Then they discussed the means of obtaining these much-courted objects. Horses could be bought, women could be bought also; but the subject is a delicate one, we will drop it. St. Clair, after having modestly pleaded his want of experience on this tender topic, concluded that the first condition of pleasing a woman is to make oneself marked—to be different from other people. But is there any general rule for this difference? He thought not.

"So, in your view," said Jules, "a lame person or a hunchback is more likely to please than a straight man, made like other people."

"You carry things to the extreme," replied St. Clair, "but I adopt, if necessary, all the consequences of my proposition. For instance, if I were hump-backed, I would not worry myself about it, but would busy myself with making conquests. I would address myself to two classes of women only—either to those really possessed of sensibility, or to the many who make pretensions to singularity, or eccentricity, as they call it in England. To the first I would paint the horror of my situation, the cruelty of nature towards me. I would try to interest them in my fate; to make them believe me capable of a passionate love. I would wound one of my rivals in a duel, and poison myself with a very moderate dose of laudanum. At the end of a few months my hump would vanish, and then I would use my cue to watch the first glimpse of sensibility. As to women who pretend to originality, the conquest is easy. Only persuade them that it is a duty established rule, that a hunchback was never fortunate in love; and they will not rest easy till they have given the rule an exception."

"What a Don Juan!" cried Jules.

"Let us cut off our legs, gentlemen," said Colonel Beaujeu, "since we are so unfortunate as to have been born without humps."

"I am quite of the opinion of St. Clair," said Hector Roquantin, who was only three feet and a half high; "we see, every day, the most beautiful and fashionable women connecting themselves with men that you handsome youths would never imagine to be at all in your way."

"Hector, get up, I beg of you, and ring for some more wine," said Thémènes, with the suspect air in the world.

The dwarf rose, and every one smiled as he thought of the fox in the fable who had lost his tail. "For my part," said Thémènes, taking up the conversation, "the more I have seen, and the more I see, a passable figure—casting a complacent glance at the mirror opposite—"a passable figure, and good taste in dress, are quite irresistible, with the most cruel;" and with a flip he knocks off a crumb of bread that had attached itself to the inside of his coat.

"Bah!" cried the dwarf, "with a pretty figure, and a coat of Staub, we may get women that we would be faithful to for a week, and who would bore us at a second appointment. Something more is necessary to make us love—that is, what we call—love! We want . . ."

"Hold!" interrupted Thémènes, "do you desire a conclusive example. You have all known Massigny, and you know the sort of man he is. In manners like an English groom; and in conversation like his horse; but he was beautiful as an Adonis, and tied his cravat like a Brunel. To say every thing in a word, he was the most ultra bore I ever knew."

"He expected to bore me to death," said Colonel Beaujeu. "Only imagine that I was obliged to travel two hundred leagues with him."

"Do you know," asked St. Clair, "that he caused the death of poor Richard Thornton, whom you all knew?"

"But," rejoined Jules, "do you not know, then, that he was assassinated, by brigands, near de Fondi?"

"True, but you must know that Massigny was at least an accomplice of the crime. Many travellers—and among them Thornton—had arranged to journey in company to Naples, from fear of the brigands. Massigny wished to join the caravan. As soon as Thornton knew it, he set out in advance, from a horror, I believe, of having to pass two days with Massigny. He set out alone; and you know the rest."

"Thornton was no fool," said Thémis, "and of two deaths he chose the pleasantest. Any one in his place ought to have done the same thing." Then, after a pause: "You will allow, then, that, when alive, Massigny was the most tiresome man on earth."

"Agreed!" They carried it by acclamation.

"We wrong no one," said Jules; "we make an exception in favour of . . . ; especially when he talks polite."

"You will readily admit further," pursued Thémis, "that Madame de Courcy is a lady of talent."

There was a short pause. St. Clair hung his head, and imagined that all eyes were fixed upon him.

"Who doubts it!" said he at length, bending over his plate, and examining, with a very minute curiosity, the flowers painted on the porcelain.

"I maintain," said Jules, "raising his voice, 'I maintain that she is one of the three loveliest women in Paris.'"

"I knew her husband," said the colonel; "he has often shown me very charming letters from his wife."

"Auguste," interrupted Hector Requantin, "introduce me to the countess. They say that you make the rain and sunshine of her house."

"Towards the close of autumn," murmured St. Clair, "when she returns to Paris. I—I believe that she does not receive company in the country."

"Do you intend listening to me?" cried Thémis. "Silence was restored. St. Clair sat as uneasy upon his chair as a culprit at the bar of the assizes."

"You had never seen the countess three years ago. You were then in Germany," St. Clair, replied Alphonse de Thémis, with a provoking sang froid. "You cannot form an idea of what she was then: beautiful, fresh as a rose, lively, witty, and gay as a butterfly. Well! know you, among her numerous worshippers, whom she honoured with her favour! Massigny! The greatest dunce and coxcomb in the world—he turned the head of the most spiritual of women. Do you believe that a hunchback would have done as much! No, no, believe me, have a good figure, and a good tailor, and fear nothing."

St. Clair was in a cruel situation. He was about giving the lie direct; but a fear of compromising the countess withheld him. He would have wished to say something in her favour, but his tongue was frozen. His lips trembled with rage, and he sought in vain for some out-of-the-way means of getting up a quarrel.

"What!" cried Jules, with an air of surprise, "Madame de Courcy surrendering to Massigny! Frailty, thy name is woman!" "A woman's reputation is of so little consequence," said St. Clair, in a dry and scornful tone, "that it is well worth while to press it into the service, when one would make a display."

While speaking, he remembered, with horror, a certain Tuscan vase, which he had seen a hundred times on the mantel-piece of the countess, at Paris. He knew that it was present from Massigny on his return from Italy; and—a most suspicious circumstance!—this vase had been carried from Paris into the country. And every evening, on taking off her bouquet, Mathilde placed it in the Tuscan vase.

The word died upon his lips; he saw nothing, he thought of nothing—but the Tuscan vase!

A conclusive proof! the critic will cry: to suspect his mistress for such a trifle! Have you ever been in love, master critic?

CHAPTER IV.

A new comer—Fresh from Egypt.

Thémis was in too pleasant a mood to take offence at the tone in which St. Clair had addressed him. He replied with an air of lightness and good-humour.

"I only repeat what all the world says. The story passed for true when you were in Germany. As for the rest, I have very little acquaintance with Madame de Courcy; it is now eighteen months since I have been in her house. It is possible that people have been deceived. To return to what we were talking about, if the example I have just mentioned should be false, I should not be the less correct. You all know that the most intellectual woman in France—she whose works—"

The door opened, and Theodore Nivelle entered. He had just returned from Egypt.

"Theodore! and just returned!" He was overwhelmed with questions.

"Have you brought back a real Turkish costume?" asked Thémis. "Have you an Arabian horse and an Egyptian groom?"

"What sort of a man is the pacha?" said Jules. "When does he make himself independent! Have you seen him cut off a head at a single blow of the sabre?"

"And the dancers!" said Roquantin. "Are the women beautiful at Cairo?"

"Have you seen General L . . ." asked Colonel Beaujeu. "How has he organized the army of the pacha? Has Colonel C . . . given you a sabre for me?"

"And the pyramids! And the cataracts of the Nile! And the statue of Memnon! Ibrahim Pacha! etc. etc. etc. . . ."

All spoke at once: St. Clair was thinking only of the Tuscan vase. Theodore having seated himself on his crossed legs, a habit that he had formed in Egypt, and had not yet laid aside in France, waited till his querists were tired, and spoke as follows, fast enough not to be easily interrupted.

"The pyramids! On my word it is a regular humber. It is nothing so high as people think. Why the Minister at Strasbourg is only four metres less. But don't talk to me of antiquities. I am tired of them. The very sight of a hieroglyphic would make me faint. There are so many travellers who busy themselves about these things! But my chief end has been to study the faces and manners of all that strange population, which throngs the streets of Alexandria and Cairo; such as the Turks, Bedouins, Copts, Fellahs, and Mōghrebins. I took some hasty notes whilst I was at the lazaretto. An infamous place this lazaretto. I hope that none of you believe in contagion! I have smoked my pipe tranquilly in the midst of three hundred infected patients. Ah! colonel, you would see there a fine cavalry—splendidly mounted. I will show you the superb arms which I have brought home. I have a dyer which belonged to the famous Mourad Bey. Colonel, I have an astagh for you, and a khandan for Auguste. You shall see my Metella, my Bournein, my Thak. I talked much with the pacha; he is a man of mind, by Jupiter! and perfectly ungraciously. You have no idea how well he understands our affairs. On my word he is acquainted with the most petty secrets of our cabinet. I have derived, from his conversation, some very valuable ideas on the state of parties in France. He is, at present, very much engaged in our statistics. Do you know that he is a thorough Bonapartist! He talks of nothing else but Napoleon. Ah! what a great man is le Bonaparte!" said he to me. Bonaparte, it is thus that they call Bonaparte!"

"Giordano, that is to say, Jourdain," murmured Thémis, in a low voice.

"At first," continued Theodore, "Mohamed Ali was very reserved with me; you know that all the Turks are distrustful. He took me for a spy, the devil! or for a jesuit. He has a great horror of jesuits. But, in the course of a few visits, he ascertained that I was a traveller, without prejudice, desirous of informing myself on the customs, manners, and politics of the east, then he unbuttoned, and spoke to me with his heart open. At my last audience, it was the third that he granted me, I took the liberty of saying to him, 'I cannot conceive why your highness does not render yourself independent of the Porte.' 'By heaven,' he replied, 'I should like it well; but I am afraid that the liberal journals, which are all-powerful in your country, would not sustain me if I should declare the independence of Egypt.' He is a fine old man, with a beautiful white beard—and he never laughs. He gave me some excellent sweetmeats; but, of all that I gave him, nothing pleased him so much as a collection of the costumes of the Imperial Guard, by Chalek."

"Is the pacha romantic?" inquired Thémis.

"He occupies himself very little with literature; but you are aware that the Arabian literature is all romance. They have a poet named Melek Agatabelone-Ebu-Esraf, who has published Meditations, compared with which those of de La Martine appear classical prose. On my arrival at Cairo I took an Arabian master, with whom I set about reading the Coran. Before I had taken many lessons, I saw enough to comprehend the sublime beauties of the style of the prophet, and to know how bad all the translations are. Hold—do you wish to see some Arabian writing? This word in golden letters is Allah, that is to say, God." While thus speaking, he displayed a very dirty letter which he had taken from a purse of perfumed silk.

"How long did you remain in Egypt?" asked Thémis.

"Six weeks."

And the traveller went on to describe everything, from the cedar to the hyssop.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

MANTACCINI, THE CHARLATAN.

MANTACCINI, the famous charlatan of Paris, was a young man of good family, and having, in a few years, squandered a large estate, and reduced himself to beggary, he felt that he must exercise his ingenuity, or starve. In this state of mind, he cast his eyes round the various devices which save from indigence, and are most favoured by fortune. He soon perceived that charlatanism was that on which this blind benefactress lavished her favours with most pleasure, and in the greatest abundance. An adroit and lopsided domestic was the only remaining article of all his former grandeur; he dressed him up in a gold-laced livery, mounted a splendid chariot, and started on the tour under the name, style, and title of "the celebrated Dr. Mantaccini, who cures all diseases with a single touch, or a single look."

Not finding that he obtained as much practice as his daring genius anticipated, he determined to resort to still higher flights. He left Paris, and modestly announced himself at Lyons as "the celebrated Dr. Mantaccini, who revives the dead at will." To remove all doubt, he declared that, in fifteen days, he would go to the common churchyard, and restore to life its inhabitants, though buried for ten years. This declaration excited a general rumour and murmur against the doctor, who, not in the least disconcerted, applied to the magistrate, and requested that he might be put under a guard, to prevent his escape, until he should perform his undertaking. The proposition inspired the greatest confidence, and the whole city came to consult the clever empiric, and purchase his baume de vie. His consultations were most numerous, and he received large sums of money. At length the famous day approached, and the doctor's valet, fearing for his shoulders, began to manifest signs of uncaness. "You know nothing of mankind," said the quack to his servant; "be quiet." Scarcely had he spoken these words, when the following letter was presented to him, from a rich citizen:—"Sir, the great operation which you are going to perform, has broken my rest. I have a wife ordered for some time, who was a fury, and I am unhappy enough already, without her resurrection. In the name of heaven do not make the experiment. I will give you fifty louis to keep your secret to yourself." In an instant after, two dashing grooms arrived, who, with the most exacting applications, entreated him not to raise their old father, formerly the greatest miser in the city, as, in such an event, they would be reduced to the most deplorable indigence. They offered him a fee of sixty louis, but the doctor shook his head in doubtful compliance. Scarcely had they retired, when a young widow, on the eve of matrimony, threw herself at the feet of the quack, and, with sobs and sighs, implored his mercy. In short, from morn till night, the doctor received letters, visits, presents, fees, to an excess which absolutely overwhelmed him. The minds of the citizens were differently and violently agitated, some by fear, and others by curiosity, so that the chief magistrate of the city, waited upon the doctor, and said, "Sir, I have not the least doubt, from my experience of your rare talents, that you will be able to accomplish the resurrection in our churchyard the day after to-morrow, according to your promise; but I pray you to observe that our city is in the utmost uproar and confusion, and to consider the dreadful revolution the success of your experiment must produce in every family; I entreat you, therefore, not to attempt it, but to go away, and thus restore tranquillity to the city. In justice, however, to your rare and divine talents, I shall give you an attestation, in due form, under our seal, that you can revive the dead, and that it was our own fault that we were not eye witnesses of your power." This certificate was duly signed and delivered, and Dr. Mantaccini left Lyons for other cities, to work new miracles. In a short time he returned to Paris, loaded with gold, where he laughed at the popular credulity.

SHAKESPEARE AND BEN JONSON.

The following sketch of Shakespeare and Ben Jonson is from Aubrey's Manuscripts, preserved in the Ashmolean Museum, at Oxford:

William Shakespeare's father was a butcher, and I have been told told of him, by some of the neighbours, that when he was a boy he exercised his father's trade; but when he killed a calf he would do it in a high style, and make a speech. This William being inclined naturally to poetry and acting, came to London, I guess about eighteen, and as an actor at one of the play-houses, and did act exceedingly well. (Now Ben Jonson was never a good actor, but an excellent instructor.) He began early to make essays in dramatic poetry, which at that time was very low, and his plays took well. He was a handsome well shaped man, very good company, and of a very ready and pleasant, and smooth wit. The humour of the constable, in A Midsummer Night's Dream, he happened to take at Credenon, in Bucks, (I think it was midsummer night that he happened to be there,) which is the road from London to Stratford; and there was living that constable about 1642, when I came first to Oxon. Mr. Jos. Howe is of the parish, and knew him. Ben Jonson and he did gather humours of men wherever they came. One time, as he was at the tavern at Stratford, Mr. Combes, an old usurer, was to be buried; he makes then this extemporary epitaph upon him:—

"Ten in the hundred the Deville allows,

But Combes will have twelve, he swears and he vows;

If any one asks who lies in this tomb,

Hon! 'tho' the Deville 'tis my John O'Combe!"

"He was wont to go to his native county once a year. I think I have been told that he left near three hundred pounds to a sister. He understood Latin pretty well, for he had been in younger years a school master in the country."

ST. HELENA.

The climate of St. Helena is, perhaps, the mildest and the most salubrious in the world, and is remarkably congenial to the human feelings. Neither too hot nor cold, it preserves, throughout the year, that medium temperature which is always agreeable. This temperature, however, varies considerably, according to the elevation of the land.

From thunder and lightning this climate may be said to be wholly exempted. In the course of sixty years only two flashes of lightning are recollected; and these, I believe, were unaccompanied with thunder: neither is it subject to those storms and hurricanes which occasionally afflict and desolate many other tropical islands. The trade winds generally blow with uniform steadiness; very seldom increasing beyond what is called a fresh breeze. There are many copious springs of pure and wholesome water. These generally issue from the highest lands. The quantity usually discharged at James' town was found to be six hogheads in a minute, or two thousand one hundred and sixty tons in the twenty-four hours, after the absence of rain.

PUNISHMENT OF SOBRIETY.

Against the door-post of Haddon-Hall, in England, is fixed a kind of hand-bolt, consisting of an iron ring, by which a man's wrist could be secured as high as he could reach above his head, said to have been used in former times as a mode of punishment among the domestics. One of the purposes to which this instrument of correction was applied, was thus described:—Any servant or retainer, then, who refused to take his horn of six pints of liquor in ten minutes, or committed other offences against the laws of conviviality, might be confined in the manner just mentioned, whilst a pail of cold water was poured down the sleeve of his doublet. Rather at variance with this, is the sharp resolution which appears to have been reserved for the punishment of drunkenness. There is still remaining in the hall a portrait of John Ward, who in 1627 was deer-keeper to Sir Nicholas Brouncker, of Haddon-Hall, and in illustration of their practice, as stated by the attendant expositor, was turned out of the family no less than six times for drinking to excess; but it seems that neither punishment nor kindness could reclaim him, for this incorrigible toper at length "died drunk." "He was found dead on a table." The Spartans encouraged their children to steal, but punished them when detected. Was it in imitation of their practice that the authorities at Haddon-Hall compelled the domestics to drink largely, and dismissed those who were seen intoxicated?

THE YOUNG GREEK GIRL.

A young Greek girl, whose lover, smitten with plague, was conveyed to a temporary hospital at the Tower, had no sooner surmised whether they had carried him, than without saying a word to her parents, who would, as she well knew, have opposed her design, she left her home, and presented herself at the portal of the infected fortress, as the nurse of the young Greek who had been received there on the previous day. In vain did the government, imagining from her youth and the calm and collected manner in which she offered herself up an almost certain victim to the pestilence, that she was not aware of her danger, endeavored to dissuade her from her project. She was immovable; and was ultimately permitted to approach the bed side of the dying sufferer.

Not a tear, not a murmur escaped her, as she took her place beside his pillow, and entered upon her desperate office. In the paroxysms of his madness, as the poison was feeding upon his strength and grappling at his brain, he spoke of her fondly—he talked to her—he stretched forth his hand to clasp her—and he thrust her from him as he yelled out in his agony, and his limbs writhed beneath the torture of the passing spasm.

And she bore it all unshrinkingly; and even amid her misery, she felt a thrill of joy as she discovered that pain and madness had alike failed to blot her image from his memory. But there were moments less cruel than these, in which reason resumed her temporary sway, and the devoted girl was pressed to the fevered bosom of her fated lover; and in these, brief as they were, she felt that she was repaid for all.

But the struggle even of youth and strength against the most baneful of all diseases could not last long. The patient expired in the arms of his devoted mistress, and as he breathed his last, bequeathed to her at once his dying smile and the foul poison which was coursing through his veins. She saw him laid in his narrow grave; and then she turned away with the conviction that she, too, was plague-stricken!

She did not return to her home; but she stood a few paces from one of the companions of her youth, and bade her bear to her aged parents her blessing and her prayers; this done, she fled to the mountains, and sought a lonely spot, where to die. None knew how long she lingered, for she was never seen again in life; but her body was found a few days afterwards beneath a ledge of earth, in a doubled up position, as though the last spasm had been a bitter one.

She who had sacrificed herself to soothe the last hours of him whom she had loved, perished also miserably, in the wild solitude of the Asian hills; and her almost Roman virtue has met with no other record than the brief one in which I have here attempted to perpetuate the memory of her devotion and her fate.—Miss Pardee

A STUDENT'S DUEL AT HEIDELBERG.

It happened in the course of a few weeks that a student, who had rooms in the same house with ourselves, was engaged as principal in a duel. The English gentleman, without any knowledge, asked him to give him an entrée into the room to himself, with two other friends; but, probably from a dislike to run the risk of a defeat in the presence of so many strangers, he would not consent. On the morning, however, appointed for the encounter, Mr. — came to our lodgings, and "if you like," said he, "and will venture to go without any introduction at all, we will walk to the rendezvous, and take the chance of being sent away." As we were not likely to have another opportunity, we immediately sallied forth into the road, and loitered along the valley, till we saw a sure sign that the play was just going to begin. As soon as this indication (which was neither more nor less than the doctor) made us certain that there would be no delay or "faux feu" in the proceedings, we turned up a mountain road, and kept along it nearly half a mile, when we suddenly turned off through a garden, at the end of which stood a small inn. Passing through the house, we found ourselves in a large room, about fifty feet long by thirty wide. There were already ten or a dozen students assembled, two of whom were engaged in measuring out and chalking the floor, to mark the precise distance at which the combatants should be placed from each other. We took no notice of them, nor they of us; but seeing a bench in the corner of the room, we walked across and took a seat upon it. Presently our hero came in, without coat or waistcoat, looking very fierce; and as soon as he saw us, he made towards us. We rose and bowed, and he explained to us that we were come in the hope that he would have no objection to our remaining, when actually on the spot; and that of course, if he still had any, we should immediately retire. He, however, made no difficulty whatever, and left us to resume our seats. By this time the weapons had been brought in and ranged against the wall; and the students, whose numbers had now become more increased, were making the air whistle with trying their hands at making hits. The blades they use are of a beautifully inland manufacture, and I believe are as sharp as they can be made. Whilst we were observing these manoeuvres, a student made his appearance from a little anti-chamber, leading a most grotesque figure into the room. Nearly the whole length of the leg, and the front of the body up to the breast bone, were encased in sword-proof quilted armour, fastened by straps behind. Once, I suppose, it had all been yellow and clean, but now it was of a dirty dark hue, and partly from great stains of blood. The right arm, too, up to the muscle of the shoulder, was covered with the same; and the left arm was slung behind, with the hand fixed in a leathern purse. The weight and tightness of this leathern coat of mail are, I imagine, so considerable, as to cause some disagreeable sensation, from the check of the circulation, or other cause, if the arm is suffered to hang down; for the conductor of each man held his friend's sword-arm aloft, supporting it in a horizontal position, as they passed round the gloomy long room. In the course of a few minutes the seconds came in, each having his sword-arm protected, up to the shoulder, with a covering of strong seals of leather, and girt round the body with a sword-proof belt, about a foot and a half in width, striped according to the colours of their respective fatherlands. A few more turns round the room, and the little doctor made his appearance, having been admiring, probably, the new vines, or his wife's new dress, or any other little amusement in keeping with his "civil" employment. At the same moment a little girl brought in a basin, towel, and jug of hot water—a sight rather adapted to act upon the nerves of the champions than to encourage them. It was amusing to see the little girl retire, but scramble up to an opening outside, whence she could see the fight. All things being now ready, the doctor lighted a fresh cigar, took a lump of chalk in his hand to mark the rally, and all was hushed and mute. The umpire took his place. The combatants, having a thick stock and a cloth cap now added to their accoutrements, are placed on the chalk line. They then receive from their seconds their gleaming swords, and bend them over the shoulder till the signal is given. "Buntz du blingen," cries the umpire, and the blades are crossed. "Loss" follows almost in the same breath, and away they go, round and round within their limits, the seconds whirling round with the principals, with swords interposed between the combatants, ready to strike up their blades when a palpable hit is given. The clashing is horrible for a few seconds or a minute. A hit is made. "Halt!" shouts the umpire; and in the twinkling of an eye the four swords meet; and if the seconds succeed at once in stopping the arms of their men, the first rally is over. Again they are placed, after a moment's breathing time, on the chalked line, and again (and in all the twelve or twenty-four times the same ceremony is gone through. The number of the rallies increases in proportion to the intensity of the wrong to be redressed; but they seldom exceed twenty-four. The duel which I am now describing was one of that number; and exactly so many times were the champions brought together for the fight. About the thirteenth or fourteenth time, the less vigorous of the two (who had, however, hitherto defended himself, and even taken the offensive sometimes, with great spirit,) seemed suddenly to flag; an opportunity which his opponent instantly availed himself of, and pushed him harder. In two successive attempts he succeeded in inflicting two cuts on his adversary's right side, where a defenceless space is left, between the armpit and the armour. I should not have known it from any other symptom than two long red streaks on the white shirt, which showed in an instant the extent and situation of the wounds. No notice was taken of it by any one; the battle was not delayed a minute; nor did the doctor even deign to take the sgar from his mouth. It was continued to the last without any further result; and the two gentlemen were then rapidly stripped of their accoutrements, in order that another pair might be clothed therewith.

EVERYDAY LIFE.

We hope that when news is scarce, we shall now and then stand excused in the eyes of our readers, if we present them with a select passage or so, from the most celebrated works now issuing from the press. In the last number of Nicholas Nickleby, we find the following eloquent and natural series of reflection upon this chequered life.—"And even now, as he paced the streets and listlessly looked around on the gradually increasing bustle and preparation for the day, everything appeared to yield him some new occasion for despondency. Last night the sacrifice of a young, affectionate, and beautiful creature to such a wretch and in such a cause, had seemed too monstrous to succeed, and the warmer he grew the more confident he felt; that some interposition must save her from her fate; but now, when he thought how regularly things went on from day to day in the same unvarying round—how youth and beauty died, and ugly gripping age lived tottering on—how crafty avarice grew rich, and manly, honest hearts were poor and sad—how few there were who tenanted the stately houses, and how many those who lay in poisonous pens, or most such day and laid them down at night, and lived and died, father and son, mother and child, race upon race, and generation upon generation, without a home to shelter them, or the energies of one single man directed to their aid—how, in seeking, not a luxurious and splendid life, but the bare means of a most wretched and inadequate subsistence, there were women and children in that one town, divided into classes, numbers, and estimated as regularly as the noble families and folks of great degree, and reared from infancy to drive most criminal and dreadful trades—how ignorance was punished and never taught—how jail doors and gallows loomed for thousands urged towards them by circumstances darkly curtaining their very cradle's heads, and but for which they might have earned their honest bread and lived in peace—how many died in soul, and had no chance of life—how many who could scarcely go astray, be they vicious as they would, turned haughtily from the crushed and stricken wretch who could scarce do otherwise, and who would have been a greater wonder had he or she done well, than even they, had they done ill—how much injustice, and misdeed, and misery there was, and yet how the world rolled on from year to year, alike careless and indifferent, and no man seeking to remedy or redress it: when he thought of all this, and selected from the mass the one slight case on which his thoughts were bent, he felt indeed that there was little ground for hope, and little cause or reason why it should not run an atom in the huge aggregate of distress and sorrow, and add one small and unimportant unit to swell the great amount."

CONSTANTINOPLE.

The Sultana Valideh still extends her influence, and on the troops receiving their pay she has added from her own purse an additional month's pay to each soldier. She is a frequent attendant at the council, and entered there lately unveiled, observing to the ministers it was right they should know the features of their sovereign's mother. The sultana, wishing to give the Messieurs Dux, administrators of the mint, a proof of her esteem, invited their ladies to witness the ceremony of the sultan's entrance into the interior of the seraglio. Those ladies said that the author of the "Arabian Nights" is most unjustly accused of exaggeration in describing the magnificence of a sultan's seraglio. The walls were hung with rich brocades, and the floor covered with the richest casimères. The young sultan reposed in a superb chair, embroidered with pearls, rubies, and emeralds. The Sultana Valideh having blessed her son, the Sultana Isma presented him with a beautiful young slave. The Sultana appeared much pleased with his aunt's present, and requested the slave to seat herself by his side. A thousand then prostrated themselves before the sultan and kissed his feet, while beautiful young Circassians showered handfuls of sequins amongst them, until the whole apartment was ankle deep with them. After the beauteous riches of the harem had done homage to the sultan, the same ceremony was gone through before the young person who has become his companion. After the distribution of costly presents all retired. The Sultana Valideh, according to the Mahomedan rule, is almost considered holy; and every Mussulman has the right of appeal to her. Even the wives of the sultan are compelled to treat her with veneration, and to kiss the hem of her garment whenever she appears. She has a deliberative voice in the council of the state, and all true Mussulmans are accustomed to pay a blind obedience to her. She is said to be an ambitious and capacious woman, and to have already interdicted access to the palace to twelve hundred persons. The sultan appears in public almost daily, visiting all the places his father took delight in.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE ANNIVERSARY.—BY THE REV. THOMAS DALE.

A year hath lingered through its round
Since thou wert with the dead;
And yet my bosom's careless wound
Still bleeds, as then it bled.
All now without is cold and calm—
Yet o'er my heart its healing balm
Oblivion will not shed;—
If day beguiles my fond regret,
Night comes—and how can I forget!

For mute are then the sounds of mirth
I loathe, yet cannot flee;
And thoughts in solitude have birth,
That lead me back to thee.
By day, amidst the busy herd,
My soul is like the captive bird
That struggles to be free;
It longs to leave a world unblest,
To flee away, and be at rest.

Rest! how, alas! shall mortal dare
Of rest on earth to dream!
The heritage of ceaseless care
May better far beseech
The child of sin—the heir of woe.
And what if mutual love may throw
A joy-inspiring beam
O'er life's wide waste!—"Tis quickly gone,
And we must wander off alone."

It was no charm of face or mien
That linked my heart to thee;
For many fairer I have seen,
And fairer yet may see

It was a strong though nameless spell
Which seemed with thee alone to dwell,
And this remains to me;
And still remains—thy form is fled,
But this can I not recall the dead.

Thine image is before me now,
All angel as thou art;
Thy gentle eye and guileless brow
Are graven on my heart;
And, when on living charms I gaze,
Memory the one loved form portrays—
"I wish it were departed!"
And they alone are fair to me
Who wake a livelier thought of thee.

Oh, too, the fond familiar sound
Is present to mine ear;
I seem, when all is hush'd around,
Thy thrilling voice to hear:
Oh! could I dream thou still wert nigh,
And turn as if to breathe reply,
The waking—how severe!
When on the sickening soul must press
The sense of utter loneliness!

A year hath pass'd—another year
Its wonted round may run;
Yet earth will still be dark and drear,
As when its course begun
I would not murmur or repine—
Yet, though a thousand joys were mine,
I still must sigh for one;
How could I think of her who died,
And taste of joy from aught beside!

Yet, dearest! though that treasured love
Now casts a gloom o'er all;
Thy spirit, from its rest above,
I would not now recall
My earthly doom thou canst not share,
And I in solitude must bear
What'er may yet befall;
But I can share thy home, thy heaven,
All griefs forgot, all guilt forgiven.

INFLUENCE OF CHILDREN.

I cannot but think that this constant presence of human nature, pure and happy, of simple and innocent enjoyment, exerts a great though little-noticed influence on this whole great lightning family of man; and that each member of it foregoes somewhat of its selfishness, abates something of its fury, after every such contemplation of something happier than himself, which never yet regarded self, never was infuriated by passions. No wonder that the greatest of men have mostly evinced a passionate fondness for children; neither can such fondness should ever rise to excess. In our mourning over a lost child, the very sources of our comfort bear in them an embittering venom for our grief. The same purity of soul which assures us of its acceptance in the bosom of God, also renders the memory of its vanished prettiness and graces more intolerable by the exemption of every, even the least, drawback on our love, from failings or offence. To the busy world, what indeed is the death of a child? It forwarded, it retarded no human aim; it stood an insignificant little alien by the side of the mighty and dusty arena of life. Not so to the parent. To him its smile and play were the invigorating spirit that nerved him in the conflict; and the very apathy of the whole world besides, its utter want of sympathy with him in his (to their feelings) trifling loss, becomes itself an added source of poignant, lonely, heart-consuming misery.

THE LOVE OF FREEDOM.

None can love freedom heartily but good men; the rest love not freedom, but license, which never hath more scope, or more indulgence, than under tyrants. Hence it is, that tyrants are not oft offended by, nor stand much in doubt of, bad men, as being all naturally servile; but in whom virtue and true worth most is eminent, them they fear in earnest, as by right their masters; against them lies all their hatred and suspicion.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE INFANT SUFFOCATION WITH KNOWLEDGE SYSTEM.

BY A MAN BORN OUT OF SEASON.

"Oh! the sunny, sunny hours of childhood,
How soon—how soon they pass away!"

VERY! There was a time when we had children. That time is past, or is fast passing. The boys are premature mockeries of men—the girls, something between a doll and a stunted woman. The schoolmaster is abroad, also the schoolmistress, besides tutors and governesses.

Shortly after the children are weaned, they commence educating them. While the brain is yet in a soft, pulpy state, they load it with heavy facts and hard names, to its serious detriment during the remainder of its mundane existence. The ancient Grecian commenced with carrying a calf upon his back a few hours every day, so that when the calf gradually grew into a bullock, he carried the bullock with as much ease as he had done the calf. This is now the education principle. They lay a few leaves of Cyclopædia or Encyclopædia on a child's tender brain, and keep adding thereunto day by day, expecting that when he is a man, he will carry the thirty volumes with perfect ease, without considering that in the attempt they may crush all sap and freshness out of that brain, rendering it as flat as a pancake, and "dry as the remainder of a biscuit."

Now is this wholesome—is it natural? Is it fair—is it humane, that a child should be cheated out of its childhood, and sent to learn the "use of the globe" before it has learnt to play at marbles? Or is it to be expected that this early forcing and hot-bed system can produce as healthy plants as if they had been allowed to grow in the free air and open sunshine? Oh! in place of sending a child to school at three or four years, let it enjoy three or four more years of healthy ignorance. Curb not its young freedom; abridge not its first holidays; cage not the pretty bird too soon! Change not the free air of heaven for the pent-up atmosphere of the "seminary;" the gentle murmur of the winds for the dull hum of the prison-house. We were children ourselves once. Let us have a fellow-feeling for the young rogues. Let kind dame Nature nurse them a few years longer. There will be fewer rickety limbs and rickety intellects.

And does a child learn nothing because it has not its primer in its hand? Certainly it does. Every hour of its little life it is learning; it cannot help it. The flower that blows, the springing grass, the withered leaf, the running water, the birds that hop across its path, and the thousand sights of the fields and woods, or even the squares or suburbs of a city, cause it to think and to question. The wind as it blows, the falling rain, the fleecy snow, the sharp frost making firm the unstable water, the thunder peal, the sun that shines by day, and the moon that steals into the dark sky at night, all and each arouses its infantile wonder and young curiosity. Let it then have a few years of pleasant natural education before it commences its painful artificial one. Let it, as St. Paul says, when it is a child, "think as a child, and act as a child," and in due and proper season, no doubt of it, it will "put away childish things."

But we are bent upon doing too much. No time has to be wasted. We cannot be content with healthy natural children, possessed of information proper to their years, we must have prodigies—or parrots. Miss prates of planetary systems whilst her fingers itch to make dolls's frocks, and Master is taught philosophy (heaven save the mark) before he has learned to curb his appetite for plum-pudding. And what are the precious results? A breed of precocious things for foolish mannanas and under-headed papas to exhibit after dinner before their silently-enduring, but inwardly blaspheming guests.

A fine way it is to learn a child humility, to cram its little head with hard, dry names, dates, and facts, which, though its memory may retain, its yet weakly intellect cannot by any possibility digest or turn into knowledge, but which names, dates, and facts it is very likely to discover full-grown people know nothing about, having never known, or having long since forgotten them. A very pretty way. But it is not your dull or ordinary children, who simply learn to babble about a multitude of things they do not understand, that are so much to be pitied. It is the naturally fine, apt, intelligent child that is the most humiliated victim. It is quick to learn, and its quickness is praised. The craving after knowledge enters its young breast, and instead of being repressed or carefully regulated, it is excited and fed by the wonder and approbation of all who come in contact with the juvenile prodigy. To add to the evil, more pains are taken with it by its teachers than with ordinary children; it is better than an advertisement to them; a living proof of their efficiency as instructors. Its gratified parents are grateful for their assiduity, and, with the best intentions on their part, its little brain is daily and hourly stimulated with mental brandy, no less hurtful to that organ, according to the best medical authorities, than the spirit itself would be. Such children are generally of a delicate constitution.

"So wise so young, they say do ne'er live long."

and some fatal disease, proceeding from that poor o'erworked brain, carries it off amid the tears and lamentations of its well-meaning destroyers. Or, if it does live, ten to one that its maturity fulfils the promise of its childhood. Commonly its intellect waxes feeble instead of gradually strengthening and expanding, and it is often outstripped in after life by far duller, and therefore less abused children.

And of what use to them is two-thirds of the (so called) knowledge with which they are burdened to the ruin of health and exclusion of enjoyment. A young girl, for instance. Of what utility to her in after life is the smattering of geography, astronomy, botany, zoology, ornithology, or any other ology which she may pick up. Is it not a more interesting fact to her that her pet dove is the emblem of true love, than that it is of the genus Columba, and she can derive pleasure from the beauty and fragrance of flowers, endeared to her by their common name and associations, and feel their moral purity, without bothering her little head about the cramp tulips with which Linnaeus and others may disguise them. Is she ever likely to call the "Forget-me-not" by its Latin name? And what to her is the use of the globe, without her lover be a sailor, and then she probably mistakes latitude for longitude and longitude for latitude? What to her is the planetary system, that caused her so many hours of trouble and perplexity, unless she affects a soldier, and has a curiosity to know when Venus and Mars are likely to come into conjunction; and what again to her is the ring of Saturn in comparison with one of much smaller dimensions? Will the signs of the zodiac give her any idea of the fashions? and what cares she now about the distance of Georgium Sidus from the earth she treads? These things were troublesome to her when she was a girl at school; they cheated her of her ball, and skipping-ropes, and scamper, and the like—but that is over now. She is a woman—she has done with them.

And are not our boys equally taught too early and too much? They are poring over the rudiments of learning when they should be tracing their young limbs with healthful exercises, and they are studying the fragments and tail-ends of sciences (soon to be forgotten) when they should be imbibing the rudiments of learning. Why should we be in such a haste to inflict the pains of education and the penalties of imprisonment upon the young varlets? It dulls or overtaxes their brain, and checks the healthful current of their blood. They must learn, but let it be in due season. It makes one sad to see a fine little fellow sent to study Euclid at the age he should be reading Robinson Crusoe; and it equally does a man good to see such a one enjoying his young existence in an appropriate manner. Few there are who cannot enter into the feeling so finely given in the very beautiful lines of an American poet, commencing—

"There's something in a noble boy,
A brave, freehearted, careless one,
With his unchecked, unhidden joy,
His dread of books and love of fun,
And in his clear and ready smile,
Unshaded by a thought of toil,
And unexpressed by address—
Which brings me to my childhood back,
As if I tried its very gladness"
And felt its very gladness"

Then let the children have their play out.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

GOETHE'S FAUSTUS.

FIRST NOTICE.

NUMEROUS translations have been made, in prose and verse, of this masterpiece of German literature. Many of its most remarkable passages have been rendered in English an hundred times, with various success. By far the best translation of the entire work, however, is that by John Anster, of Trinity College, published in London in 1835. It has never been reprinted in this country, and but few copies of it have yet crossed the Atlantic. We are confident that we can no more render a more acceptable service to our readers, than by presenting a few of its choice passages of poetry and eloquence, with such comments as they may suggest in the perusal.

We must plead guilty to having opened Faustus as a new work. In former days, with the aid of grammar and dictionary, we have toiled through a portion of the original; as a well thumbed relic of our boy-library. I attest for us. But with the entrance into the busy competitions of life, the German of the young scholar too often goes the way of his Greek; and if he can hold on by a little of his Latin, and of the languages allied with the noble tongue of imperial Rome, it is as much as the most diligent can hope to compass. We came to Faustus, therefore,—in all humility we speak it—as a new work; and we have been indebted to Mr. Anster's translation of it for an enjoyment which we are satisfied the most familiar reader of the German has seldom derived from the original.

In first running through the volume before us, it will be with the view of selecting the more striking passages of poetry, rather than of presenting an analysis of the characters, or a development of the plot. These we reserve for a future article. Of the dedication of the work, it will be remembered by our readers, we published a translation in the first number of our present volume, from the pen of Mr. Halleck; and we deem it high praise of Mr. Anster's version to say that it is in no wise inferior.

The poem, for we cannot consider Faustus as a drama, opens with a prelude at the theatre, between the manager, the dramatic poet, and Mr. Merryman. The manager calls upon his two friends for advice and assistance. His booth is up, his stage erected, and his audience collecting, and he invokes the poet to minister to their eager and excited curiosity. To which the poet replies:

Oh, tell me not of the tumultuous crowd,
My powers desert me in the noisy throng;
Hide, hide me from the multitude whose loud
And dizzy whirl would hurry me along
Against my will; and lead me to some lone
And silent vale—some scene in fairy land,
There only will the poet's heart expand,
Surrendered to the impulses of song.
Lost in delicious visions of its own.
Where Love and Friendship o'er the heart at rest,
Watch through the flowing hours, and we are blest!

Thoughts by the soul conceived in silent joy,
Sounds often uttered by the inner voice,
Tried by the nice ear, delicate of choice,
Till we at last are pleased, or self-deceived,
The whole a rabble's madness may destroy,
And thus, when after toil of many years,
Touched and roused the perfect piece appears,
To challenge praise, or win unconscious tears,
As the vain heart too easily believed;
Some sparkling, showy thing, got up in haste,
Brilliant and light, will catch the passing taste.
The truly great, the genuine, the sublime,
Wins its slow way in silence; and the bard,
Unmoted long, rises from after times
The imperishable wreath, his best, his sole reward!

Point out to us than this a more magnificent expression of the great truths here embodied. Mr. Merryman, however, treats the poet's notions as mere cant and humbug, and ridicules the idea of squandering exertion on the unborn, at the expense of the pleasures of the living. The manager follows up the suggestion of his friend, and lectures the poet on the need of a variety of action in the drama, and enough of it; that every spectator may find something to hit his fancy, or excite his astonishment. The poet rebels at this writing to order, for the whims of the many-headed multitude; when the manager pursues his argument by analyzing for him the elements of an audience, setting them before him in the boxes, pretty much after the same fashion in which we can find them any night in the week at the Park or Bovey. Goethe's manager, we must confess, seems to understand his trade, and though we are ourselves disposed to respect the scruples of the poet, we apprehend that he would have been but lightly estimated among the knowing ones. The poet replies.

Go, and elsewhere some fitter servant find;
What! shall the poet stand the throng away,
And spend in worthless, worse than idle, play,
The highest gift that ever nature gave,
The malleable birthright of mankind,
The freedom of the independent mind,
And sink into a humble trading slave?
Whence is his power all human hearts to win,
And why can nothing his proud march oppose,
As through all elements the conqueror goes?
Oh! it is not the harmony within.
The music which haunts for its dwelling-place
His own rich soul—the heart that can receive
And hold in its unshaken embrace
All things manmade, and all that live!
When Nature, like a tried and stupid slave,
Twists with dull fingers the coarse threads of life,
When all things, that, together interweave,
In happy concord still agree,
Should join to form the web of being,
Are tangled in inextricable strife!
Who then can cheer life's drear monotony,
Bestow upon the dead new animation,
Restore the dissonant to harmony,
And bid the jarring individual bow
A chord, that in the general concertation,
Bears part with all in musical relation,
Who to the tempest's rage can give a voice
Like human passion? bid the serious mind
Glow with the colouring of the sunset hours!
Who in the dead path scatter spring's first flowers,
When wanders forth the lady of his choice?
Who the valueless green leaves can bind
A wreath—the artist's proudest ornament—
Or, round the conquering hero's brow entwined
The best reward his country can present?
What voice is fame! who gives us to inherit
Olympus, and the lofty Elysian field?
The soul of man sublimed—man's soaring spirit
Seen in the poet gloriously revealed!

We know not where to look in the classics of the last two thousand years, and more particularly in those of the "fast-anchored isle," with which we claim to be not unfamiliar, and where one of any reasonable appetite may find food for a life-time without even the desire of so much foreign cookery as a French ragout—we know not where to look in the whole range and compass of English poetry for a passage that describes so glowingly and so appreciatingly the calling and the power of the poet as does this glorious extract from the prelude to Faustus. Read and re-peruse it till you have extracted all its deep meaning, and become familiar with its minute and hidden harmonies—for it is musical as are the spheres!

Mr. Merryman proceeds to further commentary on the popular drama, and exhorts the poet to present those scenes of familiar life, which all can understand, and with which all can sympathize. These in their various and shifting pictures will fix attention and excite admiration, and, above all others, the admiration and attention of unspoiled, unforced youth. On this hint, the poet bursts out in the following brilliant invocation, which loses as little like a translation as a passage from Wordsworth's inimitable "Ode on the Recollections of Childhood:"

Give me, oh! give me back the days
When I—I too—was young,
And felt, as they now feel, each coming hour
New consciousness of power.
Oh, happy, happy time, above all prize!
Then thoughts on thoughts and crowding fancies sprung,
And found a language in unbidden lays;
Unintermitted streams from fountains ever flowing,
Then, as I wandered of late,
In every field, for me,
Its thousand flowers were blowing!
A veil through which I did not see,
A thin veil o'er the world was thrown,
In every bud a mystery,
Magic in everything unknown—

The fields, the grove, the air was haunted,
And all the age, as I deem'd it,
Yea! give me—give me back the days of youth,
Poor, yet how rich!—my glad inheritance
The unextinguishable love of truth,
While life's realities were all romance.
Give me, oh! give youth's passion—
The rush of joy that felt almost like pain,
His hate, its love, its own tumultuous mind—
Give me my youth again!

Mr. Merriman rebukes this prattle and sighing for youth; and the manager terminates the discussion with some good practical advice, which proves him an adept in his vocation, and by which the dreaming bard might, not unreasonably, profit. Briskly interrupting the colloquy of his friend and the poet, he thus brings the prelude to its conclusion:

Come, come, no more of this absurd inventory
Of flattering phrases—courtious—complimentary.
You both lose time in words unnecessary,
Playing with language thus at fetch and carry;
Think not of toying, now, or preparing,
Stand up, my boy—no fear—no hesitation,
Till you commence no chance of inspiration.
But once assume the poet—then the fire
From heaven will come to kindle and inspire
Strong drink is what we want to gull the people,
A hearty, brisk, and animating tippie!
Come, come, no more delay, no more excuses,
The stuff we ask you for at once produce us.
Lose this day loitering—'twill be the same story
To-morrow, and the next more dilatory;
The undisciplined brings us no new ideas,
And days are lost lamenting over days
Are you in earnest? See! this very minute—
What you can do, or dream you can, begin it,
Boldness has genius, power, and magic in it.
Only engage, and then the mind grows heated—
Begin it, and the work will be completed!
You know our German bards, like bold adventures,
Bring out what's in their blood, and laugh at censurers;
Then do not to-day of sparing speech,
Command enough of dresses and machinery;
Use as you please—fire, water, thunder, levin,
The greater and the lesser lights of heaven.
Squander away the stars at your free pleasure,
And build up rocks and mountains without measure.
Of birds and beasts we've plenty here to lavish,
Come, cast away all apprehensions slavish—
Strut, on our narrow stage, with lofty stature,
As moving through the circle of wide nature,
Happy with speed more swift than thought can tell,
Rapid as thought—from HEAVEN—through EARTH—to HELL.

We believe that Hamblin caught his tact and inspiration as a manager from a study of Goethe's prelude; for he seems to emulate the same lavish use of fire, water and thunder, birds and beasts, larger and lesser lights, that is inculcated by his illustrious predecessor. Gujar at Barnack is surely constructed on the principles here set down, for the captivation of the multitude; and thus we see the far-reaching philosophy of the poet stooping to the vulgar realities, the trade aspects of his art, and familiar with them as with the waneabouts of the "highest heaven of invention."

But we must close the volume. We have thus far listened only to the overture of the magnificent opera. We stand as yet upon the threshold of the temple.

EXTRACTS FROM WORKS IN THE PRESS.

THE following is an extract from "The Damsel of Darien," a new novel by Mr. Sims, author of "Gay Rivers," etc., now in the press of Messrs. Lea and Blanchard, Philadelphia.

A CHAPTER FROM THE DAMSEL OF DARLEN.

Yet the dance lacked nothing of its animation. On the contrary, it soon put on an aspect of fearful excitement, as, wrought upon by the intense physical action which the commands of Garabito continued to stimulate, Azuma repeated her efforts, which combined great muscular flexibility with the most nice and wonderful adroitness. At one moment every muscle would seem coiled to the utmost point of tension; at the next, relaxing them as by magic, she would seem to sink away into exhaustion, which, in the case of a European, must have soon followed such exertions. But, practised as they were from infancy, the capacity of indolence among these people in exercises of this sort, was utterly beyond the belief of those not familiar with the spectacle. In the present instance, the fear of Garabito, whose perceptions of the Indians were not only well known to those before him, but had been felt by many if not most among themselves, prompted Azuma to unwonted efforts in her desire to avoid offence. In a little while her features became convulsed—her eyes glared wildly, and seemed starting from their sockets; her long black hair becoming loosed from the grassy string which bound it, now descended to her heels and floated wildly on the air; the thick drops gathered and stood upon her brows, and the veins swelled momentally into ridgy lines, deeply blue, and colouring the almost fair skin around them, and in the swimming and voluptuous whirl which produced these effects, the blood of the spectator bounded in like heat and sympathy. Warned by the exciting beauty of her movements, their rapidity and grace, and not less by the remembrances of their own past amusements of the girl, her companions set down their burdens, half forgot their cares, and beating time with their hands in air and upon their sides, crowded around her, muttering at forgetful moments, little snatches of their most favorite melodies. The enthusiasm of the older savages extended to their children, who, accustomed to fewer restraints than their parents, soon began to lose their fear of the stern Spaniard, to skip and shout with unmitigated delight as they beheld the wonderful performances of Azuma.

It happened, most unluckily, that the leader of the little urchins on this occasion, having been excited by the decorated market already spoken of; who, taught to take a part in all such performances, broke suddenly away from his restraints, and made his first appearance, running among the Indians from shoulder to shoulder and playing a thousand comic tricks as he ran. The mirth of the poor savages grew contagious, and Garabito himself was unable to resist it. With hearty clamour he urged the mischievous little animal on, and helped, in no small degree, by his words and cries of cheer, to increase his natural sauciness.

The spectators shouted aloud their admiration, and clapped their hands, and danced after the little creature with a delight that threw aside all constraint from their own deportment, and diminished, in some measure, that of the Indians. But the merriment of the latter was arrested by a little incident that soon changed the whole aspect of affairs. The monkey, tired of making free with the heads and shoulders of the poor savages with whom he was in the constant habit of taking such liberties, and encouraged by the open applause of the sailors, bounced suddenly in among them; and, leaping from head to head, now pulling off their caps, and now twirling the hair beneath with no measured fingers, proved himself quite as much at home among his new acquaintance, as he ever did among the old. The good-natured sailors, with few exceptions, took this intrusion in kind part; and what with their awkward scramblings after the urchin, and their play at cross purposes with each other, in the unavoidable collisions which the sudden movements of the agile creature necessarily occasioned, they found the sport far greater than before. Nobody entered the scene more than Garabito, while his own person remained sacred; but what was the consternation of the Indians when they beheld the monkey dart off in a tangent from the crowd, and suddenly emerge into a conspicuous station, perched on the very apex of the high steeple-crowned hat which the dandy witan, the first commandant, had placed upon his head, to that which Azuma had just finished. The merriment of the savages was ended in an instant. They had experience of the danger of trifling with the dignity of such a creature as Garabito. But the sailors had no such fear or thought; and regarding the matter as a continuance of the sport, they were pleased to increase these playful clamours which had produced so greatly the natural sauciness of the monkey. The laughter of Garabito was changed to sudden fury, particularly as the quickness of the monkey, leaping from shoulder to shoulder, and to and fro, between back, shoulder and head, contrived to elude all the efforts of the bedevilled Spaniard to relieve himself. The Indian boys, accustomed to manage the creature, came to his assistance; but the whole was greatly to the advantage of the monkey, who, by the aid of his long tail, and the commands which he had been taught to obey heretofore, now failed to move him in the slightest manner. He had been, unfortunately, too much encouraged, by Garabito no less than the rest, beyond his usual privileges; and was just in that state of intoxication which, in a man, prompts him to run the full length of his line, though he well knows there is a halter at the end of it.

The threat of punishment, which he well understood, occasioned not the slightest heed on his part, and he jiggled and bounded aloft upon Garabito's head and shoulders, in spite of all his struggles, which, indeed, were not very direct ones, for having some dread that his fingers might be bitten, he was at no pains to make a hasty use of them. Taking advantage of this fear, which the cunning animal he now understood, he finally plucked off the hat, upon which he had practised so many gambols, and waved it aloft with one paw. At times the other was permitted to amuse itself familiarly with the well disposed locks beneath him, which he twitched with the most shocking unconcern, bidding defiance to the while to all the efforts of the dandy, who, stamping on the earth with fury, shouting and swearing, and throwing up his hands, and leaping from side to side, succeeded only in compelling his tormentor to change his position, but never in expelling him from his perch. The laughter of the crowd added to his fury, which was not a little heightened by the consciousness that the whole scene was witnessed by Vasco Nunez, whom he knew to be approaching. That cavalier, as may be imagined, was excessively amused by the spectacle.

"A brave monkey!" he exclaimed to the astrologer, as they passed in their course to survey the scene. "He hath found his kin, he knows his claim of brotherhood. They are garbed alike, and there is little difference, save in size, between the Spaniard and the greater ape of the two, let them play awhile together—it is rare sport, the affinity is good."

And in the heart of the speaker there was an unexpressed wish that Teresa Davila might also behold it. His unmeasured laughter reached the ears of Garabito, and increased his frenzy.

"I will hang you up ye villain!" one and all—I will hang ye! the red fires shall sear you ye dogs, if ye take not this foul creature from my shoulders!"

A torrent of oaths accompanied this outbreak, and threats which the Indians well knew were not idly expressed, prompted several of them to come forward, though slowly, and with trembling, to his assistance. The boy by whose neglect the monkey had been suffered to manifest his impertinence, having armed himself with a whip, succeeded better than the rest, in driving him finally from his place of eminence. But the urchin bore off with him the hat of Garabito, as a sort of trophy of his achievement; while the latter, whose very reason seemed to be utterly disordered by the torments and taunts he had undergone, and having the jeers and laughter of his own countrymen still sounding in his ears, drew his sword and made after the criminal, who now stood upon a little point of rock, and still seemed disposed to chuckle and rejoice in his impudence, though half conscious of the danger which he had incurred. But for his agility, he had paid for his insolence with life; leaping from point to point of the rocks around him, he Garabito escaped the little wretch, still bearing the hat in triumph, mocked at the hostility which he was so easily able to elude, and stretching out his long paws in the manner of a wicked schoolboy, taunted the infuriated dandy to renewed efforts at overtaking him. Meanwhile, the sailors, to whom the whole scene afforded nothing but delight, urged its continuance after their own fashion.

"All sail, Señor Garabito, you shall overhaul the enemy soon. You have but to weather the cape, and the game is certain. The chase slackens sail, and you shall have him at short quarters, close in shore." Such was the language of one. The encouragement of a second was bestowed upon the monkey; while a third lent his counsel to the Indian boy, who, scarcely less active than the narmose, was pursuing him with the best prospect of success. He sprang up the heights in pursuit—put in practice sundry well-known tricks to persuade him to terms—leaped up daintily from ledge to ledge of the delivacy as himself, and at length succeeded in compelling him to restore the hat, which he had continued, with awkward efforts, to confine upon his own head. Finding he could no longer sustain his sturdy pursuer, who, such an innumerable, he hauled it to the feet of Garabito, who, exhausted with his efforts, and rendered mad by the ridicule of those around him, stood red and panting, looking emotions which the Indians too well understood to venture to approach him, while under their distracting influence. The hat still lay at his feet, as the boy, whip in hand, leaped down from the little height from which he had chased the monkey. Without speaking a word, Garabito fixed his furious gaze upon the trembling child, and simply pointed with his finger to the hat. The sign was understood, and with slow steps, that seemed to denote a lurking apprehension of danger, the boy approached, and stooping down as to raise the desired object from the earth, was seized by the hair by the vengeful Spaniard; swinging him from his feet with one hand, Garabito lifted his sword in the same instant with the other. The act was sufficiently startling and threatening in the eyes of all who remembered the atrocious notoriety which his former savage deeds had secured to his name. The astrologer was the first to cry aloud to his companion.

"God of the martyrs, Vasco Nunez, strike in and stay his hand; he will play the child if thou dost not."

Such also was the fear of Azuma, who was the mother of the boy. She bounded forward with a shriek, and with that animation in her fine features now, which she had not worn during the whole of her picturesque performance, threw herself before the Spaniard, grasping with one hand the child, and with the other seconding the piteous prayer, with which she implored his mercy.

"He will not—he dare not strike!" said Vasco Nunez, in hoarse accents, but hurrying forward as he spoke, with a degree of haste which belied his confident speech. "He will not use the weapon upon the child—impossible! He is not base enough for that—he dare not, before our eyes!"

But the action of Garabito looked full of the direst purpose. With his fist he spurned the mother from before him, with one hand held the child at the full length of his arm, while throwing back the hand that held the sword, he waved the instrument aloft, in order to give force to its descending sweep.

"Hold, Señor Garabito—hold, Spaniard! wretch, base, cowardly villain, hold back thine arm. Beware, lest I do to thee whatever thou dost to the child."

The words of Vasco Nunez were too late, or only served to provoke and goad the vindictive monster to the commission of the deed. The fatal blow was given at the instant. The keen steel aimed too unerringly, and with all the bitter force of rage, went through the tender neck of the boy, severing flesh, gristle, bones, and life. The body of the victim fell quivering upon the shoulders of the mother, who still lay, and grovelled at the feet of the murderer; while the head, hurled from his bloody hands, rolled among the devoted savages, who, apprehensive of like cruel treatment, ready to fly, were huddled together in fear and trembling, at the edge of the rocks.

SKETCHES OF REAL LIFE.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A PORTRAIT PAINTER.

INTRODUCTORY SKETCH.

THE village of Selworth is decidedly one of the prettiest spots in England. It stands at some distance from the high road, on the bank of a beautiful stream, a tributary to the noble river on which, some ten miles nearer the metropolis, is situated the flourishing town of D—-. There it was I first saw the light, and there I trust my body shall at length repose in peace beneath the fresh green sod of the old church-yard. My father was a respectable yeoman of Selworth, and intended that I, his only child, should inherit his fields, and pass my time in their cultivation. Fate decreed otherwise. My father, by unavoidable misfortune, was deprived of the bulk of his property, and the reverse in his affairs broke his heart.

I sat alone in my little chamber, and trace the faint sketch of my life, and the unquiet swelling of the heart, the feverish longings, the gorgeous dreams, which were mine, when, in the ardent days of boyhood, I paced this very room, and, in the vague and undefined visions of my hopes, saw a future before me, ever-changing, but ever glorious! Am I, in truth, the same being? Have I the same heart, the same pulse? Is the Edmund Ashley of sixty-five one and the same Edmund Ashley of sixteen? Even so. The same motive is here, but chastened and subdued. Does not this heart still gush over with unutterable tenderness when I listen to the low sweet breath of the wind, or the sweeter music of woman's voice?

The noontide of my life, with its feverish heat and its passionate aspirations, has passed away, but its light still lingers on my mind, and the star of a better hope has arisen, and the quiet dew of heavenly peace has fallen on my spirit. I have said I am a painter. I am proud to avow it, though my name be not of those which shall win an immortality on earth. For though the captains of my army know him not—though his name shall pass away, whilst theirs shall be echoed from age to age, the private soldier may bear a heart as loyal as his general's—and so have I been faithful in the ranks, and proud of the banner under which I have toiled.

My life may be called an uneventful one. I have never experienced the lowest depths of poverty, or known the temptations of riches. My mother's small income became mine after her decease, and my own exertions have always secured me a moderate competence. I have no tale of romantic passion to record, and yet I have loved, and that tenderly and truly. This feeling was awakened in very early youth, and it was one of my enthusiasms. She I loved is long since dead, and her very memory has probably passed away from all hearts save mine. In mine there is one hallowed spot where her name and her image lie silently treasured, and so must remain while life shall last.

A few of my experiences I deem worth recording. The names introduced in these pages must necessarily be fictitious; but with these exceptions the truth of each narrative may be relied on.

THE UNDER TEACHER.

One of the standing annoyances to which a portrait painter is subjected, is that of being perpetually called upon to portray the features of individuals, who, whilst they cannot be called positively ugly, are still so far from handsome, and so much farther from the possession of any peculiar expression, good or bad, that it is impracticable to throw any interest into their portraits, save for those who know the originals. Such has been my continual experience ever since, brush in hand, I entered the lists where so many nobler and more gifted competitors than myself are contending for the prize of fame. And yet, paradoxical as the statement may seem, one of the most interesting portraits I ever undertook to paint, was the man of procuring me more genuine pleasure than I have often found in this world of tribulation and vexation.

Miss Georgiana D— was just one of those commonplace, red and white, unindividualized girls whom it is a labour to talk to, or paint, either in words or colours. She had one quality, however, which rendered her a person of much consideration in her own circle—she was rich. Fifty thousand pounds had a magic-power which might convert a Hottentot Venus into a divinity; and Miss D— was not strikingly plain—it would have been something of a relief if she had been so. Any expression would have been preferable to the blank, mindless-looking trait of countenance, of whose resemblance I was doomed to make my canvass the recipient.

Miss D— was a parlour boarder in a fashionable metropolitan school, and the painting of her portrait originated in the fancy of a rich and childless uncle in Bombay, who had the power, if he pleased, to swell the heiress's fortune to three times its present extent. To do Miss D— justice, I do not think her own vanity would have induced her to sit to me. She was too inert and sleepy to be very vain, and certainly had no innate love of the fine arts, which might have tempted her to patronize one of her votaries. Her exclamation, when she saw the picture on its completion, might have settled that question for ever—"Dear, dear! well, I dare say it is like me, though—and I am sure the lace tucker is the very same!" The background and rich drapery, and the flush tints, on which I had expended so much thought and care, were all as nothing to her.

Yet the painting of that portrait is connected in my mind with such sunny and happy recollections—with so much of the romance of real life, that I look back on it as one of the brightest vistas in the image of memory. Another face arises in my dreams beside that inexpressive visage—a face, of which a glimpse might put a man in good humour for a week, and even reconcile him to the task of painting Miss D—. The face of Eleanor Armstrong, the under-teacher at Miss Toogood's seminary, always rises to my mental sight amidst the memories of that time as one of the fairest visions that ever blessed the eyes of painter.

Miss D— had favoured me with one or two sittings when Miss Toogood suggested that a companion might be useful in talking to her, as (heaven bless the mark!) I ought to catch the varying expression of my sitter's countenance! I certainly did not expect that anything under an earthquake or the laughing gas could induce the heiress to move a muscle; but as I could not decently say so, I assented; and Eleanor Armstrong was forthwith installed in her office of conversation, and elicited an expression whenever, and there was none to elicit. "Oh! what a face was that which beamed on me, when, on the third day of my purgatory, I entered the room set apart for my work. There was Miss D—, just as heavy and blank as usual, but beside her sat Eleanor Armstrong—the personification of living loveliness. I suppose I should sadly err from the right way of story-telling if I limited to give a description of my heroine, but truly charms like hers are more easily portrayed in colours than in words.

She was about nineteen; her height just sufficient to redeem her figure from the charge of pettiness, and yet without any approach to the stature of a tall woman. Her complexion was not sickly white, but so transcendently clear, that never might a feeling rise within her heart, but you read an intimation of it on "her cheek, her brow, her lips." Here eyes were soft and dark, and the lashes raven black, but the long curls which fell in shockers upon her neck (the expression is not original, but no other will fitly describe their luxuriance) were of a deep, bright chestnut. Her mouth was small and sweet; and she might have been pronounced the prettiest of the pretty, but for an expansive white forehead which gave too much dignity to her appearance to admit of the application of that term. Beautiful, very beautiful, was the Under Teacher. She painted her likeness on the minds of all who looked on her, as effectually as ever the sun painted the features of a landscape in Mr. Talbot's newly discovered camera obscura. But this sort of painting did not content me; I longed to paint her portrait. Had I asked permission to do so, I might, perhaps, have been refused; at any rate, such a request would naturally have drawn on the fair damsel the envy of the amiable proprietress of the establishment, of a worthy body of a certain age, who presided over the spelling and the needle-work, and of an old French governess almost starting from her seat at the deed. During the very frequent sittings with which I discovered it was indispensably requisite Miss D— should indulge me, I managed to transfer that lovely face to a miniature canvas, secretly placed in front of the larger one; and, copying this at home on a larger scale, assisted by memory, I managed to make a portrait so striking, that the likeness was almost startling. "Ought I not, Eleanor? She little guessed the nature of my employment, or of what vast importance to her future happiness that employment was to be.

The portraits were finished. Miss D—'s was to have graced the walls of Somerset House; but as the person who had undertaken to convey it to the Indian Nabob left England earlier than he had intended, it was consigned to his keeping, and from that time to this I have seen and heard no more of it. The other, so secretly wrought, so fairly finished, supplied its place in the exhibition. Fresh, and fair, and new, did that sweet face look amongst the resemblances of glowing gentlemen and smirking ladies, by which it was surrounded. Many a loudly expressed burst of admiration, many a whisper of deeper and truer delight were elicited from the groups which crowded round that transcendent portrait; and often might be heard the murmur of disappointment, when the page in the catalogue, eagerly turned to for information, was found to contain nothing respecting the original, save the unsatisfactory words, "Portrait of a young lady."

The season was drawing to a close, and the exhibition-rooms were unusually crowded. I happened to be there, and saw with much pleasure that the gazers on my favourite picture were as numerous as ever. Amongst these was a young man of about twenty-five years of age, of remarkably distinguished appearance, who seemed to regard it with an extraordinary degree of interest. Long did he pause before it, long after the groups around had departed, and he was left alone to survey it at leisure. He paced back and forward before it, looked at it from all points of view, and finally left the room rather quickly, with the air of a man who has formed some lasty purpose, and is determined to lose no time in executing it.

"I shall see that youth again," was the prophetic impression on my mind,—and I was not mistaken. That very evening a servant announced "a gentleman on business," and on the skirts of the announcement, the gazer of the morning entered my apartment.

Long before this time my readers will have anticipated that the young man had been struck by the likeness of the picture to some one in whom he was deeply interested. Such was precisely the case. He came to me for the purpose of ascertaining the residence of the original, of whose identity he had not a moment's doubt; but it is best that I should detail the history I gathered from him, in a somewhat more connected form than it was poured out to me. —Eleanor Armstrong was the only daughter of an excellent clergyman, and distantly related, by the mother's side, to the very noble and very proud Lady Boro-dale. Left an orphan at twelve years of age, and very alone, provided for by a gift of pride, or both together, induced that titled dame to extend her protection to the fair young relative, and to receive her under her own roof. This was a piece of virtue which brought with it its own reward, for it ever embodied sunshine were the inmate of an earthly dwelling, Boro-dale Park had such an inmate in the person of Eleanor. Gay, but never noisy, wise as well as witty, loving and amiable, as she was beautiful, Eleanor Armstrong was as a new life and pulse to the somewhat starchy inhabitants of the gloomy old mansion. Her light foot sounded strangely pleasant as she tripped over the old oaken floors, so long used to echo nothing but the stately steps of the Lady Boro-dale and her attendants. Her sweet laugh rang like fair music amongst the arched roofs, and the broad, quiet corridors. Her bright face looked out like a flower with a soul in it—(it is a conceit, but it is so) here—from the dark recesses and the Gothic windows. The Lady Boro-dale felt her influence—she could not resist it; and her heart, cold and formal as was the set of its currents, could not but warm into something like attachment to the fair being who was so happy, so cheerful, and, above all, so grateful and dependent.

But if the proud and formal lady almost thawed in the presence of the sweet Eleanor, there was another heart which, naturally warm and ardent in its feelings, fired with a passion of the most enthusiastic and devoted kind, as his heroine changed from a lovely child to a loving woman.

Sir Philip Boro-dale was an only child, and had been left under the guardianship of his proud mother, by a very weak and very henpecked father, who died when his son was little more than an infant. Fond of power, which she had exercised with an iron hand over poor Sir Ralph, from the time of his marriage to his decease, and hating to give up her power over any person until she should reach the extreme point to which it was possible to retain it, she had prevailed on her husband to give her a certain authority over the pecuniary resources of Sir Philip, which he could not shake off until he should have attained his twenty-fifth year.

Had he been a constant resident of Boro-dale Park, his heart might have melted to the softness of a woman's, and he might have reached the dignified coldness of those around him; and the continued presence of his orphan-cousin might have averted the event his mother dreaded; he might have loved her as a sister and no more. But fearing the consequences of constant intercourse with one so lovely and so poor, the lady contrived that he should spend much of his time at home, and when he came to the park, he was a visitor at the Park, she never failed to expel him largely on the grounds of misalliance in general, with a special clause against those which included relationship, however distant, amongst their disadvantages. Certainly, for a wise woman, Lady Boro-dale did a very foolish thing, for her design was immediately seen through; and as Sir Philip was not without a spice of the spirit of contradiction in his nature, he naturally fell in love with Eleanor, with a valence and ardour unshared in all the records of romance.

That Eleanor should be indifferent to such a passion was not at all likely. The seclusion in which she lived debarred her from comparing him with any other who could claim the slightest equality with him. In him was the image of perfection embodied, or rather she moulded her ideas of perfection by his standard. How could any young girl, with a heart full of affections, and yearning for sympathy, withstand the love of such a youth as Philip Boro-dale—so frank, so noble, so kind! So the fair Eleanor blushed and sighed, and murmured forth a promise to be his—his for ever; and never thought that his mother's anger would be implacable, nor that she herself would be deemed artful and ungrateful, so entranced was she in the happiness of loving and being loved. But a new light dawned, or rather a new cloud gloomed over her, when the discovery was made (as, somehow, such discoveries always are made,) of their mutual attachment. Each was too proud to deny it—each was too much in love to pretend to forego a treasure so precious; but not the ban of the old lady's severest displeasure—a displeasure, however, more bitterly expressed against Eleanor than Philip; for a mother's heart, be it ever so chilly, is always willing to find excuses for her own child, even though his crime be the deadly sin of opposition to her will. Nothing could excite her indignation at the poor orphan, but she was almost ready to forego her own vengeance, her declamations on the subjects of meanness, ingratitude, and low artifice. Poor Eleanor began to feel for the first time that to be dependent is a bitter thing. This state of affairs could not long remain without some change; and Sir Philip left Boro-dale Park, trusting that time would mitigate his mother's anger, and reconcile her to the idea of his marriage with Eleanor. But he had to deal with one who, though cold and slow in most of her feelings, was vehement in her wrath, and obstinate in her resolutions. He had scarcely left Boro-dale Park, when she directed against poor Eleanor a series of annoyances, so systematic and so pointed, that the friendless girl, patient and enduring as she was for some time, at last could bear no more. She entreated to be allowed to seek another residence.

"I can surely work!" said she, proudly, though her eyes were streaming with tears. "I can surely earn a livelihood somewhere—I can do anything—anything rather than remain under a roof where my presence is no longer welcome!"

"Pray, leave it, my dear," was the cold reply. "But believe me, Miss Armstrong, you shall not go where you will have the opportunity of disgracing yourself and your friends more than you have already done. You shall be placed in a situation where I know you will be safe, and have no further opportunity of acting in the deceitful manner you have lately done."

A fortnight after this conversation Eleanor Armstrong was installed in Miss Toogood's seminary as under teacher. Before my heroine quitted Boro-dale Park, she had received a letter from her lover, full of passionate protestations of unalterable love, and entreaties that she would write to him while he remained at the little German village where he purposed passing some weeks. She had done so, and waited day after day in anxious expectation of a reply. None arrived, however, and she was compelled to leave the roof of Lady Boro-dale without receiving any assurance that Sir Philip was aware of her intended change of residence, or the harsh treatment which compelled her to the step she was taking. Should she write again! It was a long struggle between pride and love before she could prevail on herself so to do; but, at length, another epistle was written and despatched. Weeks passed by, still no letter came; and at length the high spirit began to droop and the light heart to despond. He must be ill—he must be dead, or—no he could not have forgotten her!

But even that bitterest possibility seemed fixed in her belief, when, on taking up a newspaper which had wonderfully found its way through the outer barriers of Miss Toogood's establishment, she read the announcement of Sir Philip Boro-dale's arrival from the continent, and farther on a mysterious one describing a projected union between himself and a certain Lady Honora M—, with whose family he had formed an acquaintance in Italy, and with whom he had returned to England. I need not dwell upon the violence of such a shock to poor Eleanor's feelings. She had a long and severe illness, and for weeks small hopes were entertained that she would survive. But a sound constitution and an elastic spirit will bear up marvellously through heavy troubles, and revolve again and again from bitter mental suffering. Eleanor Armstrong had a truly affectionate heart, and she had loved with all the warmth and enthusiasm of which such a one is capable; but still she was not the girl to die of love, or resolve to be miserable because she had known disappointment, especially when she remembered that the object of her attachment had proved himself unworthy of it. She rallied her pride and her spirit—called in the blessed aids of religion and reason, and in a few months the lovely under teacher was as lovely as ever. There was, perhaps, a little more thought on her face, a little more tenderness in her smile;—but she was once more able to perform her duties with attention and energy, and her cheerful resignation and unrepining content won her the love and respect of every being near her whose heart was not utterly seathed in the frost of selfishness.

I do not doubt that if Sir Philip Boro-dale had crossed her path no more, she would, in time, have conquered the lingering tinge of attachment towards him which would sometimes rebel in her heart, and even might, at some future day, have practically proved that it is quite possible to love more than once. I say this might have happened, but the fates (in compassion to the romantic portion of my readers) had ordered otherwise, and Eleanor Armstrong was doomed to remain a heroine after the most approved fashion.

Perhaps Sir Philip may be forgiven for not answering Eleanor's letters, when it is explained that he never received them, and, moreover, was fully convinced of her faithlessness as she was of his. Lady Boro-dale had managed to intercept the first of these missives, and the last did not reach the village to which it was addressed until the traveller had cutted it for another resting-place. True, he had left orders that any letter arriving after his departure should be immediately forwarded to him; but the postmaster was absent, and his wife put the letter in her pocket, where it lay, amongst a curious chaos of other matters, for a full week, and then, in her fright at having caused its delay, the worthy fron committed it to the flames. Sir Philip, unable to account for his far-one's silence, and rendered restless from place to place, and at length received a letter from his venerable parent, entreating him to return home, and informing him that Miss Armstrong had chosen to quit Boro-dale Park, but that she would not pain him by detailing any particulars of the affair until his return.

The baronet had contracted an acquaintance, while on the continent, with an English nobleman, to whose party he speedily attached himself, and with them returned to England. His mother was delighted at this accident, for the family of the aforesaid nobleman was an ancient one, and his estates large, and she allowed to herself that the Earl of V—'s only daughter might be almost a sufficiently good match for the heir of Boro-dale Park. It was at her instigation that a newspaper paragraph had insinuated the probability of such a marriage, and by her direction that the paper was placed in the way of Eleanor Armstrong. To her son she was all warmth and affection. The truths respecting Eleanor's conduct, which she rather hinted at than expressed, were of such a nature as to lead Sir Philip to suppose that no betrothal had acted in such a manner as to place an eternal bar betwixt them. She described Eleanor's departure from her protection as entirely her own spontaneous deed, and even denied any knowledge of her residence or situation. But Sir Philip clung long and obstinately to the memory of his early love; and was well the very eye of his twenty-fifth birthday that his mother, unwilling to countenance a long-continued delay in visiting the Earl of V—, and if he should find Lady Honora still so favourably disposed towards him as she once seemed to be, to offer her his hand. For this purpose he went to London. Lady Boro-dale had no fears respecting the possibility of his meeting with Eleanor, for her obsequious confidante, Miss Toogood, was carefully apprised of Sir Philip's intentions, and had orders to keep her far inmate pretty close during his stay in town.

Great was the surprise of Miss Toogood when a gentleman called at the "establishment," and demanded an instant and private interview with Miss Armstrong. Greater still was her consternation when, on entering the drawing room half an hour afterwards in an agony of unbecomable curiosity, the gentleman announced himself as Sir Philip Boro-dale. Greatest of all was the anger of his lady mother when she was informed of the frustration of her schemes.

A fortnight after this memorable visit to the exhibition, Sir Philip Boro-dale kept his twenty-fifth birthday. In three months more a bridal party stood before the altar of St. George's, Hanover-square. Sir Philip Boro-dale was the bridegroom, a bishop pronounced the blessing, I gave away the bride, and that bride was Eleanor Armstrong.

The portrait, which plays so conspicuous a part in this faithful narrative, still hangs in the gallery of Boro-dale Park. There are many others around it by far worthier than mine—pictures, that by hundreds and thousands have been refused—pictures, that have raised the envy of half the connoisseurs in Europe—but there is not one which the master so dearly prizes as that which made its debut at Somerset House, in the humble character of the "Portrait of a young lady."

FLOWERS.—The cultivation of flowers is, of all the amusements of mankind, the one to be selected and approved as one of the most innocent in itself, and most perfectly devoid of injury or annoyance to others; its employment is not only conducive to health and peace of mind, but, probably, more good will have arisen and friendships been formed, by the intercourse and communication connected with this pursuit, than from any other whatever; the pleasures, the ecstasies of the horticultural are harmless and pure; a streak, a tint, a shade, becomes his triumph, which, though often obtained by chance, are secured alone by morning care, by evening caution, and the vigilance of days; an employ which, in its various grades, excludes neither the opulent nor the indigent, and, in its routine with boundless variety, affords an unceasing excitement to emulation, without contention or ill-will.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Hamilton King; or, The Snuggler and the Dwarf. By the Old Sailor, author of "Tough Yarns," etc. In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

There is no lack of incident, and of perils by flood and field, in these stirring volumes. Indeed the great fault of the work is, that the action is too crowded, the characters too numerous, and the plot too confused and compound. Mysteries, involvements, and desperate adventures, which lead to nothing, and have no dramatic adaptation to the story, follow one another in a whirl, which at last dazes the attention. Many of the detached scenes are quite graphic, and the style is that of a practised and graceful writer. The following vivid description of a squall at sea is quite artist-like:

"Far as the eye could reach astern, there seemed to be a white foam arising through the dim haze, and spreading in wider expansion as it approached. The curlings of the seas were not to be distinguished from the smoother surface, and there was a blackness hovering over all, that contrasted fearfully with the milky hue of the rolling waves. The schooner had carried on to the last moment, and then every thing was let go; her topsail flew from the yards, and passed away a-head, like a cloud borne on the fleet wings of the wind; and her jib, exposed to the fury of the blast, and the sudden lowering of the squaresail, split into ribands, and fluttered in mockery of the efforts to haul it down.

"In sail!" shouted Fearhan; and in a few minutes the Blue Bob was running along under a bare pole; for the squaresails were taken in, the gaff-topsail stowed at the mast-head, the mainsail lowered, and the boom shifted to the lee-quarter, ready for reefing the sail. Down came the squall, scattering the spray over the decks like a shower of hail stones. The vessel reeled for several minutes, as if in fright at the war of elements; every plank in her quivered; her masts shook like a reed, and the ocean around her seemed to smother with the friction of her sides, as she rushed on in her headlong course. But all was snugly housed—not a rope-yarn was started, and though Tom Graves did exclaim, "Poor thing!—how she trembles!" Yet the lovely sea-boat rode buoyant over the billows, like a duck at play; the mainsail was double reefed—the fore-sail set, and there was scarcely a wet jacket among the crew."

Orations of Lord Brougham, on politics, theology, law, science, education, literature, etc., etc., as exhibited in his parliamentary and legal speeches and miscellaneous writings. In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

The varied acquisitions and versatile powers of Lord Brougham are here exhibited in a most favourable light. The book, as the editor remarks, will be found not only to embody the most brilliant passages from his celebrated speeches and writings, but also to unfold to the reader the gradual development of his lordship's mind, on those great questions in politics, literature, and science, in which learned men of all countries, and all ages, must ever take a lively interest. A succinct and well-written preface of Lord Brougham introduces the extracts, which will be found more complete, accurate and elaborate than any that has hitherto appeared.

The Rose of Sharon: A Religious Souvenir, for 1840. Edited by Miss Sarah C. Edgerton. Pp. 212. Boston: A. Tompkins and B. B. Mussey.

This work is externally executed in that style of neatness characteristic of the Boston press. Its embellishments are not numerous, but quite respectable. The literary contents are various—many of them displaying no ordinary degree of talent. The poetry does not often rise above the level of mediocrity, although there are three or four striking exceptions to this remark. The work is, we believe, designed for the Universalist denomination of Christians. Mr. Price, of Fulton-street, has it for sale in this city.

First Readers. By S. G. Goodrich. In four volumes.

These school-books are very handsomely got up, and form a favourable contrast to most other school books of the class. The publishers and author seem to have paid to these humble, though important auxiliaries in education, more respect than is usually extended to them. Most of our juvenile recollections of "Readers" are of some ill-printed, dull extracts from speeches and histories, entirely beyond our comprehension or our sympathies. These books before us must come home to the business and bosoms of youth. They are to a considerable degree original, and what is selected is chosen with judgment. They cannot but be favourites with masters and pupils, while they will teach the mechanical art of reading, and they will raise the thinking faculties, refine the manners, and establish good moral principles in the scholar.

The American Journal of Dental Science, with plates. Edited by Eleazar Parry, of New-York, and Chapin H. Harris, M. D., of Baltimore. New-York: George A. J. Harris, Baltimore: Armstrong and Berry. Pp. 45.

This, we understand, is the first magazine devoted to the exclusive interest of dental science ever published in any country. It is handsomely printed, and embellished with illustrations, etc.—The Journal possesses an interest not merely for the practical dentist, but also the physician and the general reader. We heartily wish it all the prosperity to which the ability of its conductors so eminently entitles it.

"Lalla Rookh, an Oriental Romance. By Thomas Moore. From the nineteenth London edition. Illustrated with engravings from drawings by eminent artists, under the superintendence of Mr. Charles Heath." Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard. One vol. Pp. 37.

This is a very beautiful edition of Moore's celebrated romance—the letterpress of the volume being executed in this country, and the illustrations engraved and, we believe, printed in London. The designs, which are mostly by Edward Carbold, are spirited and appropriate—but the impressions for the American edition are apparently from plates that have seen considerable service. The work, however, forms a very elegant article for a new year's present, and is well calculated to grace the boudoir and the centre-table. We commend it to the attention of all young gentlemen who are looking round for a gift for their lady-loves.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received numerous communications upon the subject of the recent destruction of the National Theatre; but they are all of too speculative a character for our purposes. We do not doubt that Mr. Wallack will soon have an opportunity of reviewing his fortunes, and of reviewing his managerial career, under more flattering auspices than heretofore.—A London correspondent, who signs himself "Ariel," is informed that his "dissolutions" are too scandalous for our journal. We are brought to see the mother country now, by steam communication, that we must be more careful than ever what we say of each other. Distance is no longer any pollution for the publication of such personal allusions. It is quite as unsafe to indulge in personal criticisms upon the dancers at Almacks, as it would be to panegyrize the belles of Saratoga.—Correspondents who send us manuscripts of considerable length, are requested to retain copies of the same, as we cannot undertake, in all cases, to return them.—We must decline the contributions of "A Man About Town," "Stanhope," "Y. P.," "Verona," "X. Q.," "Wacuset," "Pescara," "T.," "L. Y.," and "Hudson."—The remarks upon America Vespucci are unfitted for the columns of any respectable journal. We know nothing as to the truth of the writer's imputations.—We have no copies in our possession of the autograph which "A Collector" requests us to obtain.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1839.

Letters of introduction.—A writer in the London Court Gazette, who, after the manner of Captain Maryatt and other tourists, has undertaken to recount his experiences in this country, in the course of his remarks cautions all persons visiting the United States, who may be travelling merely for amusement, and not for purposes of trade, to avoid encumbering themselves with what are by courtesy called letters of "introduction" from commercial houses. 'Although,' says the writer, 'such letters uniformly request the good offices of the parties to whom they are addressed on behalf of the uninitiated stranger, and conclude by stating that "the usual attentions will oblige," he will find that the usual attentions are considered to have been conferred when the privilege has been bestowed upon him of surmounting a flight of stairs, steep enough for an observatory (the New-York houses being very high, and counting-rooms expensive), whenever it may suit him to drop in, as they obligingly term it, to read the newspapers which "will always be at his service." In fact, letters of introduction, under ordinary circumstances, generally prove useless; when they are presented, the party to whom they are addressed appears to be extremely glad to see you, and expresses his intense desire "to contribute all in his power to render your stay in the country agreeable;" and having asked you "what you think of the United States," to which question, of course, you have returned the most complimentary reply, he pulls a pencil from his pocket, and inquires at what hotel you are staying. He then takes you by the hand, grasping the same in the most friendly manner for at least five minutes, pressing it occasionally with his thumb, as if it were a piece of dough; and concludes, by expressing the great delight which he shall experience in calling upon you. A few days afterwards, if he remembers his promise, he selects an hour for this gratification at which he thinks you are sure to be from home, leaves his card (which the waiter never delivers to you), and there the acquaintance drops. I ought to mention, that, in some cases, on presentation of letters at Philadelphia, parties may occasionally be found, who will express a hope that the fortunate holder, as a lottery office-keeper would say, should at some early period favour them with his company at dinner—a wish which they will repeat whenever they may subsequently meet with him; but as they never commit themselves by naming a day, I am afraid that I must class them along with the rest.' So much for our tourist. We do not doubt that instances of this sort of inattention are common in New-York and Philadelphia as well as in the commercial cities of Europe. The absurdity lies in mentioning facts of this kind as characteristic of Americans—as if they were not quite as likely to occur in London. Indeed, we know of hundreds of cases where American gentlemen have taken letters of introduction to England, and derived from them anything but manifestations of courtesy and hospitality—and this, too, when the letters have been addressed not solely to men harassed with commercial cares, but to persons of leisure and of wealth. We could mention one instance, in particular, where a young American of fine attainments, and honourably distinguished among the literary men of his country, took a letter to a well-known English novelist, recently ennobled by the Queen, and who derives no trifling emolument from the publication of his works in this country, who treated his visitor with repulsive coldness upon receiving the letter, and never afterwards extended to him the slightest attention. Cases like this are undoubtedly exceptions to the general custom, as well in New-York as in London; and we should never think of arguing from them, that our English brethren were selfish and inhospitable, and that their authors were ignorant of the common decencies of gentlemanly intercourse. And yet by such inferences would our Cockney commentators apply attributes to the whole American people!

The Greenwood cemetery.—Books have been opened at number eight Wall-street, for signatures for lots in the beautiful grounds appropriated to the purpose of a cemetery on the hills of Gowanus. This is no money-making scheme. The charter, procured from the Legislature, giving a permanent existence to the company, is framed in such a way that neither the stockholders nor trustees can derive any pecuniary profit from the undertaking. Whatever money, after the original expense is paid, may arise from the subsequent sale of lots, is to be devoted to the improvement and ornamenting of the cemetery grounds. Every diversion from this specific use of the funds of the company is expressly prohibited.

Park Theatre.—The opera of "Cinderella" has been produced in quite an effective style at this establishment. The machinery and properties are, to be sure, not so perfect as we could wish, but this is a minor defect. Mrs. Martyn was decidedly successful in the part of Cinderella; and in particular passages she was equal to any personation of the character that has ever appeared upon the American boards. She sometimes fails from exhaustion, and her powers do not seem equal to a long-sustained effort. Ghibblei, so far as the singing was concerned, is the best Pompolino we have yet had. Manvers played the Prince with spirit, and sang with sweetness and precision. We were a little disappointed in Martyn's Dandini. It was deficient in ease and fun. Miss Poole, as Clorinda, was as graceful and pretty as ever, and proved a great addition to the vocal corps. The whole opera was got up in a creditable manner, and has been repeated with renewed applause.

Singular trial.—A trial of considerable interest has been lately instituted in Paris. The heirs of Napoleon appear against the state—they demand that all the arrears and interest of funded property of seven hundred and fifty francs a year, purchased by the great man when only General Bonaparte, should be paid up. The Treasury opposes the claim on the ground that, by the ninth article of the treaty of Fontainebleau, the emperor gave up all his private property. The curious part of the affair is, that it is impossible to produce the treaty, and no authenticated copy of it can be found in the archives of the hotel of foreign affairs. What has become of it nobody knows; but it is certain that it cannot be found. Still it is feared that the heirs of Napoleon will press their claim in vain.

Van Amburgh in Paris.—A letter from Paris, published in the London Court Journal, says:—"Van Amburgh's success is tremendous. The piece, entitled La fille de l'Emir, which introduces him and his playfellows, is mere trash. The first piece was Victorine; and so anxious was the audience to see the hero of the night, that they absolutely forced the actors to retire, and the curtain to be let down. He is engaged to appear in Prussia and Russia immediately. The anxiety to see him is far greater than was manifested to behold Martin appear. And yet that brute tamer was just as remarkable a person as the American, and took just as great liberties with his wild beasts. Perhaps the popularity of the latter in England may account for the greater desire to see him display here."

Smoking in the streets.—The Post, in alluding to the atrocious practice so prevalent in this city of smoking in the streets, says:—"Little boys make a parade of themselves on the side-walks smoking long nines almost as tall as themselves. It is amusing to see the swagger with which a mannikin of three feet high takes his segar between the fore and middle finger, removes it from his lips and blows out a dense cloud of smoke from his distended cheeks. No doubt many of those persons who indulge in their favourite habit in the public streets, do it thoughtlessly, without thinking how offensive it is to others, and would be surprised at hearing that they are guilty of a blackguard practice."

Bunker Hill cut up into house-lots.—The first great battle-ground of the Revolution has been cut up into lots to suit purchasers, and disposed of at auction! The spot once crimsoned with the blood of Warren, may thus become in a year or two the site of a stable or a pig-sty. We shall wonder if the very turf do not cry out against the desecration. Every foot of it is "hallowed ground." It should have been held sacred till the last vestige of that liberty, whose high altar it was, smoking with the incense of human blood—has disappeared.

Sculpture in the west.—A young sculptor named Brackett, only twenty years of age, has just finished at Cincinnati, a statue large as life, of Nydia, the blind girl in Balwer's Lost Days of Pompeii. It is highly commended by the western critics. Cincinnati appears to be prolific in artists in this peculiar department. Power and Clevering have already made a rapid progress in the profession, and we do not doubt that Brackett will tread close upon their heels. We hope, if he possesses true talent, that it may not remain undeveloped for want of encouragement.

Philosophy.—A German philosopher, Hegel, says, after ample experience—"Philosophy is utterly useless and fruitless—and for this very reason it is the sublimest of all pursuits, the most deserving of our attention, and the most worthy of our zeal." This definition is not equal to that given by Burton in his character of a tipsy tailor:—"Philosophy," he says, "is like brandy and water—especially brandy."

A fortunate scribbler.—It is confidently stated, with what truth we know not, that Lockhart, the reviewer, is about to marry Miss Angela Coutts, the wealthy heiress of the late Countess of St. Albans. Good business this for the editor of the Quarterly Review. We trust he will be less truculent in his criticisms hereafter.

Paganini.—A French journal states that Paganini had just arrived at the baths of Vernet, so exhausted that he is but a shadow. He has lost his voice, and expresses himself by his eyes and gesticulation.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Sir.—Our old friend, WILLIAM DUNLAP, died this morning at eight o'clock, after a long continued illness, which he bore with great resignation. It is due to the friends and patrons of the "History of New-York," to state, that the manuscript copy of the second and last volume has been for some time completed by him, and that it is now in the press and will appear within a few weeks.

Very truly yours, JOHN W. FRANCIS.

Saturday morning, September 23, 1839.

OH, MY LOVE HATH AN EYE.

ALLEGRETTO.

Oh, my love hath an eye of the soft-est blue, Yet it was not that that won me, But a lit-tle bright drop from her soul was there; 'Tis that, 'Tis that that has undone me. I might love-ly Nor per- my have left me, But the sen-si-tive came trem-bling there, Of my heart it for e-ver be-reft me, Of my heart it for e-ver be-reft me.

SECOND VERSE.

Let me not hear the nightingale sing,
Though I once in its notes delighted,
The feeling and mind that came whispering forth
Has left me no music beside it;
Who could blame had I loved that face
Ere my eye could twice explore her,
Yet it was for the fairy intelligence there,
And her warm, warm heart I adore her.

MISCELLANY.

ANECDOTE OF DOMITIAN.—It is dangerous to jest with monarchs. The favourite amusement of the Emperor Domitian, it is well known, was fly-catching, to which royal amusement he devoted the greater part of his time. Once, while he was thus employed, a stranger presented himself in the ante-chamber, and requested to be admitted to the emperor, asking, at the same time, if he had any other company. "No—not even a fly," answered the officer in waiting, with a smile. Unfortunately Domitian overheard him, and exclaimed in a voice like thunder:—"Thy head shall pay for that joke!" and it was cut off within an hour.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?—Among the list of prisoners for trial at the late Middlesex and Westminster sessions, were Liberty and his wife, for disorderly conduct; Mary Music, for being drunk and creating a disturbance; "sweet" Ann Page, for threatening to murder Jane Shore; and a fellow who calls himself Dicky Celestina, for an assault.

TAKING ADVICE.—An Irish tailor, making a gentleman's coat and vest too small, was ordered to take them home and let them out. Some days after, the gentleman inquiring for his garments, was told by this ninth part of a man, that the clothes happening to fit a countryman of his, he had let them out at a shilling a week!

GRACE DARLING.—The rumour upon this celebrated individual has not yet ceased. Last week Mr. Gordon, a Russian merchant, and his niece, from St. Petersburg, went off to the Longstone Light-house, and presented Miss Darling with a splendid silver salver. This gentleman was accompanied by Mr. Sinclair, of Berwick, whom he has commissioned to paint for him a picture of the melancholy wreck of the Forfarshire steamer, and which is to be taken to St. Petersburg.

INSTABILITY OF NATURE.—It is one of the fatal evidences of the infirmity of our nature, that appetite decreases with eating.

PRIMITIVE MODE OF OBTAINING FIRE.—The aborigines of India, the Bhil, Kholi, and Goand, had, doubtless, found out the art of cooking their food at a very early period, having a natural tinder box and flint in every bamboo grove, and having only to watch, during a high wind, the omission of flame from the friction of those natives of the hills, to obtain a supply more than sufficient of the devouring element: their sylvan retreats being often burnt over their heads. I have witnessed the magnificent spectacle of a forest of bamboo blazing, crackling, and exploding, said to be self-ignited; and although any hard wood will yield fire by friction, the siliceous coating of the bamboo makes it by far the most ready instrument of Agni, whom the universal Hindu nation, the learned Brahmin, the warlike Rajpoot, as well as the half-savage Vanaputra, worship as a divinity.

THE EAGLE AND THE SNAIL.—"You here, you slow, creeping insect! how did you ever get on so far?" said the eagle. And what was the snail's answer? "I crept all the way." Could he have told him in fewer words the secret of political advancement and self-aggrandizement?

NOR BAD.—"Pray, sir," asked a lady at a literary party the other evening, "what languages, do you suppose, are spoken in heaven?"

"The dead languages, of course," replied a gentleman near her.

CONVERSION.—Richter says, that we are not made good (though we are made better) because we are converted; but we are converted because we are good.

A CORRECT JUDGMENT.—Niebuhr said of Scott's Napoleon, "Our only doubt must be whether the matter or the manner of the book be more contemptible."

A QUESTION.—Whether it is nobler to dwell in Paradise and dream of a cabbage-garden, or to live among pot-herbs and believe in Paradise!

FACT.—No sick man, says somebody, every dreamt such crudities as waking philosophy has imbedded in its systems.

THE GOOSE.—The goose once complained to Jupiter, that in spite of all the benefits she conferred on mortals, they despised and ridiculed her. "If they do so," said Jove, "they are very ungrateful. Your flesh affords them a relishing repast, and your feathers surpass the poppies of Morpheus in giving rest to the weary. But if you are yet dissatisfied, I will endue thy quills with still more soporific virtue—they shall be made into pens." Thus we see that stupid books were intended as a blessing, and not as a curse to the world, to afford an innocent substitute for opium.

INTERESTING SIGHT.—Race between a DEER and a STEAM-ENGINE.—While the cars were coming down on Wednesday, a fine buck made his appearance on the track and had a trial of speed with the locomotive. He kept the track for two miles, when he was finally run off, or he would have been run over. The sight must have been deeply exciting and highly interesting—as the line of road is perfectly straight: every inch of the contest was witnessed by the passengers.

LOQUACITY.—Time consumes steel and iron, but a talker does more yet, for he consumes time itself.

TO A DANDY.—BY S. S. OSGOOD

If the story be true as the heathens relate,
That Jove showered down a whole handful of souls,
And left them to scramble their best for a mate,
'Mongst the bodies that wandered between the two poles,
Your unfortunate want we can clearly explain;
For what sensible spirit in search of a shape
Would not rather a shelterless rover remain,
Than wear a wasp's form with the face of an ape

THE TUSCAN VASE.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER V.

A dream disturbed—a portrait and painting.

St. Clair went out soon after his arrival, and resumed the road to his country seat. The impetuous gallop of his horse disturbed the flow of his ideas: but he plainly saw that his happiness in this world was destroyed for ever, and that he could only find it again in death and a Tuscan vase.

Arrived home, he threw himself on the couch where the night before he had so long and so deliciously meditated his good fortune. The idea that he had most fondly indulged, was that his mistress differed from all other women, that she had never loved, and could never love, other than himself. Now this beautiful dream had vanished before the sad and cruel reality. "I possess a beautiful woman, and that is all. She has mind; for that she is the more to be blamed—having been able to love Massigny! True it is that she loves me now—with all her soul—as she can love. To be loved as Massigny has been! She loves me for my attention, my flatteries, my importunities. But I am deceived. There was never any sympathy between our hearts. Massigny or I, it is all one to her. He is handsome, she loves him for his beauty. I sometimes amuse my lady. 'Well,' she says, 'we love St. Clair, since the other is dead! And if St. Clair dies, or becomes tiresome, we will see.'" Firmly believe that the devil is among the listeners, invisible to the wretch who thus tortures himself. The sight is amusing to the enemy of man; and when the victim feels that his wounds are closing, the devil is there to re-open them.

St. Clair thought that he heard a voice which whispered: "To be second to him is an honour indeed—"

He raised himself on his seat, and cast a fierce glance about him. How happy would he have been to find some one in his chamber! Doubtless he would have torn him to pieces.

The clock struck eight. At eight and a half the countess expects him. If she should break the appointment? "But why see again the mistress of Massigny?" He threw himself once more on the couch, and closed his eyes. "I wish to sleep," said he. He remained still half a minute, then leaped out in his bare feet and ran to the clock. "How I wish it were half past eight!" thought he. "Then it would be too late for me to set out." In his heart he had not the courage to remain at home; he wanted some excuse. He would have been glad of a violent fit of sickness. He walked about his chamber, then sat down, took a book, and could not read a syllable. He seated himself before his piano, but had not the strength to open it. He whistled, he looked at the clouds, and tried to count the poplars before his windows. At length he returned to consult the clock, and found that he had not killed more than three minutes. "I can't help loving her," he exclaimed, grinding his teeth and stamping on the floor, "she rules me, and I am her slave, as Massigny has been before me. Well! wretch, obey, since you have not heart enough to break a bondage which you hate." He took his hat, and dashed from his chamber.

When we are carried away by passion, our vanity derives some solace in viewing our feebleness from the elevation of our pride. "It is true that I am feeble, we say, but if I chose! . . ."

He ascended slowly the steps which led to the gate of the park, and from a distance he saw a white figure, reined against the dark background of the trees. In it and it waved a handkerchief, as if beckoning his approach. His heart beat with violence, his knees trembled; he had not strength enough to speak, and had become alarmed lest the countess should read his ill-humour in his features.

He took the extended hand, kissed her forehead, because she thrust herself upon his bosom, and followed her to her apartment, dumb, and but half-repressing the sighs with which his breast was burning.

A single taper lit the boudoir of the countess. They seated themselves. St. Clair observed the head-dress of his friend; a single rose in her hair. The night before he had carried her a beautiful English engraving, the duchess of Portland, after Leslie, (her hair dressed in this style) and St. Clair had only said: "I prefer this simple rose to all your fashionable head-dresses." He disliked jewels, and the night before in playing with a pearl-necklace of the countess's, he had said—"Jewels are only useful to conceal defects. You are too pretty, Mathilde, to wear them." This evening, the countess, who attended every to his most trivial words, had laid aside rings, necklaces, gold buckles and bracelets, in the dress of a lady, he observed the slipper; and like many others he, his focus on this subject. A heavy shower had fallen before sundown. The grass was still sprinkled, but the countess had ventured upon the wet turf with silk socks and slippers of black satin. If she should be ill!

"She loves me," said St. Clair, and the sigh went himself and his own folly, and gazed upon Mathilde with a smile he could not repress—divided as he was between his ill-humour, and the joy of seeing a pretty woman who sought to please him, by all those little nothings which have so much value in the eyes of lovers.

As the countess, her radiant countenance expressed a blended love and tenderness, which rendered her still more attractive. She took a ring from a letter-box, and presenting her little hand closed, concealing the object it held. "The other day," said she, "you broke your watch, and you begged of me to send it to my watchmaker. Here it is." She handed him the watch, and looked at him with an air of half tenderness and frolic, biting her under lip, as if to repress the ready laughter. "Good heaven! how beautiful were her teeth! How brilliantly white on the deep rose of her lips! (A man has an exceedingly silly air, when he receives the advances of a pretty woman with coldness.)

St. Clair thanked her, took the watch, and was about putting it in his pocket. "Look at it," she continued, "open it and see if it is well mended. You who are so learned, and have been at the Polytechnic School, ought to know that."

"Oh! I know very little about it," said St. Clair, and he opened the case of the watch with an absent air. What was his surprise! the miniature portrait of Madame de Courcy was painted on the back of the case. How could he look sullen any longer! His forehead brightened; he thought no more of Massigny; he only remembered that he was by the side of a pretty woman and that this woman adored him!

The lark, messenger of morning, was commencing his song, and long lines of pale light were streaking the clouds of the east. It is the time when Romeo bade adieu to Juliet; it is the classical hour when all lovers ought to separate.

St. Clair was standing before the mantelpiece, the key of the Park in his hand, his eyes attentively fixed upon the Tuscan vase of which we have already spoken. The poison still rankled in his soul. However, he was in fine humour, and it occurred to him that Thémènes might have invented the story. Whilst the countess, who wished to re-conduct him to the gate of the park, was covering her head with a shawl, he struck his key gently against the odious vase, gradually increasing the strength of his blows, till one would have thought he intended to shiver it to pieces.

"Heavens! take care!" cried Mathilde, "you will break my beautiful Tuscan vase." And she snatched the key from his hands. St. Clair was a little vexed, but he concealed it. He turned his back on the chimney-place, to escape a second temptation, and opening his watch set about examining the portrait which had been presented to him.

"Who is the painter?" he asked.

"Monsieur R. . . . It was Massigny who introduced him to me. Massigny, after his visit to Rome, found out that he possessed a wonderful taste for the fine arts, and undertook to play Mæcenas to young painters. But really, I think the picture resembles me, though a little flattered."

St. Clair had a strong desire to dash the watch against the wall; a process which would have rendered it rather difficult of mending. He restrained himself, however, and put it in his pocket; when, remarking that it was already day, he left the house, begged Mathilde not to accompany him, traversed the Park at long strides, and in a moment was alone in the open plain.

CHAPTER VI.

A scene.

"Massigny! Massigny!" cried he, with a concentrated rage; "I shall, then, always find you in my path! Doubtless, the painter who made this portrait for me has made another for Massigny! . . . Fool that I was! I had thought for a moment that I was loved with a love equal to my own; and that because she dresses her hair with a rose, and does not wear jewels! Jewels! She has a whole desk full of them. . . . Massigny, who had no idea of a woman beyond her toilette, was so fond of jewels! . . . Yes, has a fine character, we must confess. She knows how to adapt herself to the taste of her lovers!"

Soon a more distressing thought occurred to him. Shortly the months of the countess's mourning would terminate. St. Clair was to marry her as soon as the year of her widowhood was at an end. He had promised it. Promised! No. He had never spoken of it. But such was his intention, and the countess understood it. To him this was as good as an oath. The night before..

he would have given a throne to hasten the moment when he might publicly avow his love; now he shuddered at the very idea of ally- ing his lot to a mistress of Massigny. "And yet I ought," said he, "and I will."

He rode about the woods all that morning. In a lane of the wood of Verrières, he saw a man mounted on a fine English horse, who called him by name from a distance, and immediately accosted him. It was Alphonse de Thémènes. In the mood of mind in which St. Clair found himself, solitude is particularly agreeable; so that the meeting with Thémènes changed his ill-humour to a stifled rage. Thémènes did not perceive it, or took a malicious pleasure in running counter to it. He talked, he laughed, he joked, without noticing that he received no answer. St. Clair seeing a narrow lane, drove his horse into it, hoping that his tormenter would not follow him; but he was deceived; a horse does not easily loosen a hold of his prey. Thémènes turned short, and doubled his pace to keep up the side of St. Clair, and keep up the conversation more conveniently.

I have said that the lane was narrow. Two horses could hardly walk abreast there; so it was not strange that Thémènes, though a good horseman, should graze the foot of St. Clair in passing by his side. His horse had now reached such a pitch that he could no longer restrain himself. He rose in his stirrups, and with his whip struck Thémènes's horse violently over the nose.

"What the deuce are you about, Auguste!" cried Thémènes. "Why do you strike my horse?"

"Why do you follow me?" replied St. Clair, in a passionate tone. "Are you mad, St. Clair! Do you forget that you are speaking to me!"

"I know very well that I am speaking to a fool."

"St. Clair!—I believe you are crazy. Hark! ye! to-morrow you must send me an apology, or account to me for your impudence."

"Be it to-morrow, then, sir."

Thémènes stopped his horse; St. Clair put spurs to his own, and soon disappeared in the wood.

From this moment he felt more calmly. He was weak enough to believe in presentiments. He thought that he should be killed on the morrow, and thus would come the denouement of his drama. There was still a day to pass; with still more anxiety, still greater distress, he returned home, sent his servant with a note to Colonel Beaujeu, wrote some letters, dined heartily, and was punctual at half past eight at the little gate of the park.

CHAPTER VII.

The cloud clears.

"What is the matter with you, to-day, Auguste?" said the countess.

"You are in a strange gait, and yet you cannot make me laugh, with all your pleasantries. Yesterday you were deeply touched with the blues, and I was so gay! To-day we have changed characters. For myself, I have a frightful headache."

"My dear, I confess, I was vastly tiresome yesterday. But to-day I have been walking; I have been exercising; I feel delightfully."

"For my part, I slept very long this morning, had annoying dreams, and rose late."

"Ah! dreams! Do you believe in dreams?"

"What nonsense!"

"I believe in them. I believe that you dreamed a dream which foretells some tragic event."

"Heavens, I never remember dreams. However, I remember—in my dream I saw Massigny; so you see that it was nothing very amusing."

"Massigny! I should have thought, on the contrary, that you would have derived much pleasure from seeing him again."

"Poor Massigny!"

"Poor Massigny!"

"Auguste, tell me, I beg of you, what ails you this evening? There is something devilish in your smile. You seem to be mocking yourself."

"Ah!" now you treat me as badly as your friends the old dowagers do."

"Yes, Auguste, you have to-day an appearance that you were with people you dislike."

"Wretch! come, give me your hand." He kissed the extended hand with an affected gallantry, and they stood looking a moment steadily at each other. St. Clair was the first to drop his eyes, and exclaimed, "How difficult is it to live in this world, without passing for a wretch. It would be well never to speak of anything but the weather, or the chase, or to discuss with your old sweethearts the budget of their committees of benevolence."

He took up a piece of paper from the table. "This spelling," matter in dispute) avowed his certainty that the wine which was sent was different from the sample, as was contended by the plaintiff. "And how do you know that?" inquired the opposite counsel. "Oh, it is quite a different wine to my taste. There was a fine farwell flavor about the sample, which the wine sent totally wanted." A book on his trade by one of these gentlemen would be a pædagogical treatise. Why, in this age of practical literature, does not some one bring out a little pill-recipe tome, entitled "A Gentleman's Aduertises in search of a Pipe of Wine?"

Some years ago, in one of the large towns of the west of England, (perhaps similar cases are not unknown elsewhere,) a man became notorious for a very peculiar kind of business. He was, extensively at least, a builder, a seller of land, and a dealer in domestic ties of any kind, and apparently bent on gold only for its own sake, as he lived in the style of a miser. This man was constantly prowling about the outskirts of the town, marking the progress of building operations, and acquainting himself with circumstances relative to property in land and houses. When a new factory was to be set up, he would, if possible, purchase some bit of ground near by, the possession of which he calculated must be sooner or later necessary to the comfort of the parties concerned, and which of course he would only sell at an enormous price. When he saw a gentleman getting a handsome house built, he was sure, if at all possible, to buy a rod of land opposite to it, and there deliberately began to erect an anomalous little edifice, curiously composed of shingle and brick, with chimneys peering up like the ears of a donkey, and the whole approximating in character to a dog-kennel, if approximating to anything known upon earth. Imagine the alarm of a jolly manufacturer at seeing his vision of a fairy palace thus blasted by the cunning old villain, equally inaccessible to soil, entreaty and stormy menace—one who would go on with the construction of his wretched hovel, with as much apparent interest in its architecture and purpose as could be manifested by the gentleman himself respecting his elegant mansion—cool, steady, determined to persevere while it suited his pleasure and convenience to do so—not to be driven from him by the cries of "agent!" from the passing populace, or the infuriated face of the impending tyrant looking poisoned arrows from the unfinished drawing-room windows on the other side of the way—in short, quite a suburban Hampden, determined to defend his dog-kennel to the last extremity. The victim, after a fortnight's writhing, would propose to purchase the rod with the building, on the condition of being erected upon it, when, as might be expected, an exorbitant price would be asked. He would retire, determined not to purchase. He would for a little time stop the building of his house, and deliberate if it were not better to plant it somewhere else, even at a great loss, than to give in to the old fellow. During this interval, the dog-kennel would also make a pause, and the gentleman would take heart again, and go on, when instantly the building of the eyesore would also proceed. The unfortunate man would turn over a thousand schemes—he would think of building a high wall in front of his house to shut out the view—he would change his plan, and make the drawing-room look in another direction; but all would be in vain. Like a faithful salmon landed after all its struggles by the inexorable angler, he would be obliged to come in at last, and buy up the property of his annoyances at the price of some goodly field. But one small joy was his, to set off against the anguish he had endured for months—and that was, when the bargain being completed, he could rush across the way, hatchet in hand, and hack and hew away at the dog-kennel, till his snarls were used, or his long-suspended organ of destructiveness had gratified itself to the utmost.

This old wretch went on building temples to the Genius of Annoyance for several years, and so well did he calculate in most cases, that in time he became extremely rich. He acquired the name of Eyesore Jack, and was the object of a curious interest to those who recognised his mean, insidious-looking person on the street. It was strange, certainly, to reflect on one who appeared to have no aim in life but to give discomfort to his fellow-creatures, and seek for a wretched aliment in their groans. But the old remark about the pitcher held in his case, as it does in so many of our contemporaries, was, that he was the cause of the destruction of houses in a general part of the suburbs, and they learned to get them sold to considerable advantage, when they became one of those that Jack—the tremendous Eyesore Jack—had succeeded, through the intervention of an agent, in obtaining a long lease of a large field opposite, on which it was his design immediately to commence a brick-work! The more he liked to go with his vexation; but their whole fortune was at stake, and they determined to fight the old villain to the last extremity. It chanced that another person had been in terms for the leasehold of the field, and had everything but completed the arrangement. To him the two frantic builders applied. If we recollect the circumstances rightly, it was discovered in conversation that the day on which the bargain was to have been fulfilled was a holiday, so that the non-fulfilment of the bargain might not necessarily be held as voiding it. On this point the two men fastened with avidity, and they easily succeeded, by various considerations, in inducing the other party to raise an action for recovery of the field. It was destined to be the last of the fields of our friend Jack. He battled through the medium of the proprietor of the ground as long as he could, but was ultimately cast, with the loss of his ill gotten gains. He died not long after in a brief period.

Many examples of modes of living not much more honourable than that of Eyesore Jack might be cited; that of the former, for one example, might give occasion to a whole paper, or even to a volume; but we shall content ourselves for the present with requesting all who are in the custom of execrating the catfish who live by such arts, to reflect if there be not something to find fault with in their own line of doing. Many professions pass very well with the world, which, nevertheless, to the eye of a watchful consciousness, appear by no means pure or laudable. The test we would have applied is the inquiry, "Does my profession or occupation conduce solely to the good of my fellow-creatures, or is it not rather in some degree a source of evil to them?" Unless the answer, "It does conduce solely to the good of mankind," can be given, and readily given, the party may be satisfied that his profession or occupation, however successful, is the derivation of the common world, is a vicious one. As such we would hold all those which minister in any way to bad habits and misleading vanities, as well as all those which depend on the keeping up of strife, wretched games and diplomas and honoured appellatives may belong to them. Let none of the professors of such arts or professions presume to execrate Eyesore Jack, until they have come out of their own evil ways.—Chambers's Edinburgh Journal.

A TALE OF CHIVALRY.

"The Child of Elle he fought so well,
As his weapon he wove around,
That soon he slew that carlin knight,
And layde him on the playne."—The Child of Elle.

In the early part of the reign of Henry the Second of France, a famous combat was fought between two squires of the court, named Jarnac and Chataignerac. Some words of the former were construed by Chataignerac to reflect upon his (Jarnac's) step-mother, and he afterwards repeated them at court. When Jarnac heard of the calumny that was abroad, he came before Francis I. and declared that whoever had given birth to such a report "laid in his throat." A challenge immediately passed between Chataignerac and Jarnac, but Francis forbade the combat. No sooner, however, did Henry II. succeed to the throne, than Jarnac renewed his challenge. The king assented; lists were prepared at St. Germain, and Henry and his court attended. Both champions having sworn to the justice of their quarrel, the king gave the signal, and the combat began.

The combatants were armed in proof, and fought on foot with sword and buckler. Jarnac was a slightly formed man, and being opposed to a fierce, haughty, and powerful adversary, a lively interest was felt in his behalf. It was a goodly sight to see how the sparks flew from their swords and helmets, with what care they foyned, and how skillfully they availed themselves of every unguarded opening. Now they traversed hither and thither with short quick steps, striking, thrusting, warding, as they alternately pressed forward and receded; and now was Jarnac beaten back by the overbearing force of his enemy. Covering himself with his buckler, he retired before the increasing violence of his adversary, and cautiously watched for an opportunity which might be afforded by the other's fierce haste. At length by a lucky stroke he dealt Chataignerac a dreadful blow upon the leg, and completely disabled him to fall to the ground, and Jarnac, standing over him with his sword pointed at his throat, required him to confess the calumnies he had uttered. This the wounded man refused to do, and, therefore, his life became justly forfeited to the conqueror, who, however, generously placed it in the hands of King Henry.

The proud and haughty Chataignerac, mortified by his unexpected defeat, refused to be spared, and on his wounds being dressed, he tore away the bandages, and died from effusion of blood. Such was the judicial combat fought between two squires in the year 1547. The square, he it observed, was not the mere attendant of the knight, is vulgarly supposed: nor was he always a candidate for knighthood, as is frequently assumed by writers upon chivalry.

RECIPE FOR A MODERN MELODRAMA.

Shut yourself up in a secluded garret, in as deserted a section of the city as possible, for a fortnight, during which time study "The Lives of Notorious Pirates," "Demology and Witchcraft," "Fox's Book of Martyrs," (with plates,) and the "Newgate Calendar." When you have worked your nerves up to a requisite state of excitement about three pounds of very under-done pork chops, retire immediately to bed. Rise, "withered man," at three in the morning, and by the light of a dingy lamp commence your task. You had better commence with an opening chorus of devils who all appear peculiarly hungry, and long for a delicate cold cut of some young, interesting female, who is very amiable and good, loves some nice young gentleman in the village, whom nobody knows anything about, but who is continually jumping into torments and saving everybody's life. This young gentleman, of course, must be hated by another gentleman of agreeable appearance, long black hair, and mustaches to match, who, Burke-like, has the office of purveyor to the aforesaid demons. There must be a fête at somebody's castle, and an old steward, with a long white stick, and a very stupid son, who has to make a speech to some very good, climbable Lord and Lady Downtonful sort of personages. The aforesaid young lady must be carried off by the gentleman with black hair, upon which the amiable young man must call vehemently upon everybody to follow him, and rescue her or perish in the attempt, and beg them to make haste; or, on which, to save time, all come to the foot of the stage and sing a long chorus! After an unobscure and artful dodging throughout the piece, somebody must put a clock about half an hour too fast, in consequence of which the aforesaid demons come for their victims, and the aforesaid purveyor gentleman not having his victim ready, he, of course, is lagged off through large trap by a gentleman in red—and the curtain falls amid the scraping of fiddles, and the reflection of red and blue fire, with the steward's stupid son cries out, "Oh! crickey!" and the nice young couple hug each other like mad.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Antioneers in particular, have long been celebrated for their hyperbolic talents; but all their former dongs are outdone by the following advertisement which appeared in the Times of November the twenty-second:—"To be sold by Daniel Smith, at his Great Room, Alderman's Walk, a compact family residence; the premises are situated at Bishoppate, a favorite spot, about three miles from Windsor, and stand upon a commanding eminence, verging into the Park, with which they communicate by a private gate. The scenery from the back-ground bursts like enchantment upon the view, and the eye is instantly caught with rapture by the bold, romantic glade, opening amidst the most picturesque retirement upon an expanse of wide beneath, abounding in all the variegated beauties of the forest, and crowned with the distant but magnificent grandeur of Windsor Castle!!! The estate to be viewed, &c." Bravo, Mr. Daniel Smith! Worthy pupil of Mr. Puff, that renowned professor of the art, and practitioner of panegyric:—"Puff." The antioneers, sir, the auctioneers have lately got some credit for their language, but I wish I saw, first, diminished their style.—twas I first taught them to crowd their advertisements with panegyric superlatives, each epithet rising above the other like bidders in their own auction-room! From us learned to inlay their phraseology with variegated chips of exotic metaphor; by us, too, their inventive faculties were called forth—yes, sir, by us they were instructed to clothe ideal walls with gratuitous fruit, to insinuate obsequious civilities into visionary groves—to teach courteous shrubs to nod their approbation of the graceful soil; or, on emergencies, to raise up start oaks where there had never been an acorn; to create a delightful vineyard without the assistance of a neighbour; or fix the temple of Hygeia in the fane of Lincolnshire."

CONSUMERS.—Why is a forged note like a whisper! Because it is uttered, but not allowed (aloud).

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE TREE OF DEATH.—BY ELIZA COOK.

Let the king of the grave be asked to tell
The plant he loveth best,
And it will not be the cypress tree,
Though his ever the church-yard guest;
He will not mark the hemlock dark,
Nor stay where the nightshade spreads;
He will not say 'tis the sombre yew,
Though it sponges o'er skeletons' heads;
He will not point to the willow branch,
Where breaking spirits pine beneath,
For a brighter leaf shall deeper grieve,
And a fairer tree is the Tree of Death.

But where the green rich stalks are seen,
Where ripe fruits gush and shine,
"This, this," cries he, "is the tree for me—
The vine, the beautiful vine;
I crouch among the emerald leaves,
Gemm'd with the ruby grapes;
I dip my spear in the poison here,
And he is strong that escapes.
Crowds dance round, with satyr bound,
Till my dart is hurled from his traitor sheath;
When I shriek with glee, no fiend to me
Is so true as the vine, the Tree of Death."

O, the glossy vine has a serpent charm,
It bears an unblest fruit;
There's a taint about each tendrill'd arm,
And a curse upon its root;
Its juice may flow to warm the brow,
And wildly lighten the eye,
But the frenzied mirth of revelling crew
Will make the wise man sigh:
For the maniac laugh, the trembling frame,
The idiot speech and pestilent breath,
The shattered mind and blasted fane,
Are wrought by the vine, the Tree of Death.

Fill, fill the glass, and let it pass;
But ye who quaff, O think
That even the heart which loves must loathe
The lips that deeply drink;
The breast may mourn o'er a close link torn,
And the scalding drops may roll;
But 'tis better to mourn o'er a pulseless form
Than the wreck of a living soul
Then a health to the hemlock, the cypress, and yew,
The worm-hiding grass, and the willow wreath,
For though shading the tomb, they fling not a gloom
So dark as the vine, the Tree of Death.

AUSTRIAN TOLERATION.—In Austria it is unlawful for Protestants to build churches with steeples, or with any outward form different from an ordinary house or warehouse; and no place of worship, even of this description, can be built unless there are five hundred worshippers. The Protestants must, in any event, pay tithes, marriage, burial fees, register fees for births, &c. It is also unlawful for the places of worship to have bells, organs, or even an entrance from the street, but they must be situated so that the entrance be up some cote, not over four and a half feet in width, and in length twenty feet at least.

PROVERBS.—If a man cheat thee once, shame on him; if he cheat thee twice, shame on thee. If a man deceive thee, trust him not again; if he insults thee, go away from him; if he strike thee, turn him like a snake. If you have lost your credit, be patient, and you will gain it. If you have lost your property, be industrious, honest and frugal, and you will acquire more. If you have a good wife, take care of her; and if you have not, get one immediately.

POLITENESS.—Politeness may prevent the want of wit and talents from being observed; but wit and talent cannot prevent the discovery of the want of politeness.

EXCERPTS.

Dr. Johnson, at a late period of his life, observed to Sir Joshua Reynolds:—"If a man does not make new acquaintances as he passes through life, he will soon find himself left alone. A man, sir, should keep his friendship in constant repair."

Flattery, observes Locke, is a sort of bad money, to which our vanity gives currency. It is a blot upon the memory of Alexander that he could be so weak as to be pleased with his courtiers imitating his wry neck.

Happiness consists in a virtuous and honest life, in being content with a competency of outward things and in using them temperately.

For true content is only found at home;
In our own breast the happy goddess lies,
And freely grants her favours to the wise."

That short ride was destined to affect, for good or for evil, the whole of Leslie's future career; for he quaffed deep and overflowing draughts of love from those beautiful, downcast eyes, which occasionally rested timidly on his own. He had discovered a new spring of feeling in himself; and now it gushed forth like a torrent, sweeping all prudential thoughts into oblivion. He felt not, saw not, any impediment to the successful prosecution of his love. He thought not of the high lineage of his beloved one, nor of the prethought not of a Spanish Hidalgo, of sixteen quarterings in his shield. He thought not of her rank nor of her wealth. He saw her as she was, in her native purity, a thing of light and of beauty. It was a delicious happiness he was then enjoying, and nothing interposed with his mind's eye to prevent its continuance. What was it to him if the whole world opposed his suit, so that she returned his love? And that fair young girl—was she wholly heart-free? Did not the fine features, noble form, and gallant bearing of the youth, conjoined with his tender and respectful homage, awaken some reciprocal sensations in her heart? They did. Strange, but delightful, procal sensations in her heart! The thrill that first aroused the consciousness that the youth was dear, very dear, to her. Think not, courteous reader, that the loves of these youthful beings were premature or unnatural. The boy was passion's child, and nurtured in romance. The girl was a tender flower of the warm, sunny south, whose very air is redolent with love. Each had never, till then, met the being of their imaginations. He had conferred the greatest service man can confer on woman. She had received that service with gratitude, which pre-disposed her heart to the quicker entrance of the stronger and deeper emotion. Leslie felt that he was not an object of indifference to her, but he longed to hear the soft confession from her lips. The old man, worn out by fatigue and weakness, by loss of blood, slumbered in his seat. The youth, with swelling heart, strove to give utterance to his now sensations. Time was flying rapidly—the town was almost in sight, and night was overspreading the earth with its dusky mantle. Taking the hand of Isadora gently in his own, while both hands trembled, he faltered forth: "We must soon part, dear lady; will you sometimes extend a thought on one who would have laid down his life for you; and forgive the rude sailor who has dared to love so much excellence?"

The lady's hand trembled violently, but sought not to withdraw itself: "I have nothing to forgive," she replied, "and can I ever forget my noble preserver, who saved me from a fate more horrible than death."

"Ah, dear lady, name not the slight service I have been but too happy in performing; could this poor life procure you a moment's happiness, it would cheerfully be given."

A low sigh was the only answer.

"Can I," continued the emboldened youth, "dare I hope your heart is not altogether cold to the wild throbbings which now oppress mine own?"

A slight pressure of the hand was the reply. Leslie's hand stole gently around her taper waist, which shrank not from the caress. "Am I in existence? is this a dream? am I really so blessed?" broke from the lips of the impassioned youth. "Do you really love me, a stranger and unknown?"

There was no reply; but the blushing cheek of the beautiful Isadora spoke more than utterance. The union of hearts was complete.

The harsh voice of the guide startled the lovers from their newly-found Elysium. The town was now at hand, and his own safety, and that of his subordinates, required great precaution on the part of Leslie; for had it been known that the commander of the daring and successful smuggler, Spidre, was an inmate of its walls, his lease of life would have been a short one. Leslie stepped from the carriage, and received instructions from his guide as to the quartering of his men for the night. As he quitted the carriage, Leslie whispered: "Forget me not, dearest Isadora; forget not the name of Robert Leslie."

"That I never can, dear Robert," replied the lady; and the name sounded more musical than ever to his ear.

"I will see thee soon again, dearest, if this poor life be spared. Farewell!"

Then giving and receiving one long, silent embrace, he suffered the carriage to proceed. He lingered on the spot until it was out of sight, then rounded himself, mounted his horse, and, with his men, rode slowly off to a suitable place of concealment. S. H. H.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

GOETHE'S FAUSTUS.

SECOND NOTICE.

THE Prologue in Heaven—the Lord, the celestial hosts, and afterwards Mephistopheles; with this daring imagination bursts upon us this magnificent poem. Of the opening chorus of the archangels, Shelley says that it is impossible to represent in another language the melody of its verifications; that the voluble strength and delicacy of the ideas escape in the crucible of translation; and the reader is surprised to find a caput mortuum. This conviction forces itself upon us, as we compare the various translations in prose and verse of this wonderful prologue; there is a something that they all lack, and which more than half persuades us to take up again our grammar and dictionary, and acquire a language, if for no other purpose than that of reading Faust. It is worth the sacrifice of a year or two's leisure.

The chorus is more successfully rendered by Shelley than by Anster, and with quite as much fidelity to the original. It is to be regretted that the whole poem could not have been translated by a poet of Shelley's genius; and this we say without the intention of derogating from the abundant merit of Anster. Many of his versions could not be improved, but we must confess that in some passages we miss the inspiration and boldness of the true poet. But for Shelley's version of the chorus:

Enter three Archangels.

RAPHAEL.

The sun makes music as of old
Amid the rival spheres of heaven;
On its predestined circle roll'd
With thunder speed; the angels, even,
Draw strength from gazing on its glance,
Though none its meaning fathom may;—
The world's unwither'd countenance
Is bright as at creation's day.

GABRIEL.

And swift and swift, with rapid lightness
The adorned earth spins silently,
Alternating Elysian brightness
With deep and dreadful night; the sea
Pours in broad billows from the deep
Up to the rocks, and rocks and ocean,
Onward, with spheres which never sleep,
Are hurried in eternal motion.

MICHAEL.

And tempests in contention roar
From land to sea, from sea to land;
And, raging, weave a chain of power,
Which girds the earth as with a band.
A flashing desolation there,
Flames, before the thunder's way;
Beh thy servants, Lord! reverend
The gentle change of the day.

CHORUS OF THE THREE

The angels draw strength from thy glance,
Though no one comprehend thee may;—
The world's unwither'd countenance
Is bright as on creation's day.

Passing the prologue, in which Mephistopheles obtains permission from the Lord to deal with Faustus at his pleasure, the curtain is lifted upon his predestined victim. The time is midnight—the scene is a high-arched, narrow, Gothic chamber, where Faustus is seated at his desk. His soliloquy explains his whereabouts, and gives us the necessary insight into his character. He is an old schoolmaster. For an ordinary life-time he has buried himself in the pursuits of various learning. He has sounded the depths of science. He has threaded the mazes of law, medicine, theology, and divine philosophy, and finds that he is still wandering in the circle where he started, to which there is neither end nor beginning. The result of his knowledge is the conviction that nothing can be known. He has pursued his inquiries without scruple or apprehension—surrendering himself to the guidance of an intellect that sought boldly for truth, and it has led him to—nothing! "No dog would like to live so any longer"—muttered the doctor. "I have, therefore, devoted myself to magic—whether, through the power and voice of the spirit, many a mystery might not become known to me; that I may no longer, with bitter sweat, be obliged to speak of what I do not know; that I may learn what it is that holds the world together in its inmost core, see all the springs and seeds of production, and drive no longer a paltry traffic in words."

Distress—denial—despair—are now masters of the mind of Faustus. Baffled, wearied and disgusted in his solitary and absorbing toils, he throws aside his books and papers, and turns from the glasses and instruments and ancient lumber of his study, to the window through which the moonlight is streaming in with beams potent as we may believe to augment his restlessness, and drive it to madness. He feels the nothingness of man's science. He feels that it is all vanity—the long-protracted vigils, the self-denying and self-sacrificing spirit in which he has sought for knowledge, crushing and trampling his human sympathies, flying from the green fields and running waters, and burying himself among the worm-eaten volumes of his closet, in the painful and perpetual labours of studious seclusion.

From living nature thou hast fled
To dwell 'mong fragments of the dead;
And for the lovely scenes which heaven
Hath made man love, to man hath given;
Hast chosen to pore o'er mouldering bones
Of brute and human skeletons!

In this state of mind, the old birch-handler takes up the study of magic—and we find him poring over circles, signs, and symbolic letters, whose powers he would fain use, challenging the approach of the spirits under their mysterious influence. He turns from page to page of his

"Book where secret spells are scanned, Traced by Nostradam's own hand!"— and after lingering awhile attentively over the sign of Macrocosmus, he turns impatiently the leaves till his eye rests on the sign of the Spirit of the Earth. Then breaks forth the pale and gray old student in the following impassioned burst:

Spirit of Earth! my nature is the same,
Or near akin to thine!
How fearlessly I read this sign!
And feel even now new powers are mine;
While my brain burns as though with wine;
Give me the agitated strife,
The madness of the world of life;
I feel within my soul the birth
Of strength enabling me to bear,
And thought, impelling me to share

* Hayward's translation.

The fortunes, good or evil, of the earth;
To battle with the tempest's breath,
Or plunge where shipwreck grinds his teeth.
All around grows cold and cloudy,
The moon withdraws her ray;
The lamp's loose light is shivering,
It fades, it dies away.

Ha! round my brow what sparkles ruddy
In trembling light are quivering!
And to and fro,
Stream sheets of flame, in fearful play,
Rolled and unrolled,
In crimson fold.

They float and flow!
From the vaulted space above,
A shuddering horror seems to move
Down,—down upon me creeps and seizes
The life's blood, in its grasp that freezes;
'Tis thou,—I feel thee. Stray, stray,
Thou hast heard the spell, and thou
Art hovering round me now;
Spirits! to my sight appear;
How my heart is torn in sunder—
All my thoughts convulsed with wonder—
Every faculty and feeling
Strained to welcome thy revealing.

Spirit, my heart, my heart is given to thee,
Though death may be the price, I cannot choose but see!

Faustus grasps the book and pronounces the sign of the Spirit. A red flame is seen playing about, and from it the Spirit speaks. The old schoolmaster is struck with horror. The summoned Spirit derides and scoffs at him, and after a brief colloquy, in which Faustus recovers a little from his terror, it vanishes as it came. A moment after, a knock is heard at the door, and Wagner, a pupil of the old man, enters in dressing-gown and night-cap. Faustus is vexed at being thus disturbed, and turns round upon him without an effort to conceal his displeasure. Wagner apologizes—he thought his master declaiming, and wished to improve himself in this "same art." The passages which follow are inspired with the very soul of poetry and eloquence, and if Mr. Anster has not here fully rendered justice to the original, he has, at least, succeeded in clothing, in most simple and expressive language the most elevated thought:

WAGNER.

Oh! if a man shuts himself up for ever
In his dull study; if he sees the world
Never, unless on some chance holiday,
Looks at it from a distance, through a telescope,
How can he learn to sway the minds of men
By eloquence!—to rule them or persuade?

FAUSTUS.

If feeling does not prompt, in vain you strive;
If from the soul the language does not come,
By its own impulse, to impel the hearts
Of hearers, with communicated power,
In vain you strive, in vain you struggle earnestly.
Toil on for ever; piece together fragments;
Cook up your broken scraps of sentences,
And blow, with puffing breath, a struggling light,
Glittering confusedly now, now cold in ashes;
Startle the schoolboys with your metaphors;
And, if such food may suit your appetite,
Win the vain wonder of applauding children!
But never hope to stir the hearts of men,
And mould the souls of many into one,
By words which come not native from the heart!

WAGNER.

Expression, graceful utterance, is the first
And best acquirement of the orator.
This do I feel, and feel my want of it!

FAUSTUS.

Dost thou seek genuine and worthy fame?
Not as our town declaimers use, delighted,
Like a brote heath, with chimres of jingling bells;
Reason and honest feeling want no arts
Of utterance—ask no toil of elocution;
And when you speak in earnest, do you need
A search of words? Oh! these fine holiday phrases,
In which you robe your worn-out commonplace,
These scraps of paper which you crump and curl,
And twist into a thousand idle shapes,
These filigree ornaments are good for nothing,
Cost time and pains, please few, amuse no one;
Are unrefreshing, as the wind that whistles,
In autumn, 'mong the dry and withered leaves.

Thus much for eloquence—and who has discoursed more beautifully, and more sensibly withal, on this theme, than old Faustus! How cunningly he analyzes the elements of the art—if art it be that is nothing if not nature. How flatly and frigidity falls now on our ear the lesson of our boyhood—the "action! action! action!" of the old Grecian, as the alpha and omega; the first, second and third requisite of oratory! Feeling—soul—impulse—words born of the heart by the heart inspired—reason, and honesty and earnestness—an aim and a purpose—these are the secrets and mysteries of eloquence. These sway the minds of men. These alone lead captive the senses, the judgment and the imagination of the listening multitude, and complete the triumph, the highest that man can win, the most thrilling and satisfying that the human mind or heart can enjoy—the triumph of communicated sympathies, of transfused power, of the suppressing and subduing will! What scene more striking and sublime than that of a vast popular assembly, won and wielded by a spirit stronger than that of the magician—hanging in breathless interest on the voice of the orator,—apt, home away by his wonder-working incantations—now convulsed with laughter, now melted to tears, now burning with indignation—the slaves and subjects of the sign with which he would conjure the spirits of the human breast :

With what distortion strange heaven only knows.
Oh ! often, what a toilsome thing it is
This study of thine, at the first glance we fly it.
A mass of things confusedly heaped together ;
A lumber-room of dusty documents,
Furnished with all approved court-precedents,
And old traditional maxims ! History !
Facts dramatised say rather—action—plot—
Sentiment, everything the writer's own,
As it best fits the web-work of his story,
With here and there a solitary fact
Of consequence, by those grave chroniclers
Pointed with many a moral apophthegm,
And wise old saws, learned at the puppet-shows.

But we wander from our purpose. Turn we again to the old schoolmaster and his intruding pupil. Not in vain, as the world would judge, has Faustus wrought in the great mine of antiquity, and enriched himself with the lore of centuries, if he thus discourse in words of wisdom and beauty. From eloquence the pupil turns to knowledge, and the worn and wearied scholar sneers bitterly at the "mouldy records" where man has in vain sought the "draught restorative" that springs and gushes only from "the depths of his own soul." Wagner begs pardon, and suggests that there is at least delight to be found in communing with the spirit of past ages. On this hint Faustus thus discourses :

To us, my friend, the times that are gone by
Are a mysterious book, sealed with seven seals :
That which you call the spirit of ages past
Is but, in truth, the spirit of those few authors
In which those ages are beheld reflected.

With a few more words, Faustus rids himself of Wagner on the pretence that it is getting too late to continue the conversation. The old man is again left alone, to devour his own heart, to feed and lash the restlessness of spirit that has fastened upon him like a fiend, and that will to fiends deliver him. How he reasons and wrestles with the curse, how he is tempted, and how for the time rescued, we will see anon. Meanwhile we will close the book, and ponder on what we have read.

ORIGINAL DRAMATIC SKETCHES.

MR. CHARLES KEAN.

Semper ego auditor tantum ! Nunquam reponam !
Voxatus ioties !—Jurnal.

In England, during the space of half a century, but few names have-gained renown in the highest line of the histrionic art. Garrick, the father of the English stage, had passed into history before our time. Kemble, Cooke, Young, Kean, Vandenhoff, and now his son and Mauready, with "last" and "to ourselves," not least Forrest, a child of our own soil, are the only names that occur to our immediate recollection. And so while long lists of Greek and Roman authors swell the catalogue of those who have given laws to the theatrical world, nearly all that antiquity has prominently transmitted to us of those who brought to life and embodied the idea of the poet's creation have receded comparatively into oblivion, or been consigned to the memory of the multitude in the concentrated form of a single name : the Roman Roscius stands preeminently as the representative of ancient dramatic renown.

We need not now apply to the augurs of futurity, after the public voice has been suddenly pronounced and the echoes of applause have reached us across the Atlantic. We hail the sound as reverberating from our own shores, for it was here that Charles Kean, still a beardless and unfriended youth, gave the first dawning indications that the son of our former favourite would prove "no common boy," and we take leave to ourselves for having been the first to discover and promulgate an opinion which had been so fully carried out by the result. Here it was, in this soil, genial to music and renown, that his genius put forth its early shoot, and we saw "the summer was nigh at hand." It was ourselves who first predicted, or rather anticipated, the growing wreath, which already the fostering Muse was silently waving for the brow to which the guardian genius of Shakespeare had destined the crown. We do not snatch at the toy, to soil with its withered leaves the early bloom of the bay—but in the right and capacity to criticise the representation of Shakespeare, we acknowledge no superiors. If the agency of prophecy is to be the resource, we assert our prior claim and yield in that to none, certainly not to those sinister prophets of deceit, who conjure up phantoms of public bad taste, and ghostly enemies of true classical merit, seers whose second sight is the evil eye, and their voice the croaking note of ill-omen. Prophets can never be critics. Men are too fond of their own prophecies, and

"Rather by half their friend should die
Than their predictions prove a lie."

He who prognosticates a failure tempts his own conscience to desire one, and those who come to scoff, but rarely go away to applaud. Such men should be challenged upon the jury—their testimony goes for nothing. Opinions formed in advance, come with little weight, and especially when composed in direct contradiction to testimony and proof. Our opinions are not made in the spirit of prophecy, they are merely the result of demonstration. We anticipate a prosperous future from our knowledge of the past, and we reserve our second sight until after the events have happened.

Now, then, for the tomahawk and scalping-knife, and as these may not be enough to slay and dissect alive a genius towards whom there is some tenacity of public opinion, give us a good bowie-knife at once to cut and slash at his theatrical reputation, and go ahead.

Charles Kean arrived here in the Liverpool, his heart full of affectionate recollections of this country, which, if not the cradle of his first efforts, was the scene of his dawning success and the foster-mother of his earthly renown. Hamlet was the tragedy in which he decided to make his first appearance—one of his favourite and most popular parts, in which, on the London stage, he had been accustomed to be greeted by full theatres, favouring audiences, and personal friends. We will suppress at present all that happened previous to his appearance on the stage, for we have not yet quite ascertained how far our information is authentically correct.

The reception that met him on his appearance was such as might have been expected towards one, to whom our affections had been directed in early life, and who was attracted to us by many endearing associations. A welcome in every form was given : we never saw one more enthusiastic. People stood up in the pit, and handkerchiefs waved in the air. It was a pleasant sight, and though we are growing misanthropic from all that passed before our eyes, on this occasion we joyed to see human nature in its best aspect. Charles Kean appeared affected and somewhat overcome, but he made no speech (as has been reported) at the commencement of the play. The applause which lasted sometime was succeeded by a total silence. We never remember witnessing a more sudden transition from animated enthusiasm to deep attention.

During part of the first scene, Charles Kean's voice was often inaudible, and there certainly was at times an apparent imperfection or deficiency of power which deteriorated in some degree from the merit of the performance. It seems, however, that the ladies dissent from this opinion, and affirm that the voice to which we allude is one that makes a politically agreeable impression on a woman's ear, and especially in the scenes with Ophelia, when the conflict of passion and the struggle between tenderness and misanthropic disgust with the world are portrayed. Here we are told by our female fellow-critics, that the effect was admirable, and that Shakespeare's thoughts "came mended from his tongue." We will not contend with the ladies on this point, on which it is especially their province to pronounce ; but, as it is our office to pass judgment according to the strict laws of classical precision, indeed of common sense, we are compelled to maintain, at least with regard to all but those parts which are expressly designed to "please a lady's ear," that his voice was often too low to be heard, or at least was heard very incompletely, and his pronunciation also was frequently not sufficiently distinct. The fault is more in quantity than quality. There is no positive error to condemn, but a deficiency to regret. So when he endeavours to urge his voice to vehemence of expression, the forced effort was discernible ; and there was a tendency to make the tones discordant, and the utterance becoming too rapid instead of the measured cadence. It makes it more apparent by augmenting the indistinctness. If listening to hear becomes laborious, an audience grows dissatisfied and the critics have an immense advantage from its ill-humour. When, however, we know that this was a partial or occasional imperfection produced and increased by physical excitement, while truth compels us to admit the fact, it in no respect detracts from the classical accuracy or intellectual intention of the tragedian in his conception of the inspiration of the poet.

Charles Kean was educated at Eton School, which is by many considered as unquestionably the most polished and classical of the colleges of education in Great Britain. It is remarked that the pronunciation of the English language as acquired at Eton, is refined and elegant than in any other of the seats of learning. Mr. Canning was a distinguished example in proof of this truth—Earl Grey another—and numberless instances of men of accomplished manners, confirm the same where no special gifts of nature have rendered it conspicuous by the celebrity of pre-eminent talent. This advantage is one thoroughly possessed by Mr. Kean, and adds a distinguished grace to his personation of Hamlet, whose character supposes the highest degree of mental cultivation and intellectual refinement. It must, however, be admitted also, that the very circumstance of softening and refining the pronunciation of the English language, though it may add a great beauty to the elocution of the orator, has also the effect of rendering the enunciation less distinct, unless there is a great power, and clear, steady equality of voice to counteract the disadvantage.

We have often been led himself to see Kemble in the same part. It was one on which he prided himself, and the fine picture of him—by Lawrence—in that character, denotes that Kemble and Hamlet were in those days identified with the same idea. The majestic air of Kemble, the academical correctness of every attitude, the exact proportions of his stature for the theatre, are all perfections in which, perhaps, he may never have been surpassed on any stage ; and no doubt in these respects he would eclipse Charles Kean, but then, in contradistinction to the cold, stately dignity with which Kemble never relaxed, and never compromised, the effect which he effaced all expression of passion and tenderness towards Ophelia, were as much inferior to those points in which Charles Kean especially excels. His attitudes, too, are graceful, and his action admirable in his character. He never loses the dignity of the prince ; but it is not the studied, unbending frigidity which in Kemble annihilated the lover. Kean's is the expression of deep feeling, a natural grace of attitude and gesture which seems to emanate unconsciously and without effort, the result of elevation, of sentiment, and cultured education. "A man may be known by his gait," Solomon tells us, and when Kean treads the stage in the character of the Prince of Denmark, "his enunciation less distinct, educated in a court, though there is much less of that majestic bearing, that royal state and lofty contempt, which Kemble unobtrusively sustained in his conception of Shakespeare's design. We remember hearing it remarked that when Kemble performed the part, it appeared as if Ophelia had been driven mad by his contumacious behaviour towards her. With Charles Kean it is clearly her father's death that overturns her reason—the portents of Hamlet's agony of internal strife through the irony of his assumed character, and the sensibility blended with suppressed passion adds greatly to the interest, by increasing the sympathy we feel for the wrongs to which she is subjected. In the scene where he kills Polonius, and when he addresses his mother—"Is it the king?" the effect was admirable, it was irresistible ; and the simultaneous movement which ran through the house at the utterance of those four words, reminds us of what is recorded of Garrick during the zenith of his popular favour, when it was not unfrequent to see the lobbies and passages of Drury-Lane Theatre lined with aspirants who had paid their entrance money on the chance of finding some charitable spectator, who, when the theatre was crowded almost to suffocation, would at the risk of being stifled, permit others to mount upon their shoulders just to hear pronounced by Garrick, the two remarkable passages in Richard the Third, which have thus acquired such immortal celebrity.

Love.—In love there are twice as many moments as sad ones—provided always, that our passion is requited.

Life.—Life is an opium ; it excites us a little at first, and then leaves us sleepy, weary, and disgusted.

Man.—Man is a substance clad in shadows.

DUELLING EXTRAORDINARY.

MR. BRAGG had drawn so largely upon the belief of a company by stories of transactions to which he pretended to have been an eyewitness, that several of its members could not help expressing their doubts. The narrator was affronted, and insisted on the truth of what he had been relating with the more warmth, since Major Johnson espoused his cause. This circumstance excited not a little astonishment, as the major was justly notorious as a man of excellent understanding, and particularly tenacious of truth. The surprise of all present was greatly augmented when he thus addressed them :

"Indeed, in my opinion, Mr. Bragg has abundant reason to be angry, as it frequently happens that nothing seems more improbable than truth, as I can test from my own experiences. When I was a student at Jena, I once went with Baron Fitzelring, with whom I was intimately acquainted, to Weimar, in order to attend the performance of The Mad of Orleans, at the theatre of that city. The part of the heroine was assigned to Madame Wolfe, and she acted it with so much ability, that I could not forbear several times loudly expressing my admiration. This offended the Baron, whose parity for another actress would not acknowledge the superior talents of the universal favourite. We quarrelled, and adjourned to the neighbouring park. Favoured by the full moon, the deluge began, and I shot the Baron dead on the spot."

"But," observed one of the company, "where did you get firearms at such a short notice?"

"No interruption, if you please," answered the major, in an angry tone. "Let me proceed, everything will be explained by-and-by. Well then, as I said, I shot Baron Fitzelring dead. The only Weimar, but all Saxony, because the Fitzelrings, as everybody knows, are a very ancient family."

"A very ancient family!" rejoined one. "I am sure I never heard of them before."

"That may be : but if I am to proceed, let me beg, once for all, that I may not be interrupted, as the conclusion will clear up every apparent obscurity in the story."

This address, bordering so closely upon rudeness, made the company stare at one another : the major seemed to take no notice of this, and turning to Mr. Bragg alone, he thus continued :

"I hastened back to Jena, packed up my things with all possible expedition, and travelled post to the Austrian capital. On my arrival at Vienna, I repaired to the Apollo Hall, which had just then begun to be a fashionable place of resort. I had been there but a moment, when a young man rudely pushed through the numerous assembly, and, half out of breath thus addressed me :

"Pray, sir, are not you Mr. Johnson?"

"Yes sir, at your service."

"Did you not shoot Baron Fitzelring in a duel at Weimar?"

"Yes I did."

"Baron Fitzelring was my brother ; I must have satisfaction for his death, and request you to meet me with pistols at four o'clock to-morrow morning in the Prater."

"With great pleasure," I replied ; and mounting my horse next morning, found my antagonist at the entrance. I followed him into a retired alley ; we fired, and I shot him dead."

"I was certainly very sorry to be obliged to leave the pleasures of Vienna so soon on account of this affair. It was, however, absolutely necessary for my safety that I should be gone. To avoid any further interruption of the kind, I determined this time upon a more distant journey ; traversed part of Italy, and never stopped till I reached Rome. One day, as I stood absorbed in admiration before the cascade of Tivoli, a young man suddenly tapped me on the shoulder with the question—

"Pray, sir, are not you Mr. Johnson?"

"Yes, sir, at your service."

"Have you not shot two Barons Fitzelring in duels, one at Weimar and the other at Vienna?"

"Yes, I have."

"The Barons Fitzelring were my brothers ; I must have satisfaction for their deaths, and request you to exchange shots with me in vander field."

"With great pleasure," said I, and followed him. We fired, and I shot him dead."

I now posted away to Paris. The day after my arrival, I went to see the museum, when a young man came up to me, and said—

"Pray, sir, are not you Mr. Johnson?"

"Yes, sir, at your service."

"Have you not shot three Barons Fitzelring in duels ; one at Weimar, one at Vienna, and one at Rome?"

"Yes, I have."

"The Barons Fitzelring were my brothers ; I must have satisfaction for their deaths, and request you to meet me this afternoon, at three o'clock precisely, at the end of the Bois de Boulogne."

"With great pleasure," said I ; and in the afternoon away I rode. My antagonist was already there ; we fired, and I shot him dead."

"As I had no wish whatever to send any more Fitzelrings into the other world, I determined to leave the continent for good, that I might not be again disturbed by the surviving relations ; and hurrying to Calais, embarked there and arrived safe at Dover. It seemed, indeed, as if these relations, or at least their knowledge of my rencontres with the family, had not reached London, for there I lived some time without a challenge from any of the breed. One day, however, just when I was playing a game at chess at White's, I happened to look up, and was so confounded by the appearance of a young man opposite, who kept his eye steadily fixed upon me, that I made a wrong move, and thus had well nigh lost the advantages of which my position afforded the fairest prospect."

"Sir," said I, starting up, "why do you stare at me so incessantly?"

"Pray, sir," he asked, "are not you Mr. Johnson?"

"Yes, sir, at your service."

"Have you not shot four Barons Fitzelring in duels ; one at Weimar, one at Vienna, one at Rome, and one at Paris?"

"I have."

"The Barons Fitzelring were my brothers ; I must have satisfaction for their deaths. Come out of the room with me, that we may exchange shots."

"With great pleasure," said I, "only let me finish my game, and then we'll settle this bagatelle immediately."

He agreed, and when the game was over, I stepped with him into a back room ; we fired, and—

"And shot him dead," impatiently cried Mr. Bragg with a smile, while the major stopped to say—

"No, I beg your pardon," rejoined the major, "it was he that shot me dead."

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received many inquiries in relation to Mr. Pay's new novel, "The Countess Lina." It is to the press of the Harpers, and will doubtless appear on the covers of the coming month. We hope to present our readers with an extract in the next number of the Mirror—A Passenger in the British Quango sends us quite an humorous account of his passage, that we ward on our readers of the Mirror. Some of his statements do not redound to the credit of the captain and officers. We must reserve his story until more positive and emphatic testimony on certain points shall be laid before us. The author of the admirable "Legend of Long Island" is respectfully informed, that at present the circumstances presented in his story are not in accordance with the facts of the case. "Cristianstach" must be very oblate not to have seen the beauties of Marsh. Did we not think the writer's comments were prompted by the most envious motives, we would give some consideration to his criticisms. There is no truth, by the way, in the report of the Mirror, that we are jealous of Marsh. We only knew how overworked we were with vain and empty poetry, he could not have found it in his conscience to send us his huge paltry of rhyme. We have banished them—and they are condemned to the flames. "The Countess Lina," "The Legend of Long Island," "A Mahometan," "X. L.," "Greenmount," and "L. N. Y." are designed.

A foreigner's description of Broadway.—We quoted last week, from the journal of an English traveller in New-York, some remarks upon "letters of introduction," in which the writer complains of the limited civilities extended to strangers by our men of business. The same writer discourses, after the following fashion, in relation to the great thoroughfare of our city. "The New-York people are extremely proud of Broadway. It is a fine wide street, extending to about six miles, with some good houses and some very shabby ones; and, with the exception of a nucleus formed by the City-Hall, the Park Theatre, St. Paul's Church and Astor House (which is among hotels, that which Niagara is among waterfalls,) presents nothing very remarkable in its appearance. Among the novelties which it exhibits, a stranger might be struck in summer-time by observing stalls at the corner of the streets covered with an abundance of pine-apples, which are sold at a moderate price—peaches in carts hawked about at three for a penny, and other stalls offering the temptation of iced-cream, or iced-limonade. At the windows of one shop you might be puzzled by the announcement of 'New-Jersey ash-plasters' taken here at par;" at another "Broken bank-notes wanted," etc. etc.; but amid every impression, and above them all, would be the sensation of breathing an atmosphere in which tobacco smoke was a principal ingredient. As ladies upon their first arrival are apt to be foolishly particular, they are sometimes annoyed whilst waiting, by receiving upon their dresses an occasional proof of the habit of chewing; an annoyance which is not easily guarded against, as many of the gentlemen pass their evenings sitting in clusters round the entrances to the various hotels, whence at intervals they project upon the pavement or the passenger, as the case may be, any superfluous accumulation that may arise. Very shortly after my arrival, I received a very good illustration of the universal fondness for tobacco. I paid a visit to the country-house of one of the richest men in New-York, and upon my refusing a cigar, shortly after I had entered, the daughter of my friend, a young lady of about nineteen, expressed her surprise by exclaiming, 'Oh, my! it seems so funny for a man not to smoke!' Making allowance for the usual amount of exaggeration indulged in by Cockney tourists when speaking of this country, we must admit that there is some truth in the remarks relative to the habit of clustering upon the stoops of our hotels. A pretty girl cannot pass the steps of some of our fashionable houses without being stared at by a body of spectators, quite as numerous as the audiences at some of our theatres. The custom is one which we should like to see reformed.

Fashionable music.—A writer in Blackwood's magazine adopts rather a singular title to express his distaste for foreign innovations in music. "Rot your Italianos" is the caption, more forcible than elegant, under which he anathematizes the whole tribe of mustachioed musicians, who have flooded our drawing-rooms with German and Italian flourishes and affectations, to the exclusion of the simple English ballad. The remarks of this old-fashioned person are quite as well suited to the meridian of New-York as of London. "I suppose," he says, "a lady of fashion now-a-days would as soon think of admitting that she did not adore Italian music, and she would be confessing her age. For my part, I look upon our Italianizing games pretty much as sturdy old Juives looked upon the Gravacans and patriciens—not possum ferre, Quintes, Gracem urdem.¹ There is no end to our unnatural adoptions—Italians, French, and Germans—the Swiss family This, and the Dutch family That, and the Russian family To'ther—Chanteurs Montagnards, Siffians, and Chinchoopers—Alpine minstrels, and Bohemian minstrels, and minstrels from heaven knows where; verily, the plague of foreigners is upon us, and of all live languages defend me from this! Were they ever confined to the boards of the opera-house, or the porticus of Leicester-Square, I should not mind it so much, though it would cease to be bad enough. But this is, alas! far from being the case.

Read a programme of a fashionable morning concert—the probability is, that you will find not one English song in the list. Walk into a fashionable drawing-room, and ask Miss Mary or Miss Caroline in favour with a little music—fifty-to-one she strikes up some Italian rignarole, of which you understand not a syllable, but which you are bound to pronounce the most beautiful thing you ever heard in your life, as you would escape being set down for a greater fool than even Alaric himself. An English audience, "gaping at wonderment" at a modern morning concert, puts me strongly in mind of a congregation of certain enthusiasts at their devotion

They are alike to yet admiring and devout listeners to a service, of the meaning of which nine-tenths of them have no more comprehension than a cow has of mathematics. But the evil does not stop at morning concerts and crowded sores; like the frogs of Egypt, it invades our very chambers, and takes its station unreisted by our parlour firesides—those very citadels of John Bullism,—our very children of ten years old practise bravuras and prattle of Donizetti.” We must confess that we are Vandals enough to sympathise with the indignant remonstrances of the “fine old English gentleman,” from whom these remarks must have proceeded.

Musical prospects of our city.—We take infinite pleasure in announcing to our musical friends the arrival of HANS LUDWIG RACKEMANN, a distinguished pianist; who brings from the land of harmony its purest and best traditions, and comes a true missionary of art among us. This gentleman is a native of Bremen, where we learn by many and warm letters received in this city, he was so highly prized as to have been reluctantly suffered to depart. After various artistical wanderings, in the course of which he frequented all the distinguished pianists of Europe, and became a pupil of the great Thalberg, he turned his steps hitherwards, to succeed the artist we have just lost. In testimony that they accept his mission, the Concordia have elected M. Rackemann to the "direction" unhappily vacated by the death of our much-lamented SCHLESINGER. We sincerely rejoice in this appointment; for it is for the interest of our country—so mighty, so prosperous, and so ready to commence its career of art—that this praiseworthy association should be continued with the ardour implanted by its late illustrious leader; and we are of those who proudly anticipate that its harmonious chorals—reaching farther and deeper into our land and the hearts of its inhabitants—will one day excite, in the forests of the far west, a thousand echoes, responding to the invocations of Handel, Beethoven and Weber, and swelling, from beyond the mountains, a national and undying anthem of musical glory. We have the most extraordinary accounts of this gentleman's powers. But even had we listened to him, which, we regret to say, is not the case, we should hardly venture to forestall public opinion, which will soon have an opportunity of judging how far his ability justifies report.

The poisoned chalice returned—beauties of the present copyright system.—A friend laid before us the other day a copy of a London edition of Ingham's late novel, entitled "Captain Kyd," printed in a newspaper form, and the whole work sold for a sixpence! The works of Cooper, Irving and Dr. Bird have been treated in the same unceremonious manner. No American writer can hereafter hope to derive any emolument from the sale of his works in England; for the moment he attains the least degree of popularity that moment will his literary offspring be seized upon by the Herodian conductor of the "Penny Novelist," and published on white-brown paper for the delectation of the economical lovers of pocket literature in Wapping and the purlieus of Grub-street. This is all fair in the way of retaliation. Our publishers prey upon English authors; and English publishers can now say to us in the words of Shylock—"The villainy you teach me I will execute." The system is a monstrous one. Will it never be remedied? Will our legislators never consent to remove abuses so flagrant and so discreditable to our country?

National Theatre, at Niblo's Saloon—Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff
We are glad to learn that Mr. Wallack has been doing a fine business at this neat little theatre, which has been well attended during the past fortnight by fashionable audiences. Mr. Vandenhoff commenced his engagement with the performance of Master Wallace, which we shall have to say hereafter. It was a masterly performance, and drew down repeated bursts of applause. Miss Vandenhoff, who made her début in this country in the character of Julia in Hunchback, produced, undoubtedly, a strong and deep impression. Her fine person and extraordinary talents eminently fit her for success in her profession; and, with a little more stage practice, she will find herself without a rival upon the English boards. Her Julia was full of brilliant and highly effective points, which called down the most enthusiastic applause. Her triumph has been quite decided. We should not omit to remark, that Mr. Vandenhoff's Master Walter was admirable.

The Southern Literary Messenger.—The October number of this ably-sustained periodical is one of the best ever issued. The continuation of the beautiful story of "Judith Bensaddi" is worthy of the preliminary chapters. It will be the author's fault if he do not reach a high niche in the fame of American literature. Mr. Benjamin has contributed a tale of thrilling interest, entitled, "The Innocent Avenger;" and Mr. Otis has furnished another number, his agreeable, gossiping articles, under a somewhat affected title. The remaining contents are varied and interesting; and the whole number forms a valuable contribution to the magazine literature of the country.

Bowery Theatre—Mr. Hamblin's appearance at this theatre several Shakespearian characters has been greeted by large and pleasing audiences. In Hamlet, his reputation is deservedly great and he always attracts a good house, when he puts himself up to that part. We learn that a new piece, likely to prove uncommonly attractive, and dramatized from Ainsworth's celebrated romance "Jack Sheppard," is soon to be produced at this theatre. Hamblin is continually on the alert in the production of novelties, and the public appreciate his exertions.

Park Theatre.—The new operatic corps has continued to attract respectable houses at this theatre. The operas of Cinderella, Sonnambula, and Guy Mannering, have been produced in good style, and with proportionate success. A rare entertainment has been afforded nightly to the lovers of music during the past month.

"The Good Housekeeper, or the Way to Live Well and to be well while we Live." Containing directions for choosing and preparing food, in regard to health, economy and taste. By Mrs. S. J. Hale. Boston: Weeks, Jordan and Co. Pp. 144.

There is no greater fallacy than the vulgar error that literary pursuits necessarily unfit the mind for the domestic and business duties of life. On the contrary, rightly followed, they have often formed a most desirable auxiliary in the efficient discharge of those duties. Sir Walter Scott did not think it beneath him to write for the kitchen as well as the parlour, and Mrs Hale affords another instance of high literary talents engaged upon the subject of the humble household matters of daily life. We need not assure our readers that she has accomplished her task in the most complete and faithful manner, and that the little manual before us ought to find its way into the hands of every family in the country.

"Adventures of an Attorney in Search of Practice." By the author of "The Adventures of a Gentleman in search of a Horse." In two vols. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

This work is appropriately dedicated "to all attorneys who want a client, and to all clients who want an attorney." There is a good deal of fraisance about the adventures, and we can readily believe that they are not wholly imaginary. A number of instructive hints, interesting both to lawyers and clients, are contained in the work, which is written in an agreeable and vivacious style. Many anecdotes of the principal practitioners at the English bar are given, which have an air of authenticity. The reader must pay the price of 6s. for this quite satisfactorily in coming to the volumes. Not the smallest commendation is, that they are printed in a large, handsome type.

FOLLOW, FOLLOW IN THE CLEAR MOONLIGHT.

THE MUSIC COMPOSED AND ARRANGED BY CHARLES McKORKELL.

MODERATO.

Follow, follow in the light To the of the mossy fo-rest old; fol- low me- of night green heart low, fol- the noon

From the vil-lage bell hath toll'd. Hie a-way, hie a-way, Where the fat-ry train are re-vel-ling; Hie a-way, hie a-way, Light-er heart no elf can bring.

2d—Where the oaks in Druid circle stand
Giant kings of many, many hundred years.
To the daisied knoll where sighings bland
In the noon the peasant hears:

Hie away, hie away,
There the elfin train re-vel-ling;
Hie away, hie away,
Lighter heart no elf can bring.

3d—I will shew thee kingly Oberon,
I will bring thee to his peerly rooted queen,
And the phant'sies thou shalt look upon,
Mortal eye hath never seen:

Hie away, hie away,
Thou shalt share our pranksome revelling;
Hie away, hie away,
Lighter step no elf can bring.

MISCELLANY.

We presume that the following parody is from the pen of John H. Hewitt, Esq. of Baltimore, one of the cleverest writers in the country. We like a good parody. It requires brains to make one. The following is quite to our taste:

PARODY.

"She wore a wreath of roses,"
He wore a neat silk waistcoat,
The day when first we met;
And "Bloomer's best" he sported
Upon his curls of jet.
His footstep had the lightness,
His voice the drawing tone—
The tokens of a lady's man
Whose debts are quite unknown.
I saw him but a moment,
Yet, methinks I see him now
With his bright and shaming beaver
Placed sideways on his brow.
A hat of white, all faded,
When next we met he wore;
The curl of his mustachoes,
Was graceful as before;
And dogging in his steps was one,
Who strove, but quite in vain,
To make him pay for all the clothes
He ne'er might see again.
I saw him but a moment,
Yet, methinks I see him now,
With a white silk hat all faded,
Pulled closely o'er his brow.
And once again I seen that brow,
No polish'd beaver's there;
A loafer's hat, without a brim,
Conceals his tangled hair.
He walks with pockets all "to let,"
And there is no one near,
To ask him to a friendly glass
Of Medart's genial beer.
I seen him all forsaken—
Yet methinks I see him now,
In the pride of manly beauty,
With his beaver on his brow.

GOOD HUMOUR.—Good humour is the clear blue sky of the soul, on which every star of talent will shine more clearly, and the sun of genius encounter no vapours in his passage. 'Tis the most exquisite beauty of a fine face; a redeeming grace in a homely one. It is like the green in the landscape, harmonizing with every colour, mellowing the glories of the bright, and softening the hue of the dark; or like a flute in full concert of instruments, a sound, not at first discovered by the ear, yet filling up the breaks in the concord with its deep melody.

AMERICAN NOTWANTY.—Marryat says there certainly is a very remarkable energy in the American disposition—if they fall they bound up again. Somebody has observed that the New-York merchants are of that elastic nature, that when fit for nothing else, they might be converted into coach-springs, and such really appears to be their character.

JULIUS CÆSAR.—Lord Bacon, no mean judge, considered Julius Cæsar the most accomplished character of all antiquity. He certainly was not inferior in military genius, eloquence, and scholarship to any man the world has produced, and his clemency was superior to that manifested by any conqueror.

THE EFFECT OF MUSIC ON MORALS.—The influence of music upon the mind is so refining, and tends so much to beget feelings of kindness and benevolence, thus beneficially affecting the health, that no system of education can be considered complete which does not provide this important means of moral training. Music is taught in most schools on the continent, and it is to this circumstance, among others, that, as I conceive, the superiority of the Germans and Italians over ourselves in this science is mainly attributable. Besides, are we not, equally with them, Saxons, and members of the great German family; and are not, therefore, our natural capabilities originally the same? The notion that our countrymen have comparatively no "ear for music" is an unfounded prejudice. Our actual inferiority arises solely from the want of cultivation.

CHINESE WAR STATISTICS.—Gutzlaff says, that the rebellion which broke out 1833, near Leon-choo, proved very destructive to the imperial soldiers. The general Kwangkang, being also president of the military board, matched in person with a numerous army, in order to defeat the unruly mountaineers. On one dark night, the mountaineers fastened lights on the horns of goats and sheep, and let them loose upon the mountains. The imperial troops taking aim, began to fire upon these unwelcome animals, while the real warriors came down in defile, attacked the imperial army in the rear, and made a great slaughter among them.

ON THE ARRIVAL OF MISS ELLEN TREE WITH HER MOTHER AND SISTER FROM AMERICA.

Has "Bimman come to Dunsinane?"
I cried, in sight when Ellen hove;
For, lo! three Trees come o'er the main—
Is this "I say, a moving grove?"

DRESS.—The Anglo-Norman dress, in the eleventh century, was simple, if not elegant. The nobles and gentry wore a long and close gown reaching to the feet, the lower edge being usually embroidered with gold. Over this hung an equally long cloak, generally clasped over the breast. In walking or riding, a hood hung behind it. The close gown was put on, over the head like a shirt, and fastened round the waist by a girdle, often studded with gems.—Their "nether man" was stured in fine cloth, sometimes very costly. Long-toed shoes, which came in fashion with William Rufus, were denounced from the pulpit as unnatural.

THE CELEBRATED GUADAGNI.—Guadagni was remarkable for his politeness to the fair sex. One day, while he was engaged in conversation with a lady, a servant entering hastily, announced that the king of Sardinia was in the ante-chamber. "Is he?" said Guadagni, coolly; "then request his majesty to wait till this lady has finished her business with me."

ON THE IMMENSE PLATES OF GLASS FORMING THE WINDOWS IN REGENT-STREET.

Why such expensive windows here!
Cries these augment the owners' gains!
Yes; for to please, they make it clear,
Such tradesmen take the greatest pains.

ATTORNEYS.—The rights of authors are as well protected in Prussia as they are neglected in America and Great Britain. The idea that what a writer composes and publishes should not be considered as much his property as his houses or lands, is so preposterous that it scarcely merits refutation. And yet we can behold no other ground upon which the rights of authors have so long been studiously neglected.

ENVY.—It is easier to pardon the faults than the virtues of our friends; because the first excite in us a sense of complacency always agreeable, and the second a sense of humiliation which makes us dislike the indicator.

A BUSINESS MATTER.—Call on a business man in business hours, only on business; transact your business, and go about your business, in order to give him time to finish his business.

HAYDN'S DYING PRAYER.—The army of Napoleon had been gradually approaching Vienna, and, on the night of the tenth of May, 1808, the French artillery took its position at Schonbrunn, within two hundred paces of the composer's little garden, in which four wells fell and exploded in the course of the night. Its Latrines were directed against the city, and Haydn, picturing to himself the horrors of a sacked town, the massacre of his fellow-citizens, and the imperial eagle succumbing to the bird of Gaul, raised his feeble hands to heaven, and then tottered with feeble steps to his piano, where he sang with a voice tremulous with emotion rather than from bodily weakness the national air, composed by himself, of "Gott halte den Kaiser!"—God save the King. This, which he was accustomed to call his prayer, he sang with surpassing expression three times; but the doom of his country was sealed, and a few days after the taking of Vienna the patriotic composer breathed his last.

OP TWO EVILS CHOOSE THE LEAST.—A French dog was taught by his master to execute various commissions, and among others, to fetch him victuals from the traiteurs in a basket. One evening when the dog was returning to his master thus furnished, two other dogs, attracted by the savoury smell of the petits pâtés that this new messenger was carrying, determined to attack him. The dog put his basket on the ground, and set himself courageously against the first that advanced against him; but while he was engaged with the one, the other ran to the basket, and began to help himself. At length, seeing that there was no chance of beating both the dogs, and saving his master's dinner, he threw himself between his two opponents, and without further ceremony, quickly despatched the remainder of the petits pâtés himself, and then returned to his master with the empty basket.

ON THE OFFER OF SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE TO ESTABLISH A BANK IN EGYPT.

Sir Moses claims Egyptian thanks,
Since in that land, despoiling France,
He'd set a bank up, knowing banks
Are over-run there every year.

EXERCISE.—Exercise is generally considered too omnipotent; and relying on its restoring power, people run into every kind of extravagance in living, apparently in the firm faith that an evening or a morning ride will fully indemnify them against any deleterious results from such excesses. They seem to think that late hours, excessive drink and gluttonous eating, may all be indulged in with impunity, if they will but occasionally submit themselves to a gentle jolting in a carriage, or the almost imperceptible motion of an ambling nag. Exercise is indisputably a capital assistant in the preservation of health; but, without the concurrent aid of a temperate and prudent course of life, it is but a broken reed to lean upon for the promotion of a healthy state of either body or mind.

AN IRISH ADDRESS.—The following is an address delivered by the manager of a small theatre in Ireland; there were only three persons in the house:—"Ladies and gentlemen, as there is nobody here, I'll dismiss you all; the performances of this night will not be performed; but the performances of this night will be performed to-morrow evening."

SERVICE.—Advice, like snow, the softer it falls, the longer it dwells upon, and the deeper it sinks into the heart.

A MUSICAL ERROR.

All out of tune Hal sang the song,
Then played his flute—till, heaven knows!
Methought 'twas very, very wrong
For Hal to "go from words to blows!"

THE ENGRAVING.

AN AMERICAN AUTHOR *

Illustrated by two of her artists.

We present the readers of the New-York Mirror, this week, with a chef d'œuvre, from the pencil and burn of two American artists, Chapman and Danforth, illustrating a page in the history of Virginia, which has been made the subject of a beautiful ode from the pen of an American author, J. K. Paulling, Esq. This engraving is an honorable instance of the genius and skill of our own countrymen in the various departments of literature and the fine arts. A few years ago such a specimen of native talent would have astonished the virtuosi of the old world—and even now many will be skeptical, on a careful examination of this beautiful picture, of its being the production of American artists. The scene which the artist has chosen for his illustration may be found in the last edition of "Tales of the Good Woman," in the sketch entitled the "Cradle of the New World." It is also partially shadowed forth in the following stanzas:

The wonders of an age combined,
In one short scene memory supplies,
They throng upon my weakened mind,
As Time's dark curtains rise,
The volume of a hundred buried years,
Conspicuous in one bright sheet, appears.

I hear the angry ocean rave,
I see the lonely little bark,
Scudding along the crested wave,
Freighted like old Noah's ark,
As o'er the drowned earth he whirled,
With the forefathers of another world.

I see a train of exiles start,
Amid the desert, desolate,
The fathers of my native land,
The daring pioneers of fire,
Who braved the perils of the sea and earth,
And gave a boundless empire birth.

I see the gloomy Indian range,
His woodland empire, free as air;
I see the gloomy forest chasm,
The shadowy earth let rare,
And where the red man chased the bounding deer
The smiling labours of the white appear.

I see the haughty warrior gaze
In wonder or in scorn,
As the pale fires tol to raise
Their scanty fields of corn,
While he, the monarch of the boundless wood,
By sport or hair-brained rapine, wins his food.

A moment, and the pageant's gone;
The red men are no more;
The pale faced strangers stand alone
Upon the river's shore;
And the proud wood-king who their arts disdained,
Finds but a bloody grave where once he reigned.

Their names have been forgotten long;
The stone, but not a word, remains;
They cannot live in death's cold core,
Nor breathe in pious strains,
Yet this sublime obscurity to me
More touching is, than poet's rhapsody.

They live in millions that now breathe,
They live in millions yet unborn,
And pious gratitude shall weave
As bright a crown as e'er was worn,
And hang it on the green-leaved bough,
That whispers to the nameless dead below.

No one that inspiration drinks;
No one that loves his native land,
No one that reasons, feels or thinks,
Can mid these lonely ruins stand,
Without a mother's eye, a grateful tear,
Of reverent gratitude to those that moulder here.

NEW NOVELS IN THE PRESS.

A CHAPTER FROM "THE COUNTESS IDA."

BY THEODORE'S FAY.

CLAUDE now rose to leave the table. It was eight o'clock, and he had resolved to go this evening, for the last time, into society in Berlin. After all that had occurred, he did not wish to leave town clandestinely, but to take this occasion to bid farewell to such of his friends as were not alienated by the slanders of his enemy, and to steal one more look at her who filled his soul with tender anguish. He had not seen Carolan for some time, nor the countess, nor Ida. He knew that the challenge from Elkington, which he had refused, had already become the topic of conversation. The fierce little general, disappointed in his intention of proceeding in the duel, or of taking summary vengeance upon Claude for the result of his mission, and the little respect with which the messenger had been received, found some vent for his fury in spreading everywhere the news of his enemy's cowardice and disgrace. As gentlemen may be very ready to fight duels and blow other gentlemen's brains out, and yet be capable of wide deviations from veracity, we must not be surprised to find that the doughty general garished his recital with embellishments; and he was a great talker and knower to everybody. According to his account, "Mr. Wyndham had insulted his friend, Lord Elkington, by calumniating him to Count Carolan, with the view of breaking off his approaching marriage with Ida—that he had accordingly borne a message from Elkington, upon receiving which, Mr. Wyndham had become exceedingly pale and alarmed, and that, after having refused to fight, although urged to it by provocations which no gentleman could endure, and still refusing, he the general took his, Mr. Wyndham's nose between his, the general's fore and middle fingers and pulled the same, and that the operation had been performed with so little resistance on the part of the operatus that he should have repeated it at short intervals, when not otherwise engaged, wherever the said Wyndham presumed to show the said nose in society—only he, the said Wyndham" (and in this part of the account the general gave such huge twists with his body and such ghastly contortions of his wounded cheek as to render the description extremely lively and impressive) "had had the meanness—the cowardice—the—" (and here he used to make a pause in consequence of there not being any word in either the French or German languages exactly strong enough to convey the full extent of his contempt for such conduct—"to go to the police and complain of a threatened assault—thus meanly and basely, and in a most ungentlemanly manner, preventing his being shot—or, at least, horsewhipped in the street—the next morning—as, but for this, would have been the case.")

"Come what may," thought Claude, "I will meet these gay crowds once more. I will steal one more look at that fair—fair face, which I am never to see again, and then—hail! the future—and the past—adieu!"

While dressing, his servant brought him a newspaper, sent up by Denham. He unfolded it—glanced his eye across its pages, and was flung up at once, when the name of the earl of Beverly caught his eye, and he read the following:

"DEATH OF THE EARL OF BEVERLY.—We regret to be obliged to announce the death of the earl of Beverly, at his princely residence at L—, on Monday morning. The earl, who had been previously improving in health, on rising in the morning at his usual hour, fell suddenly to the floor in a fit, and expired before any assistance could reach him. An express was instantly sent off to the continent to acquaint Lord Elkington and Lady Beverly, who are at Berlin."

"The late earl was born in 17—, in March, 17—, when only the Hon. Mr. Lawton, he married a Miss Carentz, a beautiful young orphan of Vienna. The match was one of inclination, but terminated unfortunately. A short time after their union the bride, to whom he was attached with a fervour corresponding to his high powers of mind and peculiar ardour of character, quitted him, allured by the attractions of an ancient lover, and after having afforded too glaring evidences of a character singularly light, and a total disregard of her own honour and the peace of her husband. She carried with her a child not many months old, but neither the unfortunate infant nor its mother long survived; both having been dead at sea on a voyage to the West Indies. Having succeeded to the titles and estates of his father, the late —, he was subsequently created earl of Beverly by his late majesty. After which he immediately married again, Miss Seymour, daughter of the distinguished General Seymour. Lord Elkington, now earl of Beverly, the only son, is twenty-two years of age. He is daily expected, with his mother, from the continent."

Claude read this paragraph with a singular interest. He felt almost as if Providence were unjust, to raise the prodigal duellist to opulence and honour—and to depress him, who had shown himself so ready to sacrifice even his reputation in the cause of right. How brilliant was now Elkington's prospect. The earl of Beverly, courted by all—his rank and wealth would gloss over the defects of his character. His gambling debts would be paid, and his misdeeds meanness hushed up. If Count Carolan before had been anxious for an union with him, he would now be much more so, and he would be little likely to listen to charges concerning him from one against whom he was already obviously offended. Ida would become the countess of Beverly. Bled with everything to elate his spirits and to swell his hold, had heart with joy and triumph—he could go on for the future—perhaps having no temptation to evil—he would endanger his reputation by no further open acts of prodigality—while he himself, having openly branded him, would be regarded as a mean calumniator and a defeated rival.

As these reveries passed through his mind, he found himself at the house of Count N—, the minister. It was blazing with light and very crowded. It seemed all the world was there.

For some time Claude wandered around the rooms, every one appearing to avoid addressing him. The effect of this upon him was visible in an increased paleness. Where was Lavalle! where was General St. Hillaire? Some accident had detained them. He felt that he would have given worlds to see the face of one friend—to have any one to talk to—that he might break the general coldness and silence which he appeared to bring with him wherever he went. He wandered on like a man in a dreadful dream. He could scarcely believe that, by the acts and villainy of a single person, he had been so entirely ruined in the estimation of so many people. His isolation was more complete from the fact that, perceiving how much he was the object of odium, he did not like to subject to the embarrassment of associating with him the few who, perhaps, had he addressed them, as usual, would have replied with civility. Thus marked, as it were, by the proscription of the whole brilliant assembly, and by his pale countenance and haughty air, a conspicuous person amid the laughing and pleasure-seeking crowds, he thought himself suffering the worst effects of his honest adherence to principle and the slander of his enemies, when Carolan and his family entered the room. Amid the many persons whom they saluted the omission of him was conspicuous and generally remarked. The count looked at him a moment with disdain and turned his back. The countess carefully avoided meeting his glance, and even Ida—upon whose beautiful countenance—now as pale as his own—he could not avoid fixing his eyes, in which all his pride and haughty indignation had not been able to prevent a moisture—even Ida turned silently away, and was led by a gentleman to a distant part of the room—without a word—or a look.

There are moments when the more we suffer the better able we are to endure; and this, for Claude, was one of them. He felt that to remain longer in a society, after so open an exposure of the estimation in which he was held, would be neither necessary nor delicate. He resolved, therefore, to retire; but, before doing so, to seek with Count Carolan a few moments conversation. He, therefore, approached that gentleman, and, with an air so calm and yet so evidently agitated, that Carolan started at his sudden address.

"Count Carolan, a word with you."

"Certainly," said the count.

"There is, I believe, no one in Madame de N—'s boudoir, may I beg your company there for a few moments?"

The count turned rather pompously and followed. When they reached that remote room, they found it deserted.

"What is your pleasure, sir?" said Carolan, haughtily.

"To ask you what I have done to merit a condemnation without a hearing—I perceive with indignation and surprise, that my reputation has been destroyed by calumny. I could drag the slanderer to light, and make him pay with his life the penalty of his falsehood, but that would punish the falsehood and not disprove it. Neither is Lord Elkington one who would hear with candour, what I have to say. To you, sir, I appeal from a sense of duty, as having been my first friend in Berlin, and beg you, to know of what I am accused and what suspected; and I offer publicly or privately to submit my life, actions, and character to any scrutiny you may desire. I do not ask your friendship; but I desire you will, by your words and conduct, refute intimations against my character, which I offer you the means of knowing to be above reproach."

"I had hoped, Mr. Wyndham had discovered a more manly mode of righting his injured fame. Gentlemen settle these things in a shorter, and you will excuse me for adding, in a more honourable way," said Carolan.

"Pray spare me your insinuations, sir," said Claude, mildly—"I am not here to quarrel, but to explain to you your injustice towards me. If this injustice is wilful, I shall not resent it; but if it is an error, I am willing to explain the calumnies of Elkington."

"Stop, sir—stop sir—I shall hear nothing again, at my friend I deem it proper to admit him into my family, and I presume I am the best judge of my own companions and my own affairs."

"Indeed," said Claude, remembering he was addressing the father of Ida, and thus in some degree repressing the disgust which the pompous, arrogant manner and unreasoning remarks of his companion excited. "Indeed, sir, in offering my defence of myself, I am obliged to place in your hands once more a letter, concerning Elkington, which—"

"Stop, sir—stop. I will hear nothing upon that subject. I presume, sir, you are aware that my daughter has chosen him as her husband; and though you have been unprincipled enough—"

"Count Carolan!"

"To attempt to win her affections, and to allure her from her father's house."

"I! I do most solemnly protest—"

"Stop, sir—I am acquainted with the whole; and I deem it proper, since you have sought this interview, to state, sir, that when I took you up—a friendless, nameless person—too hastily, as it seems—I thought I discovered in you something worth my encouragement. You are nothing, sir. It was my stamping you that you have alone been received into society, and having been mistaken in you, I must, from a high and imperative sense of duty—I must drop you in the most marked manner. Any application from you, sir, will be entirely useless."

*In the press of Messrs. Harpers, and will shortly be published.

There was an insufferable conceit in the manner in which this was said, which made Claude's blood boil in his veins. It was a thousand times more difficult to endure patiently than the stratagem of injuries of Elkington, or the capricious near-sightlessness of Lady Beverly. He could not help wishing in his heart that he could call out to the fiend, and plant at twelve paces from the muzzle of a good pistol, an insolence and pomposity so inexpressibly provoking. But the father of Ida would have been safe from an angry reply, even had he been influenced by no loftier consideration in governing his passions. He, therefore, replied:

"If Count Carolan supposes my present suit as an application for his aid in enjoying the pleasures of the Berlin society, he mistakes me greatly. I complain, that by a sudden withdrawal of the respect which, from whatever motive you have been pleased to honour me with, people are left to form erroneous opinions respecting me. I offer you proof that such opinions are false—and I appeal to your generosity and sense of honour, not to inflict upon me the injury which you have now the power to do, at least without satisfying yourself that you have cause."

"I presume, sir, that I know how to take care of my own honour without your advice; and as to generosity, that which I have already shown towards you has been so ill returned, that I must reserve it hereafter for a more worthy object, and one free from the charges currently believed against you, sir."

"Will you tell me what are the charges reported against me?"

"Ask nothing of me, sir. I presume I shall be ready to render an account of my actions to those who have a right to call on me."

"If then, sir," said Claude, his patience giving way before the insufferable pomposity and insolence which appeared in every word and gesture of his former patron, "your opinion is formed without cause, and adhered to against proof, I can only conclude that, in seeking to change it, I have placed upon it more than its real value."

"Do you mean to insult me?" said Carolan, turning very pale.

"I protest," said Claude, after a moment's reflection, "I am wrong to forget that you have rendered me kindness, which should even seal my lips. I cannot but think, in refusing me the opportunity to lay my character before you, you do me wrong; but I did not mean to fall in my respect towards you, and—for the image of Ida floated through his mind—"Count Carolan, before we part—I beg your pardon."

"No, sir, you intend to insult me."

"I assure you—"

"No, sir—stop!—you cannot deceive me. I see it is your intention to insult me. I am justly served, sir, for my imprudence in taking up persons without examining who and what they are! I shall hereafter, sir, be more on my guard; and I shall deem it a high duty to look with suspicion upon all strangers ere I give them my countenance in society."

Tired with contending against these characteristic remarks, disgusted beyond measure, even more with the manner than the matter, and unwilling, from various considerations, to resent, Claude remained silent, inwardly hoping that a fool might thus be best dealt with; but even silence was no refuge against the displeasure of Count Carolan.

"Go, sir," said that gentleman. "I recommend you to abandon a class of society for which you are neither fitted by your education nor your fortune; but, before you go, you will be so good, sir, as not to forget a bill for fifty pounds has been cashed by my banker, at your request."

Astonished at this extraordinary speech, Claude, with an indignant heart and the strongest possible desire to horse-whip him, turned in silence, and with a burning spot in his cheek, withdrew with the determination to retire instantly to his own house, and leave Carolan, wife, and daughter, without another word. He had done all that good sense demanded to re-establish his character, and all, through the malice of Elkington and the stupid pomposity and conceit of Carolan, had been in vain.

Accordingly he turned his back upon Carolan, who had never appeared to him so ridiculous and disgusting, and approached the door which led to that of egress. He had reached the last ante-chamber, lost in thoughts of no tender nature, when he was astonished, not to say startled, to behold Elkington planted directly in the door-way through which alone he could pass to the street; and, on the appearance of Claude, a low laugh announced a fiendish delight which announced no good. Claude stopped and gazed a moment with surprise upon the features, attitude and dress of his enemy. He was not in the ordinary habiliments of a ball-room—but wore a surcoat and boots. His cravat was loosely tied, his wrists unfastened, his vest but partly buttoned, and his hair dishevelled. His attitude was motionless as that of a snake before he springs. On a nearer glance at his features, he perceived that his face was much flushed and his lips stained with wine. There was a certain air of swagger very different from his usual elegant quietness of manner, and his eyes were fixed on Claude with a fury which probably neither wine nor passion could have produced separately, but which was the combined effect of both. Behind him stood little General Le Beau. The peculiarities in the dress and manner of Elkington, however singular, were less so than his appearance at all at this time in such a scene—the news of his father's illness having but so recently arrived, and some of the journals having even formally announced his death.

Claude saw that a premeditated attack awaited him if he advanced; and had it been possible, despite the sneers which such a course might have excited, he would have returned to the drawing-room, rather than engage in a scuffle which, from the degenerate character of his foe, might be a fatal one; but he saw that it was the intention of Elkington to pursue him if he retreated as certainly as to assault him should he proceed. He therefore paused, not knowing for a moment what to do.

"So, sir," said Elkington, "I have sought you at your hotel—I sought you through the streets—I have sought you here—and here you are! I learn you are about to quit Berlin. You have deeply wounded my honour—you have slandered and insulted me. I have demanded of you the satisfaction of a gentleman, which you have refused, sir. Take this—and may it burn on your forehead—for ever!"

He stepped deliberately forward, and with his clenched fist struck him a violent blow in the face. For a moment Claude was stunned. He did not think of returning it. He started back and covered his face with his hands. He seemed blasted with thunder. He heard several voices exclaim, "Ha, a blow!" in tones of surprise and horror. His heart stood still. His reason left him. His principle against taking human life flashed upon him as a mockery. He sturd—it was to sacrifice, and tear to pieces the being who had brought this spell upon him. He found some one had grasped his arms and held him back. Fire flew from his eyes. He thought their glance alone could kill, and he turned them that they might do so on his victim. He beheld him standing there, very pale, but smiling a sneer—a devil—on his face—and his extended finger pointing at him. A sense of agony—of ruin—of utter, interminable, irremediable shame and despair filled all his being. Never had he known the fearful energies of his nature. Never before had he dreamed what it was to receive a blow! Some moments elapsed. He knew not how long. He was deprived of the power of motion. Invisible hands held him. He could not tell how—nor who—nor how long—nor by what tremendous power—his strong impulse to leap forward was withheld. He wanted motion—a weapon, a pistol—any thing which would destroy—crush—strike dead.

He was first somewhat recalled to reason by the low laugh of Elkington, who advanced and said,

"My card, sir! You know where I am. I shall be happy to hear from you, at your earliest leisure."

"To-night—to-night," said Claude.

"When you please, sir."

"Lord Elkington, you are an infamous scoundrel," cried a voice from the side of Claude. It sounded like Denham's, but he scarcely attended to it. He was still as one in a dream.

"How! who is that?" demanded Elkington.

"It is I, insolent ruffian!" said Denham, stepping up. "You know my friend is no duellist, and the blow you have struck—may it recoil upon your own forehead, and sink into your own heart. How dare you, sir—your hands stained with dishonesty—your name—"

Elkington now, in his turn, showed signs of trepidation, but he said, "I did not expect to see you here—but I have an account to settle with you also—unless you are as whining a coward as your friend."

"I will meet you when your hands are clean from—"

"If you are a man," muttered Elkington, desperate with fury, "you will meet me at once!"

He lifted his hand and hurled a blow upon the forehead of Denham. The object of this unexpected attack sprang upon him, but Le Beau rushed between.

"Elkington," said Denham, his face livid with passion, "you have succeeded. You shall near from me," and left the room.

This scene was very rapid in its occurrence. A general interference now took place. Elkington retired. Claude was released. The crowd had rushed from the inner apartments at the noise of the brawl. Claude was surrounded by them. They opened to give him room as he passed out. He found himself in the open air—alone, burning, like an evil spirit just out of his abode of fire.

METROPOLITAN SKETCHES.

WHAT'S IN THE WIND?

BY A SKETCHER.

I do not believe that a more restless, eager, excitable multitude can be found on the face of the globe than that which congregates daily in Wall-street. What a contrast does a scene here present to the good old times of the Knickerbockers; when Newport was a bigger place than New-York, and when it was the hope of the burghers that the city of Manhattan would yet rival her more flourishing sister of Rhode's Island! But now, forsooth, the real Dutch blood is almost exterminated; and it is enough to raise from their last sleep the steady old pipe-smokers, the bustle and rattle that are going on above their graves.

I found my way, a week or two since, into Wall-street, just before the hour of exchange; the first time for a twelvemonth. A young southern friend was with me, returning home from Saratoga. Crowds were collected about the side-walks, little knots hurrying down to the wharves; men stopped man inquisitively, and parted with a mutual shrug of the shoulders. Something was evidently in the wind.

"Ah," said I to my companion, as we passed the lower corner of the Exchange, "here comes my old friend D. . . . man and boy, he has haunted Wall-street this hundred years, more or less; and if there's any mischief afoot, he knows all about it."

He was passing me with a firm, rapid step, his eyes bent on something or somebody beyond. "Hale and hearty yet," I exclaimed, "though I have grown quite too old for you to remember Time was, sir, when I was your junior, but it has gone faster with me than with some folks. What's the deuce to pay in Wall-street!"

"Ah! Mr. L. . . .," replied the old gentleman in specs, for it was none other, "the report is that the British Queen is in possession of the revenue cutter."

"What's the matter?"

"Ah, that's more than I know. The story I tell as it is told to me, and do not vouch for the truth of it. There are a thousand rumors, but I am going to find out the facts."

"As fond of facts as ever, D. . . .," I cannot comprehend how you can still take such an active interest in affairs. For my part, I have got out of them these ten years. I believe you were born in Wall-street, and your ghost will haunt it for a century after you are gone. But I see you are in haste. Good morning."

The active old gentleman waved his cane courteously, and was off in a twinkling. My companion looked askingly. "That, sir," I replied, "is the biographer of Burr, and is more than suspected of being the Spy in Washington. He has been a partizan for half a century, and has never asked or accepted office at the hands of the government or the people."

"And why so?"

"Simply because he would never be bothered with it. He would never consent to merge his individual influence and character in an office. He prefers his independence, and will have his own way in spite of the world."

Thus conversing, we threaded our way through the crowd to the parade in front of the Courier and Enquirer. "Let us take a look at the bulletin."

"Not a word of the British Queen! We will inquire at the door."

"What's the matter? what's the matter?" They were all askers and listeners.

"I understand," said a rosy-visaged, plump gentleman, "that there are two cutters alongside of her, but what they want is more than any body can tell."

"Where is the consignee? What says he about it?"

"I have just come from the consignee's, and he is just as wise as you are," says Tompkins.

"The government has given orders to search every steam-vessel that goes abroad, for fear that there may be some more elopements of sub-treasurers," suggests Smith.

"The truth is, gentlemen," said a dapper young man in black, who had just come up the street, fresh from the scene of action, "the marshal has gone aboard to inquire after an absconding creditor."

Higgins looked on in contempt. Higgins knew. Higgins knows everything. Higgins shrugged his shoulders, and observed that the fact was that there was some specie on board not entered at the custom-house, and that, consequently, the custom-house had determined to detain the Queen.

Still the fever increased. What could be the matter? Specie smuggled, sub-treasurers giving leg-bail, creditors absconding—what was the truth? Still grew the wonder. An hour elapsed. Despatches had been received from the British minister. The British consul was about taking up his connexions. Important news from Canada had just come in, and the Queen was to be kept back four and twenty hours. All creation was hurrying down to the wharves.

For two whole hours Wall-street was in a ferment. The brokers forgot their second board, and stocks were described as in a fluctuating condition—to continue so, until this mystery was solved. Cotton trembled. Flour looked blue. Indigo turned pale. United States bank shivered. The only articles that rose in the market were hemp and eggs.

At length the British Queen was again seen gliding majestically through the water—and as she passed the noble floating palace, the pride of our gallant navy, a hearty cheer bade her God speed upon her ocean path!

The knots of eager loungers and lingerers were broken up. Wall street went home restless and unsatisfied. Money-dealers passed sleepless nights. Old Grimes determined to sell out all his stocks the next day; for nobody could tell what would happen next. Bluenose was horror-struck, and ascribed the whole matter to the rapid progress of democracy, which was ruining the country; and Vainmont thought it quite time to shut up shop, if foreigners were to be permitted to cut such capers with impunity.

With an impatient hand did many a worthy citizen open the papers of the next morning, to learn some authentic account of this mysterious occurrence. I must plead guilty to no little anxiety myself. I wished to know what it was that had unsettled the markets, knocked down our stocks, and created such a whirl and whiz of excitement on our metropolitan exchange.

The mystery was solved in a single word. It was nothing connected with our north-eastern boundary, or Canadian insurrections. Mr. Fox, though he has been all the summer at Washington, had no hand in it. Mr. Buchanan was guiltless. There were no de-capitalising sub-treasurers. There were no revenue cutters, but an oyster-boat and a Whitehall barge. There was no man in the claret-coloured coat!

"What then could it be?" exclaimed my wife; for an impulse of curiosity in females not indecorous or unusual.

"Why, my dear," said I, laying down the paper, and replacing my spectacles, "the steward had forgot the eggs!"

EPICRAM.—One of the cleverest epigrams ever written was produced, extempore, on the representation of Mrs. Cowley's Fate of Sparta, or the Real Kings; a tragedy which was acted some nine nights at Drury Lane, towards the close of the last century:

Ingenious Cowley! while we view'd

Of Sparta's sons the lot severe,

We caught the Spartan fortitude,

And saw their woes without a tear.

ROMANCE OF ITALY.

A TALE OF NAPLES.

BY JAMES ALDRICH.

"Naples! thou heart of men which ever pantest
Naked, beneath the idles eye of heaven!
Ere thou city, which to calm eyes lookest
The moutous air and sea! they round thee, even
As sleep round love, are driven?" Shelley.

In the suburbs of the city of Naples—a city which nature, poetry, and history emulate each other in clothing in the most attractive charms, stands a princely structure embosomed in orange and citron trees, where formerly resided a gentleman of noble birth, named Felix Ambrose, who employed the most of his time in the cultivation of flowers and the study of botany. Signor Ambrose was a man of poetic disposition, intoxicated with the charms of nature; and where could a man of his temperament be more happily situated than in the vicinity of Naples? Near his residence by the grotto of Pausilippo is the tomb of Virgil—a spot more beautiful than any pictured by the poet's imagination—indeed every isle and promontory within view from the campagna of Naples, is consecrated by genius—near Gaeta, Cicero lost his life, and the banished Scipio ended his days near the same place—the tomb of Agrippina is yet to be seen opposite the island of Caprea; and at the little isle of Nisida, Brutus and Portia breathed their last farewells.

Signor Ambrose, with a soul born for happiness, and accustomed to the pleasures of the imagination, lived mostly in the past; all that seemed to connect him with the present, was his affection for his beautiful and only daughter Caterina, whose charms, not less than the beauty and odour of an infinite variety of flowers, frequently attracted to the gardens of Ambrose two gentlemen of Naples: the one named Caracciola, and the other Andrea; the former was in possession of great wealth, but Andrea, the favoured lover, though sprung of one of the most ancient and honourable families in Italy, was poor. Caracciola was not ignorant of the love which Caterina bore for his rival—towards whom he conceived the most bitter hatred that jealousy could engender, and longed for nothing so much as a favourable opportunity to put him out of the way.

Although Signor Ambrose entertained for his daughter the fondest parental love, he did not fail to urge incessantly the suit of Caracciola. The gentle Caterina would not for a time listen to her father's unwelcome importunities, yet, at last, yielded an unwilling consent on condition that the marriage should be deferred to a distant period, hoping that fortune would come to her aid and unite her to him whom she best loved, and who was most worthy of her.

When Andrea heard of this he abandoned himself to despair, and determined to seek among new scenes and new acquaintances, to obliterate if possible from his memory one whom he felt he could no longer continue to address without dishonour. This determination he kept a secret even from Caterina. He lingered in Naples several weeks, enjoying, whenever opportunity offered, a stolen interview, and resolving that each one should be the last. Of these interviews Caracciola became informed, and his hatred for Andrea increased to such a height, that in a moment of desperation he bribed two ruffians—such as can always be procured in Naples for a trifling sum, to commit any crime—to assassinate him. There is something peculiar, original, and noticeable in the half civil, and half savage lawlessness of Naples; they may be seen by hundreds lying on the pavement sunning themselves, or in their pinniers of osiers which serve as habitations. Thousands of them live in a subterranean grotto, sleeping away the most of their time: the necessary articles for subsistence are so cheap there, that little or no industry is necessary to obtain a livelihood: they live in the most deplorable ignorance—many of them not even knowing their own names, and wholly devoid of moral sentiments—and almost, one might suppose, of moral accountability. It is not to be wondered at, that, among beings of this class, may be found those who are ready for the perpetration of any crime.

The murders employed by Caracciola, watching in the dark by a corner where they supposed Andrea would pass, silently awaited his approach. Now it so happened that Andrea, knowing nothing of this, on that very night departed secretly, and in disguise, for Terresina, on his way to Palermo. The assassins had not waited long ere a man passed, whom they thought to be Andrea, and they, falling upon him, despatched him with their knives, and threw his body into the sea.

In the morning Andrea's absence gave great alarm to his friends, and hearing no tidings of him for two days, they offered a large reward in gold to any one who would give information respecting him. Tempted by the reward, one of the murderers, being assured that he should be permitted to make his escape, divulged the whole transaction: his fellow-murderer and Caracciola were arrested, tried, and convicted; the former was executed, and the latter sentenced to be imprisoned for life.

Andrea, now on his way to Palermo, knew nothing of this; and his friends, supposing him to be dead, went into mourning for him. Caterina was inconsolable in her grief, and would have retired to a convent, but that her father, old and infirm, whom she dearly loved, claimed her filial care and attention.

When Andrea arrived in Palermo, he entered the service of a merchant, and led a sad and solitary life; making but few acquaintances, but winning from those he did make, their warmest affection and esteem. He remained in Sicily for five years without hearing a word from his friends in Naples, and without informing them whether he had fled—supposing all the while that Caterina was the wife of Caracciola. Although he endeavoured to forget the idol of his heart, it was in remembrance of her, perhaps, he found his chief pleasure. Wandering alone one evening in a melancholy mood, his attention was arrested by the voice of a gallant who was singing a serenade under the balcony of a magnificent dwelling; and drawing nearer, he found the song to be one which himself had composed, the burden of which was his love for Caterina.

"Slight withal may be the things which bring Back on the heart the weight which it would fling
And for ever: it may be a sound—
A tone of music—summer's eve—or spring,
A flower—the wind—the ocean—which shall wound,
Striking the electric chain wherewith we are darkly bound."

The slightest events are not infrequently productive of the most important events in life; that song awakened a thousand pleasing recollections, and brought back to his heart its early love, and with it a resolution to set out for Naples, in the hope of at least seeing once more her, whom he found it was in vain to endeavour to forget.

On arriving in his native city, Andrea took lodgings at the Hôtel du Belvédère, under the assumed name of Baritola; and making casual inquiries of his family, he accidentally heard of the extraordinary and tragical drama performed after his leaving Naples, together with every particular connected with it. Bethinking for many hours how he should act, he determined, in the first place, to go to the prison in disguise, and see Caracciola. Accordingly he went and obtained permission to visit the wretched man's cell.

"I come to you as a friend," said Andrea, "to converse with you on affairs of importance."

"Stranger," replied Caracciola, "then your discourse must be of a future state, for to me the affairs of this world are of the least possible importance."

"Nay, hear me," said Andrea; "I come on an errand of mercy, to promote your happiness in this life. I think I have it in my power to release you from this confinement." Caracciola looked wildly upon his visitor, and replied with a sigh of despair. Andrea continued: "You had a rival once, named Andrea, whom you suppose dead, but he is living, for I have seen him within these three days past."

"Do not mock me," said Caracciola.

"On condition that I obtain your release," said Andrea, "will you renounce all claim upon Caterina, and depart from Naples, never to return?"

"On any condition would I regain my liberty—but do not aggravate my sufferings by creating hopes which can never be realized." Then Andrea explained to him the whole of the mystery, and departing, left Caracciola buried in tears.

Andrea returned to his hotel musing as he went, upon what course he should next pursue, when he bethought him of this expedient. Hearing that Signor Ambrose and his daughter were living in great seclusion, he wrote a letter, purporting to come from a famous botanist, in Geneva, introducing one Baritola (himself) to Signor Ambrose; this letter he delivered in person, still preserving his disguise—and was received with great civility by Ambrose, who after customary salutations and renewed professions of civilities, directed Caterina to conduct the stranger to his gardens and exhibit to him several of the rarer sorts of plants and flowers which he had expressed a wish to examine.

Little dreaming who accompanied her, Caterina walked with Andrea in the garden, pointing out to him the most beautiful flowers and discoursing, pleasantly, upon their peculiar natures. The conversation soon became free and general, and wearied with walking, they seated themselves in an arbour covered with aloes and broad fig-leaves, when Andrea remarked, in a casual manner, that by accident he had lately seen in Palermo a person named Andrea, with whom she was very well acquainted, and for whom he had a very great regard.

"'Tis impossible, sir," said Caterina, with a sigh; "he whom I once knew by that name, died long since. This is a beautiful flower; do you have such in Geneva?—like the calista, it blooms during the day, but when night comes, it closes and becomes a bud again."

Andrea desired no stronger proof of her continued love for him, than the manner in which she spoke that short sentence; and, asking the privilege of renewing his visit, he took respectful leave and returned to his hotel. He then sent for his brother, who was overjoyed to see him, and when all that had happened had been explained, they went to the proper authorities, who being convinced that Andrea was the man they had supposed murdered, immediately ordered Caracciola to be released. He was accordingly set at liberty and departed forthwith from Naples.

On the morrow Andrea returned to the house of Signor Ambrose, and was again conducted to the gardens by the fair Caterina, who knew not what had transpired relative to Caracciola. The breathing odour of flowers in the delicious climate of Naples produces upon the senses an effect similar to the softest strains of music; and all of external nature there seems to dispose the soul to a poetical and spiritual state of existence. Andrea observing a guitar laying in an arbour, took it up, saying, "Fair lady, if it please you, I will sing a song I learned in Palermo from the friend of whom I spoke to you yesterday." Caterina expressed a desire to hear it, and Andrea sang what he had sung to her an hundred times before, a canzone beginning with,

The moon is up, upon the ware
A living glory lies!
And bright the stars in beauty shine
Along the cloudless skies.
Wake, wake, my dear, wake,
And shun them with thine eyes.

The song and the voice completely bewildered Caterina, and Andrea, disclosing himself to her, unravelled the tangled thread of our story. Thus, in one and the same day, he had the happiness of winning her whom he best loved, and of forgiving and releasing an enemy.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

A FRAGMENT.

Good friend, the world hath many sorts of men,
As many sorts of trees, and herbs, and flowers,
Which from the gifts that common are to all
Do each draw up their several differences;
And in the garden close beside the rose
Springs acacia, and in the wild wood too
The hemlock and the violet; some with love,
And some with juice medicinal, and some
With laughter, creeping poison, or quick death,
Where life flies gasping out as from a blow,
Speak to the heart of man, and yet they spring
From the same earth, ay, even in the same day:
Sunshine and winter, moonlight and the dew,
Are natural to all.

FABLES.

THE PHYLURMANS.—There was not a town in all Thrace where Jupiter was worshipped with so much devotion as in the little city of Phylurma. Every day a fat steer smoked on his altars; every day he was honoured with hymns and incense. Only once, the morning after a general feast, the tired inhabitants forgot their devotions. Then Jupiter waxed wroth; he thundered fearfully all day and all night long, so that the Phylurmans thought the last day was at hand, knelt and prayed for forgiveness, and vowed by all that was good they would never forget him again.

"How unjust you are," cried Momus, "if the people of Thrace neglect you for months together, you say nothing, and keep giving them sunshine and rain as usual, while these men, who never were false to you, must pay so heavily for the carelessness of a single morning."

"Because the example of others has learned me experience," answered Jove. "There was a time when the whole of Thrace did homage to me as faithfully as this little town does, and it would not now neglect me for months together, if I had been too indulgent at first, and said nothing to their first offences."

MINOS AND THE SHADES.—Minos grew old, as old men are apt to do, weaker in the upper-story than he was formerly. His sight especially, once so keen, grew dim, and he found it difficult to distinguish the expression of the ghosts who were brought to judgment, and what had been the pursuits of each on earth. So he hit upon an idea, which, for an old man, was not a bad one. He placed in front of the judgment-seat a quantity of tools and implements of all kinds, such as men use—books and weapons, ploughs and clothing, and so forth. "Choose here," was his command to every new-comer, and every one chose what he had been most familiar with in life. This did very well for a long time, and Minos was very proud of his discovery, when a shade of haughty aspect, with his face still clothed with blood, appeared, and chose a scourge. Then was Minos perplexed and angry, and cried, "By Styx! I must examine this fellow further; how else can I tell whether he has been a jailor or a despotic sovereign? Jupiter ought to be ashamed of himself—he, whose invention is so fertile, to suffer two so similar creatures to exist in one and the same world."

THE TRAVELLER AND THE FOUNTAIN.—A traveller came once, in the heat of the day, to an ice-cold fountain. He had walked fast, the sweat stood upon his forehead, and his tongue was parched with thirst. As soon as he saw the clear stream, he stooped and drank eagerly; but the sudden chill was too much for him, and he sank on the ground, sick almost to fainting. "Oh, vile poison!" cried he, "who would have suspected so much ill under such a fair outside?" "How unjust you are," was the answer. "My waters refresh the fields around me, they quench the thirst of the beasts of the field, and yield strength and support to thousands of the feeble mortals. It is their own rashness that has done thee harm, while moderation would have prolonged, instead of shortening, thy days."

There are some fools, who complain of love as an evil, instead of their own folly.

THE TWO TRAVELLERS.—A fierce thunderstorm overtook two travellers. One house was in sight, only a huge oak, that stood not far from the road, offered a shelter, of which one of the wayfarers availed himself. The other preferred proceeding, and trudged patiently on, through wind and rain, till he reached a village, where he dried his wet garments, and rested after his journey. He waited long for his companion, but in vain, so, as soon as the weather cleared up, he hurried back to the oak, and he found it had been shattered by lightning, and his friend was lying dead under the ruins.

"Unhappy man!" said he, "let this fate be a warning to me for ever after." The coward who, when storms threaten, flies to seek the protection of the mighty, may escape sometimes, but more usually he is struck down along with his protector.

OSIRIS AND THE VINE.—The Egyptians tell us, that Osiris first discovered the ivy and the grape. He taught their kings to cultivate the latter, but loved to weave garlands of the former. This displeased the vine. "What merit has this useless shrub," it asked, "that thou shouldst give it the preference? When did it ever make thee a present, that was half as precious as my fruit?" "Never," but it possesses one quality, which thou dost not, and which is essential to friendship." "What?" "Its uniformity. Its leaves never fade; thine are missing for half the year. He on whom we can always be sure of finding the same, is more to be depended on than he who performs a great service for us at one time, and does nothing at another."

THE FOX AND THE LEOPARD.—A fox sat, deep in thought, at the entrance to his den: "What are you thinking about now?" asked his helpmate.

"I will tell you. The leopard went by just now, and spoke to me so polite—spoke first, too. What the plague does it all mean?"

"Why, you silly creature, what should it mean?"

"You can't know much about leopards, wife, if you fancy they are so polite for nothing!"

Let the poor man think of this, when a man of high standing greets him first, and bows low to him.

LAND, HO!

BY GEORGE P. MORRIS

I.
Fill high the brimmer!—the land is in sight,
We'll be happy, if never again, boys, to-night;
The cold cheerless ocean in safety we've past;
And the warm genial earth glads our vision at last:
In the land of the stranger true hearts we shall find,
To soothe us in absence of those left behind.
Then fill high the brimmer! the land is in sight,
We'll be happy, if never again, boys, to-night!

II.
Fill high the brimmer!—till morn we'll remain,
Then part in the hope to meet one day again,
Round the heartiness of home, in the land of our birth,
The holiest spot on the face of the earth!
Dear country! our thoughts are more constant to thee
Than the steel to the star or the stream to the sea.
Then fill up the brimmer! the land is in sight,
We'll be happy, if never again, boys, to-night!

III.
Fill high the brimmer!—the wine-sparkles rise,
Like tears, from the fountain of joy, to the eyes;
May rain-drops that fall from the storm-clouds of care,
Melt away in the sun-beaming smiles of the fair!
Drink deep to the chime of the nautical bells,
To woman, God bless her, wherever she dwells!
Then fill high the brimmer! the land is in sight,
We'll be happy, if never again, boys, to-night!

National Gallery.—Origin—Benefits to be derived therefrom.—Pictures—
Flemish Women.

AFTER surveying the efforts of the moderns, as exhibited in the Royal Academy, you cross to the "National Gallery," and are at once surrounded by the productions of the mighty dead. The contrast is very striking. You feel yourself in the presence of the past. In the modern rooms all is bustle, gaiety, chatter, trivial remark, and flippant off-hand criticism. The artist's convulsions and friends are busied in pointing out the beauties of his works, and his foes, or brothers of the brush, in dwelling upon their defects. Every one seems to think he has a right to give an opinion, and self-complacent nods of approbation and supercilious sneers are in great abundance. Not so in the National Gallery. The genius of the place rebukes the affectation of would-be critics, and genuine education is generally silent. Most of the pictures here have passed the ordeal of centuries—those you have left are merely putting in their claims for immortality. A becoming reverence is therefore natural and seemly; though a blind and bigoted denunciation of all modern works of art, in comparison with those of the "great masters," is both foolish and reprehensible. What man has done, man may do again.

The nucleus of this fine collection was formed by the purchase of the pictures of the late Mr. Angerstein, a gentleman distinguished in his time as a most judicious and liberal collector. Immensely rich, he was enabled to avail himself of the troubles prevailing in various parts of Europe, to acquire a most important and select assemblage of pictures by the great masters, principally of the Italian schools. After his death they were for sale, and the opportunity thus offered to the government of laying the foundation of a National Collection of Pictures, was so apparent to the earl of Liverpool, then prime minister, that with the advice of the most competent judges of the day of works of art, he brought the matter under the consideration of Parliament, and by unanimous consent secured those treasures to the nation. The collection has since been increased by various government purchases, and by the munificent bequests and donations of sundry private individuals. It is opened four days in the week to the public, (without any fee or gratuity whatever) and the remaining two days are set apart for the visits and improvement of artists and students.

The advantages of such an institution cannot easily be over-rated. As a place of study and severe discipline for rising artists, it is inestimable. But there are other and perhaps higher points of view in which it is to be regarded as a national benefit. It is not merely an agreeable lounge for the affluent connoisseur, but here resort more especially on holidays the industrious tradesman and the humble mechanic. Who can say, among the crowds that come hither, what numbers there may be with aspirations far beyond what might have been expected from the station in life which they at present occupy, and who have been denied by circumstances the means of cultivating and improving the better nature within them? Who can say what impulses may be given—what ray kindled in this place for the benefit and admiration of posterity? Nothing so much tends to humanize and elevate the mind, as the contemplation of what mind has effected; and by the forms of immortal beauty almost moving and breathing around, it is quite possible some poor youth may feel incited to spring from his present condition, and "leave behind him name and memory." Such things have been—such may be.

But, in an humbler and more practical point of view, what excellent aids are museums, parks, and picture galleries, which can be enjoyed without expense, to temperance societies. How many may be kept away by them from the gin-palace and the tavern. What purifying, instead of debasing influences, may be exercised through their medium on thousands. These moral statistics are worth attention.

The National Gallery contains selections from the works of all names of note—Titian, Correggio, Michael Angelo, Guido, Leonardo da Vinci, Sebastiano del Piombo, the Caracci—Annibale and Ludovico, Raphael, Poussin, Parmegiano, etc. etc. etc. Here, too, are some of the best works of the Flemish masters. Pictures by Teniers, Rubens, Rembrandt, Vandyke, Vanderelde, etc., together with those by comparatively modern pencils—Sir Joshua Reynolds, Wilson, Gainsborough, Beechey, Benjamin West, Beaumont, Lawrence, and Wilkie. Here is the celebrated series forming the "Marriage A-la-mode" of that truly English artist, Hogarth. Nor should there be forgotten the portraits of Velasquez and the inimitable life-like creations of Murillo. The wild scenery of Salvator Rosa stands in fine contrast with the mellow landscapes of Claude, steeped in golden sunset and deep tranquillity. If a man be in a fretful or uneasy state of mind, let him look for ten minutes at one of those landscapes of Claude. He will go away in peace. A spirit of repose, not to be resisted, breathes from the canvases.

Far be it from me to attempt to criticize even the works of the immortal dead. I leave that to those who are more able to do so, or less sensible of their own deficiencies. The value of off-hand criticisms on a collection of works which it would require the study of years thoroughly to understand and appreciate, may easily be estimated; and besides, a lengthened notice of the various pictures would neither be useful nor desirable at such a distance. I may be allowed to mention a few facts, or interesting circumstances connected with some of them.

"Mercury instructing Venus in the presence of Cupid," and the "Ecce Homo," both of Correggio, after being in the possession of Charles the First, the duke of Mantua, the duke of Alva, and the Colonna family, finally fell into the possession of Murat. After his death they were purchased by Lord Londonderry, and by him sold to the government for eleven thousand guineas, or nearly fifty thousand dollars! The "Ecce Homo" is looked upon as one of the finest triumphs of art.

There is one, "The Vision of St. Jerome," by Parmegiano, purchased for three thousand and fifty guineas, with which an interesting anecdote is connected. It is recorded that in 1527, when Parmegiano was painting this picture, Rome was sacked by the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and when the soldiers entered his apartment, they were so struck with the extreme beauty of the work, as well as by the composed conduct of the artist, that they reverently retired without offering him the slightest injury. It was a fine acknowledgment and triumph of intellectual power.

There is another one, "The Vision of St. Augustin," by Garafalo, to which the following legend, intended, we suppose, as a rebuke for human self-sufficiency, is attached.—St. Augustin, being seated on the margin of the deep writing his treatise of "the Trinity," observed a child taking water with a ladle from the sea, which he emptied into a small hole in the sand. Being questioned by St. Augustin as to his motive for that singular action, the boy said he was emptying the sea into that hole. "Impossible!" said the saint. "If you find this impossible," rejoined the child, "how much more so is it for you to elucidate that which God chooses to keep a mystery." The child disappeared in a glory, and the saint recognised in him the young Saviour.

There is one thing, however, on which we would venture a few words. With all our reverence for such names as Rubens and Rembrandt, we must be allowed to protest against their delineations of the female form. Temera may be overlooked, for he delights in painting low and frequently repulsive subjects, and we do not expect to find Venuses or Junos in Dutch taverns; but Rembrandt's "Woman Bathing," is certainly about as ordinary and unadventurous a looking piece of humanity as ever water washed; while Rubens's picture of "The Abduction of the Sabine Women" by the Roman soldiers, at the games instituted by Romulus, is a vehicle for a series of unpardonable slanders on the fair sex. Such waists! such busts! such pedestals! The "virgin" in the foreground of the picture, is about the size of two fat cooks, and the poor soldier who is attempting to carry her off, is certainly much to be commiserated. If the Roman soldiers had muscle sufficient to carry off such ladies as these against their will, it is not to be wondered at their arms subduing the world. It is, in sober fact, a bevy of burgomasters wives translated into Sabine virgins.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE DEAD GUEST.

BY HEINRICH ZSCHOKKE.

CHAPTER I.

IN the town, or rather village of Herbesheim, flourished the Burgomaster Bantes, a rich, jovial, self-willed old fellow, whose greatest wealth, however, was his only daughter, Frederica, the belle of the country for ten miles round, and as amiable as pretty. Now it so happened that the burgomaster had a ward, George Waldrich, who ran away from him to enlist as a soldier against Napoleon, and came back after the battle of Waterloo, a fine manly-looking fellow, with a captain's commission, a riband of a military order, and luckily, no wounds to offset against them. It so happened, too, that his company was ordered to his old residence, Herbesheim, and he, as commanding officer, was naturally quartered in the best house in the place, which of course was his old guardian the burgomaster's. It is useless to add, that he was received with gladness by his old friends, with deeper feeling by his old playmate, Frederica, which, however, betrayed itself neither in her looks or language. His old friends sought to renew their acquaintance with him, and he was received into the best families in the neighbourhood. Wherever Waldrich went he was the life of the company. Brave, modest, eloquent, a capital story-teller, a good draftsman, dancer and musician. It was admitted by all the ladies of Herbesheim, both young and middle-aged, that he was a handsome, agreeable, and very dangerous young man. As to the danger, none of the fair ones could ever ascertain to her own satisfaction, whether it was increased or diminished by his retiring modesty.

Just at this time, however, neither far nor ugly were much occupied either in conquering others, or submitting to be conquered themselves; on the contrary, each one guarded her heart with peculiar anxiety. The cause of this self-denial will not be easily divined by those who have never been at Herbesheim, nor read its manuscript records, nor be readily believed by those who learn it now for the first time, but it is unquestionably true, and the more so, the more improbable it is. The current year, then, was the centennial festival, or rather epoch of the so-called dead guest, a most dangerous visiter, as it appears, to the brides of Herbesheim most especially. No one knew exactly what this guest was. But the story ran that he was a spirit, who made his appearance in the town once a century—stayed there from the first to the last Sunday in Advent; injured nobody else, but paid court to every bride in the place, and ended by twisting her head round. The next morning she was always found lying dead in bed, with her face turned round to her back. A circumstance, however, which distinguishes this spirit from all others in the world, is, that he does not make his appearance at eleven or twelve at night, the regular hour for supernatural visiters to appear, but in broad daylight, and fashionably dressed, like the children of this earth. He always has plenty of money, and the worst is, that when he cannot find any bride, he turns wooer himself, and bewitches the poor girls' hearts, only that, having first turned their heads with his fine speeches, he may afterwards turn them clear round on their shoulders. No one could tell the origin of this fable. In the church registers were to be found the names of three young women who died suddenly in Advent in the year 1720, to which were added, "With their faces turned round backwards," as formerly, "God have mercy on their souls!" Now, though this commentary of the church register was no proof of the fact to a reasonable man, it showed, at least, that the story must be more than a hundred years old. Unluckily, the early registers were burned during the war of the Spanish succession. Be this as it may, every one was acquainted with the story—every one insisted that it was a silly old woman's tale, and yet every one looked forward with curious anxiety to the approaching Advent, to see what would be the result of the thing. The wisest heads agreed that "there might be something in it." The old clergyman, who received more visits than usual at this time, spoke mysteriously. He either said, "I should be much surprised if—but still I don't believe it!"—or, "God forbid that I should ever have to make such an entry in the church books!" The young gentlemen were the greatest skeptics, and made themselves merry over the thing on every occasion. The young girls pretended to be strong in their incredulity, but it was only pretence. Each one thought to herself—"It will do very well for you young men to laugh, it does not concern your heads, but ours, and that is most horrible!" One consequence of this belief was, that every wedding was hurried on so as to be over before Advent, or if this was impossible, the engagement was broken off at once, even if hearts were broken along with it. Whether the pretty Frederica shared in the fear of her sisters we cannot state, but it is certain that her partiality for Waldrich was long concealed, and might have never been seen the light, had not her father threatened her with another and less agreeable bridegroom in the person of Herr Von Hahn, a rich young banker. Herr Von Hahn's delectate health prevented his waiting on his intended bride in person during the cold and stormy weather, and the burgomaster shook the barometer every day to make it rise, while Frederica as regularly shook it to make it fall, and keep back the unwelcome visit.

Her mother, who as all good mothers do, took her daughter's part warmly but quietly, urged on her stiff-necked husband at least to put off the wedding till Christmas, for fear the dead guest should re-appear on his anniversary, and his daughter suffer the penalty of his visitation. The old man prided himself on his freedom from pride, and laughed in scorn at the fable; but somehow or other, the idea of his darling Frederica, with her pretty head twisted round on her shoulders, haunted his imagination incessantly, and he felt a foreboding he would have been ashamed to have acknowledged. Such was the position of matters in the burgomaster's family.

CHAPTER II.

The next evening the first of the usual winter assemblies took place in Herr Bantes' house. It was a rule for the best families of the place to entertain each other once a week in a plain and social manner, and enliven the long evenings with music, conversation, and innocent games. On this occasion, however, no one at Herr Bantes' seemed to think of either music or singing, games or mirth. It was the first meeting of the season. There was a great deal to be talked about, and as the first Sunday in Advent was only three days off, it may be imagined that the dead guest was the great topic of conversation. The young ladies turned up their pretty noses, and pretended to be very skeptical. Some were glad they had no lover, who probably would not have rejected one after the fatal day was over; and many a one felt her poor heart contract painfully, when she thought of one to whom that poor heart belonged. The more elderly ladies, after mature deliberation, generally agreed that the story was perhaps not altogether without foundation. The young gentlemen were unbelievers, without exception. Some wished that the dead guest would come and try their courage. A couple of elderly gentlemen raised their fingers in warning to the young boasters. The young ladies joined them, and manifold were the quizzes, the play of wit and lively laughter.

"What," said Herr Bantes, with comic indignation, "what behaviour is this! Wherever I go nothing but dead guests, right and left. Is that the right entertainment for my merry guests! Away with it, I say! Let us have some more lively pastime. No whispering in corners, no ghost stories!"

"So I think," said the district revenue collector, "the commonest game of forfeits rather! If Herbesheim had as little to fear from living visitors as from the centennial appearance of the dead one, we might be sure that the heads of our young beauties would never be turned."

"I should like to know how the silly story first got abroad," said a young counsellor. "It is as dry as a skeleton, not a single circumstance of it is known, out of which, at any rate, a romance or ballad might be fashioned, so as to make it useful in some way."

"On the contrary," answered Waldrich, "this story, as it was formerly known, and as I once heard it in my childhood from an old forester, is too long and too tedious for modern times, therefore it has been forgotten, and rightly so."

"How, do you remember the story?" asked many.

"I recollect it but imperfectly," replied he. "Oh, you must tell it to us!" cried the ladies, and crowded round him; "we beg, we beg; you must tell it."

No resistance, no excuses availed. The gentlemen joined their entreaties to the ladies. The chairs were drawn close together.

Waldrich was forced, willingly or no, to repeat the story. To render it entertaining, he embellished it as well as he could on the spur of the moment.

Two hundred years, (said he,) are now elapsed since the thirty years' war broke out, and Frederick, the elector palatine, placed on his head the crown of Bohemia. But the emperor and the elector of Bavaria, at the head of the catholics, rose up to deprive him of it. The great and decisive battle was fought on the White Mountain, near Prague. The elector lost it, and with it his crown. The news flew through Germany with the speed of the wind. All the catholic cities rejoiced at the overthrow of the unhappy Frederick, who occupied his throne but a few months, and was therefore called in derision the winter-king. It was known that he had escaped from Prague, in disguise, with a few followers.

This was known to our good ancestors in Herbesheim two hundred years ago. They loved to chat about political news then, as well as we, their worthy descendants, do now, but they were then, if not more religious, more earnest for religion. Their joy at the flight of the winter-king was therefore just as great, nay, even more boisterous than ours a few years ago at the overthrow of the Emperor Napoleon.

Once three lovely maidens sat together, talking about the winter-king. They were all three good friends, and all three had a betrothed lover; that is, each had one of her own, otherwise they would not have been friends. The one was called Veronica, the other Francisca, the third Jacoba.

"The king of the heretics should not be let escape from Germany," said Veronica; "as long as he lives will the monster of Lutherdom live, and never cease vomiting out destruction!"

"Yes," said Francisca, "he who kills him may expect a great reward from the emperor, from the elector of Bavaria, from the pope, and the whole holy church. yea, he may count surely upon heaven."

"I wish he would come into our town," added Jacoba, "oh, I wish he would! He must die by the hand of my lover, and he would receive a countship, at least, for his reward!"

"It is rather doubtful," replied, "Veronica, whether thy lover can raise thee to the rank of countess, for he has scarce courage enough for such a deed of daring. Mine, if I only winked to him, would draw his sword and strike the winter-king to the earth; and then the countship would be snatched away before your very eyes."

"Do not boast so much, you two," said Francisca, "my lover is the stoutest of them all. Has he not already served as a captain! And if I should bid him cut down the grand Turk on his throne, he would do it. Don't flatter yourselves too much about the countship."

While the three girls were thus quarrelling about a title, the quick tramp of galloping horses was heard outside. All three went to the window in a moment. The weather out of doors was terrible: the rain poured down on the street in streams from every roof and gutter. The storm-wind whistled, and drove the sheets of rain against house and window.

"God be good to us!" cried Jacoba. "Surely he who is on the road in such weather does not travel for pleasure."

"Hard need must drive him," said Veronica.

"Or a bad conscience," added Francisca.

Thirteen horsemen halted opposite them, at the sign of the Dragon, and dismounted hastily. Twelve stayed with the horses; the thirteenth, who was dressed in white garments, entered the house. The landlord and his servants came and led the horses to the stable, while their riders followed the first within doors. In spite of the rain, people came together in the street, to see the strange travellers and horses. The handiwork stood belonged to the gentleman in white; it was white as snow, with splendid trappings.

"Suppose this was the winter-king!" the three maidens exclaimed, as they turned away from the window, and gazed earnestly and fixedly on each other. A noise was heard on the stairs, and their three lovers entered. "Do you know," said one of them, "that the fugitive winter-king is within our walls!"

"There is a prize to be had," said another.

"You can read terror on the face of the long, pale man in white," cried the third.

The maidens trembled with joy. They eyed each other keenly, and it seemed as though their looks spoke and understood each other. At last they gave each other their hand, and said, "So be it, so be it! all together, and no division!" when each turned towards her lover.

Veronica said to hers, "If my lover suffers the winter-king to depart from our walls alive, I would sooner be his mistress than my lover's lawful wife. So may God and his saints be good to me."

Francisca said to hers, "If my lover suffers the winter-king to outlive this night, I will embrace death rather than him, and my lover shall wait in vain for the marriage-day. So may God and his saints be good to me!"

Jacobea said to hers, "The key to my bridal-chamber is lost, now and for ever, unless my lover brings me, to-morrow, his sword red with the blood of the winter-king!"

The three lovers were shocked; but soon decided, when they saw their mistresses standing before them, lovelier than ever, waiting for their answer. So they promised that the winter-king should not see the light of another day. They took leave of their brides, who now chatted joyously together, about the eternal glory of their lovers, their courage and tenderness, and finally, of the countship to be divided between them. The three young men went over to the Dragon, and made inquiries about the stranger, where he slept, and if he had a fine room. There they sat drinking till late at night.

At break of day, twelve of the travellers rode hastily away, through the storm. The thirteenth lay dead in bed, swimming in blood. He had three deadly wounds. No one knew who he was; but their host assured them that he was not the king. And he was right, for the king of Bohemia, it is well known, escaped safe to Holland, and lived many years.

The dead guest was buried the same day, not in consecrated earth, among the bones of catholic christians, but in the public slaughter-ground, as one suspected of heresy, without sound of bell or sacred music. Meantime the three brides waited anxiously for the return of their lovers, to claim their sweet reward. But they came not. They sent into all the streets and houses, but no one had seen them since midnight. Even the landlord and his servants could not say where they went. Then the poor maidens sorrowed bitterly, and wept day and night, and repented of the wicked commands they had given to all, for she had been the first to propose the attempt on the life of the winter-king. Two days, and almost a third, had elapsed since that unhappy night; neither the maidens nor their anxious parents knew anything, as yet, of the fate of the youths.

Suddenly some one knocked at Jacobea's door, and a noble stranger entered, and asked for the maiden, who sat weeping by the side of her father and mother. The stranger handed her a letter, which he said he had received from a young man, and promised to deliver. Oh, how joyful was Jacobea! The letter was from her lover. It was nearly dark, so her mother brought in lights to read the letter, and have a better view of the stranger. He was a man of about thirty, tall and thin in person, clad wholly in the fashion of the day, but in black, with a broad hat, embroidered by black feathers, a black doublet, with a large ruff falling over the shoulders, black hose and wide boots; by his side a sword, the hilt of which was adorned with gold and pearls and sparkling jewels. The rings on his fingers glittered with precious stones. His features were regular and noble, but yet, in spite of the fire of his glances, his face was pale and earthy-coloured, and his black dress made him look still paler. The father read the letter, which ran as follows:—"We have slain the wrong man; therefore, love, farewell, for I have lost the key to thy bridal-chamber. I am going to the wars in Bohemia, and will seek me a new bride, who will not look for a bloody sword from her lover. Console thyself, as I do. I give thee back thy ring." When Jacobea heard this, she fainted, and then wept and cursed the faithless one. Her parents soothed her as well as they could, and the stranger said many polite things. "If I had known that the rogue was making me the bearer of such a message, as true as I am the count of Graves, I would have read him a lesson of good breeding with my good sword. Dry your bright eyes, fair lady: a single one of the pearls that run down your rosy cheeks should be enough to extinguish all the flames of your affection." Jacobea, however, could not give over weeping; so the count took his leave, first asking permission to renew his visit the next day. When the morning came he was as good as his word; and as soon as he was alone with Jacobea, told her, "I could not sleep all night, for thinking of your beauty and your tears. You owe me at least a smile, to bring back the colour to my cheeks, that are pale with watching."

"How can I smile?" answered she; "has he not returned my ring!"

The count took the ring and flung it out of the window. "Away with it," said he; "how gladly would I replace it with a better one!" and he laid the most splendid one of all he wore on the table before her. "Yea, with all these rings, and to each there hangs a rich lordship!"

Jacobea blushed, and pushed the costly ring aside. "Do not be so cruel," exclaimed the count; "he who sees you once can never forget you. If your lover has despised you, despise him; that is a sweet revenge. I lay my heart and my title at your feet."

It is true, Jacobea would listen to nothing of the kind, but she confessed, to herself, that the count was right as to revenge, and the faithless one must be forgotten. The count spoke in a very modest and winning way, only he was not so handsome as the lost lover, and his face altogether too pale and earthy-coloured. So, as there is a time for all things, Jacobea ceased to weep, and even began to smile sometimes.

The arrival of a rich stranger in Herbesheim was soon noised through the whole town, for he had servants in rich liveries, and spent a great deal of money. It was also soon known that he had brought a letter to Jacobea, from her lost lover. As soon as Veronica and Francisca heard this, they hurried to their friends, to ascertain whether the count knew any thing of their betrothed. The count promised to wait on them in person. Jacobea now began to treat him with more tenderness, for she had been thinking of money-matters alone at night, and looking often at the costly ring, and she thought, "Here I have nothing to do but to stretch out my hand and take the lordship, without needing to divide it with Veronica and Francisca. So that the deed of my false lover has, after all, helped me to a title." She showed her parents the costly present she had received, and they agreed that a son-in-law of such rank and wealth was all they could desire. He came oftener and stayed later, and never departed without leaving rich presents behind him. Jacobea rejoiced in her heart at the thought of exciting the admiration and envy of the whole town, as the countess of Graves, and grew more yielding as her new lover grew more pressing. The rogue, however, when he first saw Veronica, found her still fairer than the fair Jacobea; and when he came to know the flaxen-haired Francisca, the other two seemed almost ugly. To each of the maidens he told substantially the same story. He said he had seen their lovers drinking deep in a tavern, in company with light damsels, that they talked slightly of their former mistresses, and scorned to take the trouble of even bidding them farewell by letter, but merely sent back their plighted rings, in token of final separation. While he was with Veronica, the count insisted that her ring fitted him exactly; when he saw Francisca he was sure the ring must have been made for his finger only. He played his part as well as he had done with Jacobea: he made each one presents, offered each his hand and title, and each soon grew accustomed to his ashy paleness. The three friends kept their interviews with the count a profound secret, for each feared that the other would throw out her net to catch the game. They ceased to visit each other, and got vexed when they learned that the count kept up the acquaintance of all. This jealousy he made good use of. He protested to each one, separately, by everything that was holy, that he thought the others ugly and silly, but was obliged, from politeness, to visit them occasionally. When he was required to break off the acquaintance, as a test of his truth, he seemed perplexed, but finally agreed, on condition that a formal betrothal and exchange of rings should take place at once, in presence of the parents, and that a quiet hour at night should be granted him, when he might chat with his love, undisturbed, about their marriage and wedding-journey, and the new arrangements to be made in his palace. This, too, each agreed to, and sealed their promise with a kiss. As he kissed them, each asked, "Dear count, what makes you so very pale? Lay aside your dark garments; they make you look still more deadly." To which he was uniformly answered, "I wear black to fulfil a vow. On our wedding-day I will appear in white and red, like thy cheek, my best beloved!" So the count was betrothed to each of them, and on the very same day. Then he slipped through the window into their chambers. The next day, as the girls seemed to sleep entirely too long, their parents went to wake them. They found each of them lying dead and cold, in bed, with their throats twisted round, and their faces towards the back.

Weeping and wailing arose from the three houses. The people assembled, horror-struck. Murder! was cried; and, as suspicion fell at once on the count of Graves, a crowd gathered round the door of the Dragon, and the city guards and archers rushed in. The landlord met them, and complained that his guest had disappeared, with all his retinue, and no one had seen them depart. All their baggage, which was very bulky, was gone, yet no one had removed it; their many fine horses had disappeared from the well-fastened stable, yet no person in town, not a watchman on the walls, had heard anything of them. The crowd was struck with terror, and every one crossed himself as he passed by the residences of the three unhappy brides. Within doors were loud grief and woe, and it was found most strange, that all the rich presents, the splendid wedding-dresses which the count had already provided, the strings of pearls, jewelled-rings, and diamond crosses, had wholly disappeared.

It was but a small company that followed the biers to the place of burial, and all were wrapped in dark mantels. When the coffin had been set down in the burial-ground of St. Sefild's Church, and the prayers of the church were about to be said, a tall man, who had not been noticed before, was seen to leave the group of mourners. As they eyed him, every one was surprised to see, that though he had been dressed altogether in black, his garments gradually turned white, and three red spots appeared on his white doublet, and the blood dropped visibly along the seams, and the pale, tall man moved towards the slaughter-ground.

"Holy mother!" cried the landlord of the Dragon, "that is the dead guest, whom we buried there, three weeks ago!"

Horror seized on all present, and all fled in terror. A fierce storm of snow and rain blew after them in violent gusts. For three days and three nights the coffins stood unburied by the side of the open graves. Finally, the authorities ordered their removal.

and the parents offered a large sum of money to induce some bold fellows to perform this last duty. They were greatly astonished when they lifted up the coffins, for they felt as light as though they were empty, and yet they were nailed tight. One of them took heart, and brought a chisel and hammer, while another went for the priest and clerk. When the coffins were opened they were found to be wholly empty, not even a pillow or shroud in them. So they were buried empty.

Here Waldrich paused. The room was still as death. The candles burned low, and threw a fitful, doubtful light on the circle of listeners. The men sat or stood, still and serious, the young ladies had crowded close to each other, and the old ones listened, even after he had ceased speaking, with folded hands and lengthened visages.

"First of all, snuff the candles," cried Herr Bantes, "and talk again, so that I can hear living, human voices, or I shall run away. The accused story makes one shudder."

That was the general opinion. The candles were trimmed, and refreshments were handed round. Every one made it a point to talk and laugh loud, and amuse himself with the terror that each had noticed in the others; yet no one would acknowledge. The story was pronounced to be the wildest fable that ever was conceived in an old nurse's brain; and the opinion was expressed, that if Miss Radcliff or Lord Byron were acquainted with it, the world would be enriched with another master-piece of the horrible. As soon, however, as Captain Waldrich had rested from talking, and the company from listening, he was asked for an account of the second apparition of the dead guest. The rest got round him, in a half circle, without waiting to ask whether he was willing to go on or not. Every eye rested on him with fearful curiosity, as he resumed his seat, and profound silence prevailed, when he commenced as follows.—[Conclusion in our next.]

GOETHE'S FAUSTUS.

THIRD NOTICE.

We left Faustus in his narrow, arched Gothic chamber, just relieved of the company of the intruding student. He reverts naturally to the circumstances under which he was interrupted; the late presence of the spirit which he had summoned, and his own insignificance when measured with his supernatural visitor. Relapsing into his original train of reflection, he inveighs bitterly against the meanness of man's nature, and the vain mockery of his pursuits; his baffled hopes, his disappointed ambition, his idle longings after knowledge, and his final conviction that nothing can be known. The illuminated pages of his library, with its old scrolls and rolls of parchment, seem to him but dust and lumber. Lathes, rings and cylinders, screws and levers, and all the instrumental keys of science, have aspired to open to him the bolted and guarded doors of nature. Youth's aspirations have been crushed within him. Riches in his eyes are a delusion—learning is a mockery, and on all things about him are inscribed as the only result of his experience—vanity and despair!

'Twere better did I dissipate,
Long since, my little means, than be
Crushed down and cumbered with its weight:
All that thy fathers leave to thee,
At once enjoy it—thus alone
Can man make anything his own;
A hindrance all that we employ not—
A burden all that we enjoy not.
He knows who rightly estimates,
That what the moment can employ,
What it requires and can enjoy,
The moment for itself creates.

While pouring forth his spirit in this strain, his eye rests eagerly upon a flask of poison; and in gazing upon it he burst forth in an invocation to the subtle and potent draught. He grasps the phial, and the fever of his brain subsides, the conflicting powers within him are charmed into peace, the swell of his soul ebbs and is at rest. He is already in imagination delivered from the bondage of earth. His shackles drop by his side, and his disembodied spirit is winging its triumphant way through boundless realms, bathed in the raptures of a new life and a new glory. But one firm farewell to the earth—and the dawn of a second existence will open upon him—or haply, for thus whisper him distrust and despair, he passes into nothingness. Taking from an old case an antique goblet—but this passage is so exquisitely picturesque, that we cannot omit to copy it. Mark the fine melody of the verse, with its beautiful variety, and confess that after some sort at least Mr. Anster is a poet:

And thou, clear crystal goblet, welcome thou!
Old friend and faithful, from thy antique case
Come forth with gay smile now,
As gently I displace
The time-stain'd velvet: years unnumbered,
Forgotten hast thou slumbered;
Once bright at many a festival,
When, in the old man's hall,
Old friends were gathered all,
And thou with mirth didst light grave features up,
On days of high festivity,
And family solemnity,
As each that passed on the happy cup;
Its mazy pride, the figures rich and old,
Of curious carving, and the merry task,
Of each (thus did our pleasant customs ask)
Who drank, the quaint old symbols to unfold,
In rhymes made at the moment; then the mask
Of serious seeming, as at one long draught
Each guest the full deep goblet duly quaffed;

The old cup, the old customs, the old rhymes,
All now are with me; all, that of old times
Can speak, are speaking to my heart; the nights
Of boyhood, and their manifold delights;
Oh! never more to gay friend sitting next
Shall my hand reach thee; never more from me
Shall merry rhyme illustrate the old text,
And into meaning read each mystery.
This is a draught that, if the brain still think,
Will set it thinking in another mood.
Old cup, now fill thee with the dark-brown flood;
It is my choice; I mixed it, and will drink;
My last draught this on earth I dedicate,
(And with it be my heart and spirit borne!)
A festal offering to the rising morn.

As he raises the goblet to his lips, bells are heard and voices in chorus. The magnificent Easter hymn bursts upon his ear; a hymn of hope and consolation and joy. Heavenly strains are these to the despairing spirit. They carry him back to his days of youth and innocence and trusting faith—and the thousand recollections of happy childhood rise up between him and his purpose. The goblet falls from his hand—"Tears come, and earth hath won her child again!"

The scene which follows contrasts vividly with that of the study. It is before the gates of the city, and persons of all descriptions are abroad in their holiday dresses, to enjoy the various festivities of the day; peasants, servants, citizens' daughters, old men and young maids, students, beggars and soldiers. Among them are Faustus and Wagner, his pupil. Of the latter personage it may not be amiss to mention that the traditional Faustus had a disciple of this name, who is described as a "mauvais garçon," and who figures, according to Heyward, in all the dramas and histories founded on the old fable. A book was published in Berlin in 1714, entitled "Christoph. Wagner's Magic Arts and Life of Dr. Faust"—purporting to be by the follower of the old magician. An early friend of Goethe, bearing the same name with the pupil of Faustus, had offended him by an instance of base plagiarism; stealing the tragic portion of this very poem, relating to Margaret, and developing it in a tragedy with the title of The Infantide.

In the scene before the gates, we find many allusions to the customs and superstitions of Germany; lightly touched, indeed, but furnishing pregnant texts for the commentators. We extract the song of the dancing peasants, as a specimen of the lighter vein of the poem:

The shepherd for the dance was dressed
In ribands, wreaths and Sunday vest;
All were dancing full of glee,
Underneath the lind tree there!

"Thy merry and merry—heigh-ho, heigh-ho,
Blithe goes the fiddle bow."

Soon he runs to join the rest;
Up to a pretty girl he prest;
With elbow raised and pointed toe,
Bent to her with his best bow—
Pressed her hand: with feigned surprise,
Up she raised her timid eyes!
"Thy strange that you should use me so,
So, so—heigh-ho."

"Thy rude of you to use me so."

All into the set advance,
Right they dance, and left they dance—
Gowns and ribands how they fling,
Flying with the flying ring;
They grew red, and faint, and warm,
And rested, sinking, arm in arm.

Slow, slow, heigh-ho,
Trod in elbow, foot and toe!

"And do not make so free," she said;
"I fear that you may never wed;
Men are cruel"—and he prest
The maiden to his beating breast.
Hark! again the sounds of glee
Swelling from the lind tree

"Thy merry, thy merry—heigh-ho, heigh-ho,
Blithe goes the fiddle bow!"

The peasants collect in a circle about Faustus, and pledge him in a draught of "brown cheer." From the homage thus rendered we learn that both Faustus, and his father, who was also versed in hidden lore and the mysteries of magic, were held in deep respect and veneration by the multitude. The revelations of Faustus, however, to his pupil, teach us that neither father nor son much deserved the thanks and gratitude that were thus lavished upon them. A plague had visited the people, and the old man had compounded, by the cunning of his black art, a potent medicine, in the union of "antagonistic irreconcilable." According to Faustus,

—they who took it died;
None asked, or thought of asking who recovered.
Thus have we with our diabolic mixture,
In these sweet valleys, 'mong these quiet hills,
Been guests more fatal than the pestilence.
I have myself to thousands given this poison;
They withered and are dead—and I must live,
I, who have been their death, must live to hear
This lavish praise on the rash murderers.

Wagner seems to be surprised that his master should take this so much to heart. He argues that man cannot practise more than he knows; and that the studies which have enlarged the field of science have prepared the way for new discoveries, which, but for these experiments, might have remained unrevealed. Faustus again wanders into the old vein, of the uselessness and hopelessness of all knowledge—but is recalled by the quiet beauty of the scene before him to a momentary kindness and sympathy with man and nature. The hour is that of sunset, and as he gazes on the pastoral landscape, lit up with the radiance of the departing day-god, his soul kindles and burns with an impulse irresistible, to be borne away on wings that would outstrip the flight of the lark or eagle,

—to drink the beams
Of the unfading light—before me day—
And night still left behind—and overhead
Wide heaven—and under me the spreading sea!

With this feeling Wagner cannot sympathize. He confesses to his hours of reverie, but finds more pleasure in books and parchments than in watching the changing aspects of nature. The birds he does not envy their wings. Faustus in his reply reveals the secret of his condition:

Thy heart, my friend, now knows but one desire;
Oh, never learn mother! in my breast,
Alas, two souls have taken their abode,
And each is struggling for the mastery!
One to the world, and the world's sensual pleasures,
Clings closely, with scarce separable organs;
The other struggles to redeem itself,
And rises from the entanglements of earth—
Still feels its true home is not here—still longs
And strives—and would with violence regain
The fields, its own by birthright—realms of light
And joy, where—man in vain would disbelieve
The instincts of his nature, that confirm
The loved tradition,—dwell our aires of old.
If—as 'tis said—spirits be in the air,
Moving, with lordly wings, 'twixt earth and heaven,
And if, oh if ye listen when we call,
Come from your golden "incense-breathing" clouds,
Bear me away to new and varied life!
Oh, were the magic mantle mine, which bore
The wearer at his will to distant lands,
How little would I prize the envied robes
Of princes, and the purple pomp of kings!

While Wagner rejoins, the attention of Faustus is attracted by a black dog, which is sporting about them, and to the eye of the philosopher coursing in serpent circles, marked by sparkles of fire. It is according to the tradition that Faustus was constantly attended by an evil spirit in the shape of a black dog; and Heyward says that this four-footed follower has a place in most of the old pictures. Of the sparkling line which followed upon his track, Goethe gives the following explanation in his work upon colours. "A dark object, the moment it withdraws itself, imposes on the eye the necessity of seeing the same form bright. Between jest and earnest, I shall quote a passage from Faustus which is applicable here. (Then follows the passage.) This had been written some time—from poetical intuition and in half consciousness—when, as it was growing twilight, a black poodle ran by my window in the street, and drew a clear, shining appearance after him—the undefined image of his passing form remaining in the eye. Such phenomena occasion the more surprise, as they present themselves the most vividly and beautifully, precisely when we suffer our eyes to wander unconsciously."

Faustus takes a fancy to the dog and whistles the creature home with him. We leave the philosopher closeted with the poodle.

THE STAGE.

HOME'S TRAGEDY OF DOUGLAS.

The tragedy of Douglas has been recently revived at the Bowery with signal success. The appointments of the piece were all admirably got up, and we doubt if it were ever represented with more general propriety and effect. Mrs. Shaw personated Young Norval to the life, and invested it with an interest of which we hardly thought the character susceptible. The blending of modesty and dignity, the virtue of blood overmastering the lowliness of the peasant, and infusing into him a spirit worthy of his natural nobility, were all caught and exhibited by this excellent actress with superior tact and sagacity. Her reading is unusually correct. Her emphasis is distinct and appropriate, and there is a variety of intonation in her delivery which always relieves and enlivens it. The old man was so well personated by Hamblin, as to leave us little room for criticism. He literally chained the attention of the audience, and made a somewhat subordinate character one of the chief attractions of the piece. His imitation of the feeble gab and voice of age was perfect, and in the interview with Lady Randolph, where she first discovers that Norval is her own long-lost offspring, he displayed an intimate knowledge of his art, and beautifully embodied the conception of the author. Of Mrs. Field's Lady Randolph, and Mr. Barry's Glenalvon, it is no small commendation to say that they fully sustained the excellent personation of the characters to which we have already alluded. It was gratifying to us to witness this attempt to present the legitimate drama, by the successful efforts of a stock company, without resort to what is too often regarded as the indispensable assistance of a star.

Douglas has maintained its place with honour on the stage for nearly a century. Napoleon sneered at the idea of a fame of five hundred years; but one-fifth of that period is a very decent poetical immortality. Most dramatists would be happy to compound their claims for a round century of reputation. Douglas promises to furnish for even a longer period. It is a classic and beautiful drama. Without any noise or bustle, with little or no aid from striking scenic effects, the fine bursts of feeling and the exquisite passages of poetry with which it abounds, with its variety of character, and its gradual development and accumulation of interest, continue to render it attractive upon the stage as in the closet. The language is throughout accurate and elegant, sometimes almost to coldness; but there are lines in it and expressions illuminated with the true fire and inspiration of genius.

SHE SAW HER FLOWERS WITHER.

AN ORIGINAL MELODY BY JONAS B. PHILLIPS—WRITTEN AND COMPOSED FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

She saw her flow-ers wi-ther, And be-held her hopes de-cay, And all their bright cre-a-tion,
Like sha-dows pass a-way; But she thought of him whose smile, Like the sum-mer sun, could cheer, And thought to weep up-on his breast, Love's home of peace was there.

SECOND VERSE.

But she saw no more that smile
Of joy upon his brow;
And the breast that oft had pillow'd her,
No home of peace was now!
For cold the heart that beat within
To its first love had grown,
And affection's smile that cheer'd her once
With hope's young dream had flown.

THIRD VERSE.

There is no lustre in her eye,
No bloom upon her cheek;
She speaks not—weeps not—yet her sighs
The soul's despair bespeak:
She's fading like a summer plant
For ever from this earth,
To dwell where sorrow ne'er exists,
Where angels have their birth.

MISCELLANY.

THE MORNING DREAM.

On! thou morning vision,
Why so soon depart?
Bring thy joy Elysian
Once more to my heart!
Ah! let me behold them!
Those glad eyes once more!
Ah! let me enfold them—
Dear ones! I deplore!
Bring that best and fairest,
Her, Love could not save!
Why should flowers the rarest
Earliest find a grave?
Let me gaze upon her,
Beautiful as when
First in youth I won her—
Let me gaze again!

Twine an orange blossom
In her raven curls,
And upon her bosom
Lay a cross of pearls.
Let her dark hair glisten,
Let her dark eyes shine,
While entranced I listen
To her song divine!
Ah! a moment longer,
Vision bright, beguile!
Sleep! in fetters stronger
Bind me yet awhile.
Vain! entreaty scorned,
Vision! thou hast flown!
And the cold, gray morning,
Sees me weep, alone!

MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

Translated from the French.

THE MUSICAL IMPROVISATORE.—It is the fashion, the rage, a settled thing; to perform on the piano or any other instrument, is nothing now-a-days. Who is not a virtuoso now-a-days? We have them of all ages, from five to seventy. Mozart's father would make us laugh now, if he were to come from beyond the Rhine with his youthful prodigy: we would send him to the conservatoire, and the future author of Don Giovanni would be outdone by some laureate of three feet high, with his face smeared with gingerbread. It will not answer any longer merely to conquer the actual difficulties of execution; we must improvise. If you know nothing except to run your fingers over the keys, and shower down a deluge of notes on your audience, you still must improvise. We shall show that, after all, this is not so hard a matter as it seems, and that the last thing expected in an improvisatore, is the talent of extempore composition. He who has inserted in his advertisements the magic words which announce that he intends confining himself solely to the inspirations of his genius, is always sure of being received with a murmur of mingled curiosity and admiration; this is the first element of success. His second and chief chance consists in his dress, his attitude, and his manner of executing. Let us look at these three points. It is impossible for him to make his appearance except in a tight-bodied black coat, with huge projecting ruffles; his hair must hang carelessly and partly cover his forehead; occasionally he gives his head a shake to rid himself of these troublesome locks. He advances, bows awkwardly, (because he has not had time to learn to bow,) seats himself at the piano, turns up his ruffles, and bends his body forward in the attitude of a hermit in meditation, or St. Cecilia listening to seraphic music. Next he makes the piano tremble by a tremendous blow, that makes half-a-dozen ladies start from their seats, and a hundred dilettanti faint away with delight. Look out! the fireworks have begun, rockets whirl past each other, fuses fly, crackers burst, Catherine-wheels whirl, blue lights blaze, red and blue rain comes down by handfuls, and lastly, the grand finale crowns the whole scene of confusion by a series of explosions as loud as a volcano's. Such is the performance of the improvisatore; he torments the piano for an hour together; he gets out of it all the sound it contains, he unites in one inexpressible mass of discord the strangest combinations; but then he did not hesitate nor stop for a moment as if a lawyer, who had a good cause, would lose it, if he should happen to be at a loss what to say for a single moment. Next morning come the criticisms of newspapers, large and small, none of whom are sorry to rise into a little flight of poetry on the occasion of this musical steeple-chase. Only read them—one will say, "While our beloved Penseroso (or whatever the name may be) ran over the melodious keys of his instrument, it seemed as though the heavens had opened above us, to shower down all their celestial harmonies on this world of sorrow, on this vale of tears." Another favours us with a different commentary on the same text, as thus: "While the high notes were raising their sharp tones in our ears, they sounded like the incessant wailings of the spirits of the condemned, traversing the depths of their jaws to arrive at the gates of heaven." Thus, you see, the improvisatore is a poet, a great artist, a great man. Why should we not ask him to write an essay on hieroglyphics, or to be good enough to discover the longitude! For surely nothing can be unknown to the gifted mortal, who can thus give us the music of the spheres, off-hand, at ten francs per ticket.

THE ARTIST'S INCONVENIENCE.—There is a bench in one of the public gardens of Paris, which is the resort of the inferior class of musicians, and where the keepers of places of amusement are in the habit of coming to hire performers. One fine morning, the keeper of one of the guingettes, or little dancing-and-drinking houses in the suburbs, came there to hire musicians for the evening, and saw a little old man, of cheerful air, walking up and down. He accosted him at once: "Are you a musician?" "Yes." "I want some one to play for me to-night." "What will you give me?" "Three francs." "It is a bargain." In the evening the musician took his place in the little orchestra, and begun to play waltzes for the grisettes and their lovers, who formed the company. Soon the dance was deserted—every one crowded round the orchestra to listen to a music very different from what they were used to hearing. The ball-room grew still as death, except when the silence was interrupted by prolonged and vehement bravos. The landlord was as much surprised and delighted as the rest. "Pray, sir, who are you?" "Ferdinand Pair, maitre de chapelle to his Majesty Charles X." It was indeed he, the first musician and composer of the day, who, for a frolic, had pocketed his three francs, and agreed to amuse a far more miscellaneous audience than those he was accustomed to see.

A MUSICAL FAMILY.—There lives in a little village in Silesia a large family, in which music has been cultivated with an industry and a success seldom equalled. This family comprises, reckoning from the great-grandfather down to the smallest of the great-grandchildren, no less than fifty-four souls, all of whom, that is, all who are old enough to talk, are musicians, and perform on different instruments; so that they can easily form a complete orchestra without going out of the family. They execute Mozart's and Haydn's symphonies, Bach's and Homelin's chorusses, etc. with a great deal of castell. Perhaps other similar instances of musical talent and skill may be found in Germany; but we are certain it would be idle to look for them elsewhere.

M. and B.—One of our journals lately remarked that the letter M. was the most important initial in musical matters, and mentioned Mozart, Mehul, Mendelssohn, Moscheles, Meyerbeer, Mayrader, Molique, Marx, Milder, and some others. The Leipzig Musical Gazette, on the other hand, thinks there is nothing like B., and runs on with Bach, Beethoven, Boieldieu, Bennett, Bocklet, Bishop, Bellini, Bertini, Bohrer, Berlioz, Burgmüller, Barmann, Benedict, Bellaville, Blahetka, Blanchard, Brahms, Balfe, Bocha, Benoit, etc. Besides which, Breitkopf is the first musical publisher of Germany, and Broadwood the best piano-maker in England.

THE NIGHTINGALE.—The habits of this bird are singular. It arrives in England about the middle of April, and the male generally comes ten or fifteen days before the female. If he is caught during this interval, he is easily kept, and does well; but if they are not caught till after pairing, they are almost sure to die. They are abundant in Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, and it is very singular that but few reach England, and in Scotland they are unknown.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. Terms, five dollars per annum, payable in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

[We had the pleasure, "long time ago," of publishing the firstlings of the muse of Miss Fanny Kemble, which excited, at the time, a remarkable degree of attention among literary circles. With equal gratification, we now enrich the Mirror with an original production, the first published in the country, from the pen of Miss VANDENHOFF. This beautiful and accomplished young lady is the only artiste that we have seen, worthy to succeed that singularly-gifted creature, the niece of Siddons, whose vivid delineations of dramatic character haunt the memory like half-forgotten music or pleasant dreams. The opinion seems to be unanimous, that our fair correspondent is, in her arduous profession, a "bright, particular star," unrivalled in brilliancy by any as new in its orbit. She is yet upon the threshold of life, and if the woman do but realize the promises of the girl, a splendid career of histrionic triumph is before her. The public always take a lively interest in everything relating to its favourites; and when, as in the present instance, there is an union of literary and poetical talent with the capacity of impersonating, with fidelity and force, the bright creations of the English drama—rare qualities, indeed, combined in the same individual, and that a young lady yet in her teens—the productions of her muse never fail to command universal attention. The stanzas which follow are exceedingly beautiful, and the mine from which they are drawn is unquestionably rich in similar treasures.]

THE BLUSH.

BY CHARLOTTE E. VANDENHOFF

Unbidden I come
From my prison home,
Where I linger mid smiles and tears:
Oh! the sweetest word
I ever have heard
Has waked me with fluttering fears!

And first o'er the snow
Of the bosom I flow,
Then change the fair hue of the brow;
And see, on the cheek,
Though silent, I speak,
Sweet secrets revealing their now.

A traitor am I!
For a gentle sigh
May be breathed for another's woe;
And the crystal tear,
All bright and clear,
From soft pity may oftentimes flow.

But one little thought,
With tenderness fraught,
One word into life makes me start;
Love bids the tongue hush—
He speaks in a blush—
A blush tells the tale of the heart!

THE DEAD GUEST.

BY HEINRICH ZSCHOKKE

CHAPTER III.

The country residence just outside the town which now belongs to the Becker family, was formerly owned by the Barons von Noren. The last baron was a spendthrift. He seldom visited this castle, except to recruit his finances after a season at Paris or Venice; and his residence here was only a continuation of his former extravagance on a smaller scale. Traces of the former splendour may yet be seen in the ruins of the old buildings and the vast gardens by which they were surrounded.

The last time that the baron visited his seat, was at an unusual time, and with an unusually large circle of visitors, that is, late in the year, and accompanied by fifteen or twenty young noblemen and their servants. His daughter was betrothed to the Viscount de Vivienne, a rich and amiable voluptuary, who had visited Germany in the service of Cardinal Dubois. Dubois was the all-powerful minister of the Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, and Vivienne his especial favorite. It may easily be supposed that the Baron von Noren omitted nothing to make the country as agreeable as possible to his guests. The pleasures of the table, the chase, of play, of short excursions and private theatricals succeeded each other incessantly. Count Altenkreuz, a wealthy young nobleman, of one of the best families on the Lower Rhine, was the master of ceremonies. He loved high play, and had an inexhaustible spirit of invention in all kinds of sport and amusement. The baron had, lately made his acquaintance, and brought him with him to Herbesheim. As winter drew near, Altenkreuz proposed to give a series of masked balls, for which each cavalier was to choose his lady from the neighbourhood, without regard to rank or birth, but only beauty. In fact there was a deficiency of ladies at the castle, and the Baroness von Noren and her few friends were completely lost in the crowd of gentlemen. "Why look at pedigree, when pleasure is the object?" said Altenkreuz, "beauty is to be found in every class, and there are some grisettes, who would do honour to a court." All applauded these remarks, and tailors, milliners and carpenters were soon at work. The Viscount de Vivienne was determined to surpass all others, and Altenkreuz equally determined to eclipse him. He looked about him for the most skilful tailor, and the prettiest damsel, and found both under one roof. Master Vogel was the prince of tailors, and his daughter Henrietta boasted charms which produced only too deep an impression on the count. He began to visit Master Vogel very frequently. There was always something to look after, especially in Henrietta's sewing. He ordered two sets of splendid ladies' masquerade dresses, and had the measure of the tailor's daughter taken for them, saying that his partner was a lady from a neighbouring castle, whose tall and graceful figure was exactly like Henrietta's. He was very liberal too, and the finest presents as may be imagined, were bestowed on Henrietta. Whenever he happened to find her alone, he said many flattering things, and finally began to speak of love. The damsel refused to lend an ear to his wooing, for she was a virtuous girl, and besides, already pledged to one of her father's journeymen; still she was not displeased at the attentions of so distinguished and polite a nobleman, for ladies are seldom offended at those who do them few days before the ball. Altenkreuz entered the tailor's house, seemingly vexed and dissatisfied. He wished to speak a word with him alone.

"Master Vogel," said he, "I am in a very unpleasant situation. You can, if you choose, help me out of my trouble, and if you will, I will pay you better for it than if you should sit making ball-dresses for a twelvemonth."

"I am in all things your excellency's most obedient servant," replied the smiling and bowing tailor.

"Well, Master Vogel, only think: the lady who was to have been my partner is sick, and sends her excuses. All the other gentlemen have their partners, most of them daughters of your citizens here. Now here I am, alone. I might perhaps find a lady in some of the aldermen's families, but where is there one whom the dresses would fit? So you see, I am forced to ask you to let me take your daughter. The dresses we know will fit her exactly."

The tailor hesitated at first. So great an honour as this he was not prepared for, so he kept bowing on in silence.

"Henrietta shall have no reason to repent it," pursued the count, "the dress she is to wear shall remain her property, and I will with pleasure provide whatever is necessary to make her appear to advantage in a brilliant assembly."

"Your excellency is too good," cried Master Vogel. "Be pleased to remain here, I will just speak to my daughter, and send her here."

"But, master," rejoined Altenkreuz, "Henrietta's lover may perhaps be jealous, which would be most unreasonable. You must explain the matter to him."

"Poh, he does not dare open his mouth," was the hasty answer, and the tailor left the room. Shortly after Henrietta entered the apartment, blushing deeply. The count covered her hand with kisses, and told her of his awkward situation, offering to provide everything for her, so as to enable her to appear as well as the most richly-dressed lady at the ball. She blushed again, especially when he told her that she would be the belle of the room, and handed a pair of magnificent earrings. This was too much for a vain, weak girl. Henrietta ran over in her mind the splendour of the entertainment, herself in the midst of it, admired and dazzling, and dressed from head to foot like the first lady in the land—but she stood embarrassed and stammered out something about her father's permission. Altenkreuz satisfied her on this point, and as she no longer hesitated to grant his request, he clasped her in his arms, and cried, "Henrietta, why should I conceal it from you? You, and no one else, were my chosen partner from the first moment I saw you. I chose you for my partner before you were measured for these dresses—only for my partner then—now how gladly would I choose you for something nearer and dearer—for I adore you. Thou art too wondrous lovely, to become the spouse of a rude, starving journeyman-tailor—thou art destined for higher things. Dost thou, wilt thou understand me?" She made no answer, but escaped from him into her apartment. Now, however, there began to be trouble in the tailor's house; for his journeyman Christian, Henrietta's lover, was half crazy when he heard what was going on. Neither the caresses of the weeping girl, nor the anger and threats of her father, could make him listen to reason. Henrietta got no sleep that night. She really loved Christian; but she felt no inclination to yield to him, and give up the only chance she might ever have of exciting the envy of all the town by her beauty and splendour at the ball. She even began to suspect that he did not really love her, or he would not have grudged her a pleasure which seemed to her so innocent. The next day Christian was less violent, but still kept repeating, "You shall not go to the ball!" to which Henrietta uniformly answered, "I will, though!" to which the father would add, "and go she shall, in spite of you, I command it." But when the day came, and it appeared that she was still determined to go, Christian packed up his little bundle and stood before her in a travelling dress. "If you go," said he, "I go too, and we are parted for ever." Henrietta turned pale, and began to weep. Just then a servant of Count Altenkreuz entered, bearing a package, as a present from his master. It contained a rich veil, silks and ribands without end, rings and jewels. Henrietta looked sidelong through her tears at the rich presents, and wavered between vanity and affection.

"You shall not go!" repeated Christian.

"I will," replied Henrietta, haughtily. "You do not deserve my love or my tears. I now see that you never really loved me, since you would deprive me of so innocent a gratification."

"Be it so!" answered Christian. "Go! you are breaking a constant heart." He flung her ring down at his feet, went, and returned no more.

Henrietta wept and sobbed, but the evening came, and in decorating herself for the festival, she soon forgot her lost lover. The count's carriage took her to the castle. He and Henrietta were dressed in black, in the ancient German costume. The splendour of their dress attracted all eyes; they outshone even the Viscount de Vivienne and the young baroness, both of whom wore Turkish dresses.

"The man in black must be the count," said the viscount to his bride; "he cannot hide himself in a mask, for that long hop-pole body of his cannot be shortened, and he is a head taller than any one in the room. I am more curious to know who his partner can be. She has a fine figure, and dances divinely."

"Some common person from town," said the baroness, "you can tell by her awkwardness."

It was late before supper was served. At the meal the masks were removed. The viscount could not gaze his fill at the lovely German. He sat by her side at table, and Count Altenkreuz next to the baroness. The two gentlemen seemed to have exchanged parts with each other, for while the viscount was loading his delighted neighbour with compliments and more than compliments, the count was equally attentive to his betrothed. "Upon my life!" said the viscount to Altenkreuz, after the tables were cleared, "I shall steal your partner from you, even if I have to fight for her."

"I have my revenge in my power, my dear viscount," was the answer; "I shall steal your amiable baroness."

The viscount, warmed at once by his new passion and old wine, said unthinkingly, and not noticing that the baroness was near enough to hear him, "I would give a dozen of her for that one Venus in the antique dress!"

"Viscount," cried the count, earnestly, "you do not know what you say. My partner is pretty, I grant, but the prize of beauty belongs only to the queen of this festival, your bride."

"Titular queen, only! titular queen! I do homage to the actual sovereign!" exclaimed the viscount. Altenkreuz endeavored to silence him by frowns, but in vain. His neighbour grew bolder in his language, and he was forced to use a sterner tone himself. Wrath of language on one side produced angry responses on the other, till each of the two gentlemen had insulted the other deeply. To avoid notice they withdrew to another apartment, where the count produced two swords. The viscount, still boiling with anger, snatched one, flung away the scabbard, and set on his antagonist with blind fury. The contest had hardly lasted three minutes before the viscount's weapon flew out of his hand, and struck a mirror on the wall, shattering it into a thousand pieces.

"Base, contemptible wretch!" said Altenkreuz, "your life is at my mercy. Away and never again pollute this spot with your presence." He struck him slightly with the flat of his sword, and flung him out of the door. That night, the Viscount de Vivienne and his retinue quitted the castle.

Deeply as the young baroness had been offended at the viscount's rudeness, she felt it atoned fully for by the honour of having had swords measured in her cause. She had never really loved the viscount, she now hated him, while, on the other hand, Altenkreuz, whom she had always thought so ugly, now seemed quite interesting. It was easy for him to perceive the change in her sentiments, and as easy to avail himself of it. He danced with her repeatedly, avowed his passion, and was heard without displeasure. Meantime Henrietta was intoxicated with joy. She had never heard or seen so many fine things before, and her gratitude to her partner was in proportion. He took her home himself, and though he was forced to steal the first kiss at parting, she granted him the second. Next day he did not fail to wait on both his partners, the highborn and the humble, and he contrived to flatter both, till each felt sure that his affections were her's alone. He made splendid prosenote to the old tailor, who soon felt rich enough to give up his shop, and the baron was loud in praise of his virtues, and not without reason, for his intended son-in-law had advanced him a large sum of money at a very crucial moment. It was an easy matter, therefore, for him to obtain the consent of both parents, as well as both his mistresses. Nor was this all, for he played the same game in the family of one of the town officers, whose daughter he had estranged from her lover, and then courted her himself. The baron gave a splendid entertainment on his daughter's wedding-day. Henrietta was invited; among the rest, and the count obtained permission from his bride to escort her to the ball. The weather was fearful; wind, rain and snow seemed to strive for the mastery. Even thunder and hail were not wanting. Huge trees were broken by the fierce storm, and tiles rattled down from the roofs. Thus, however, was not noticed in the ball-room, where a hundred lustres shed around an artificial day, and wine, mirth, and love abounded undisturbed by the tumult without. The baroness and Henrietta fairly swam in pleasure; the one, proud of her wealthy husband, of the priceless jewels, his presents, which glittered on her dress, and caused the wonder and envy of all present; while Henrietta, though forced to give up the count to his bride, found no lack of admirers and flattery. Towards midnight the baroness left the ball, and was followed by her husband. When he returned, the guests were preparing to depart. Carriages were driven up. Altenkreuz conducted Henrietta to his, and escorted her home himself. She found everything hushed in sleep. She opened the door softly, and struggled in vain to prevent her companion from following her. The coach drove off and he remained with her.

Early the next morning, a fearful, astounding report went round that the daughter of one of the city functionaries had been found dead in her bed, with her throat twisted round. The people began to gather round the house, and physicians and the police were hastily sent for. The sounds of woe were heard loud and shrill from within. Many began, all at once, to recollect what had happened a hundred years before, and also in the time of advent. The story of the dead guest ran from mouth to mouth. Master Nozel heard the sad news, and thought of Henrietta with secret terror. Her sleeping so long did not make him uneasy; for he knew she had staid late at the ball. But when he thought first of the dead guest, and then of Count Altenkreuz, his tall thin figure, his pale face, and the deep black suit he always wore, he could not help feeling anxious. He tried to laugh off his superstitious fears, and went to the cupboard for a glass of the wine which the count had sent him. The flask was gone!—and, as he looked further, he found that all the presents he had received had likewise disappeared. Fearing the worst, he crept softly up to his daughter's room, and when he opened the door, there she lay, dead—her face turned towards her back. Hardly knowing what he did, he hurried for a physician. The man of art eyed the body long, and shook his head doubtfully. The father, who would have lost all he was worth sooner than that the truth should be known, hinted, that over-exertion at the ball, or a sudden chill during the ride home, had probably caused her death. While the whole town was talking about the sad end of the two maidens, a new rumour began to spread, at the sudden death of the only daughter of Baron von Noren. The medical men, when they returned from the castle, all told the same story, that the baroness was alive that morning—perhaps still living; that she had been attacked by apoplexy from over-excitement at the ball, and so forth; but who would believe it? All were satisfied that she had suffered the same fate as the others, and the baron had not spared his gold to purchase the physicians' silver. His house, so lately the scene of tumultuous enjoyment, had become a house of mourning; as himself was inconsolable. To increase, if possible, his horror, he soon found that all the piles of gold and bills, all the necklaces, rings, and jewels, which the count had presented to either father or daughter, had vanished with the life of the latter. The count himself, for whom diligent search was made, had disappeared most strangely. His rooms were as empty and clean as though he had never occupied them. He had disappeared with baggage, horses, carriage, servants, and everything, and not a trace of him or them could ever be found. The three unhappy brides were interred on the same day, and it chanced that the three funeral processions met in the churchyard. The priest performed the service over all at the same time. Then one of the mourners, wrapped in his black mantle, was seen to step aside from the rest, before the prayers were ended, and hardly had removed a few paces before he seemed to change his shape, and appeared in strange, antique garments, as white as snow; and, as he moved, three dark red spots were seen on his back and breast, and drops of blood fell on his white doublet and hose, in the sight of all. He moved towards the slaughter-ground, and there vanished. Fear came on all the company, and still more on the grave-diggers, when they lifted up the coffins to lower them into the vault; for they felt as light as though they were empty. Full of panic-terror, they let them down, and covered them hastily with earth. Black clouds, with heavy bursts of rain, spread over the country. All ran in affright towards the town, and a sharp wind, with gusts of rain and snow, blew after them.

Soon after, the Baron von Noren left his country-seat, and neither he, nor any of his name, ever returned to it. The gardens lay waste, and the castle stood empty, till it was destroyed by fire. So ended Waldrich's tale. It was evident that the second part of his story had produced less impression than the first; still it had its effect—for the legend was the subject of conversation for the whole evening. The stoutest unbeliever was Herr Bantes. His wit, however, made but little impression; for he was generally looked upon as a kind of free-thinker, and it was known that the old clergyman had alluded to him when he preached against Arians, Socinians, Rationalists, Deists, and Atheists. The subject became next day the talk of the whole town—and no wonder; for the time for the centennial appearance of the dreaded stranger was near at hand, and even the skeptics were anxious to know how the thing would end. Waldrich himself did not learn till sometime after ward what an unexpected result his story had produced; for he was obliged to leave Herbesheim for some weeks on military duty. He would gladly have staid, not only on account of the winter, which threatened to set in early, but for Frederica's sake, or rather his own. He felt no doubts as to her truth, nor her firmness in resisting the proposed union with Herr von Hahn; still a hundred thousand possibilities daunted him. But there were his orders, and he had nothing to do but to obey them.

CHAPTER IV.

"Ah, poor Waldrich!" said Frederica to her mother, on Sunday, after they had come home from church, and sat chatting by the window of their warm parlour, looking at the deserted streets, now deluged with rain. "I do hope he is not on the road now! While he was here, we had the finest weather in the world; and now he is gone, it is horrible."

"A soldier must bear with everything," replied her mother. "And remember, if you marry a soldier, to accustom yourself at once to the idea that your husband belongs to his king, and not to you—to honour more than to love—to the camp more than the fireside; and that a hundred deaths are watching for him, where only one lies in wait for other men. For that reason I would never have married a soldier."

"But only look, mamma, how the wind roars, and how black the clouds are! and see, great hailstones falling along with the rain!"

Her mother smiled, for a strange idea came in her head. After awhile, she said: "Frederica, what do you think? This is the first Sunday in Advent, when the dead guest always makes his appearance. It seems he always announces himself by a storm."

"I will engage, mamma, that the weather makes our good town-people terribly afraid. They are locking their doors at noon, for fear the stranger should get in."

At this moment, her father came in hastily, laughing in such a strange kind of way, that it was hard to say whether it was nature or forced.

"Stuff and nonsense, and all that!" cried he. "Go into the kitchen, mother, and bring the gals to their senses, or they will fling the roast-beef into the soup, the soup on the vegetables, and the vegetables in the milk-pail."

"What is the matter?" asked his spouse.

"Why, don't you know? The whole town says that the dead guest has arrived. Two of my workmen came in just now, wet as rats and frightened to death, to tell me what they had heard. I did not want to listen to their nonsense, and went away. As I came past the kitchen-door, I heard a noise among the servants, and put my head in to see what was the matter. As soon as the fools saw my black wig, they began to scream and run away, taking me for the dead guest. 'Are you all mad?' I roared out. 'Oh, goodness!' bawled the cook, 'you did frighten me terribly, Herr Bantes. I ought not to be ashamed if I have promised to marry Max the chimney-sweeper. But now things turn out so, I wish I had never seen him in all my days!' Then she began to blubber, and when she wanted to wipe her eyes, let the frying-pan full of eggs tumble into the fire. Susan is sitting in the chimney-corner with her apron at her eyes. Old Charlotte is in great trouble too, spite of her fifty years, and keeps trying to clean a carving-knife, and cutting her finger with it every minute."

"Did not I say so, mamma?" cried Frederica, screaming with laughter.

"Bring them to their senses, mother," repeated the old gentleman, "else the first performance of the stranger will be to make us go without our Sunday dinner."

Frederica repaired to the scene of commotion, laughing and exclaiming: "That he can't do it at all events!"

"These things," her father continued, "are the precious fruits of superstition and ignorance. All are smatterers, from the hostler to the prime minister! School-boys and divines, professors and old nurses, are all out now-a-days against instruction, and say it produces insubordination, irreligion and revolutions, and try to stupefy the people back into their ancient ignorance. They will not give a penny for improving our schools, but millions for troops and powder. That is it. Superstition all over. The first Sunday in advent, and a storm—and the fools creep into corners, and cross and bless themselves, as though the dead guest made it rain on a Sunday, and all that."

His wife smiled, and only answered, "Don't be so earnest and angry! the matter does not warrant it."

"Not warrant it! Ah, you are a little touched too, mother! Don't try to justify superstition—don't try to justify any such nonsense! When I make my will, I mean to leave a legacy of ten thousand guilders to a teacher at one of our schools, to learn the children common sense. He who can tolerate such crazy fancies about spirits, devils, apparitions of the dead, and unearthly visitors, would bear to see the whole world a lunatic hospital, and every country a slave-market, with half of the people groaning as serfs, and the other half keeping watch over them with cannon and musketry. Curses on their superstition! Things will never be better till another Bonaparte comes to teach the fools something."

While Herr Bantes was declaiming thus, walking quickly up and down the room, and stopping every now and then to fire off a fresh volley, his book-keeper crept stealthily into the room.

"It is all true, Herr Bantes."

"What is true?"

"He has arrived. He lodges at the Black Cross Hotel."

"Who lodges at the Black Cross Hotel?"

"The dead guest."

"Stuff and nonsense! You are a grown-up man, why will you believe everything that old women tell you?"

"But my eyes are not old women. I went to the Black Cross through curiosity; the town-clerk was with me, as I may say. We took a glass of krusch together, as a pretext, as I may say. There he was."

"How?"

"I knew him at first sight. The landlord seems to know him too, for as he went out, he turned to the town-clerk, opened his eyes, and drew down his mouth and eye-brows, as if to say, that man, so to say, is not here for any good."

"Fiddle-de-dee!"

"The collector, who knew him as soon as he saw him, has gone off to the police."

"The collector is a superstitious fool, and ought to be heartily ashamed of himself."

"No doubt, sir, but allow me to say, if it is not the dead guest, he is his twin-brother. A pale face, dressed in deep black from top to toe; and a body two yards long; a triple gold chain round his neck; his fingers loaded with brilliants; a splendid equipage, and travels extra post."

Herr Bantes eyed the book-keeper long, with a look in which surprise seemed to contend with doubt, then laughed loud, and said, "Is the devil busy with us, that such a man must come just on the first Sunday in advent?"

"And just as church was out, while the people were hurrying home, and the wind and rain, so to say, were the fiercest."

"What is his name?"

"I don't know, but suppose he takes any name they please; at one time he will call himself count of Graves, at another Count Altenkreuz. It seems to me suspicious, so to say, that he went straight to the Black Cross. The name seems to have attracted him."

Herr Bantes stood for a while, lost in deep thought, but at last passed his hand across his forehead, and said, "It's nothing but chance, a strange sort of circumstances. Nonsense! But still it is a queer thing—on the first Sunday in advent, in terrible weather, tall, pale, dressed in black, the jewels, the equipage—I would not believe a word of it all, my friend, if I did not know you to be a sensible man. You hear the story of the dead guest, you see a stranger dressed in black, and in a moment your fancy runs away with you, and you imagine all the rest."

So he said, and would not be persuaded out of it.

(Conclusion to our next.)

SKETCHES OF REAL LIFE.

THE YOUTH OF PROMISE.

CHAPTER I.

"Give me, O, give me back the days
When I—I too—was young."—Goethe.

My friend, Mr. Sydney Sumpter, was a resident of the state of Virginia, and a descendant of one of the noble cavaliers, who were among the earliest settlers in the Ancient Dominion. He was a gentleman of handsome fortune, with a fine landed estate, an elegant mansion, and a cohort of slaves. His ancestral domain was usually designated by the name of Eagleswood. Mr. Sumpter was not a remarkable man. His favorite beverage was apple-toddy; and he called his wife Mrs. S.

One morning, after breakfast, as he was perusing the last Richmond Enquirer, Mrs. S. was surprised to see his countenance light up with a sudden gleam of intelligence, as if an idea had entered his head, and was looking round apprehensive that it had walked into the wrong room. An emery suggestion was evidently struggling for delivery; and throwing down the paper, Mr. Sumpter yawned, and at last was safely relieved of the following interrogation.

"Didn't you tell me, Mrs. S., that—yaw—aw—aw—that Harry had been turned away from Hilson's?"

"Yes, my dear; actually turned away. Hilson said to him one day: 'Sir, you have told me an untruth'; whereupon Harry threw a bottle of ink at his head. I do believe the poor boy didn't mean any harm. He was only a little hasty. It was afterwards proved that Hilson's accusation was unjust. Hilson says he is irreclaimable; but Beaumont, the usher, says he has a taste for the classics, and is a boy of parts."

"Well, Mrs. S., what shall we do with him? Yough—ugh! But stop, my dear. We have discussed the subject sufficiently for the present. Next week we will resume it. Is that the Knickerbocker on the table? Just toss it over to me, if you please."

As this conjugal dialogue subsided, the object of it might be seen mounted on a spirited pony, galloping at full speed in the avenue towards the house. His dress manifested a mingled predilection in the wearer for jockeyship and dandyism. He was apparelled in a green hunting-frock, with plated buttons bearing the impress of a fox's head, black tights, and military boots with tassels. On his head he wore a black velvet cap, clasped with a band of silver and jauntily set upon one side. As he dismounted, he might be heard greeting the black domestics in the court-yard in a manner which called forth from them irrepressible peals of laughter. "Plato, you old heathen, take good care of Saladin, and curry him down well, if you wouldn't have me spoil your beautiful profile with the but-end of my whip—Zip, you long tail! Who you looking at, Miss Dinah! Glad to see you, old Pomp. Come, boys, clar de kitchen, and let me have a fair run!" and, breaking through the sable crowd of old and young, who welcomed his return, the boy rushed into the parlour, where his parents were seated. Dropping his riding-whip, he bounded towards his mother, and bending over her shoulder, received her kiss upon his cheek. He then re-animated his father with a cordial embrace.

The door now opened, and a fair girl, with soft auburn tresses curling closely about her temples, made her appearance.

"Emeline! my own sister!" exclaimed Henry Sumpter; and taking both her hands in his, he extended them at full length, and gazing a moment full in her face, implanted a kiss upon her forehead. The family meeting was complete.

But the black domestics were curious to examine the singular dress and appointments of their young master. "Lorra-gorry! whar did massa Harry get so much boot!" ejaculated a voice in a husky whisper, which the boy readily recognized as coming from behind the door, that was slightly ajar. A noise of suppressed laughter was issuing from the same direction, and casting a side-long glance towards the spot, he saw half a dozen ebony phizzes, one above another, peering through the aperture. Leaving his sister, who clapped her hands in anticipation of the mischief, he stole with furtive strides towards the door, and suddenly threw it wide open. The consequence was that an aggregation of blacks were precipitated into the room, laughing, screaming, and hurrying back, so that their intrusion might not be witnessed.

"What the deuse is the matter now?" exclaimed Mr. Sumpter, throwing down the "Knickerbocker."

"Nothing but a sudden fall in wool," replied the boy, with readiness. "It will be up again soon. Wasn't that capital fun, Emeline!"

CHAPTER II.

"O, wonderful son, that can so astonish a mother!"—Hamlet.

"Harry, how old may you be?" said Mr. Sumpter, taking off his spectacles.

"Fifteen, last March, sir; if I may trust the old family bible."

"And how can you reconcile such frivolity as you are in the habit of indulging in, with your age?"

"Why, sir, as I draw nearer towards my second childhood, I seem to resume a portion of the light-heartedness of my early years."

"Oh! the dear, smart little fellow!" exclaimed Mrs. Sumpter, with maternal admiration at the precocity of her offspring—"who else would have thought of making such a witty reply!"

"The reply, madam, is more remarkable for its impertinence than its wit," said Mr. Sumpter, who liked to be antithetical. "And, Harry, what have they been teaching you at Hilson's?"

"To smoke, chew tobacco and mix mint juleps," replied Harry, with amazing coolness. "Beaumont says, that they spoil the juleps at Richmond, by being too sparing of their peach brandy. I don't take snuff, sir; Beaumont says it's vulgar."

"Who the deuse is Beaumont?"

"Beaumont, sir! Egad, Beaumont is my tutor, who has been fitting me for college."

"Yes, and I dare say you are one of his most promising pupils. Has he limited your studies, sir, to those interesting branches, which you have named?"
